It was quite morning before the lovers discovered their attendants, when they immediately had the canoe launched, and getting into it, made for a small island lying in the middle of the river. Here they landed, drew up the canoe into the bushes, and prepared to pass the day—keeping, however, a good look out, in the mean time. Chikagou had calculated with absolute certainty upon his pursuers following him by land. And he was not mistaken; for, when the sun had been about two hours in the sky, one of his braves came in to inform him that there was a party standing upon the opposite shore. Chikagou stole forward to reconnoitre; and sure enough, there was Paatlako and six other Indians, looking directly into the island. Presently a musket-ball came whistling past Chikagou, which gave him to understand that he was discovered. This did not disconcert him, for he expected it; and, being armed with three good rifles, he did not fear an encounter. But it was his object to avoid this, for the sake of Tonika.

Remaining quiet, therefore, he watched his adversaries with the closest attention. After talking awhile, they ascended the bank of the river, and going into the wood, appeared again about three miles above, at a point that commanded a view of the channel on both sides of the island. Chikagou comprehended their design at once; which was, to build a raft, and, taking advantage of the current, float down the river, and land upon the island. He immediately brought the canoe to the south end, and returned to his post. It was near noon before the raft was completed, and the party, guiding it with long poles, were in the middle of the river; but, within a mile of the island, the channel divided; the raft was drawn to the west, which, putting the island between them and the eastern shore, Chikagou and his party immediately leapt into the canoe, and struck across and landed without being discovered. They drew up their canoe, and concealed themselves in the thick underwood on the shore. Paatlako was completely foiled. They saw him from their retreat, and enjoyed his perplexity. But he was not long in doubt. Again he put his raft in motion, and suffered it to float down the stream, while he attentively examined the shore. At about three miles below, he landed, remained a few moments, and then, leaving four of his men, with the other two descended the river again. This manoeuvre Chikagou did not understand. But the fact was, Paatlako had penetrated his design; and, leaving a party to watch the movements of the fugitives, he had determined to return to the village, and intercept them on their way down.

Either the four savages who had landed from the raft had failed to discover their retreat, or had no intention to attack them; for it was now dark, and they had not been molested. Chikagou, so far, had gained his object. He therefore took to the water again, pushed silently over to the opposite shore, and suffered the canoe to drift. As the river was full at this season—it being the latter part of the month of October—the current was rapid, and they glided on their way as fast as they could reasonably desire.

When Paatlako arrived at the village, the sun had set. But there was great news awaiting him. Several barges had that afternoon arrived from New Orleans, containing a large amount of goods for the French. This had determined the Indians to make the proposed attack the next morning. This was meat and drink to Paatlako. The plan being arranged, and everything in readiness for the morning's business, he and his two Indians took their muskets, and descending to the river, sat themselves down behind some bales, which had been landed from the barges, and awaited the appearance of Chikagou.

They had not remained there long, before the canoe came in sight. For once Chikagou had been rash. Relying upon the custom of the Indians never to post sentinels at night, he had suffered his vessel to drift toward the Natchez shore. Hence, so soon as he had come nearly opposite the party in ambush, they arose, and with a shout, brought their muskets to a level. Chikagou, fearing for the safety of Tonika, stood up and signified his desire to surrender. The muskets were grounded—the canoe turned her prow to the land—and the adventure seemed to have arrived at a speedy and disastrous end. But Paatlako, in his eagerness to secure the prize, incautiously threw himself into the water, and swam out to meet it. He had just reached the canoe, and put out his hand to seize it by the gunwale, when Chikagou buried his hatchet in his head. He sank without a groan, and disappeared down the stream.

Chikagou hesitated for a moment, to consider whether he had not better continue his voyage. But the two Indians had already seized their guns again, and their report would call out the whole village. This would again endanger Tonika. He therefore leapt ashore, the others immediately following, and was conducted at once to the presence of the Great Chief—for the village was still awake, under the excitement of the morning's expectations.

The Brother of the Sun reproached the young Michigan in bitter words. His conduct in carrying off Tonika was now made doubly offensive by the death of Paatlako. He was informed that he must be confined until to-morrow, and then be given up to be dealt with by the relatives of the dead chief. That was the custom, and Chikagou knew what it meant. He, however, though he did not fear death, loved his life for Tonika's sake. He therefore offered at once to renounce his tribe for ever, and become the subject of the Natchez despot. This offer softened him; and he qualified his severity by the offer of the young chief's life, upon the condition that he would take part in the morning's attack on the French. Chikagou did not hesitate to prefer death to such dishonour. Well, then, he must take the alternative. He was accordingly removed, and bound to a tree.

As for Tonika, she said nothing—and nothing was said to her; for a Natchez princess is as free as the sovereign himself. But her resolution was taken. She would deliver her lover, or die with him. She said this to herself quietly: and went quietly about her business. She had too much upon her mind to give way to tears or vain expostulations. Besides, she knew that, so far from melting the savage hearts of her people, they would only harden them. She therefore marked the place of poor Chikagou's imprisonment. This was nothing but a large cottonwood tree, to which he was laced with thongs, tighter than a modern young lady in a pair of Madame Cantello's corsets. Chikagou was not dismayed. He had in him a sound heart, full of Tonika and pious sentiments. Besides, he had great faith in Tonika's resources. And if he had not, seeing she was an uncommonly shrewd daughter of Eve—supposing, in opposition to modern geologists, that this continent was not peopled before Adam's days—why, then, he deserved to be burnt. But, he had—and the event justified his faith. Nevertheless, the night was fast wearing away, and he had heard nothing from her. It was now near day, when Tonika appeared, with a knife in her hand—whether to cut the thongs, or to invite him to join her in a journey to the unknown world, in the Parisian style of disconsolate lovers, he did not know—hardly cared. She approached, embraced him—which looked rather suspicious—then applied the knife to the leather, and he was free. She told him, he must make for the river, where his two men would be found waiting for him; remain there until he heard the report of guns, which would be the signal for the massacre. In the confusion, both he and she would be forgotten, and she would immediately join him.

Chikagou's first impulse, on his liberation, was to run down to the Fort, to apprise the French of their danger. In this he was unfortunate. The soldier on guard refused him admittance; and he was in danger of being shot for his pertinacity. Failing here, he next sought the dwelling of Father Philibert. But Father Philibert had departed a few days before, down the river. It was now broad day; and he turned with a sigh to seek his own security, leaving the Frenchman to his fate. He had no sooner reached the shore, than the firing began. The cries of the poor struggling victims, and the yells of the savages, filled the air with their dreadful reverberations. Presently Tonika came flying down the bank. A barge, which the two braves had already launched, and supplied with provisions and other articles from the bales and boxes at hand, received the lovers, and they were soon floating down the stream. Meanwhile the carnage was going on above them. The guns of Fort St. Rosalie sent forth their thunder—the drums beat—but all in vain. The attack had been too well planned; and not a man remained to tell the tale.

But let us not dwell upon the sanguinary scene. We must admit that it had been provoked; and that Chopart at least met the fate he deserved. And say what we may of these savage doings, there is not a civilized or Christianised nation on the continent of Europe, whose armies have not committed as great outrages; and, let us add, with even less provocation. Among the aboriginals of America, the white man has ever been the aggressor. But his superior knowledge has enabled him, hypocritically

For which, we doubt not, he will yet have to answer to a higher tribunal than public opinion.

But, leaving this sad subject, let us follow the lovers to New Orleans, where they arrived in a few days, bringing the first intelligence of the disaster. The city, containing at that time but about ten or twelve hundred inhabitants, was greatly alarmed. A general rising of the Indians was apprehended. But as their fears in this respect were unfounded, they soon set on foot an expedition against the Natchez. The most signal revenge was taken. The tribe was nearly exterminated; and the residue driven across the river never to be heard of again.

Chikagou and Tonika were married according to the rites of the Catholic Church. They passed the winter in the city, and in the spring returned up the river to Michigau. They both lived to be old—to be respected by the red and white man alike—and dying, left their name to be perpetuated by the flourishing city of Chicago.

JAPANESE EXPEDITIONS.

SCARCELY have two years elapsed since the attention of the public was drawn to the state of our commercial, or, rather, non-commercial relations, with those remote islands which comprehend the empire of Japan. We then laid before our readers a brief, but full view of the history of that country, its physical aspect, the productions of the soil, the religion, government, education, manners, habits of the people, and briefly alluded to the different missions that had lately been undertaken for the purpose of opening up, if possible, a friendly intercourse with the natives. The recent expedition fitted out by the Americans, who have been amongst the most enterprising voyagers in those seas, which perhaps, whilst we write, is ploughing its ocean-course to those distant islands, has again brought the subject before the world; and we may be pardoned if we take an ampler review of the embassies that have been sent out, and give a few of the most prominent features of that wealthy kingdom.

(1) See Sharpe's Magazine for August 1850.

A mystery has long hung over the condition of these islands, and curiosity has frequently been excited with respect to them—partly from what we know of them—partly from what we do not know. The restrictive laws that have been passed against the admission of strangers, and which have existed upwards of two centuries, sufficiently explain the causes of our ignorance; but whilst we confess that our information is imperfect, we would not draw the sweeping conclusions that some have ventured to do, and assert that we know nothing of those countries. Whilst we have the works of Kempfer, Thunberg, Siebold, and Charlevoix, we shall always retain more than sufficient acquaintance with them to whet our curiosity and excite our deepest interest.

The earliest information the Europeans received of the existence of Japan, or Zipangu, as it was then called, was from the celebrated Venetian traveller, Marco Polo, who, in company with his father and uncle, traversed the whole extent of the broad continent of Asia, and settled at the court of Khublai Khan, the conqueror of Tartary and China. The accounts of this young traveller, exaggerated and improbable as some parts of them were, were received with the keenest avidity by his credulous and excitable countrymen. The East had always existed in the imaginations of men as the region of wealth, luxury, and beauty, and the pictures of Marco Polo, in which he described the temples of Zipangu to be "roofed with gold," were perfectly consonant with the received idea of the exhaustless riches of these "countries of the sun." Accordingly, the minds of the Venetians were filled with the most extravagant desires of visiting those remote islands and participating in the treasures of their gold and diamond mines. But their imperfect acquaintance with navigation was a barrier to the realization of their wishes, and it was not until the year 1552 that the true position of that kingdom was known to the West.

The Portuguese, from the time of the discovery of a passage to the East Indies by doubling the Cape of Storms, or, as it was afterwards called, the Cape of Good Hope, in prognostication of the track by sea it would open to the Indies, had been indefatigable in their discoveries in those sunny waters. That long chain of rich and luxuriant islands, which group themselves between the tropics and link the great northern continent with the island-continent of Australia, had been already explored, and their indefatigable exertions had brought them into connexion with even China itself. But it was left to one of those overruling occurrences which mark, and in some degree explain, the mysterious dispensations of Providence, to discover the islands of Japan. In 1552 some Portuguese vessels, navigating the neighbouring seas, encountered a violent storm, and after buffeting for several days the fury of the waves, at last fell in with one of their harbours, in which they took refuge. Here they were hospitably received by the natives. Provisions and other necessities were supplied them, and every means taken to enable them to recruit their exhausted strength. Their ships, which had been shattered by the tempest, were refitted with materials, brought voluntarily by the inhabitants, and made sea-worthy; and when these Portuguese mariners were about to depart they were warmly invited to make a speedy return, and take such things as the country produced in exchange for whatever valuables they might think proper to bring.

The empire of Japan consists of three large islands and several smaller ones, lying between the parallels 30' and 45' north latitude, and bearing the same kind of relation to the Continent of Asia which the islands of Great Britain do to that of Europe. The area of these islands—Nippon, Jesso, and Kiusiu—exceeds that of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by 40,000 square miles. The population has been estimated at thirty millions, but it is difficult to ascertain the truth, and the probability really is that the number is overstated. Yeddo, the capital, is said by some to have a million or a million and a half of inhabitants, but the impossibility of arriving at any correct statement will be evident when it is mentioned that the citizens themselves fix it at ten millions. Meaco, Sakay, Osaka, and Nangasacki, also rank with the imperial city. The latter is situated in the most southern of the islands, Kiusiu or Kimo, and is reported to contain upwards of seventy thousand inhabitants. The other towns are populous, and the country is represented as covered with villages.

The idea which the shipwrecked Portuguese entertained of the riches of Japan, from their short sojourn on its coast, convinced them that a lucrative trade might be carried on with the Japanese; and when they left they not only expressed their gratitude for the humane attentions that had been paid them, but parted with many promises of a speedy return. No sooner had the tidings of this new discovery reached Lisbon, by the safe arrival of the Portuguese sailors, than numerous expeditions were fitted out, and speculators of every kind hastened over to Japan, to be the first to reap a prolific harvest from the golden opportunity now thrown in their way. The character given of the inhabitants encouraged many whom the prospects of vast wealth could not stimulate. In a short time these fortunate adventurers obtained a firm footing in the island. Marriages between them and the natives were contracted and solemnized; manufactures were established; the concerns of government entered into with unwearied assiduity; the work of conversion from idolatry to Christianity progressed with extraordinary success; and in every district and quarter of the empire the Portuguese might be found rapidly spreading and happy in the possession of an uninterrupted and gainful monopoly.

It was not long, however, before the Dutch, themselves as enterprising and daring as the Portuguese, and who had on many occasions proved themselves no contemptible rivals even in those seas, followed in their track, and by a similar misfortune became acquainted with Japan.

A trading fleet, consisting of five sail, fitted out from Texel, suffered much from tempestuous weather, and after a few days became separated. Of these vessels only one escaped, and this, after beating about for some time, was driven into a Japanese port. The situation of the crew was in the utmost degree miserable. They were exhausted by fatigue, want of provisions, and the incessant anxiety consequent upon being driven about by a violent storm upon a distant and untried sea. Few can appreciate the welcome of that morning which brought them within sight of land! They had no fear of inhospitable enemies or barren islands. All apprehensions were swallowed up in the one prevailing idea of delight that filled their hearts—one thought alone was theirs—the prospect of escape from the dangers that menaced their vessels and them. Eagerly they steered to the nearest point that seemed to give a promise of shelter, and after cruising about the coast for a short time they entered a bay that conducted them to a town and harbour. What was their astonishment at finding, mingled with the variegated costumes of the natives, which from its novelty gave an air of wildness to all around, the dress of Europeans! No sooner had they landed than the Portuguese came to welcome them, and their joy was complete. But treachery and deception awaited them. The Portuguese, who had thus apparently befriended them, offered to act as interpreters, to introduce them to the civic authorities, and to procure for them immediate relief. Accordingly the Dutch were conducted to the governor's house, where they were received with much show and ceremony. Questions were put to them, which the Portuguese undertook to explain, as well as to convey their answers. But no intention of assisting them existed in the minds of the Portuguese. They played false, and instead of giving correct answers, they made only such replies as condemned the unfortunate mariners. They dreaded lest the Dutch should interfere with their monopoly, as they had done in many parts of Asia, and thus basely represented these helpless and pitiable men as spies; and it is probable that the fate which belongs to such characters became the fate of these unfortunate victims of misplaced confidence and treacherous jealousy. An Englishman, however, of the name of Addams, who was one of the crew, managed to save his life, and ingratiating himself into the favour of the ruling powers, lived to become an influential man in the country, and a means of performing many valuable services to the Dutch and English, and even to the Portuguese, though they had acted so malignantly against him and his unfortunate companions upon their first arrival on the islands.

The reign of Elizabeth is memorable in the annals of our naval history. With a sagacity and penetration that characterised her government, she foresaw that England must become a maritime commercial country. Hence, priding herself upon the strength and magnitude of her armaments, the substantial bulwarks of that commerce, she encouraged her people to make voyages of discovery into every quarter of the globe. It is needless to point to names, whose brightness is imperishable, and whose number make the period of her rule a galaxy of glory; it is sufficient to state that to her conduct in this respect may be attributed the origin of the East India Company—a Company that has extended vastly the dominions, as well as the wealth of Great Britain in Asia, and which was called into existence shortly after by a royal charter.

It was during the eighth expedition, fitted out by this honourable federation of merchants for Japan, that two events of great importance to our commercial prospects in those quarters took place. The one was, the establishment of an English factory at Nangasaki; the other, an agreement drawn up and signed between the deputies of the East India Company and the ministry of the Japanese Emperor, for the better regulation of our intercourse. It was as follows: "We give free licence to the subjects of Great Britain, viz. to Sir Thomas Smith, Governor, and the company of East India merchants and adventurers for ever, safely to come into any of the ports of the empire of Japan, with their ships and merchandise, without any hindrance to them or their goods, and to abide, buy, sell, and barter, according to their manner with all nations, to tarry here as long as they think good, and to depart at their leisure." Captain Saris, who commanded this expedition, was a man of conciliating address, open heart, and incorruptible integrity, and the East India Company were not a little indebted to his urbane and courteous behaviour, which fascinated the Japanese emperor, for the privilege chartered in the above treaty. He even visited the imperial palace by express desire, and was in every way treated with great respect, the letters which he brought from his sovereign, James the First, being received with marks of peculiar distinction.

The results of this treaty were highly beneficial to all those whom it concerned. But the Portuguese were jealous of the Dutch, and the Dutch of the English, and every means that could be found to thwart the influence of the others, was adopted by the two former. On some occasions the attempts of the Dutch to magnify the importance of their government to the Japanese emperor served to render them ridiculous in the eyes of the rest of the world. They prepared maps of Europe to be laid before his imperial majesty, in which England and Portugal were represented as insignificant countries, and Holland a colossal empire, occupying two-thirds of the continent.

This absurd, and when it entailed worse consequences, which it frequently did, mischievous rivalry continued for upwards of half a century, when an event took place which crushed in the head the jealousy and ambition of these three nations, and restricted the commerce of the country to but one European power, the Dutch, and that too under the most stringent and humiliating regulations.

As an account of the causes which led to the expulsion of foreigners from the islands of Japan has already been given, in the number alluded to above, it will be unnecessary to detail them here. The Jesuits having endeavoured to overthrow the existing religion and subvert the government, having failed, a decree was instantly promulgated, banishing all strangers from the coasts and territories of Japan, under the most severe penalties, and closing its ports and harbours for ever against them under every circumstance. An exception, as we have observed before, was made in favour of the Dutch, who had assisted them in defeating the insurrection of the Portuguese and Christian natives, and who, it was asserted at the time, further purchased this privilege by denying their faith and performing the degrading ceremony of trampling the cross under their feet at one of the annual festivals of the natives. This gross charge against them has been partially answered by Dutch writers, who assert that their countrymen did not deny that they were Christians, but that they were of the same communion with the Portuguese; but the trampling of the cross under their feet would seem to imply that they did not wish to be accounted holding even a common or general connexion with them, and for this purpose, to gain a monopoly of comparatively speaking valueless privileges, they consented to treat with disrespect the symbol of their religion, a symbol that has been in every age and every country the glorious sign of their one belief.

It is not improbable that the injustice exercised towards the English on this occasion would have been severely dealt with, had not the government at home been distracted by the internal disturbances of the country and the impending struggles that even now began to menace the political horizon of Great Britain. Certain it is that no effort was made until long after to urge our claims of admission, and never, that we know of, to seek redress for the injuries inflicted in 1637, the year when they, in conjunction with the Portuguese, were banished; and a false delicacy has repressed the governments of Europe from demanding what must be acknowledged by every reflective mind a universal right, and by the law of nations the prerogative of all.

The exception made in favour of the Dutch, was the permission to send annually two ships from Batavia to the port of Nangasaki, but under such restrictions as make their crews for the time being little less than prisoners. Upon their arrival at the harbour, they are signalled to await the agents of the government, to whom they deliver up their arms, to be returned upon their departure. When in port they are only allowed to move about at stated times, and under surveillance, whilst in some instances the Japanese authorities affix the price to the articles they have brought with them for sale.

The Portuguese could ill brook the ascendancy of the Dutch in Japan, however ill-gotten that ascendancy had been, and in less than three years from the time of their expulsion made an attempt to renew their commercial relations with that people. Accordingly, a deputation was sent to Nangasaki, consisting of seventy-three persons, and accompanied with all imaginable pomp, to impress the emperor with the dignity of their claims and the sincerity of their intentions. But the fate that awaited them was consistent with the spirit of Japanese legislation. No sooner had they set foot upon the shore, than in defiance or contempt of the power and assumptions of the Portuguese, the governor ordered them to be seized and thrown into prison. Sixty-one out of the seventy-three were shortly after executed. The rest were sent adrift in an open boat, and with scanty provisions, upon the ocean, to find their way back to some friendly port, and to communicate to their countrymen the treatment they might in future expect upon a similar occasion. These unfortunate men, however, were never afterwards heard of, and it is probable that they perished in a storm or by the longer process of famine. Such summary justice exhibits at once the barbarity of the laws and the vindictiveness of this government.

For more than half a century the Japanese were allowed to remain unmolested and to enjoy the exclusiveness which they had established, no attempt being made to gain admission into their ports, until the year 1672, when the English arrived at Nangasaki, bearing a copy of the old treaty. The same inflexibility towards any communication was manifested, and after several interruptions the English sailed away without accomplishing their object. Such has been the result of every subsequent expedition.

The vigilance with which the Japanese guard against the infraction of these laws amongst their own subjects is curiously illustrated by the following anecdote:—In 1808 Captain Pellew, cruising about in those seas, was driven by stress of weather into one of their harbours, and being also in want of provisions, sent word to the governor that he stood in need of his assistance, and if he would order the necessary articles to be forwarded to the vessel he should be paid for them in return. The only reply which he obtained was a message, that unless he sailed away immediately the guns of the fortress would open upon him. The captain upon the occasion vindicated the dignity and character of the British nation. Instead of being intimidated by this haughty and inhuman threat, he gave the governor to understand that unless the provisions were speedily sent he would batter the town about the heads of the inhabitants. The result was, that supplies of every kind were brought, the vessel re-stored and put into a proper condition for leaving the harbour. The governor, however, who had allowed the provisions to be sent, met with a melancholy fate. He committed suicide. But in this unnatural conduct he acted in conformity with the laws of his country, by which it is enacted that if the man, convicted of the crime of which this governor was guilty, puts not an end to his own life, the lives of his wife and children shall be sacrificed and his property confiscated.

The searching examinations they maintain of every vessel that is admitted into their ports, cannot be better exemplified than by the following incident, which shows that no deception can impose upon, or caution elude their vigilance. During the late war, whilst the decrees of Napoleon closed the ports of the continent against England, the Dutch were obliged to go to America for a freight of manufactured goods. An American vessel was also placed at their service, and, being filled with a valuable cargo, set sail, arrived at Nangasaki, and proceeded with the disposal of their freight. But the government agents quickly detected that the build of the ship was dissimilar to what the Dutch had brought before; the texture of the goods, which were coarser than the English, was animadverted upon, and even the crew (there were Americans among them) were subject to their scrutinising suspicions. Upon this the whole stock was ordered to be re-shipped, the sailors to embark, and the vessel instantly to quit the harbour.

Such pictures will give some idea of the difficulties that lie in the way of obtaining a hearing from his imperial majesty, the Emperor of Japan. Within the present century, besides other embassies, the Russians sent a conciliatory expedition under the conduct of Vorseburg, but with no better success; and so lately as 1837, just two centuries from the period of the expulsion of the foreigners, the English government commissioned the Samurau to proceed to the port of Nangasaki, and endeavour to obtain a friendly conference, but to no effect. The Americans, taking with them some shipwrecked Japanese, whom they wished to restore to their country and their homes, also pursued the same plan. But their humane mission was no more respected than the efforts of other nations. However, they have been more active and vigorous than ourselves in their conduct towards the Japanese, and their demands have been more loud and determined. The failure of former negotiations has roused them again to undertake a more decided step, and, perhaps, whilst we are writing an expedition from New York is on its way to those distant islands, for the purpose of placing the commercial relations of that kingdom with the other nations of the world upon a more comprehensive and liberal footing, if possible; or at least to demand the restitution of several American sailors, who are said to be exposed in iron cages, in different parts of the kingdom, according to the custom adopted against those unfortunate creatures who happen to be driven upon the coast. Nor is this the least evil. After a certain interval they are executed as criminals. Another important object is to compel the emperor to sign a treaty engaging him to supply any shipwrecked mariners thrown on his shores, of whatever country they may chance to be, with whatever necessities they may require, and insisting upon the right of all nations to seek refuge in his harbours during stress of weather. To carry weight with their request and to ensure the accomplishment of this most humane object, a sufficient force accompanies this legation of mercy, consisting of three steamers, a frigate, a sloop-of-war, and a store-ship, all under the command of Commodore Perry, a man who has distinguished himself in the American navy, by an active and enterprising spirit, a generous and humane disposition.

It is to be sincerely hoped that the end of this expedition will be attained, independent of the new field of investigation it will open to the historian, antiquarian, naturalist and merchant, for the sake of charity; but more is it to be hoped that it will be attained without violence. It will be a great and a glorious day when the nations of the world, laying aside false and suspicious ideas of inter-communication, shall throw open their gates widely to all, and every man of every country find a generous welcome and unshaken security on whatever shore he may chance to set his foot.

COMMUNICATED BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

"I PROMISED, my dear Aunt," continued Nelly, "when I left you, to tell you everything I saw! I little knew what a promise that was when I made it! but there's something so mighty queer has happened lately in this great town, that I should like you to come to knowledge of it; it is so different from what's going on in poor old Ireland. I haven't much time for writing this month, so must tell it out of the face, and be done with it. Do you remember the watching we used to have when the war was going on betwixt Miss Mulvany of the big shop, and Mrs. Tony Casey of the red house, about the length of their gowns? All the county cried shame on Miss Mulvany, when the hem of her bran-new-Sunday-silk reached the binding of her shoe, and then they shouted double shame on Mrs. Tony Casey, all the way home from mass, when the next Sunday her dress touched the heel; sure it served us for conversation all the week, and every girl in the place letting down her hems—and happy she, who had a good piece in the gathers—and to see the smile and the giggle on Miss Mulvany's face! We all knew, when we saw that, that she'd come out past the common, the next Sunday; and so she did, and a cruel wet Sunday it was, and she in another silk, a full finger on the ground behind and before, and she too proud to hold it up! and that little villain, Paddy Macgann, coming up to her in the civilist way and asking if he might carry home her tail for her! And then the row there was between Tony Casey and his wife, the little foolish crayshur, because he refused her the price of a new gown, with which she wanted to break the heart of the other fool, Miss Mulvany, by doubling the length, and how Mrs. Casey would not go to mass, because she couldn't have a longer tail than Miss Mulvany! And sure you mind, Aunt dear, when all that work was going on, how the fine Priest stood on the altar, and 'Girls and boys,' he says—it was after mass—'Girls and boys, but especially girls, I had a drama last night, or indeed, to be spaking good English, it was this morning I had it, and I need not tell you, my little darlings,' (that was the kind way he had of speaking,) 'that a morning drame comes true. Well, in my drame I was on the Fair green, and there was a fine lot of you, all looking fresh and gay like a bank of primroses, and all sailing about like a forest of paycocks, with tails as long and as dragged as Mary Mulvaney has got, and Mrs. Tony Casey has not got.'— 'No fault of hers, plaze your Reverence,' said Tony. 'Hould y'er tongue, Tony,' said the Priest, 'until you're spoken to, and don't be a fool; when a wise man wins a battle, he shouldn't brag of it; and its ill manners you have, to be putting your Priest out in the face of his congregation. Where was I?'

" 'In a forest of paycocks, your Reverence,' squeaked little Paddy Macgann.

" 'That's a fine boy, Paddy, to remember what your Priest says.'

" 'Your Reverence promised me a penny the last time I held your horse,' squeaked Paddy again; upon which there was a grate laugh, in which his reverence joined. It was mighty sharp of Paddy.

" 'Well, girls,' continued his Reverence, 'you were all like paycocks, only some had longer tails than others, and very proud you were of them—mighty fine, and quite natural; showing them off, girls, not to one another, but at one another. Well, there is, as you all know, no accounting for drames, for all of a sudden who should come on the green, but the Black Gentleman himself! It's downright earnest I am. I saw him as plain as I see you; hoofs and horns, there he was; and when you all saw him, of course you ran away like hares, and those that had short gowns got clean off, tight and tidy, but as for poor Mary Mulvaney, and all like her, (in dress, I mean,) all he had to do, was to put his hoof on the gown tails, and they were done for—pinned for everlasting. Girls! remember the morning drame comes true! If ye make a vanity of your gown tails, it's a sure sign that the devil has set his foot on them. Now be off every one of you, and let me see you next Sunday.' Ah, Aunt dear, the tails were cut off to the shoe binding.

"Now, Aunt, it would be the greatest blessing in life if the fine ladies here had some little contrivance (those who walk) for keeping their dresses off the streets; it's a murdering pity to see the sweep they give to the dirt and dust as they float over the pavements; my mistress says, that long ago the upper petticoat reached the ankle joint, and was of quilted silk, mighty handsome, and the dress drawn up so as to show it a bit, and could be let down at pleasure; it's next to impossible to keep shoes and stockings clean, while what our good old priest called the 'paycock's tail' sweeps the streets as the lady walks. But, indeed, (as my dear good lady says,) 'extremes meet;' for will you believe it, that there has been an attempt made by some ladies from America, (that wonderful uneasy country, that's too big to contain itself, and must keep on a-meddling and a-doing for ever more,) to revolutionize, that is, stir up a rebellion against every stitch we wear! There is reason in all things; and it would be both more clean and more convenient if the ladies left it to the dear little red-coated ragged-school boys, to sweep the streets; but these ladies (Bloomers they call themselves) are for turning all the women into men, by act of parliament. I don't know if they have got any plan for turning the men into women, but my mistress says that must follow. You remember, Aunt, that we used to call the darling Miss Mildred a 'bloomer;' and there was a poem made about her, in such beautiful rhyme:

'Oh, you are like Cassandra fair,
Who won great Alexander's heart;
A bloomer, sweeter than the rose.'

I forget it, Aunt, but it continued very learned—about

'O'Donaghoo and the great O'Brien,
That bang'd the strength out of Orion.'

It was all about her, and her bating Venus for beauty, and went to the tune of 'Jackson's Morning Brush.'

"Only think of our darling Miss Mildred being thought of in the same day with these 'bloomers,' as if she wore a man's hat and waistcoat,—to say nothing of the other things,—in the broad light of day; and if that isn't enough, strapped over the boot! Our own born, bred, and reared Miss Mildred, with the blush of innocence on her cheek, a brow as fair as if it had been bathed in May-dew every-morning of her life, with the freshness of youth on her rosy lips, cauntering through the country on her snow-white pony, mau-fashion, to say nothing of boots and spurs!

"Well, this band of Bloomers is quite different to what you would expect from the name. My mistress bought the picture of one, and that was pretty enough to look at. But think of the dress of a slim young lady of ten years old, on a grown-up woman, particularly if she is rather fallen into flesh, and you'll see how I saw a stout Bloomer look,—certainly, that was not blooming. 'Anything looks well on youth and beauty; or rather, youth and beauty look well in anything; but the deepness of the dress was that it was only a cloak, (though that's not true, for cloaks are not Bloomer,) only a sign, or an all-over sort of badge, for another thing—putting us all into! Counsellor's wigs, and turning us into Parliament men and ministers; and police-inspectors and generals, and rifle-brigades. The upsettingest thing that ever crossed the wild waters of the Atlantic!

"My dear mistress shook her poor head, and said to me,—for I was greatly troubled at the first going off to think if it was passed into a law here, what I should have to turn to myself, or whether it would not be more patriotic for me to go back to ould Ireland and be a White-Boy at once, because if the women were turned into men, surely we'd have the best of it then, any how. I was troubled, for I hate the law, and as for Parliament, I never could stand the arguments there, as I'd like best to have my own way, without any contradiction, which a woman can do at home if she's at all cute; so, seeing me bothered, (this as I say was at the first) my lady was quite amused, and 'Ellen,' she said, 'do not trouble yourself about it, there is little doubt but that the more civilized we become, the more employment will be found for women, and the more highly will they be respected; but to be either happy or useful, a woman must be employed as a Woman, not as a man; she must be employed where her tenderness, her quick perceptions, her powers of endurance, her unselfishness, her devotion, are called into, and kept in, action. She who is the mother of heroes does not covet to enter the battle field herself,' said my mistress, all as one as if she was reading out of a printed book,—(I never could handle any thing but a stone, and should dead faint at the sound of a pistol, but I was not going to let on that to her),—so, 'True for you, Ma'am,' I said, though I was fairly bothered, but made bold to add, 'Sure no lady could attend to the Parliament-house and the wants of a large small family.'

"Oh!" she said, smiling, 'no married lady, I suppose, would think of entering Parliament, it would be very awkward indeed when a right honourable lady-member was delivering her opinion on the malt tax, or on the duty on bread stuffs, just as the ladies on the opposition benches cried out "Hear, hear!" to be interrupted by a message from the other house, of "Please, Ma'am, the baby wants you."'

"Well, I saw a great deal of good sense in this, and thought it would be better for women to be content to be women. I am sure we used to be very happy long ago, before this came into our heads, but the landlady I told you of did not think so: she has two or three friends that come and talk over all the domestic and un-domestic arrangements of all their 'gossips;' one of these ladies is a widow—for the second time, and they say she was the death of the first by her tongue, and of the second by her temper,—may be the one helped on the other against both the poor fellows! any how, the both are dead, and she makes a great boast of never taking a third; they say she was never asked; she is what's called a 'strong-minded woman,' she would say anything, or do anything; and what I can't understand,—though she is for ever abusing the men, and letting on she hates them and their ways,—is that she does everything in the world she can to seem manly! She tramps about in high-heeled boots, with straps; she speaks in what she calls a 'fine, manly tone,' and hates soft voices, because they are romantic; she has a way of her own of turning the rights of women into the rights of men: she parts her hair at the side, and turns it in an under roll all round—'because it's like a man;' and yet she calls 'them men' bears and brutes enough to fill the zoology gardens; and though she grumbles because men tyrannize over women, she is bringing up her son to have his way in everything, and makes his sister give the cake from her hand, and the orange from her lips to pamper him!

"Now that's mighty quare to me—She is the landlady's prime minister—her name is Mrs. Blounet. Then there are the two Miss Hunters, Miss Cressy and Miss Mary Jane. Miss Cressy is a fine stately woman—bone—and high-learned, and has spoken more than once on 'Man, the oppressor;' but though Miss Mary Jane dresses Bloomer, she does not abuse her fellow-creatures as badly as Miss Cressy. She is five years younger, and very good-looking—by candle-light! To be sure it is wonderful how the tongues of the three go against mankind, when they're all together, and the landlady making one little lament after another, how that her husband does this, and doesn't do that; and this often makes me think of what I heard of often from one we both loved—you will remember who it was when I tell you the advice. 'If you would lead a happy life, never tell your husband's faults to any ear but his own; a woman who makes her husband's failings a subject for 'conversation is unworthy his respect or his affection.' And, if you mind, Aunt, the same woman, (the heavens be her bed!) used to say we had two ears and but one tongue—a sign that we should not say all we hear. Anyhow, it would bother the saints to hear the talk of them—Mrs. Blounet hitting ever so hard at Miss Cressy and Miss Mary Jane for being old maids; and, Miss Cressy especially, turning upon Mrs. Blounet for having two husbands, (not at a time, though.) It was wonderful the talk they used to have, and the suppers; and then Miss Cressy disappeared in the evenings, and poor Mr. Creed (that's the landlady's husband,) declared she served at a confectioner's of an evening in the dress; and my mistress said that sort of thing would crush 'the movement altogether;' as if the dress was thought to be ever so healthy and convenient, its going into that class as a show and a vulgar attraction would prevent its ever being recognised as respectable in England. Then Mrs. Blounet took stronger than ever to lecturing in pink trousers—she weighs thirteen stone—and a grey 'tunic,' she calls it, but it is just a short petticoat pleated full. Oh, so short!

"And Miss Mary Jane was wonderful, except when Mr. Creed had any gentlemen visitors; then she would allow that Alexander the Great, and Buonaparte, and a few more, were equal to us. But the worst of it was that this spirit of Bloomer was quite upsetting our house; the landlady took to writing about the rights of woman, and left every one of her duties un-care for. Mr. Creed is a police inspector of the P division, and often wanted a hot cup of coffee, but Mrs. Creed downright refused to make it. The baby did as it liked. The only thing its mother corrected was proofs: long strips of printed paper like dirty farthing ballads—and Mrs. Blounet and she would sit all day just making mischief, and writing the botheringest nonsense that ever was, while my mistress might wait for her dinner. Think of three guineas a-week, for three rooms, and done for! and yet not able to get a chop dressed, because the landlady is practising the rights of women—by giving us no rights at all. Now isn't it quare? And it was worse and worse she was getting, so that between her and the east wind, we had neither peace nor quiet—all the morning she was reading newspapers, and correcting them 'proofs;' all the evenings, attending public meetings. And the poor babby! I have heard her tell her husband that if he wanted it washed, he must do it himself, for she had the rights of her sex to attend to, and it was as much his business as hers to mind it. Oh! it's wonderful when politics get into a woman's head, how they drive nature out of it! they beat small tea-parties, and fairs, and dances, and paterns—ay, and falling in love—out and out for making a woman forget herself. And yet if there's a thing in the world she is proud of, it is that babby, and sitting at the head of her tea-table pouring out tea, and laying down the law! You used to say, Aunt dear, that a woman never went out and out to the bad, until her heart got into the wrong place; indeed, you and the landlady would not agree at all; for in almost everything she had reasoned herself out of nature—and that's what they try to do—but just wait until I tell you how things went on. We were very uncomfortable; my poor mistress kept waiting for her dinner, and if I had not studied a cookery book, as hard as ever Father Jonas (dear holy man!) studied his breviary, she must have gone days and days without a bit of proper food, for there is but one poor fag of a servant, who was born on her legs, and has kept on them ever since, to cook, and wash and walk the children, and lay the cloth, and wait the table, and go every body's messengers, and open the door, and bear the ill-temper of the parlours, drawing-rooms, and every floor, and faction in the house. Well, since the landlady took up with the rights of women, no slave in the free states of America has been so overworked as that poor girl; among other things, the landlady reproached her for taking no pride in laying out supper for the 'great movers,' as she called them, 'in the cause of women;' and the girl asked what good the 'movement' was to her, except to give her more work. Well, you should have heard the landlady's tongue go after that—no one that did could ever forget it,—how she reproached her for want of public spirit, and proper feeling—and 'sympathy.' Now the best of it is, that this good woman's husband is, as I said, a Police Inspector, though she tried hard and long to make me believe he had a 'situation in the city,' which did not sound like policeman. You see, darling, the English are grown very like ourselves in that; my mistress says, that a great deal of the pride and spirit they took in honest labour and its profits, are gone, and forgetting the respect due to great people, I mean, Aunt, great good people, and great good things, they run into every little dirty short cut to wealth they can find, and after all sorts and kinds of money—like mad; in fact she says—that there are as many at 'their dirty diggings' in the city of London, as in that place, they call it by the name of California, in a far away country. Now, to take pride out of mere money there and then, seems of all things the most unnatural for those who have souls in their bodies: the understanding that two and two make four, doesn't seem much to be proud of, and yet that's the beginning and end of half the knowledge and pride going—of all the knowledge the gold-seekers care about, just as if grubbing up and counting up would make them all as one as the rascal quality; and then, if you say a word, they get up a cry of and bother yo'r heart out with 'it's nothing what a man was, but what he is,' and so I say, but with a different meaning,

'A man's a man for a' that,'

'A grub's a grub for a' that,'

and don't tell me! all the wealth of California and Australia to the back of it, won't change a man; what he was, he is, unless something brighter than gold comes over him; the seeking and loving money never purified a heart yet, nor raised a man the breadth of a straw.

'It's not the wealth, but how you use it.'

I see and hear a deal about wealth, but something keeps stirring in my heart, and whispering in my ear, which, as a poor girl, I've no right to talk about; there are ways of working up like the little grain of mustard seed my mistress reads of, that grew into a great tree, and sheltered the houseless and homeless. Now that is a fine thing to think of, and I delight in a little story of a mouse letting a lion out of a net—there's great comfort in that—and I feel when I hear tell of a little old man who, blessed be God! first thought of INFANT SCHOOLS.—Oh! it's them are the blessings. The things I love best, are the things that teach people how to keep from sin,—of the two I like them better than what takes them out of it. And when I remember who sent Temperance abroad to the four quarters of the globe—so that even gentlemen are ashamed of being tipsy—and how as a regenerator that Temperance is only next to Godliness—there's a glory for Ireland! And I think of a fine ancient white-headed saint in Manchester, Wright by name and nature, who remembers, as my dear mistress says, to tread in his Master's footsteps, who was sent, 'not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.' And I think of the charities, grander than the Pyramids of Egypt my cousin writes home about; charities purifying the great sins of great London; charities, Aunt darling, increasing every year, and as each new one starts up, from the brain maybe of some poor working man, the people cry out, as with one voice, 'This can't be done without.' I am glad of such thoughts, and such knowledge, for I'll tell you the truth, I mortally abominate them great bloated gold-finders. When I think of the gold-loving English, I could send all the Fathers of the Church against them, with, bell, book, and candle. When I think of the other things, Aunt dear, why I can only pray that they may be remembered to them as a people, at the last day;—and I'm willing to do penance for the prayer, if so be it's a sin!

"But it's high up above Bloomerism, and all other follies I've got, sure enough; only as the lark said, I must come down some time. At last the house became a fair Babel, worse than what I've heard of Donnybrook itself, when the boys used to cry out, 'Oh! the glory's left old Ireland,—twelve o'clock, and no fight;' and when the poor fellows would be going about the Fair green, shouting, 'Who'll fight me for the sake of St. Patrick.' The man of the house was sorely to be pitied, he was a mighty quiet man; and impossible as it may seem, very fond of his vixen of a wife (talk as you will, there's mighty little reason in love,) and his babby; and moreover, he was very little at home at all, which ought to have made her all the pleasanter when he was in it, for it's very easy to find words going sharp, when a man's ever and always molly coddling about a house, and bothering about every in and out, no ways becoming to him. Of late, she was always grumbling when he went out, though it was about his business—and yet never peaceable when he came in; I wondered how he took it so easy, but there is no use ever interfering betwixt married people; no matter how bitter they are to-night, they may be all like sugar and honey to-morrow morning, and whatever you say to one, is sure to go to the other—they're not safe to make or meddle with; if you want to make peace, you must never let one know what the other says when they're in their 'tiffs;' and to keep quit of that you must tell more woppers than is at all pleasant to carry, particularly when the priest is cross, and puts heavy weights on the penances.

"I kept as clear of both husband and wife as I could, though they would come now and again, and tell me their troubles; the landlady blaming the tyranny of mankind, and the badness of the laws,—and the husband bewailing that she had got among the bloomers; I hinted that may be if the dress which she only wore at their meetings was burned, it might put her off her fancy; but he said, 'he couldn't do that—she looked so pretty in it;' was not that foolish? but Aunt, dear, men is that—and think more of a pretty face with a sharp tongue—than of a plain one, that has nothing to say but goodness. Well, he gave in to her—it seemed so in everything for ever so long, but I sometimes thought that smooth water runs deep. One evening he told her he was going to have a few of his friends come there, and he hoped she would do her best to make them comfortable; she rose at this, and said she wasn't going to be no man's slave, and that if he had company, he must attend to them himself; and that she would dress as she pleased, and have one of her own friends with her, and sit at the head of her tea-table—like the Queen; well, he said he hoped she would wear the dress, and have her friend by all means, and he would give her as little trouble as possible; instead of this putting her into good humour, it made her quite fractious, for she liked to be contradicted, that she might have something to complain of; they went on jangling all day,—I heard her say:—

" 'The world never will be right until we change places.' "

" 'My love,' he answered, 'I thought you wanted us all to be in the same place.' "

" 'Not I indeed,' she said, 'you are much more suited to be a slave than I am; content that everything should be as it is, so that you may not have the trouble of moving it—augh!' "

" 'Very true, my dear.' "

" 'I only wish they would make me an Inspector of Police—I would soon get things in order—I only wish I was a man!' "

" 'I wish you were, my dear!' "

" 'You know you don't wish any such thing—Oh yes! you would like finely to be trampled upon, as all poor women are—but I don't wait on your friends, you may depend on that: you may snub me as you always do, and set the baby crying, that my maternal feelings may be worked on to attend to it; you may spill the tea-kettle into the fire, that I may be forced,—yes, Mr. Peter Creed,—forced to light it again, you having first sent the other white slave out for cigars and muffins,—but from this hour I'll pluck up a spirit!' "

"And so they went on; I wondered how he could bear it; for she told him over and over again, he was only fit for woman's work; but my dear mistress says, its always the way,—the gentle quiet men get the vixens; and surely young maids are so gentle, that one wonders where the old vixens come from! However, in the course of the evening, as she was flourishing down in her 'bloomers,' she told me, that she had made up her mind not to do a hand's turn, let Peter manage as he might; but sit as grand as Cromwell, at the head of her tea-table,—pour out her tea, and talk of the wrongs of woman! She was as proud of her beautiful chancy as of her baby. Well, about an hour after, before any one came, I met a strange woman on the stairs, a very tall, thin woman, and then there was a knock at the door; Mrs. Creed kept firm, the poor servant was out; but to my surprise, the tall woman sprang up from somewhere, and introduced the gentlemen to the bloomer ladies in the parlour,—oh what a skrietch the landlady gave. 'Why,' she said, 'that is Peter, that is my husband,—in my best apple silk.' "

" 'Changed places—that is all,' said the Inspector of the P Division coolly; 'we agreed, my good friends, (the first time we have agreed since the new movement,) that I was intended by nature to be one of the fair sex, and my wife—(according to the old fashion,) to be one of the foul; so I have taken her place, and when the hour comes, she will accompany you to Great Scotland Yard, and take my duty, while I attend to the house and baby.' After this speech, he plumped down at the head of the tea table, the seat she delighted in, and began placing the things—or rather misplacing them—and pouring out the tea. Oh, if you could but have seen her! At first she and her friend Miss Cressy stormed, and when they did, the men laughed so loudly, as to drown the storming; then she flew at her husband like a mad cat, and tore his cap, and a cup and saucer were broken; upon which she sat down and went into determined hysterics,—the men declaring it was the first time their Inspector had ever occasion to use vinegar and burnt feathers; then a basin of water was thrown over her to bring her to, and in the midst of it the baby cried; just as a fierce cat will run to its kitten—the screaming took another turn, and she called out, 'My child, my child!' but the men would not let her move,—and the Inspector rushed out and returned bringing in the baby, hush-owing it in his arms, and talking all kinds of nursery nonsense to it, and dancing it as a woman would, but far more roughly: then he placed it on his knee, and stuffed cake into its mouth; and then a knock came to the door, with a message that the Inspector of the P Division was wanted immediately, as there was a fire in Holborn; and Peter insisted that the new superintendent of the P Division should act up to her words and go; he had done all according to her wishes, and to please her, had resolved to dress as a woman, and perform all a woman's duties; and she must therefore take his place, and act his part; that she had declared publicly and privately that she was the better man of the two, and he therefore insisted she should now prove it, and that his friends would see that she did so. I could hardly tell whether to laugh or cry, I was so frightened for fear the poor innocent baby should get hurt; and because it continued screaming, the father went to the cupboard and emptied a whole bottle full of that wicked Daffy's Elixir, which the women here of that class, half in ignorance, half in laziness, give their infants to keep them quiet; and seemed as though he was going to pour it all at once down the dear baby's throat. Ooh hooh! it was then I pitied the poor mother.

"Oh, Peter, Peter!" she called out, 'even a spoonful is too much. Don't—don't. Oh, just give my baby to myself again, and I'll never be a Bloomer;' and then the dreadful instigator of the mischief shook her head at her, and cried, 'For shame, for shame,' and harangued about consistency, and called upon her 'to be worthy of herself, and go to the fire and command the force, not like a man, but—a woman!' And all the time the poor mother was struggling to get at her baby; and, for fear of mischief, I turned over the cup—though to be sure it did for the apple-green silk. Poor woman! she could see nothing but her child, and hear nothing but its cries. 'Give me my baby, and go to your duty, and I'll never go near a Rights of Woman woman as long as I live,' she repeated.

"Oh, you unworthy member!" cried her friend. 'If you had a drop of the old Roman blood in your veins you would sacrifice home, husband, child, to the public good.'

"Now, Aunt, think of that being said before me—and I being a Roman born, bred, and reared,—as you and Father Doyle know well—as if female Romans did not care for their children! I gave it to her then. I never let my tongue go as I did then, since I've been in the country. She said she should not forget me, and I told her the remembrance would be mutual. Roman blood, indeed! I saw her out of the house, and going down the street, with a gang of boys after her, calling out, 'There's an old Bloomer—there's an old Bloomer!'

"While I was busy with her the poor landlady got her baby, and humbled herself—as was right—and in another hour the house was quiet enough, and the inspector gone to his duty. The next morning my dear good mistress sent for the landlady.

"I suppose," she said to me, going up stairs, 'I shall lose my lodgers as well as my character.'

"Now my mistress says, that of all laws the law of kindness is the strongest; and, though the landlady entered the drawing room with every nerve in her body set for a battle, the tears came into her eyes by the time my mistress bade her good morning and told her to sit down—of course, I came away. When Peter came home that evening, I heard his wife go—rather slowly, but she did go—to the door; and I heard him say, 'Thank you, my love—this is very good of you.' And when I told my dear lady this, she smiled the old smile, and went on talking so sweetly to me, that I judged it was just the way she talked to her.

"Ah!" she said, 'it is very wrong to go on laughing at follies that are likely to lead to evil. Not but what ridicule will sometimes gain a quicker victory than reason; but it leaves an ugly scar, which marks to the death.' (I always put down her exact words.) 'Whether the young or the ignorant listen patiently or not, to reproof or advice, it is no less the duty of the old to give it; but to be done usefully, Ellen, it must be done kindly. I should have talked to this young creature before, and not have suffered her to go on in her folly without remonstrance. It is a vain creature, as I might have known by the cards—that was one turn of the vanity, this is another. All love of notoriety is vanity; it's wonderful the forms it takes. One man wants to write a book before he can spell; another talks of joining the legislature because he has been listened to at a vestry; another's desire leads to heading charity lists—very useful, if he pays the money. One woman piques herself on small hands, and lays them on the top of a muff intended to keep them warm; another gets up an ancestry; another, (the vulgardest,) talks of her rich friends and her accounts at her bankers, or stuffs your ears with titles, committed to memory from the peerage. But these, Ellen, if you understand them, are innocent vanities, doing no harm. The ill-spelt book will never be published; if the would-be orator gets into parliament, he continues a "single-speech Jack" to the end of his days; the small hands become chilblained; the rich friends get into the list of uncertified bankrupts, the titles are soon drilled off; but the vanity which takes a woman from the sacred duties of home to display her weakness abroad—and unsexes her—strikes at the root of our domestic happiness, and should be treated accordingly. I should have talked to her before, Ellen—I should indeed!—kindly, you know, and nothing daunted even if repulsed. And I am not sure but that kindness can turn even vanity to good account. There are plenty of mischievous people always ready to start new wrongs and new sorrows as causes for discontent; and, between you and me, Ellen, if more extensive employment could be given to women, they would not get into such imaginary troubles; they would have more to do. In gentle, profitable employment the legislature—law-makers, Ellen,—have neglected our interests now and then; but short tunics and long trowsers won't alter laws, you know. That young woman confesses she never knew she had anything to complain of until it was put into her head. And—it makes me smile—but she says, the folly of the thing never struck her until she saw that six-foot-two Peter of hers, with his black whiskers and broad shoulders, in her dress, spoon-feeding the baby! She bitterly resents his exposing her to the ridicule of his companions; but I reminded her she had exposed herself by her attempts at establishing so unblushing a notoriety. Certainly the landlady is a changed woman, poor thing! poor thing!"

"It will be some time, dear Aunt, before I will be able to write to you again, for we are going to a fine watering place—over the seas—to seek that health for my mistress that is so plenty on our hill side. Oh, dear! if everything in old Ireland was as plenty as health what a people we should be!"

"Ever, with a heart and a half, your own

"NELLY NOWLAN."

TIME'S CHANGES.

BY FLORES DEVIA.

"We miss'd the merry ring of her sweet laughter,
In the changed home with sudden moanings fill'd;
And thence for evermore through Time's hereafter,
The deep warm current of our hope was chill'd."

It was well known to every one acquainted with the locality, that old Mellon of Wharfedale, though commonly called "the miser," was immensely rich, and that Minna, his daughter, was the fairest flower of the valley; and without entering upon the forbidden precincts of private life, gentle reader, we claim your attention for a brief sketch, where truth figures in the foreground, and needs but little colouring or fanciful adorning.

Having but one day left of a pleasant sojourn in the valley of the Wharfe, the grey dawn had no sooner opened its waking eye, and smiled through the diamond panes of the lattice, than we arose

"To meet the sun upon the upland lawn."

The orient smile of a sweet autumn morning threw its fascinating beauty over wood and stream, and the soft balmy air whispered of delicious dreams. The serenity of the time had a soothing influence that is only to be felt when we have hasted away from the turmoil of the life-thick city to renew our acquaintance with nature, and to cultivate reflection by the side of a clear stream, in the field paths, or beneath the shade of hanging wood. And now, the village of Poole, with its scattered cottages half hidden among blushing orchards, slept peacefully in the valley of the winding Wharfe. One wide golden tinge of glory fell across the woods of Farnley—the rocky Chevin, with its cavernous front, darkly frowning in the picture, stood majestically looking down upon the river at its foot, and in the shadowy distance gloomed the ivy-covered towers of Harewood's ancient castle. The mist had already left the valley, and in cloud-like form swept across the neighbouring uplands, like the departing spirit of night, flying the footsteps of the blushing morn. The speckled deer of Farnley bounded to the park side, and the lowing herds came with them to where the Wharfe, shaded by monarch oaks, ripples over its shallow bed.

Long might the eye have feasted on natural beauty, where peaceful serenity and wild romantic grandeur dwell together; but, although beneath the shade of umbrageous woods, far from the crowded market street, or the ledger desk of anxious commerce, an object caught the eye which awakened thoughts in the beholder, not at all in unison with morning worship at the shrine of nature.

Emerging from a straw thatched, but roomy, antiquated dwelling, an aged man was looking out upon the green pastures of the Wharfe. His grey locks fell in melancholy disorder over his broad shoulders, and his silver beard glistened in the morning sunlight. His outward appearance, which bespoke care and anxiety, was a faithful index to the inner man. Without knowing anything of his history, it was easy to read of past turmoil and present internal strife, in that pale and almost repulsive countenance. From his dress, and the general outline of his figure, you might instantly perceive that he had not always been a dweller in the rural and secluded haunts of peace. The ghastly paleness of that hollow cheek, the gleaming expression of his large though sunken eye, darting scrutiny upon you with a glance almost amounting to ferocity, the compression of his lip, adding determination to his otherwise moody appearance, as he stood tottering and holding together a flowing robe of foreign fabric, much too large for his wasted frame,—all denied that he had experienced for any long period the calm retirement of village life. No! old Mellon was but a new comer among the peaceful denizens of Wharfedale; his life-toil had been among crowded cities at home and abroad, in the forests thick of human lights and shadows,—the exchange of money had been his sole occupation. The old dilapidated fabric in Wharfedale, where we now saw him, he had obtained from a sinking family, over the intimate matters of which we must draw the veil of silence; and as his health was fast failing, he had been advised to settle here, to maintain as long as possible the fast wasting oil of life. His only child, the beautiful and accomplished Minna, was here his sole company; he had no friends, and looked upon every passing stranger with suspicion. He had, it is true, in a distant part of the country, a sister worn down with age, and suffering in extreme poverty; but his heart was closed to her complaints,—he owned no relatives.

He ever seemed to idolise his Minna, as a perfection of loveliness that sooner or later would link his hoarded wealth to a still heavier dower; and was delighted to know that she had offers that met his views. But his period of declining life was one continued scene of misery, that the gentleness and angel attention of the matchless Minna often failed in alleviating. Feeling the sure and gradually advancing touch of age and disease upon a frame and mind once amazingly vigorous, he sighed, not only for lost physical energy, but for the golden moments of those departed years, when the alchemy of his worldly cunning filled his daily gatherings,—he mourned over time's changes—strange would it have been had he known peace, he had been too long a slave to mammon—the heyday of his hot eagerness after gain had long ago denied his bones a fair covering of flesh,—the aquafortis of his burning thirst for gold had left his frail tenement like a forest tree—lightning scathed. However, an affair of no small importance to Mr. Mellon, was this day to be accomplished: his fair daughter was to be married to the scion of a wealthy family, and the father had risen from his night couch eager to gloat upon the sacred hymenial bond that brought in so close connexion with himself, a fortune that princes might have been proud of; that his daughter would be allied to a kind and loving husband, was foreign to his thoughts. The money—the money! every other consideration fell below the old miser's rate of interest.

As the lovely morning advanced in beauty, we caught the occasional features of the approaching nuptials. The village gossips were hanging about to catch every passing glimpse of the “weddlers,”—to tell the tale, and to hear the tale, with voracious wonderment: and as the sun approached the meridian, we observed a train of young rosy girls approach the church walk, each laden with flowers, and when a few grey-haired men had made a clear course for them, they fanned on each side of the path, for some distance, up to the church porch.

If there is anything that can add a grace to the hilarity and beauty of a wedding scene, surely it must be to look upon such a party threading their way through groves and orchards, to the ivy-covered village church.

“Each in its plot of holy ground
How beautiful they stand,
Those old grey churches of our land.”

And truly there was a glance at earth's nearest approach to gentleness and greatness in that happy scene. It was a beauty that fastened itself upon the sunniest spot in memory's waste; to see that village wedding as the party emerged from the tall elm-trees that shaded the church walk. As the sylph-like figures moved gracefully along, hanging upon the arms of stalwart yeomen, true sons of the soil, the hues of the panorama had loveliness too bright for our descriptive crayon. We saw in that one glance the beauty of England's fairest daughters gliding by the side of athletic strength; the one, called to throw the wings of gentle affection over the domestic circle; and the other, formed for laborious exercise of manly toil, or the arduous and noble application of mental power,—each properly dignified and manly. Minna, the old usurer's accomplished daughter, had a pensive air of thoughtfulness about her that morning, which only heightened the charm of her pleasing features, and the old and the young, as she approached the church, threw bouquets across her path, and vied with each other in their bridal blessings. And then it was the feast day, and rosy maidens tripped past, or sauntered by the side of sunburnt swains, all breathing the same joyous atmosphere, and throwing about them a colouring to the rural scene, so peculiarly English. In such moments how we drink of social bliss, and are sure that we feel the presence of the innocent and the beautiful. The marriage ceremony in the plain village church,—the gathered company there, of the wealthy country squire and his ruddy daughters,—the witless, unsophisticated farm-labourer, “brown with meridian toil,” holding, for the time, subordination sacred over certain young rustics who clustered round the altar table with anxious gaze at the “rich folk,” with here and there about the venerable pile, a pale-faced citizen, who, like ourselves, had come to woo the health-laden breeze of the valley;—all this, the tremulous bashful bride, and the gay creature of sunny smiles who attended her as maid, together with the manly form of him who claimed the lovely heiress as his own, and the emaciated figure of old Mellon, who wandered down the aisle like the ghost of other times; all this, gloriously picturesque, and rife with truthful imagery, passed before us like a fleeting vision. Other company and urgent duties were even then whispering of our withdrawal from the happy scene. We had already begun to fancy the roll of the dizzy mill-wheel; for a time we must leave the green banks of the dear Wharfe. And now the departing gleam of day warned us of the length of our journey home. “The roses that had been strewn in the path of the blushing bride, lay withered by the churchyard path, and seemed fain to create a slight feeling of melancholy; but the occasional song of a rustic reveller, or the notes of a clarinet by the Wharfe side, broke upon our reverie; and taking a parting look at the village, more especially at the ancient house, where old Mellon lingered out his days, and from whence the sweet flower had gone forth that day in bridal beauty; with contending emotions, we completed our glance at the Wharfedale wedding on the day of the annual feast.

“Oh, that we ever should find a shade,
With life in its sunny robes array'd!”

Time had not twice gone his annual round, when one summer's morning saw us again in the valley of the Wharfe. As we have said, the locality is favourable to lonely habits and pensive musings, but on revisiting the scene of Minna's bridal hour, many were our thoughts of an inquisitive nature. It is scarcely necessary to acknowledge that among other things, we saw, as vividly as ever, the light figures gliding along to consummate the holy rite; and Minna, the queen of village maidens, shed a light of beauty over the retrospective glance. We almost longed to hear of the happy days that had followed the nuptial hour; we painted them with all the colours of the rainbow, for it was agreed on all hands that the united were passionately fond of each other; they had untold wealth, their sky was cloudless.

The historical associations of the locality to which we have invited the reader's attention, are not altogether devoid of interest, and the great families of Faifarix, Pulme, and Pulleyi, have here left behind them monumental vestiges of departed greatness. The day was lovely, the clear blue heavens looked down upon myriads of blushing sweets, the honey-suckle and the wild rose twined amorously along the hedgerow; and as we sat beneath a spreading oak listening to the voice of past ages, while we pictured forth on fancy's canvass the gorgeous pageants of those by-gone days, when the great feudal masters of the time named the broad lands before us "Othelaj," (the field of Otho),—our attention was called, not to a bridal train, but to a mournful procession in funeral array! The deep-toned bell of the village church spoke like the messenger of Time! Upon asking the chronicles of the past, we were informed that many changes had taken place since we last wandered along the valley. The cares and anxieties of the old miser had passed away like a tale that is told—he was laid in the tomb! His fair daughter had withered and died during the first year of her marriage! And now the united wealth of the two families, which formed the rainbow of the old miser's last dreams, had also passed away into other hands, for that day Minna's husband was borne along the green valley to sleep with his young bride! The villagers threw roses into the grave, they were both young, both wealthy, and both hopeful for the future; life's golden chain was new and bright, but little did they reck of the blighting storms and fatal witherings that lie unseen by us, under the dark wing of Time's Changes!

"Sweets to the sweet;"

PALERMO AND THE FEAST OF ST. ROSALIE.

THE Church and the world, religion and pleasure, are considered, in Protestant countries, as altogether antagonistic to each other. In Roman Catholic countries, however, the case is far different. Romanism, springing as it does from the flowery soil upon which Heathenism had once unfolded all its gorgeous splendour, still retains many elements of the worship of ancient Rome—now, as in the days of the Empire, does the service of God assume the form of a popular festival, and, instead of the chastened voice of prayer and praise, ascending reverently towards the throne of God, the air is filled with sounds of merriment; and the discharge of fireworks, together with peals of martial music, accompany the brilliant processions formed in honour of some patron saint! A true popular festival is a thing almost unknown in the Protestant countries of Europe. Domestic life is the prominent feature of our more northern lands, and even our Christmas joys are chiefly partaken of by family groups, and do not in any degree wear the character of a national festivity. In Italy, on the contrary, life is a public thing; the chief pleasures of the people are enjoyed in common—music, fireworks, illuminations, and processions, are amusements shared in by all, high and low together, and the very poorest lay aside from their earnings a small annual contribution towards the celebration of the Church festivals.

One of the most renowned of these annual commemorations is the Fête of St. Rosalie, at Palermo; and, during my summer sojourn in the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, I heard so much about its pomp and splendour, that I resolved on crossing to Palermo, in order to witness with my own eyes this chef-d'œuvre of Romish festivals.

The fête commences on the 11th of July, and continues during the five succeeding days.

The passage from Naples to Palermo is delightful in calm weather. The steamer starts from the Molo nuovo about noon, and reaches Palermo in the course of twenty hours.

It was a still and lovely morning, that on which we first neared the coast of Sicily. Monte Gallo first appeared in sight, and ere long, the Monte Pellegrino, that most beautiful of all rocks, became visible. Soon we approached the harbour of Palermo, and the city lay outspread before us, like a fair maiden, reposing in tranquil serenity; for at her feet played the protecting waves—her faithful and kindly companions—whilst by her side towered the gigantic rocks of Monte Pellegrino and Capo Zafferano, like grave guardians, keeping an earnest and loving watch over her weakness.

I scarcely know any town which, at first sight, presents a more cheerful and imposing aspect than Palermo. It lies embosomed amidst a semicircle of rocky hills, terminating at one end in the Monte Pellegrino, whose summit is crowned by the Chapel of St. Rosalie, and at the other in the Capo Zafferano, which stretches far into the sea, both together uniting to form the splendid harbour of Palermo. Two streets, the Toledo and the Maqueda, intersect the city throughout its whole length and breadth, dividing it into four quarters. The point at which these streets cross each other, is named the Quattro Cantoni. I had heard much of the Moorish character of Palermo, but cannot say that such appeared to me to be the prominent feature of the town. The exterior of a few churches, specially that of the very handsome cathedral, and the façade of some of the buildings, which wear a strikingly foreign and oriental aspect, are lost in the general mass. Whilst viewing Count

Roger's Chapel and chamber in the Royal Palace, as well as the beautiful church of Monreale, the period of the Moorish domination is vividly recalled to the mind; but in general, although the aspect of Palermo is very different from Naples, and remarkably foreign and peculiar, I should say it bears the stamp of the Spanish middle ages far more than of the period of the Moorish rule. This city conveys to the mind a melancholy feeling of decayed splendour; not, like Rome, an impression of fallen greatness. Rome and the Romans have declined together. People and city, creators and created, all lie crumbling in one common dust on the Forum Romanum. One gazes upon these majestic ruins in that spirit of silent resignation which ever fills the heart in presence of a great fatality. The decay of Palermo, on the other hand, simply leaves upon the mind the impression of a misfortune—an adverse stroke of fate. The progressing, cotton-clad humanities of the present day wander about its streets, plying their handiworks and their trades, and every now and then attempt to spread a coat of whitewash over the crumbling ruins of the past, in order that they may still be able to pride themselves in the relics of former greatness. Pauperized descendants of a royal race—the faded golden trappings which once adorned their garments may yet be seen clinging to their rags. There is something in this state of things which is both painful and repelling to the mind. Here, as in Naples, the eye of the stranger is arrested by the sight of clothes and maccaroni hung out on poles to dry from every window in the streets. White and coloured dresses, waistcoats, stockings, curtains, and maccaroni, float in the air like so many wonderful decorations, and afford, at least, some degree of shade from the heat of the sun. In addition to these extempore awnings hanging from the upper stories, there are also regular awnings spread over the trottoirs, beneath whose shade every sort of handicraft is carried on. Shoemakers, tailors, bookbinders, timmen, all work before their own doors. Young maidens may be seen busied in knotting fringes, weaving aloe nets, and working embroidery in large frames. In some streets, two or three of these embroiderers may be seen seated before every door. Public scribes, with their tables before them, may be found at the corner of every street. Advocates, cooling themselves with the indispensable green fan, sit between piles of documents on the one side, and clients on the other, and impart, in the public street, their counsel and advice. The coffee-houses stand wide open, the newspapers are read, and in the evening cards are played before the doors. Never do night and silence altogether assert their claims in Palermo—at least, on the Marina, which is, perhaps, one of the most beautiful public walks in Europe. It is situated on the sea-shore, and forms, in fact, the Quay. A stone bench, fixed into the wall, magnificent trottoirs, gaslights, and in the neighbourhood of the houses a double avenue of evergreen trees, combine to present every agrément which the loungeur can desire. A noble terrace, well provided with seats, extends itself in front of a row of palaces; under this terrace, the Corso promenade takes place, commencing about seven o'clock in the evening. At ten o'clock, the orchestra begins to play, and the music lasts until near midnight.

It is a picturesque and striking scene which presents itself to the eye of the stranger, as he gazes forth from the windows of the Trinacria, the only hotel on the Marina, upon the varied groups who are loitering about and enjoying the evening breeze. Here sits a white-robed Dominican by the side of an officer in full uniform; there walks a young maiden leaning upon a gentleman's arm—but in general, the proportion of women in the crowd is very small.

The men belonging to the middling classes remain later on the Marina than do those of higher rank. When the Corso is over, and all is quiet, they still linger behind, and fall into that state of half-dreamy repose which is the prelude of sleep. Often, in the middle of the night, when the oppressive heat of my apartment drove me to the open window, I could see boys tumbling about on the seats, and hear them singing, in a shrill tone of voice, the popular songs of the country. One would commence the ditty, dwelling on the last words and note of the strophe, until another, at a distance, took up and prolonged the lay. This would frequently last until morning, and although it effectually disturbed our slumbers, we could not feel vexed with the poor fellows for preferring the cool night breeze to the close and sultry atmosphere of their own dwellings.

But it is only within doors that the heat is so oppressive. During the very hottest days of July, both in Naples and Palermo, I found the sea-breezes ever pleasant and refreshing. The sirocco, when it chanced to blow, was, of course, very disagreeable; but that summer, its visits were, happily, of rare occurrence. Whilst thus engaged in examining the beauties of Palermo, time sped swiftly onwards, and the day on which the fête of St. Rosalie was to commence, soon arrived. The king was expected, although his arrival was as yet uncertain. Suddenly, on the evening of the 11th of July, a little fleet appeared on the distant horizon, and very shortly afterwards, a royal salute announced the approach of the sovereign.

In order to avoid the noontide heat, the solemnities of the fête of St. Rosalie do not commence until evening. The whole of the Toledo, which, from the Spanish times downwards has also been called the Cassaro, is closed against carriages. All the balconies are filled with people as during the time of the carnival at Rome, and a gay and varied throng fill the streets.

The peculiar national costume has here almost entirely disappeared and been replaced by ordinary printed calicos. The only distinctive article of dress which has been retained in Palermo, is the large crape handkerchief which is fastened on the head, and falls over the neck and shoulders. The prevailing colour of these handkerchiefs is yellow, but crimson is also used, and of an evening, during the time of the fête, when the women frequent the promenade, they wear white muslin handkerchiefs, which set off their dark complexions to the best advantage.

Numerous men and boys may be seen wandering to and fro amongst the crowd, selling sweetmeats and dainties of divers kinds. Tables, over which white cloths are spread, stand in all directions, covered with preserved gourd, almonds, beans, chocolate, and sweet cakes. In Italy, the approach of a fête-day is always the signal for a multitude of gaily decorated booths being erected, and well stored with all manner of provisions. The Italian is not satisfied unless his eye is refreshed as well as his palate gratified. Cherries intermixed with vine-leaves are fastened together in large bunches, and suspended around long poles, thus forming a beautiful thyrsus-staff; the baskets in which sweetmeats are carried about for sale, are converted, with the aid of gay-coloured paper, into miniature full-rigged ships, or shells of brilliant and varied hue; whilst the flower-sellers weave their nosegays together in the form of graceful coronets, which they bear aloft over the heads of the busy throng who fill the streets at this festive season.

Raising my eyes to the balcony of the opposite house, I perceived that it was filled with boys who had been brought thither to view the fête. They belonged to a school conducted by Jesuits, who, in Italy, have almost unlimited control over the education of the young. In Sicily, the students all wear a kind of uniform, selected according to the taste of each school. It consists in general of a dark frock, trimmed with gold galoon, a three-cornered hat, and an order hanging from the button-hole.

Over the balcony, which was filled with these boys, were two iron-grated galleries, fifteen or twenty of which may be seen in different houses of the Toledo. These are appropriated to the use of nuns, who can reach them through covered passages leading from their convents, and thus witness at their ease all public festivals and processions. It seemed to me that in Palermo monks and nuns enjoy a much greater degree of liberty than in Rome. There, one scarcely ever sees a nun in the streets, and the monks are obliged to return to their cloisters before the hour of the Ave Maria. But, in Palermo, you meet nuns driving about the streets in every direction, frequently accompanied by priests, and I have often seen monks walking on the Marino till a late hour of the night. The greater degree of freedom permitted here, is, probably, due to the heat of the climate, which renders the enjoyment of the evening breeze actually necessary to health.

At length, the triumphal chariot of St. Rosalie was set in motion, commencing its progress from the Porta Felice, at the lower end of the Toledo. It is built in the form of a boat, and rests upon low wheels. It is from fifty to sixty feet long, proportionately broad, and adorned in the gayest colours. On this vehicle stands displayed the whole heavenly hierarchy.

First, a choir of archangels of supernatural size; then cherubim and seraphim in the midst of decoration clouds, and bearing in their hands flutes, harps and garlands, together with crosses and other instruments of martyrdom; next in order follow floating groups of little angels, and, surrounded by a choir of female saints, rises up from amidst a strata of golden clouds the statue of St. Rosalie, robed in white, her flowing locks crowned with a wreath of roses, and bearing in her right hand a cross resting on the globe. The saint is raised to the level of the fifth story windows of the lofty houses of the Toledo, and is most significantly separated from this lower earth.

In front of the chariot stand forty regimental musicians, and under the angels are placed a group of artisans with their tools in their hands, ready to lend their aid in case a sudden jerk or unforeseen storm should overthrow the equilibrium of the complex groups above. Their presence, however, does not in the least disturb the effect produced by the whole scene on the vivid fancy of the Italians.

Six-and-forty oxen of divers colours draw the huge machine. It is considered an honour and a good work to lend oxen for the occasion. The sons of the owners, dressed in Arcadian costume, guide the oxen, and watch lest they should do any injury with their formidable horns.

This Trionfo della santissima Rosalie is preceded by the civic guards in full uniform, together with bands of music, cavalry, and three senators arrayed in the old Spanish costume. Loud cívicas burst from the admiring populace, who accompany the triumphant procession as it passes slowly along the Toledo in the direction of the royal palace. In the mean time the illumination of the Toledo commences. Wooden pillars and pyramids are erected along the trottoirs at each side of the street, and illuminated transparencies forming alternately the words "Evoica la san Rosalia" and "Evoica il rè" are attached to them. The upper and lower end of the Toledo are ornamented by gigantic pyramids, adorned with the royal eagle, and the street being perfectly straight from one end to another forms a very striking perspective.

Here the populace wander about until the illuminations on the Marina are completed, and about eleven o'clock the fire-works commence. All carriages are excluded both from the Toledo and the Marina,—an excellent arrangement, which allows the poor man to stroll to and fro in undisturbed freedom, and to enjoy the sight of the fire-works, in company with his children, without fear of their being run over. Thousands of benches lie scattered around, thousands of people are wandering about by the sea-side, amidst the brilliant illuminations; the gentle murmurs of the sea, as it breaks upon the shore, are drowned by the bursts of joyous music; at length, a rocket fired off from the terrace announces the approach of the king, and gives the signal for the commencement of the fire-works. By hundreds and hundreds do the hissing sky-rockets now soar aloft, as though they would fain reach the heavens; but soon their bold flight is checked and weary, and exhausted they sink back to earth. Fire-balloons ascend on high like so many globes of dazzling light, and then shower down rays of brightness upon the waves which engulf them within her bosom; and fire-wheels and crowns and flaming temples, emerging in rapid succession from the deep gloom of night, are greeted with shouts of applause by the assembled populace, shine for a moment in radiant beauty, and are then for ever quenched in darkness. There is something mysterious, and at the same time singularly attractive in this display, in watching this element of fire, which seems as it were to have wandered from its place, floating mid-way betwixt sea and sky, as though vainly seeking a home—a resting-place. As soon as the fire-works are over, the crowd hasten towards the Toledo, where, at midnight, the Corso promenade begins. A deep silence now pervades the Marina, replacing the joyous stir of human life with which it was erewhile filled. The artificial stars were extinguished in gloom, and now the moon, surrounded by the everlasting stars, shines forth in tranquil brightness, shedding a mild radiance upon the white waves of the slumbering ocean.

For more than twenty-four hours the triumphal chariot of St. Rosalie remains in front of the palace. About ten o'clock on the evening of the second day of the festival, it returns along the Toledo, so brilliantly illuminated, that St. Rosalie appears to float in a sea of light, and is greeted with jubilant shouts of applause by the populace, proud of their patron saint and fellow-countrywoman.

The third and the two succeeding days of the festival commence with the horse-racing, a miserable scene of animal terror and suffering, from which I was glad to absent myself.

In the evening, an incessant flourish of trumpets announces the drawing of the lottery, which is held in a large tent on the Piazza Marina, hung with gay pictures and brilliantly lighted up. This lottery, named Beneficenza, is frequented by the people in crowds; the tickets are sold for a mere trifle, and the most paltry prize is announced by a flourish of trumpets, whilst, in honour of one to any considerable amount, the saint is carried in procession.

On the third evening of the festival, there is a promenade held on the Toledo which lasts until near midnight. The citizens' wives and daughters, leaning on the arms of their husbands and friends, parade the long streets dressed in full ball costume, decked out in flowers and feathers, satin and gauze. The balconies of the adjoining houses wear the aspect of boxes in a theatre on a gala day. Sparkling brilliants glisten amidst raven locks, fans flutter to and fro with graceful coquetry, gentlemen stand behind the ladies' chairs, animated conversations are carried on from one balcony to another, and this goes on without any sort of preparation, beneath the open vault of heaven, in the public streets, where every sort of trade and handicraft has been carried on a few hours before.

When one celebrates the Fête of St. Rosalie in Palermo, it is only due to her that one should also pay a visit to her solitary hermitage on the beautiful Monte Pellegrino. Santa Rosalie was the daughter of one of the rulers of Palermo, whose dissipated habits of life so corrupted the manners of the court, that the pure-hearted maiden fled from the tainted atmosphere, and disappeared from her father's court, without leaving any trace behind.

In the year 1624, when a fearful plague devastated Palermo, a priest dreamt that its ravages would cease when the bones of a saint then resting in a cavern of Monte Pellegrino had been discovered and exhibited in Palermo. Animated with pious zeal, he lost no time in setting forth on the search, and discovered in a cleft of the rocks a female skeleton, which was recognised, by means of a small clasp, to be that of the Prince's daughter, the holy Rosalie! No sooner were her ashes brought to Palermo than the pestilence ceased to rage. Rosalie was canonized, declared to be the patron saint of Palermo, and a chapel and monastery were immediately erected on the spot where she died. I must say that the erection of a monastery here seemed to me to be quite contrary to court etiquette. The fair young Princess ought surely to have had for her attendants a band of gentle maidens rather than a troop of bearded men.

The way leading to the Monte Pellegrino through the Conca d'oro (as the beautiful plain around Palermo is justly designated) forms one of the most charming rides it is possible to conceive. The strong and yet delicately formed Sicilian ass carries his rider in three-quarters of an hour up the well beaten track. From the summit of the mountain, surrounded by wild rocky chasms, you gaze down upon Palermo, lying far beneath your feet, upon the sea-shore, surrounded by the extensive and highly cultivated plain which bounds it on all sides, reaching to Bagaria and to the promontory of Capo Zafevano. Beyond this latter you perceive the Bay of Cefalù, with the little town of the same name nestling on its shores, Termini, lying at the foot of Monte Modonia, and far behind, towering in the distance, rises the rocky ridge of Etna, from whose summit a thin column of smoke, lighted up by the rays of the sun, ascends slowly towards heaven.

The monastery, a little insignificant building, built on a rocky platform, wears a dreary and desolate aspect. Two poor-looking farm-houses are attached to it, and a few bread-fruit and acacia trees afford a scanty shelter to these lonely dwellings. There is something indescribably mournful in the whole aspect of this spot, and the contrast between the wild barren rocks and the smiling plain beneath increases yet further the impression of desolation which this scene conveys. Passing through the monastery, you enter the chapel of St. Rosalie. The outer court, through which you approach the inner sanctuary of the cavern, is formed by precipitous rocks of grey chalk, faintly lighted up by a few straggling rays of sunlight, which penetrate through a small fissure at the top. Art has done but little for this spot, and even had she done more, her achievements would dwindle into insignificance when compared with the unadorned grandeur of nature. Here and there a stone pillar supports the roof to prevent it from falling in. Long tendrils of ivy and flowering clematis hang from each crevice of the rock, and form graceful festoons on the walls, as though nature would fain adorn to her utmost the dwelling place of the sainted maid. In place of the jewels and the pietra dura which adorn the gorgeous churches of Palermo, the golden sunlight here sparkles on the walls intermingled with the rosy hues of evening, heaven spreads over all its azure tint, bright beetles flit to and fro in busy haste, like messengers from the outer world, sent to do the work of this little sanctuary.

The gloom and silence of the evening hour soon pervaded the cavern. Pointed stalactites hung from the roof; and, reposing upon an altar, lighted by waxen tapers, lay the marble statue of St. Rosalie. It represents a fair youthful form gazing towards heaven with ecstatic smile; her right hand supports her head, whilst with her left she grasps the pilgrim staff and the crucifix which she clasps to her bosom. Costly garments wrought with gold veil her graceful form, a golden wreath of roses rests upon her brow, and sparkling gems adorn her hands; but her eyes rest not on these—they gaze upwards towards the light; she seeks that which on earth she could not find. The shades of evening were fast gathering around the hill, as we turned to depart. Dark clouds hung in threatening masses over the sea, whose surging waves we could plainly hear breaking upon the distant shore. By the time we reached the carriage which was waiting for us in the vale beneath, it was quite dark. I was not sorry for this; there are certain impressions which one would gladly retain undisturbed, and which every new sight and scene only serves to weaken and drive away.

The last two days of the Fête of St. Rosalie is celebrated in a more ecclesiastical manner—that is to say, the pomps and ceremonies of the Church occupy the chief portion of the day. The illumination of the cathedral forms the great object of attraction on the fourth evening of the festival. As we were repairing thither about nine o'clock in the evening, we met a great procession of men and boys accompanied by the everlasting flourish of trumpets. They were leading the winning horse, who had outrun his competitors in that day's race, in triumph through the streets. The poor animal would, doubtless, have far preferred a little repose after his exertions, to all this honour and glory. As it was quite dark, the boys extemporized torches, made of wood shavings, aloë fibres, and similar rubbish, picked up in the streets, which they now set on fire, and waved in the air, casting a ruddy blaze around. These Italians are like children. They know how to turn everything to account in their games and festivities, and though, at times, a somewhat comic effect may be produced, yet on the whole there is something very picturesque in their arrangements.

We were compelled, by the pressure of the passing crowd, to seek refuge in an adjoining house. Its interior wore a desolate and poverty-stricken aspect. A lamp burnt on the table, around which were seated an ugly old woman and four men, partaking of their evening meal, which consisted chiefly of fritters. No sooner, however, had we crossed the threshold, than every countenance was lighted up with pleasure; a friendly nod greeted our approach, and the old woman, with a smile, pointing to the dish before her, said, "Volete favorire?" (Will you favour us with your company?) It is this ready courtesy which is to me so attractive amongst the nations of Italian race. They are not ashamed of their poverty—they feel that they are in reality the equals of the wealthiest—they are only poorer.

Leaving this hospitable abode, we soon reached the splendid Moorish cathedral, one of the finest specimens of this style of architecture which exists in Europe. In front of the cathedral stood the saint, who had been placed beneath an illuminated canopy, and around whom a market had sprung up, presenting as varied and as gay a scene as the German markets on Christmas Eve. Rows of benches were scattered here and there, and were occupied by merry groups chatting to each other. The equipages of the senators, built in the ancient Spanish form,—coaches and horses both adorned with white waving plumes,—are waiting for their owners in the side streets. The Guarda nobile, counts, dukes, and princes, most of them handsome men and splendidly mounted, ride after the court, attending the king in his progress to the Church. The scene presented by the interior of the cathedral was, indeed, one of enchantment. Many thousands of candelabra, so delicately wrought that their forms were scarcely distinguishable amidst the flood of light which they shed around, hung from the vaulted roof of the church, like so many brilliant stars let down from heaven to earth. None of the gorgeous decorations were here to be seen, which are usually displayed at other Church festivals. The countless lights reflected from the white walls and polished granite pillars form the only ornament of the splendid edifice. I never saw a more beautiful and striking spectacle. But amidst all this light, a dark shade was not wanting. The presence of the numerous Jesuits, who exercise so great an influence here, cast a gloom over the scene. They go hand in hand with the reigning house, and the hatred entertained towards them is equal to the power which they exercise. The scholars of the Jesuit school who were present on this occasion, were dressed in a very tasteful uniform, and wore white silk stockings. Were their spiritual being only as well attended to as their external bearing and attire, they might well be deemed fortunate; but, as far as I could learn, the Jesuits neglected the intellectual development of their scholars here, as they do in every land where education is under their absolute control.

At last, the ringing of the bells announced the arrival of the sovereign. The cardinal, the bishops, the whole clerical body, followed by the senators in their wigs, advanced to meet him. He then entered the cathedral, a tall, stout-built, and tolerably well-looking man, dressed in uniform, followed by two pretty little princes, also clad in military attire. Next to them came the Queen, the king's sister, Princess Amelia, and the Infanta, all in toilette de bal, and with flowers in their hair. All the royal family are fair, with blond hair—it is at once evident that they belong to a different race from that of the people who own their rule.

The king comes to the church on this evening in order to receive the benediction which he is, on the succeeding day—the last of the festival—to dispense to the assembled multitude.

Ever since the days of the Norman rule, the secular ruler of Sicily has also been considered as the head of the Church—not that he exercises the functions of pope, for the pope is looked upon here, as in other Roman Catholic countries, as the Vicar of Christ upon earth; but in Sicily, this Vicar of Christ can only accomplish his aims so far as they are in accordance with the will of the temporal sovereign. This latter potentate dispenses indulgences in the pope's name, and lodges the profits safely in his own money chest. There is no papal nuncio in Sicily, neither has the pope any executive power in the island.

On the last day of the Fête of St. Rosalie, the king accordingly stands in front of the Iligh Altar, bare-headed, and with his hand resting on the Gospels, whilst, surrounded by clouds of incense, he pronounces the benediction over the assembled crowd, amidst the booming of cannon from the ships, the music of the regimental bands, and the pealing of bells from every church in the city.

On the fifth evening, the whole festival is closed by a grand procession of all the saints who are considered to be the protectors of the city. The king, together with the whole court, view this procession from the great hall of the Prefecture. He is on this occasion considered the guest of the city. The nobility and strangers, who are ever treated with most courteous respect, also receive invitations.

The cards of invitation are worded as follows: "Per godervi la processione delle sacre reliquie della nostra concillidina Santa Rosalie." (To enjoy the sight of the procession of the sacred relics of our fellow-citizen, Santa Rosalie.)

A handsome fountain adorns the square in front of the Prefecture—churches and monasteries surround the piazza, and their rich and highly ornamented style of architecture is admirably suited for the purpose of illuminations. The fountain, with its garlands of coloured lamps interwoven with wreaths of flowers, which were reflected a thousand-fold in the limpid waters of the basin, bore a truly fairy-like aspect.

About ten o'clock, the procession commenced. Never again shall I feel surprised when I hear of the Hindoos casting themselves down beneath the wheels of the Car of Juggernaut, for in truth, the frenzy of devotionism is here carried to such a pitch, that it is a perfect marvel some of the people are not crushed.

The different saints are placed in divers tower-like vehicles, more or less lofty, according to the sanctity of their respective occupants. These temples, the lowest of which reaches to the level of the first story of the Prefecture, are borne along by the people, who have poles specially prepared for the purpose. Every now and then a halt is made, and at the door of every church, wine and provisions of divers sorts are distributed to the crowd.

When St. Joseph, with the Holy Child, the Madonna, bearing the sacred Infant in her arms, St. George, and two or three other saints, whose names were unknown to me, had passed along in solemn procession, a wild tumult suddenly arose amongst the crowd; men and boys, chiefly Marinari, as though stung by a tarantula, came bounding and rushing forwards, bearing with them, in eager haste, the images of St. Cosmo and St. Damian, two physicians, who, during the fearful pestilence, had distinguished themselves by their unremitting exertions amongst the poor, and more especially amongst the Marinari. On this account they were canonized, and are considered the patron saints of the Marinari, who bear them through the city at full speed, and weary themselves by the vehemence of their exertions, in remembrance of the untiring devotion and unresting zeal shown by these two brave and kind-hearted men.

Last of all comes Santa Rosalie, in proud, tranquil dignity, surrounded by her attendant monks. And now, once more, the guns are fired, and sounds of tumultuous joy break forth on every side. The transport of the people can no longer be contained within any bounds, and far on in the night the shouts of the excited crowd fell upon my ear.

Joyous and gorgeous enough, truly, is the Fête of St. Rosalie, at Palermo! Viewing it merely as a popular festival, there is a certain pleasure in contemplating the brilliant scene, and feeling that the very poorest amongst the populace may enjoy their full share of its festivities. But as I gazed upon those angels floating aloft, those painted wooden saints borne on the shoulders of the multitude, and followed by a troop of monks, I could not but ask myself, "What right had any man to destroy the idols of the heathen, merely to substitute in their place such paltry idols as these? How could any men, who were ambassadors of Christ, permit a nation to rest satisfied with a Christianly debased to the very lowest form of Heathenism?"

The morning after the festival, the dreary stillness of fatigue rested over the sunny streets of Palermo. The sea and the sky sparkled with light, and ever brighter and more ruddy glowed the morning dawn, until the whole surrounding scene was bathed in a flood of splendour. Beneath my window, rolling in the warm sand, and rejoicing in the shade of the caruba and pepper trees, gambolled a merry band of sun-burnt urchins, the sons of the Marinari, light-hearted and happy as though resting in the confident assurance that the earth and the ocean at least were to them an inalienable inheritance.

EGYPTIAN DANCING GIRLS.

THERE is a combination of material in Mr. Warren's elegant picture of "Egyptian Dancing Girls," which naturally suggests to the mind the past and the present condition of the country it represents. Whether the composition be a real or an imaginary one we will not undertake to affirm; but the scene is evidently borrowed from the banks of the Nile, and not improbably from that particular locality on which once stood the great city Memphis, the rival of mighty Thebes. Although the exact spot on which the ancient metropolis of Lower Egypt was situated has been the subject of much dispute, and has afforded materials for long and laborious investigation, it is now almost universally decided that it occupied a place very near the village of Motrahenny, on the western bank of the river; and the vicinity of this village presents features similar in character to those in the artist's picture. Travellers who have visited this part of the country describe manifest indications of an ancient city, in the form of mounds, channels, and blocks of granite, many of which are covered with sculptures and hieroglyphics, that are locally considered to be the remains of the royal seat of the Pharaohs, the "Noph" of the prophet Ezekiel, of which Jeremiah prophesied that it should be "waste and desolate without an inhabitant." And so completely has this prophecy, like all others found in Sacred History, been fulfilled, that nothing remains like a building of any kind, and not a single human being is to be found dwelling within its precincts.

It is the fragments of architectural grandeur introduced into the picture which throw back the thoughts into, far distant ages, of whose history the records are few and unsatisfactory. There is nothing more calculated to manifest the instability of human greatness, and how utterly futile are man's hopes of establishing for himself and his heirs a power that shall live for ever, than to witness the entire, or even partial, desolation of a land which at some period exalted itself among the nations of the world. Every remnant of its former glory is a mute instructor, while even the dust on which one treads is not unfrequently all that remains of some object of beauty that attracted the admiration of thousands of intelligent beings. And thus it will be with regard to those things in which the living generation pride themselves, for, to borrow an elegant thought from the poet Moore,—

"Time looks on,
Waiting till all, now bright and blest,
Shall fall beneath him like the rest."

Was it by way of reading a homily upon the changes to which every created object is destined, that the artist has placed his dancing girls amid the ruins of Egyptian grandeur? There was no necessity for his so doing in order to a characteristic introduction of the figures, which would have been advantageously disposed, for pictorial display, under other circumstances than those he has thought fit to associate with them. But if such were his intention he has effectually succeeded in producing a picture in which the gaiety of the present seems only to mock the solemnity of the past, and the low enjoyments of actual existence are placed in striking contrast with the mouldering relics of antiquity, which speak of a period so distant that even imagination itself can scarcely penetrate into its buried mysteries. The scene reminds one of some unhallowed revel among the tombs of the dead, though as a composition of ideal art it is very beautiful.

The dancing girls of Egypt are of the most remote origin; indeed, this pastime is generally supposed to have first been practised in that country, from which the Jews brought it in their Exodus, and caused it to form a part of the idolatrous worship they offered to the golden calf. In the choral dances and festal processions illustrated in the paintings on ancient Egyptian monuments, the dance is almost invariably represented as performed by women, and even to this day it is generally left to the females, the men considering it beneath their dignity to take any part in such proceedings, except as spectators; but in this character the dance forms no inconsiderable portion of their amusement. The public female dancers of Egypt have acquired by the reports of almost every Eastern traveller, a very unenviable notoriety: They chiefly exhibit in the courts of houses and in the streets: the movements of their dance are not unlike those of the Spanish fandango, and it is generally accompanied by a viol and tambourine, played by musicians of the company, while the dancers themselves are provided with castanets, which they sound, as represented in the engraving.

In Mr. Bartlett's interesting volume, entitled, "The Nile Boat," he gives an account of an exhibition of this sort, at which he was present. The two performers who were amusing the assembled party, "had once been handsome, but were now, though young, decidedly usé, worn out with early profligacy, and bedaubed ad nauseam with a thick layer of vermilion. Their dress consisted of very large loose trowsers of silk, and a tight-bodied vest open at the bosom, and having long sleeves, with a large shawl wreathed round and supporting their languid figures; they were also profusely decorated with gold coins and bracelets." The writer speaks of the dance itself as having little to recommend it in the way of grace and elegance—qualities which render the movements and attitudes of the skilful European dansseuse so attractive and picturesque—but much of that equivocal expression more calculated to create disgust in the well-regulated mind than enjoyment. Whatever of a kindred nature Mr. Warren may have seen in those who formed the models of his picture, he has properly and carefully avoided to introduce, lest truth should, perchance, become offensive: as an illustration of modern Eastern customs the subject is highly interesting.

IMPRESSIONS OF ENGLAND IN THE

Associated Workmen in England and Scotland.—Visit to the Co-operative Tailors in London.—Visit to the Co-operative Needlewomen.—Organization of Association.—An Idea.—The Ancient Guilds regenerated in a deeper sense and more liberal form.—The sympathy roused towards them by Poets, Noblemen, Clergy, Lawyers, who take part in this movement of the workers.—The Fourth Estate comes forward upon the scene.—Christian Socialism.—The True Socialism.—The False.—The Wheat and Chaff.—The Discrimination of the Earth.—Kossuth's Reception in London

THEY had already begun in England; they were already in operation, these new institutions for an improved future in the social state; ragged schools, model dwelling and eating-houses, public baths and wash-houses, emigrants' home, dormitory, and such like, when the Morning Chronicle brought out a series of articles under the name of "London Labour and the London Poor." These articles made known the results of long-continued inquiries, pursued through intercourse and conversation with the various classes of the poorer population of London; and gave an accurate representation of their social state; their occupations, customs, habits, enjoyments, temptations, moral condition, sufferings and vices. In this class were included cab-men, porters, postillions, street traders, sellers of fruit, policemen, street-musicians, crossing-sweepers, beggars, servants in hospitals; pickpockets, burglars, and such like. The narrations in which the parties themselves were introduced as speaking and acting, were rich both in humour and pathos, in comedy and tragedy, in novelty and wisdom. They bore an internal stamp of truth; outward circumstances still further strengthening this, and the spirit of the author being steady, earnest, and acute. Every one, even the meanest human being whom one might meet and overlook in the street, was here brought forward in his own individual world, his own home, education, feelings, crimes and virtues. The author, without sentimentality, without palliation, accompanied these pariahs of society from their earliest days of innocence and through their degradation, down to the extremest point of human wretchedness, which prisons and hospitals conceal. Here were no mysteries of Paris delineated by an author only half a Christian, in a melodramatic style, half true, attractive and delusive at the same time. Here it was the truth, the actuality itself, brought together by a trustworthy person, and speaking the convincing language of truth itself. Here also were stern statistical facts, deducible from moral data. These and the conclusions which they led to, astonished the thinking men and women of England. It was incontrovertibly proved by the facts here adduced, that thousands of women are to be found in London, as well as in other large towns of England, who are not able to live by their own labour, and would not be able to live at all excepting by—degradation. It was incontrovertibly proved, likewise, that there were also thousands of men there who could not support themselves and their families by the honest wages of labour; it was proved that certain trades and corporate bodies, formerly rich and prosperous, were sinking lower with each succeeding year; as well as that the circumstance which in England was bringing the well-to-do in the labouring classes to poverty, and the poor to crime, and, finally, to the extremest wretchedness, was an increasing cause in England, and had its root in the present organization of society.

The first effect of this extraordinary exposition, of this influx of light amid darkness, was a general consternation. Had not Government long ago been established as a great protecting institution for society? Had not the laws, the church, houses of correction, workhouses, prisons, poor-laws, schools, public and private benevolence for hundreds of years, been actively employed in keeping in order and in improving society? and never more than at the present time!—and yet—in the very heart of all this, and in the face of all this, and in spite of all this, there was an increasing condition of ruin, of degradation, increasing silently, secretly, but at the same time perceptibly, undermining the whole visible fabric of society, if no obstacle were presented to its progress, if there were no other counterbalancing influence than the old order of things, the old curative measures!

People inquired on all hands, Whence is it to come? The answer was, It will come of itself from the blind, unopposed, and selfish competition, which places the interests of one man in opposition to those of others, and leaves the weaker to be trodden down by the stronger. People inquired yet further; How can this be helped? The field of competition must be left open; competition must be free to all alike. Some said, That will do nothing. It must go as it will! Others replied; No! because then it would go to destruction at once; and that is the will of the Evil One, and not of God. God has said, that all men are brethren, and should live together as brethren, as the children of God, and not as mortal enemies in perpetually bitter strife one with another.

It was in the last week of December in the year 1849, when ten persons, amongst whom, besides men of the working class, were two clergymen of the Church of England and one Member of Parliament, met together in the house of a working man. The Morning Chronicle had just published a horrifying description of the condition of the working tailors and needlewomen in London, who, through the system of, so-called, middlemen, and the consequent reduction of the prices paid for work, with other abuses of the powers of labour, were reduced, day by day, into a state of yet greater need. And these persons had

(2) The opinions put forth in this article are to be accepted as those only of the accomplished writer. The Editor, while, in many cases, dissenting from them, has considered it right to print them as they have been written. It may be necessary, however, to remind the reader that Miss Bremer's opportunities of judging were limited and few; and that her views upon subjects so delicate and intricate as those upon which she here treats are to be received with some degree of caution.

It was determined that they should immediately endeavour to form associations of workers in those trades which were at the present time most depressed; and that the members of these associations should work at the same time for their own and for the general advantage, as well as in such places and under such conditions as befitted men and women in the nineteenth century of Christianity.

The next meeting of these men took place in January 1850, at the house of one of the clergymen. Several gentlemen of respectability and wealth had in the meantime joined the original small company. Upright and trustworthy men of the tailors' trade had been selected to make known this first tailors' association, and they had even found among those willing to become its friends and supporters two master tailors—to their honour be it told! The masters and workers, in concert with the gentlemen, drew up rules and calculated expenditure. A sum of money, three hundred pounds, was advanced on loan, to bring the undertaking into operation; the direction was organized; conditions drawn up, laws written out and subscribed; the association took a house and began to work.

At the same time, as if propelled by some general power of nature, similar associations were established in various towns of England and Scotland, as well as also in the country, in the manufacturing districts; and in fact, this peculiar form of social development increased so rapidly and so generally, that within a short time it was to be met with in nearly all the industrial trades. Just lately in Scotland, and if I remember correctly, in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, not less than four thousand operatives of the so-called block-printing business entered into a general partnership. At the same time were opened, throughout the length and breadth of England and Scotland, the so called co-operative shops,—shops for the sale of all kinds of provisions and goods, established by companies or associations of operatives, who supplied them with their various articles, and from which they made their own purchases, whether of goods generally, or provisions for their family consumption, convinced that from them they would obtain a good article at a reasonable price.

I had frequently, during my rambles in other towns, seen these shops, bearing the inscription, "Co-operative shops, or stores." But it was not until I came to London, that I fully understood the design and universality of these undertakings among the working classes of England, or of their advancing concentration into a system. These establishments had grown up out of the pressure of the times, from an internal and external necessity, from a moral and physical necessity; in the first instance isolated, disconnected, without knowledge of each other; by degrees however—also from natural necessity—becoming acquainted one with another—coming into a fraternal relationship one with another by the attention which was requisite for the common interests, by the adoption of a common code of regulations, by the development of a yet more and more perfected system, through which the individual members were united into one body, with one heart and one head; or, to speak less figuratively, with a central body of directors, to which the separate associations might send deputies or representatives.

I visited the first-mentioned association in London, about two years after its first establishment. It had already paid off one-half of its original debt, and had a certain prospect of paying off the remainder within the course of the present year. It was in a state of prosperity, although work at that moment was not abundant; which was by no means unusual at that period of the year, when the greater portion of the wealthy residents of London were in the country. The house belonging to the association was of somewhat insignificant appearance; and the stairs by which one ascended to the workroom were rickety, but they were going to have this properly repaired: the room, however, where the tailors—somewhat above twenty in number—sat to work, was clean, airy and agreeably warm. There was also a book-case in the room, where, among other well-bound volumes, I observed "Plato's Dialogues," of which an English translation, somewhat abridged from the original, has lately been published and is much read by the working classes. There was also in the house a small bath-room, convenient and well supplied with fresh water; and which, in summer especially, is industriously made use of by the workmen. One portion of the house, formerly an outbuilding, had been taken down; and was now in progress of re-erection for a large hall; where lectures might be delivered, and in which the association should have its reading-room and place of social meeting.

The superintendent of this association, Mr. W. C, himself an operative, and who had been elected to his office by the members themselves, is a little man of rare endowments, whose whole countenance seemed to me an animated beaming eye. Of my conversations with him, I will draw from my memory the following.

Quest. How came you first to think of this association?

Ans. It came as if of itself;—as if from necessity. The men had become weary of Strikes when work became scarce and wages low. They gained nothing by them; and were, after all, obliged in the end to submit themselves to necessity, or to starve with wife and children. They had become weary also of going out "on tramp," by which they seldom got anything but worn-out shoes. In this way the thought arose in some of our minds, Could we not unite ourselves for conjoined labour, for conjoined profits, under laws of association, and thus become independent of the pleasure of individuals? We attempted the thing; and many others in other trades attempted also to become associated; and many gentlemen, nay even some manufacturers themselves, participating in our views, joined us, and assisted us with money and with advice.

Quest. How are members elected?

Ans. All who desire to become such must pass through a certain time of trial; after which, if they have shown themselves to be trustworthy and skilful workmen, they are admitted as members of the association and receive a copy of its regulations.

Quest. How would you act towards a member who, after having been received into the association, showed himself to be unworthy?

Ans. He would be excluded by general vote.

Quest. Do you pay all your workers alike, the unskilful as well as the skilful, provided that the former does his best?

Ans. No; we pay for work by the piece, and according to its value as work. The skilful workman, as a matter of necessity, obtains more than the unskilful. The unskilful gets less, but not so little as he would if he worked out of the association, if he conscientiously does his best and behaves well, because we acknowledge a higher principle in our association than merely skill in work.

Quest. And how do you proceed with regard to the division of the over-plus, or of pure profit?

Ans. I acknowledge that, at first, this question troubled me, and that I had my doubts about an equal division of profits. I did not rightly know how to guide myself in this matter; but the men themselves helped me when I laid the matter before them. We will more than willingly, said they, divide the profits equally with our associate who has done less than ourselves, provided only that he has done his best, because we know that his good conduct and industry are as advantageous to our association as his work; and we must acknowledge higher principles of action than merely material advantage. As yet we have not had much over-plus to divide; because, when we met together to consult about the application of the first hundred pounds which we had of clear profit, we unanimously agreed that it should go towards the paying off our debt, and that we would not make any division of profits amongst ourselves until the whole was liquidated. And we hope to do that within the next twelve months; for we have now a large order for liveries for Lady E.'s servants. Lady E. sent for me and talked the matter over with me herself, for she understood all about it; she is a thorough man of business—that she is! and she laid before me a high estimate for the clothes, and asked me whether I could make them properly and well for a lower price. And when I had looked over the estimate, I said that we could make some of the required articles at a lower price than was here given in, so that the whole might be done at a less cost. And thus we got the order.

Quest. What do you consider the advantages of this establishment to be, in an economic point of view, over the usual establishments of this kind where the workmen are paid by a master?

Ans. In the first place, we consider our work to be better and more conscientiously done, because every workman ought to do his work conscientiously; and here it is done by men who are not wearied by over-work, as we do not work above ten hours out of the four-and-twenty; and secondly, that we never do business on credit; but only for immediate cash payments; we therefore run no risk of loss. Besides which, we can sell at a lower price than the great master tailors:—They are obliged to sell their clothes at a higher price, because, from old custom, they must give credit; hence some of their customers never pay at all, and they lose at least a third of their calculated profits. We trust, also, that thinking people of affluence will still more and more come to regard our establishment as right and judicious, and will give us their countenance. Hitherto we have done very well, although just at present it is “a slack time” for work.

Quest. And if this time should continue, and work become yet slacker, how would you keep the workers of the association together?

Ans. We must be contented to let them go over to another association of the same trade, or of a trade kindred to ours, which for the time happens to be full of work. The members of these associations must mutually assist each other; and every one must be prepared for movement and change amongst them, in consequence of a much more extended acquirement of knowledge and much greater skill than has hitherto been the case. We have devised many resources against the difficulties of slack work, and we see many remedies;—among these, a savings fund. We have yet much to learn; we are still in the first period of our apprenticeship; and in our beginning. The most important thing is now, that the different associations should be brought into friendly and close connexion with each other, by means of central association.

Quest. Are the men in your association guided by religious principle?

Ans. Not many of the workmen acknowledge religious principles as yet. But many of the gentlemen, our promoters, do; and they are obtaining more and more influence amongst us. We commenced our association on purely economic principles; but it is clear that higher principles cannot long be absent. And they show themselves already.

Quest. In what class of society is the greater number of your supporters?

Ans. Among the clergy. Do you know Professor M. and Mr. K.?

The little man's countenance beamed with joy as he named these two clergymen of the Church of England, whose portraits hung in the room. He inquired further, whether I should yet remain any time in London?

“No,” replied I, “I must soon leave on my way home.”

“That is a pity,” said he, “I could have wished you to have been present at our great meeting next month; on which occasion delegates from all the associations in Scotland and England, as well as our promoters and friends, will all assemble here for consultation together, and for the still further development of our plans; and the consideration of our economic questions. We have invited — (and he named several of the most influential men of England), who have all promised to be present; and we shall have lectures and discussions on various important sections of our undertaking."

"How does the Needlewomen's Association go on?" I inquired.

"Not so well," he replied, "They have made a mistake in the beginning, by not in the first instance making articles of the simplest kind and most general use; and also by opening their shop in a part which is but little frequented. But we shall lend them a helping hand in their removal, and to enable them to compete with the ordinary 'slop-workers.' We hope soon to be able to open for them, as well as for ourselves, shops in — street, where there is a great traffic. They, like ourselves, often may learn much from their mistakes."

"Did you find in a general way a good and fraternal spirit existing in the various associations which you visited?" inquired I of Mr. C., who, I knew, had but lately returned from a journey in England and Scotland, during which he had delivered lectures on the question of association.

"In a general way," replied he, "it is so; although many associations and their supporters as yet know very little about these questions. Nevertheless, the true comprehension of them is on the increase, as is also the spirit of co-operation. In — (he named a small town in Scotland,) I found that the provision dealers had united in co-operation, and had banished all intoxicating liquors from their shops; so that the town which formerly was deluged with whisky and drunkenness, was now perfectly free therefrom. The merchants, by their union, had obtained power over the movement, and now dared to rise up in opposition against them."

In company with the noble clergyman, Professor M., I one day visited the Needlewomen's Association. Among the leading members who had become the directors of this association, I had seen the name of Lord Ashley, and that of the Prussian Minister in London, the noble and intellectual Chevalier Bunsen. The association was designed for the most oppressed class of needlewomen, who, in their struggle with want, had still maintained a pure course of life. The association was intended to be self-supporting; but had not yet succeeded in this respect; partly from the cause assigned by the superintendent of the Tailors' Association; partly, and still more, from the difficulties which were caused by the ignorance, and the unwillingness to submit to order, and the want of punctuality in a portion of the needlewomen, as well in their habits of life as in their work. A kind and agreeable woman, the mistress of the house, opened the door for us, and accompanied me through the rooms. The needlewomen pay here a certain sum—as low as possible—for work-room, food, firing and light, which sum is deducted from the amount of their wages. Everything in the house was neat and orderly. Each bed-room was fitted up for three or four persons. In one large warm room sat, at two long tables, somewhat above twenty women; and sewed, two by the light of each candle. The effect was pleasing.

I inquired from the superintendent what it was which would induce a purchaser to give their shop the preference to any other in which the same description of articles was sold?

She replied, "The excellence of the workmanship—the moral condition of the workers."

I examined various articles which were in progress of making; and I could not but really marvel at the excellence of the workmanship. Such sewing-schools would be useful in the United States. This association, although not yet self-supporting, had saved many an elderly woman from perishing of hunger; and many a young one from what was still worse. May it go on; and its noble supporters not become weary!

I have given so much of my conversation with the superintendent of the Tailors' Association, because his words afford a good representation of the spirit and aim of the co-operative movement which is now going on in England and Scotland; and which more openly takes the name of Christian Socialism; which has for its organ in London the paper called The Christian Socialist, in opposition to the Socialism which is based upon radical and anti-religious principles; and the organ of which in England is The Leader.

The doctrines propounded by this latter newspaper would, if carried out, work a revolution in the social system of England; the effects of which none can possibly determine.

The former—Christian Socialism—excites to reform on Christian principles and with Christian faith; goes forth from a divine principle, developing itself in a Christian people and community; and lastly, perfecting itself into a universal kingdom of God upon earth, where all true forms of human association are preserved and made yet more clear; and where no man stands alone. It acknowledges the right of enjoyment, but places virtue before it; and knows that finally they are one and the same in the highest felicity of mankind.

I will leave to persons more skilled in these subjects than myself, to state the politico-economical consequences of these new social arrangements, when they shall have fully established themselves:—I will leave them to demonstrate the importance to the public of a better and a more conscientious labour; and the gain to production where the multitude of the producers themselves stand forward also in a higher degree as consumers,—a natural result of the improved circumstances of the masses. I will here speak only of the moral influence of these associations, in some respects which are to me obvious.

It has been seen in England, as in other countries, that good and upright masters have nothing to fear from these movements amongst the working classes; that their interests will not really suffer, nor will they ever have any want of workmen. No: such masters will obtain hands in the first instance, in preference to the associations. These demand, especially in their commencement, the virtues of self-denial and self-command, which the workman under a good master need know nothing of. He can possess a greater freedom and indulge himself in pleasures, which the workman of an association in the first period must deny himself. For instance, the associated workmen must give up their old custom of keeping St. Monday. But, if the world was full of good masters—and that is far enough from being the case—they would not be sufficient to exclude the causes of evil and suffering amongst the working classes; to fill up the necessity which more and more seriously displays itself there; which demands something more and higher than bread alone. For it seems clear to me, that, as the success of an association depends pre-eminently on the moral and practical virtues of its members; and on its constitution and rules strictly in force there; so is it equally clear that it must exert a potent influence on the morals and industrious spirit of the workmen; yes, upon their whole human consciousness.

Even in France, where co-operative associations are not professedly built upon a Christian foundation; the mere necessity of succeeding in united labour, has led to an elevation of the moral standard; and the written rules do homage to the noblest humanity. We see that the ordinances which these associations adopt and publish as comprehending their constitutions, have for their aim to elevate the labouring classes as well through a moral reform, as in their material condition. They will improve their circumstances, that is certain; and they will also become better. The coarser vices will be abandoned; and also the more refined ones. Even punishment has for its foundation a high conception; and a humanizing tendency. For example, the first class of punishments consists of flogs; the second and higher, reproof from the members of the association. Honourable members, say these rules, honourable sensible workmen must, as members of the association, strictly condemn and prohibit all coarse, angry and unbecoming language. Their language and conduct must be worthy of citizens who live by useful labour.

An association, they say further, has also for its object to assist members during illness; and to give pensions to the old; and to invalid workmen. The Association of the Turners of Steel in Paris, organized, on the 1st of January, 1850, a fund for assisting cases of distress, but could not advance it beyond 313 francs. Two years later, it had given all needful assistance; and left, for the sick, and payment of medical aid, 490 francs in hand.

The Association of Bricklayers and Stone-cutters declared its object to be, to form a union, with a common interest of labour, so as to advance towards the goal of humanity—universal brotherhood.

But such an object is not to be attained merely by rules and laws; but through a life which French Socialism does not yet possess; namely, the life in

Him, who is "the Way, the Truth, and the Life;" and who has also said, "I am the true Vine, ye are the branches; without Me ye can do nothing." "I in them and Thou in Me, that they may be made perfect in one."

The English Christian Socialism advances beyond the French, as being conscious of this life, of this eternal foundation. The Christian, the true Socialism, is the most powerful opponent of the false Socialism, and of Communism; it is their certain conqueror. Communism haunts the twilight of the understanding, where Socialism arises like Thor against the Trolls.¹

That the Workmen's Associations, in proportion as they are able to carry into effect their plans, will come to exhaust and annihilate the proletariat, seems to me clear; since these associations already, in their commencement, are planning schools;—institutions for sickness and poverty, with all their necessary machinery;—seeking the health of the public;—though the sanguine prophecy of a French minister may be somewhat exaggerated,—that the time shall come when the word "proletär" shall no longer be understood on the earth.

May this young, new, social heart of France grow and develop itself; grow all the stronger under the pressure of an iron hand, calculated to hold it back, so that it may the more thoroughly ripen and ennoble itself! "Much bread grows in a winter's night!" says the proverb. But it is in England's associations of workmen that we hail the newer awakened consciousness of society; and the advance of the fourth estate upon the ocean of life towards self-guidance; and towards full knowledge and exercise of the social rights of humanity. And that this shall take place cannot be unexpected by those who believe in the Christian revelation; and its development in history. But whether this shall come in the name of the Prince of Peace, for the blessing of the earth; in the communion of saints, for the edification of God's kingdom; or—under the guidance of the red flag, amidst blood and war and much misery;—depends upon the men themselves. It depends, in the first place, on the virtue and seriousness of the working classes; but, next to that, and in as thoroughly great a degree; upon the brotherly and active sympathy of the classes which, in knowledge, in power, or in wealth, already occupy the upper regions of society.

The word Socialism has fallen into disrepute in the world in certain circles, through various abuses and misunderstandings. But is there another term which so well expresses what it really means; and which, in reality, every good man holds dear? The names of St. Simon, Fourier, Owen, are quoted as bugbears likely enough to terrify all reasonable souls; yet the impression which these fantastic prophets of the great scenes of the future have made, and do make in the world, is incontestable. Reasonable minds ought not to be frightened at a bugbear; but courageously to look at it, and to recollect that in the northern myths, the Rimthursar (Giants of the Frost) came before the gods and the demigods; before "the Mighty One:"—

"He who guides all things,
Judgments he utters;
Strifes he appeaseth;
Laws he ordaineth
To flourish for ever."

That in all science, the beginners are like the Vikings—yet the Vikings prepared the way, by their bold expeditions of plunder, for Columbus and the discovery of America. Chaldean and Ptolemaic astronomers preceded Copernicus, Kepler, and Newton; and the social astronomy must also have its first discoverers; and its Titans. That they will, of necessity, commit many mistakes is quite natural; but that in which they are right, that which constitutes their power—that is the question. For where a powerful necessity, a deep interest operates in the bosom of humanity; and expresses itself in a variety of ways simultaneously; there must an actual new life exist; and be in the very throes of its birth.

"Prove all, and hold fast that which is good," says Paul; and nearly two thousand years later, one of England's and of earth's strong champions, utters these beautiful and philosophic words:—

"In the great and eternal conflict of opinions, Nature herself is the arbitrator; and cannot decide wrong. The thing which is the most deeply rooted in nature and which we call the truest, this thing and no other, is that which finally grows."

"But at the same time we must call to mind what sort of arbitrator Nature is; what greatness, what a union of light and toleration there is in her. You take wheat and throw it into the bosom of the earth: your wheat may be mixed up with chaff, straw, sweepings, dust, all sorts of imaginable rubbish, no matter! You fling it down into the bosom of the gentle and just earth. She cherishes the wheat. All the rubbish she silently consumes, shrouds herself in it, says nothing of the rubbish. But the good wheat she permits to grow. The good earth is silent about all the rest,—has, silent at the same time, turned it to some use, and makes no lamentation over it. She is true and not indifferent; and at the same time so great, and just, and motherly in her truthfulness! She desires of a thing only that it shall be true at heart; she will protect it, only if it is so. There is a soul of truth in everything; and this she never gives in vain."

And is there not in human nature also a good and equitable soil, which follows the example of the earth, separating the wheat from the chaff? The Christian socialism of England has already shown this. It has let fall the visionary theories of St. Simon, of Fourier, and of Robert Owen; it has retained and made use of, with great and sound judgment, such of their theories as were possessed of head and heart. It has laid its foundations in the eternal life, and has sprung therefrom, silently and in concealment as yet, only to develop itself one day as the world's tree, which shall extend the shadow of its branches over the desolate wastes of the earth.

I have faith in the good soil even of human nature, which separates the wheat from the chaff; which bears of itself, first the green blade, then the ear, and then the perfected corn in the ear.

It is to this good, equitable earth, that I entrust that which I have here written.

During my stay in London Kossuth arrived there, and people of all classes prepared to give him a warm reception. Being at the time exclusively occupied with England and English affairs, I did not myself make many inquiries about Kossuth and his arrival, although the hero of Hungary could not be an object of indifference to any freedom-loving soul. It was a surprise to me, therefore, when one day, as I was sitting in my room in the Strand, I heard in the street outside a loud noise, which increased like a rushing stream; and on looking out, I saw an open carriage drawn by four white horses, coming slowly along, surrounded by many hundreds of people hurrahing and waving their hats. After this came a second carriage, with children and fluttering banners. In the first carriage, which was surrounded with people as by a moving wall, sat two gentlemen. One of these acknowledged the salutations of the people and the greetings from various windows, where flags and handkerchiefs waved, and acclamations resounded, as the triumphal procession went by.

It was Kossuth, who thus made his entry into London. The slow advance of the train and the so frequent removal of his hat, enabled me to see Kossuth particularly well; and all the better, as two hours later, he returned the same way attended by a still greater, a still more enthusiastic crowd. He appeared to me, a man of short stature, with a strong and remarkably well developed forehead, especially as regarded breadth; but, otherwise, with nothing remarkable about him. In carriage and manner, however, there was a something decided, simple, resolute and clever, not in a military, but a civil style;—a person not remarkable from any extraordinary personal power, although he may be so as regards political intelligence. I should hardly have been willing to write down this impression, derived merely from a window, of a person driving past in a carriage; had not everything which I read and have read of Kossuth's speeches, only strengthened the same impression. He is a man of clear and decided political intelligence; he is perfectly master of his subject and the impression which it will produce; he is possessed of an astonishing fluency and perspicuity of expression. That which he says is excellent, is living, convincing; one cannot but admire his ability; he is right, he is right, altogether right, very right, perfectly right, and the whole world will do him justice; but—my heart will not grow strong within me as I listen to his words. They find their way to my head, but not to my heart. I say that which I feel.

But though Kossuth was not able to deliver Hungary, yet he can liberate the political mind of the whole civilized world; and for this has he been especially called forth by Providence from the down-trodden soil of liberty; a seed of freedom, borne by the wings of mind over all the world, so that it may vegetate and shoot forth all the more.—Wonderful!

Asylum for Aged Governesses.—Home for the Young.—Queen's College.—Government School of Design for Women.—Ladies' Guild.—Some Thoughts.—Review of England.—Its Authors and Authoresses.—Departure.

I HAD heard some years since, whilst yet in Sweden I had listened to the news, as one listens to some beautiful half incredible story; I had heard that persons of talent, rank and fortune, had united in England to establish a Home for Aged and Poor Governesses, to enable them to enjoy a bright evening of life, free from anxiety. I had also read Mrs. S. C. Hall's charming story, "The Aged Governess," and wished that it might be read and thought upon by many. This story, written solely for the promotion of this good object, describes one of the most common occurrences of life, as we all must acknowledge; namely, how the old instructress, neglected by the young whom she has brought up, often as a second mother;—how they, not from badness of heart, not from premeditated neglect, merely from common thoughtlessness,—leave her to her fate; after her long laborious career in the family when they had need of her, and out of the family when they need her no longer,—left alone, to live or to die, utterly forsaken.

This story had caused me to think the undertaking must succeed; it is an affair of humanity, and its advocate knows how to touch the heart.

I heard in America that the work had been accomplished; the Asylum for Aged Governesses had been erected, and I set my heart upon visiting it during my visit to London.

Nothing more was needed than that I should mention my wishes to my friends in London. One of the most effective promoters of the good institution, the excellent and cheerful Mrs. Laing, conducted me thither.

It was a beautiful afternoon. It was pleasant to drive with that agreeable and kind woman, in an open carriage, away from the crowded noisy London into the pleasant suburb of Kentish Town, where the green fields shone in the sun, and trees and flowers nodded in the wind; it was pleasant to listen all this time to Mrs. Laing, who told me how that, ever since her earliest youth, she had wished above everything to be able some time to be of use to the distressed of her own sex, whose smoother path of life she herself was beginning to tread; and of the happiness which she now experienced, in finding herself in a position to accomplish the warm wishes of her youthful years. Beautiful and cheering is the sun! But still more beautiful and cheering is the sun of human kindness in a human eye!

The carriage drew up at a pair of iron gates. Within these, upon an open space and with a free look-out, stood a large splendid house, built of grey stone, in the beautiful antique style. This was the Asylum of the Aged Governesses, their last calm haven and home on earth. The building had been completed only in June 1849, and was calculated to receive twenty-two inmates. Rooms for more may yet be added. We passed through the garden, which, however, consisted principally of beautiful grassplots and beds of flowers, shrubs and newly planted trees. Some of the old ladies were walking here, in the bright light of the setting autumnal sun, and tending the flowers. We entered the house. The steps, the doors, all, from foundation to roof-tree, were built as if for a thousand years' duration, beautifully and excellently—the sterling English spirit breathed throughout it.

In the large common drawing-room, adorned with pictures, bookcases, and all those various things which constitute the peculiar little world of a beautiful room intended for social enjoyment, sat two of the old ladies at their work. Mrs. Laing was received by all as one receives a messenger of joy. The old ladies evidently regarded her as one of their best friends. They were anxious to prove to her that they were well and full of the energy of life. For she had made them understand that no greater trouble could happen to her than that they should die; that she wished them all to live and to be happy here, the longer the better.

A little, cheerful, bright old lady, more than seventy years of age, but very lively, and as agile almost as a young girl, went with me through all the different rooms. They were all exactly alike as to arrangement, had the same kind of furniture, carpets, and all comforts equally alike. My little conductress was quite alive to all this, and showed me with how much thought everything had been arranged for their convenience, how easily the bonnet-boxes under the tables were drawn out, how accurately and noiselessly the doors closed, because the edges were lined with listing; how everything was so arranged that they might find life easy and agreeable. In one of the rooms sat an old lady, who was an invalid, and was no longer able to walk out. She sat in her comfortable easy-chair, the dim eyes, which shone like feeble lights in the still handsome countenance, gazed out from a window which commanded a lovely view over the distant green, church-crowned heights, behind which the sun was now sinking in the calm splendour of autumn, illuminating the room where the old lady sat. Her voice was weak, so were evidently the powers of life; the lamp was about to be extinguished. But within, as well as without, all seemed to be peaceful and bright as regarded her. Freed from the gnawing anxieties of providing for the day, protected from cold rooms, shortness of food, from a desolate home, she may now calmly await the night, sinking quietly; like the sinking sun, which glanced into her chamber kindly, like the loving eye of a friend.

(1) The remarkably beautiful earthenware used in these rooms, was the gift of a manufacturer of this ware; the name of whom I regret much that I have forgotten. (It is scarcely necessary to name Herbert Minton, Esq., who has here most amply evidenced his kind feeling and his good taste.—Ed.)

That aged governess, and all the aged ones there! my heart throbs warmly at the thought of them, and of their asylum.

It is in institutions of this kind that one sees the heart in a nation. Here the question was not about any "dangerous classes," whom society must take in hand in order to secure its own safety. Here the question was about a class, the least dangerous of all, the most defenceless within the range of society;—about solitary women, who, after a life of toil and self-denial in the service of the young generation, go forth into silence, no one knows where, and hide an existence which they almost feel to be supernumerary, to be a burden,—go forth, often, like the sick bird, which seeks out a gloomy solitude of the wood in which to die.

The aged governess! •How hard is frequently her lot! How thankless is society for her labour, how indifferent towards her fate, how unsparing towards her faults,—faults, which arise precisely from the disproportion in her fate, which demands from the teacher all a mother's qualities and self-denial, without giving her in return any of the mother's recompense, the esteem of society, the gratitude of the child, or even a home.

During the several years' labour which noble-minded men and women in England have given to searching out and alleviating the silent misery which prevailed in this class of society, it has been proved that there is no class more deserving of esteem and attention; that no women better deserve the aid and esteem of society than the aged governesses.

Out of seven thousand teachers (it is estimated that the number of governesses in England amounts to about fifteen thousand) who during this time had come under the notice of the Committee of Direction which had been organized for their aid, several were found in lunatic asylums, but none in prisons. Many were without means of support in their old age, because they had maintained aged parents with the wages of their labour, assisted young brothers and sisters, or had brought up orphan nephews or nieces. Too many in consequence of their labour had weak sight, or were suffering from severe nervous complaints, of all suffering the worst.

Since the public attention in England has been so much directed to the responsible vocation of the governess, to her difficult position, and her unprovided-for old age; the public endeavour has increased with every succeeding year to elevate and improve the condition of the governess. Academies have been established for the education of young persons; annual pensions have been established for the old and needy; the crowning flower of this beautiful growth of human love and gratitude being the Home for the Aged Governesses, the asylum in which I now found myself, and which, when completed, will leave it difficult to imagine one more perfect.

Among the earliest promoters of this institution I found the names of—men. Men had been the earliest friends and protectors of the old, solitary ladies! The Duke of Cambridge, Dr. Thackeray, John Hatchard, (who lately closed a life full of good works) had long, both by word and deed, laboured to improve the fate of these lonely beings. These good men, in connexion with noble-minded ladies, such as Mrs. S. C. Hall and Mrs. Laing, had carried through this beautiful undertaking, and hence this final home for the aged governess.

Since then have the subscriptions for the support of aged governesses been so numerous, and so considerable in amount, that now a better future may be anticipated with certainty.¹

A payment of five hundred pounds entitles to nominate a lady to the asylum. And with all the conveniences and even luxuries of the establishment all has been so well calculated that the cost of each inmate's support is remarkably small. A physician and medicine are also provided by the institution.

One agreeable thing for the old ladies seemed to me, that they were permitted to have their friends and acquaintance to tea, on the payment of a mere trifle for each guest.

I saw, finally, in the handsome, light dining-room, the greater number of the inmates of the asylum assembled. There, seated at the piano, I played to them Swedish ballads and dances, and afterwards cordially shook hands with the kind old ladies, recommending them to follow Mrs. Laing's advice, to live long and remain well; they must take care and not die; they must take care and not grieve the good lady! They laughed, and seemed especially willing to attend to my admonition.

Why should they not? Everything which makes old age bright—yes, perhaps, which makes it the most cheerful portion of a woman's life—quietness, a secure future, all the amenities of daily life, society, retirement, the kindest care, the most faithful guardianship, everything which at their age might reasonably be desired, all this is theirs. With a joyful heart I left this institution, over which the most splendid autumnal sun seemed to cast its blessing, and drove with Mrs. Laing to the home of the younger governesses, which also, I was desirous of visiting. This institution,—under the same direction as the former, is designed as a shelter and home for young ladies who come to London in search of situations as governesses; is intended to be self-supporting through the payments of the parties whom it receives, as well as that it shall afford them all possible comforts at as low a price as possible. Not far from this institution, which is calculated to receive somewhat above twenty young ladies; is

(1) Would that this hope could be entertained with equal certainty in Sweden! I am acquainted with governesses in Sweden, before whose maternal hearts mankind ought to bow themselves in reverence; governesses who have in love and self-denial brought up worthy members of society, both men and women; and who now, in their old age, when their strength fails them, know not where they may lay their heads. And if an asylum like the one in England should be proposed in Sweden, I shall not be surprised to find Swedish men also among its principal promoters.

Queen's College, a newly established academical institution, which enables young women to study and graduate in the same way as young men; and to advance as far in the acquisition of knowledge as their natural powers will admit of. The formation of a skilful class of teachers, of which it is said there is a great want in England, is the highest object of this college, which is under the direction of the Government and the Established Church. "The Ladies' College," situated at no great distance, is an academy of the same class, founded by dissenters from the Established Church. Both institutions are promising beginnings in a path, in which the youngest of earth's nations, the United States, has gone far in advance of the mother country, and of all the nations of Europe; namely, in its superior means for the intellectual development of woman.

Having long since become clear in my own mind as to the importance of this intellectual development, not merely for women themselves, but even for men, for the whole rising generation; I had inquired in England, as well as in America, what was being done for women? There was only very little to tell me of in England; they had, however, in London, the Asylum for Aged Governesses, (and a more beautiful institution cannot be exhibited in any land,) the Home for Young Governesses, the two Female Colleges, together with "The Government School of Design for Females." I had already noticed this inscription upon the door-posts of a house in the Strand, directly opposite to where I had my own excellent lodgings. I was very anxious to visit the Female School of Design in this great magnificent London, the school which bore the grand appellation of "The Government School of Design for Women." It must be something really great and magnificent, thought I to myself.

The entrance did not promise much. It was narrow and rickety. But—that did not matter, the Englishman has sometimes a way of putting a simple outside to that which within is very splendid. I went up into a room, story above story, in the third floor. Ah! now had vanished all hope of and all esteem for the care of Government, as regarded the instruction of women, at least in the art of design. In a close, dark room, sat from sixty to seventy young women, so closely packed together that they took away from each other light, space, and, as it seemed to me, breathing-room. They had not even space in which to place their models, (some plaster of Paris casts stood on the floor in a dark corner of the apartment,) they had not room to place anything in a right light or proper perspective. In order to enable me to move along the room, the girls were obliged to stand aside, both they and their drawings. I saw two of them busy drawing a real—no, a withered plant which stood in a glass. And yet they came hither, and yet they sat here, day after day, industriously, crowded together as they were, the poor young girls!

(1) This is a misconception.—Ed.

So great was their desire, so great the necessity for them to learn.

In the house on the opposite side of the street, in "Somerset House," was "The Government School of Design for Young-Men," and they had every advantage which large rooms, models, teachers could give. And, nevertheless, and in spite of there being every unfavourable circumstance on the side of the girls, yet, in the two years, when public examination had been made of the productions of the two schools, the prizes had been awarded to the girls. So unquestionable was the superiority of their talent for decorative art, so nobly just the decision of the male judges. I heard much praise bestowed upon the head mistress of the Female School of Design, as being herself a distinguished artist. I cannot but deplore for her that she has not a better opportunity of developing her own talent and the talent of her young pupils, than that which is afforded her by the Government School of Design for Women.*

My thoughts involuntarily sped back across the sea to the country, to the people who preeminently among all the nations of the earth govern themselves, and to one of the Schools of Design for Women, which have lately begun to spring up there, with that fresh, vigorous growth, which all great, public, useful undertakings have in the soil of the New World. I saw the school which had been commenced in the first instance in the shade of private life, by Mrs. Sarah Peter, an English lady, with a warm feeling of fellow-citizenship; which had been taken up by the government, and incorporated with the Franklin Institution, at Philadelphia, with an annual endowment of three thousand dollars. I saw once more the large, light halls there; saw the kind, cheerful mistress happy in her vocation, happy in the progress of her pupils, and in the flourishing condition of the school.²

I saw the young girls' beaming countenances, saw how a happy consciousness had arisen within them, as if they would say, "We also have now obtained work in God's beautiful vineyard!"

I saw them drawing vine-shoots and palms, as decoration for walls and floors; saw genius here unfold its youthful wings in joyful amazement at its own powers; and patient industry gladly take her place in the service of her more ardent sister; saw in the practical direction which the spirit of the New World gives to all work, an infinite future and sphere of operation opened for women in the employment of that talent which Mother Nature has given to them for the beautifying of life—the sense of the beautiful, a feeling for the tasteful and the ornamental—a talent

(2) Since Miss Bremer's visit, the female branch of the school, under the able tuition of Mrs. McFann, has been removed; and there is little doubt of its more than rivaling that which attracted the admiration of the author of these papers.—Ed.

(3) In Boston, where there is also a school of design, as yet, in its commencement; I saw fatherly men with mild countenances, whose hearts and purses were ever open to do everything for the advancement of the future of the young daughters of their country. "Since I have understood what this school might become for the future of woman, I have gone into the matter with my whole heart!" said one of them to me.

"See!" said a warm-hearted, right-minded man, Dr. E., who accompanied me through the scholars' room, "this work by Elizabeth B.! fifteen dollars have been paid for it. And this second design for a carpet, by Miss —, this has been ordered and twelve dollars are paid for it. This little pattern for calico-printing—see how pretty it is!—has been bought for two dollars,—this for three. And these wood-cuts, are they not well done? The young girls who do these are full of orders for similar ones, and can command their own price. This lithograph is another work of Miss —; and these lithographed groupings of flowers, ordered for a little book, are by Miss —, and twelve dollars are paid for each. But I must introduce to you this young girl, Miss —. She used formerly to maintain herself by her needle; she did needlework even for my family; but it was discovered that she possessed so remarkable a talent for drawing, that after only seven months' instruction, she is secure of provision for the whole of her life, by means of art."

Dr. E. and the head mistress together, selected specimens of the young girls' various works. "Take," said they, "this, and this, and this, and this, home with you to your father-land."

This was in North America; in the country which preeminently opens a free field for the development of woman. In Europe a few individual voices are raised for this object. In America it is the universal voice which says,—

"He who points out a new field for the employment of female industry, ought to be regarded as one of the public benefactors. And every means by which such a field becomes accessible to woman recommends itself to society as an important agent in the civilization of the future."

It delighted me to hear that Charles Dickens, in his Household Words, had made some remarks upon it worthy of his warm heart and clever pen; also to hear that it was seriously contemplated to remove the school to a more favourable locality.

"The Ladies' Guild," is the name given to a Female Association in London, which I visited. It is as yet in its earliest commencement, and depends principally upon a discovery of a Miss Wallace, for the application of glass to the hitherto unknown purposes in ornamenting rooms, and the material of furniture. Miss Wallace has taken out a patent for her invention, which she uses entirely for the benefit of persons of her own sex. She was not at this time in England, but the ladies to whom she had communicated her art had united themselves for the formation of a guild, in which instruction in this particular branch of art is given, under certain conditions, to all such as wish to enter the association as working members. I saw here many original and particularly beautiful decorations of glass. I was, however, most struck with the branch of the art called "gems," in which pieces of cut glass crystals were set in flower-like groupings of various colours, yellow, green and red; as well as with plates of glass prepared and burned, so that they resemble white marble, and of a strength so great that a man might stand and stamp his foot upon them, without their being cracked. A room whose walls should be set with clusters of these gems, and some of the various brilliant paintings on glass which I saw here, would have the appearance of a fairy-palace, and would realize the most brilliant dreams of our childhood.

They were at this time desirous of preparing such a number of works as would enable them to have an exhibition, by which means the public interest might be turned to the undertaking.

May it succeed! May the well-intentioned, earnest women who commenced the undertaking be so happy as to carry it out for the benefit of their sex! How great the need of such institutions is, may be shown by the simple fact that a single advertisement offering work in this glass manufactory, called forth four hundred replies from gentle-women desirous of obtaining employment.

I saw several of these employment-seekers; for the greater part they were women of middle age, or in the latest youth; and the greater number were clad in deep mourning. They seemed to me like beings who had sat long in darkness, and now were come forth, half astonished, half mistrusting, inquiring, "Is there any light, is there any life for us?"

Alas! That in God's rich, beautiful abundantly-living world, so many beings created in His image, called to participate in His life, should need to ask thus!

"It must, it will succeed with us!" said the lady superintendent of this new undertaking, with the courageous calmness of conviction.¹ And I believe it will. The thing speaks for itself, and noble-minded men extend a brotherly hand to the ladies to aid them in carrying it out.

Yet once more: may the undertaking flourish, and may it be the precursor of many a similar one!

What a field of beautiful and advantageous activity lies waste through the neglect of rightly cultivating the talent which God has entrusted to woman! Thus, for example, her taste and her feeling for the beautiful are universally acknowledged, and she is permitted to cultivate it,—merely for her own adornment and beautifying; and by so doing makes this heavenly talent minister to vanity and self-love. What if this sense of beauty were developed under the guidance of knowledge, for the use of society, for the beautifying of life? Does not woman's natural taste for ornament and for ornamenting give her an hereditary title in the realm of decorative art?

(1) A worthy daughter is this lady of the well-known philanthropist, Dr. Southwood Smith. Dr. Southwood Smith stands at the head of the movement for Sanitary Reform in England, which is now being effectively carried out in many towns, and the main principles of which are, that every house and family shall have a constant and sufficient supply of fresh water, the erection of healthy dwellings for the poor, together with the careful removal and consumption of all impurity.

And if she were allowed there to employ her single gift, if she felt herself, through it, living and working, as a fellow-citizen—?

Ought not every country to have its school of art, in which the artistic skill of women might develop itself, in a peculiar and national manner? Might there not, by these means, be a northern art, which, as such, might obtain acknowledgment even in foreign countries?

Might not the daughters of Sweden, so rich in natural feeling and fresh life, study the natural productions of Sweden; draw the pine and the linca borealis, the Apollo-butterfly, and such like beautiful things which God has given to the soil of their fathers; and arrange them in tasteful groups, in vases and baskets for the decoration of walls and floors; and thus from northern scenes bring forth a northern art, tended by the hands of women, which might beautify northern homes, from the highest to the lowest; which might chase away ugly and common pictures, and let the brightest eye of home, the eye of the child, open into a world of beauty?

Is not, for all men and in all countries, one of the gates which opens into the sanctuary, like that in Solomon's temple—the beautiful?

We are speaking now merely of a branch of art. But is there not in many other arts and in many manufactures—nay, perhaps in every art and manufacture and science, the more they are developed and ennobled; a department which ought preeminently to be cultivated by women, expressly because of that one talent which has been given to them by nature?

We merely ask. We acknowledge to a profound faith in our own questions. But we would beseech of thinking men and women to consider the subject with us.

For the importance of it lies not merely in the peculiarity of woman's work. There is something beyond this in woman, through her own work, being able to acquire a self-relying position in society, a noble independence for the life both of soul and body; that she may feel, may know from childhood upwards that she may courageously look towards a future which she, through her own power of work, can prepare for herself; to know that creditable work is not disgrace. And that beautiful consciousness which already exists in the intellectual heights of society, may alike in the palace and the cottage of the peasant be acquired by all.

What is it that people are afraid of in this independence of woman? Are they afraid that thereby she will become less womanly? Are they afraid that any being, if it develops itself in freedom and in truth, can become any other than that which God designed in its creation?

Are they afraid that women may take the work away from men?

But all development, all natural division of labour in the world prove that its multiplication and affluence increases in proportion to the various powers which are employed upon it, each in his own way.

In truth, at the present moment, and with the mistaken purposes of existence which have so long depressed the life and consciousness of women, and with them those of men also, one can only wonder that women are what they are.

But when woman becomes that which God intended her to be, man's equal and helpmate in all spheres of life, Manna, or she-man, as the Bible calls her in the first morning of creation—

Amid many gloomy scenes, many sorrowful experiences, I yet live in the steadfastly joyful anticipation of the future, which will some time dawn for society, when the fettered woman shall become wholly free.

It enchants me when I think upon the beautiful relationship—and of this we already, thank God, have seen and still see many examples,—which must take place when these two halves of life stand together,—not master and slave,—resting only upon God and upon themselves, relying upon each other, merely through the free homage of the heart and the intellect. He sees in her a noble self-dependent being, who needs not and seeks not him for any lower object. And he loves her for that cause. She sees in him a free and noble being, who seeks not and needs not her for an unworthy object, advantage, or pleasure. And she esteems him for that reason. But each needs the other as a helper in the highest work upon earth—the perfecting of life. That they know, and for that cause they extend to each other the hand, as a married pair, as friends; two free, divine beings united in the highest!

Thus is paradise regained on earth; no longer that first merely natural paradise; but the higher, spiritual paradise, where man and woman shall live together as the angels in heaven.

Is this sight too beautiful ever to become true?

It is too beautiful not to become true!

But if before this a new development of woman's life and consciousness must take place, the subject need not be further pursued here.

The Chinese cramped up their women's feet in tight shoes, that they might not go far from home. But the Chinese themselves have remained standing on the same spot whilst all the rest of the world has gone forward.

Often when the starling comes in spring to our northern land have I seen him sit in the top of the trees, saluting with his song the rising of the sun over the morning-illumed country. And at this moment, when I sit like the bird upon the bough ready for flight, ready to seek my nest, I feel like the starling glancing abroad over the country upon which a new day is ascending.

For the sight of England at this moment is the sight of a new birth, of an awakening life, calculated to awaken every soul in which are the principles of vitality.

Whilst Germany is mute in the sense of an internal chaos, and all her poets dumb, (since her last comet-like genius, wearied of elliptic circuits in search of the eternal, conceals himself in a cloister;) whilst beautiful Italy lies bound, like the Greek slave, yet noble in her deferred revenge;—whilst heroically bold France, always foremost in the struggle for the advance of thought—foremost, though too impetuous, wearied by her own eccentric endeavours, allows a daring adventurer to put a rope round her neck, and a gag in her mouth;—how vigorously and calmly England proceeds onward in her work for the future; how powerfully she advances under her banners, “the Law and the Gospel;” and in the spirit of these, works out her great destiny by means of her free institutions, her free public discussion; her constellation of statesmen, poets, authors; her scientific and industrial institutions, and lastly, by her movement for a general, unexclusive system of education throughout the nation; retaining through all this a clear consciousness of the foundation of all true freedom and happiness for the people of the earth.

May she advance triumphantly in her career for the new future of Europe, and with her the nations which stand in near alliance with her life!

No country in the world can at this time exhibit such an affluence of good authors as England. And their influence is founded upon the great principles of humanity, which they serve not merely by power of genius, but of practical reason. Authors of the most varied political and religious opinions are united in this;—the advocacy of some human right; some human advantage, the crown of which is in heaven, while its root is on earth;—or they are rejected by the public mind; everything must become subservient to the supreme claims of humanity. Merely to mention here some of the cultivators of polite literature:—there is the aristocratic Bulwer, spite of his inclination for the merely strong; the democratic, warm-hearted Dickens; Thackeray the flagellator of much that is great and small, but by no means of the good; Charles Kingsley, whose warm sympathies for suffering humanity might make him unjust towards the self-indulgent if that life which inspires did not also restrain him; and lastly, him who, standing aloof from all parties, yet influences all.

So also, among the beautiful group of England's distinguished authoresses—women whose power is acknowledged by the whole cultivated world. Harriet Martineau, Mary Howitt, Mrs. Marsh, Mrs. S. C. Hall, with many others still living, among the latest and most remarkable of whom stand Mrs. Gaskell, the Author of Mary Barton, and Miss Brontë, the author of the fascinating novel of Jane Eyre; all these are united in working for the moral elevation of life, although frequently regarding it from different points of view. Nevertheless are they sisters in the higher harmonies and the same fundamentally pure accords, the same holy anthems sound from their harps. They also have obtained free entrance into every noble home in the world, and great power over the life of the heart.

people are not blind to the gleams of light discoverable in the mysteries of the former; and the many beautiful things which there are in the glorious Consuelo of the latter. But they could not have been written there, nor could their authors live there with any success. The genius of England distinguishes itself from that of France, not so much by its genius, but by its sound reason. The dissimilar fate of England and France at this time, may be estimated by the dissimilarity in the works of their romance writers. The romance of a people and of their authors have more in common than people believe.

Now that I am about to leave England, I feel with regret how much from want of time I must give up seeing, give up knowing—amongst which is the knowledge of persons whose acquaintance would be to me of great value, and of whom I saw sufficient for me to regret it all the more. This is often the sorrowful lot of the traveller, and I have no right to complain. If I should never again see England, yet I shall be eternally thankful that I have seen it, and for that which I have there seen. I thank England for the glorious Asylum which she afforded to a people who raised themselves in the consciousness of their own power, and with no lower object in view than the highest which humanity is capable of. I thank England for affording a new hope for the future of Europe, a new and a fresher courage. And seeing as I do that England is preeminently beyond all other nations designed to extend its dominion, I shall henceforth only rejoice in this, because it extends at the same time, the Law and the Gospel, God's dominion upon earth.

Add to this, that the English race are also the handsomest now existing on the earth; no one can do other than wish that, in this point of view also, they should increase and multiply.

These English women—I am fond of them. They approach with a frank, warm cordiality which is irresistible, or with a quiet demeanour which expresses esteem both of you and of their own worth, or else—they leave you in peace. This dignity of manner, added to an agreeable kindness, struck me particularly in the class of female domestic servants, whilst they are commonly as well dressed as the persons whom they serve, at once, as well dressed as unpretending.

And then—they are so handsome, these English women, that certainly, the whole figure included, they are the most beautiful women in the world.¹

I have no word sufficiently strong to express my grateful sense of the noble hospitality and good-will which were shown to me while in England. They live in the sanctuary of my heart, together with the names of the friends from whom I received them; I must call some of them my benefactors, because the human beings who awaken in us a warmer faith in and love to mankind, are our eternal benefactors.

(1) One trait of moral beauty in the youthful daughters of England, is the active part which they take in all that promotes the well-being of their fellow-creatures, in particular, as regards the children. One sees in Sunday schools and Ragged schools, young girls of wealthy families, instructing and looking after the little ones. I saw, on one occasion, in Birmingham, a lovely young girl of a respectable family in the town, surrounded by a little circle of children, whom she was teaching in the sweetest manner. She seemed to me like an angel.—Author's Note.

And greater benefactors in this sense have I never found anywhere than in the United States, and in England, excepting in my own beloved fatherland!

THE STRANGE GENTLEMAN.¹

BY JANE M. WINFARD.

CHAPTER XX.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

FORTUNATELY, there was no one to oppose the physician's authority, and Dr. Underwood's injunction was strictly enforced. Miriam Grey was kept quite quiet;—as quiet as her own fevered ravings would permit. It was many weeks before the disease itself left her; and during that time her life was several times despaired of. Dr. Burns and Dr. Underwood were most assiduous in their attention; the latter never left the Tower for more than an hour at a time until he felt sure that all immediate danger was past; and his wife devoted herself to the care of the sufferer from the time that she entered the sick-room, in the manner already described.

It was deemed expedient by both the medical advisers that Mrs. David Underwood should do so, on two accounts;—first, because Miss Grey required unremitting and unwearying care as well as prompt, experienced and intelligent tendance, such as her husband believed no woman in Milford was so well able to give; secondly, Mrs. David having placed herself in close contact with the patient during a day and a night, was in a condition to carry the infectious fever to her children by returning to them. It was therefore settled by Dr. Underwood that they should be sent off to the sea-side under the care of their governess, while he and his wife remained to watch over his patient at the Tower. Day after day, in compliance with her husband's orders, Edith left the sick-room for a short time to pace to and fro on the open hill-side, and breathe the pure air. Here she was always met by Mr. Shepherd and Martha, or one of the girls, and gave them accounts of the patient's state. They were all forbidden to enter the Tower by their brother; but Edith had plenty of helpers and handmaidens; for all the poor women in the village, young and old, came to ask to be made of use to Miss Grey in some way. She accepted the services of one and another to supply old Dame Barnard's deficiencies; but except for menial offices she admitted no one into the sick room; being of her husband's opinion that the fewer the nurses the greater an invalid's chance of recovery. Edith was excellent in most positions in life; as a nurse, she was invaluable—working always under and in the spirit of the physician. She never forgot the Scripture which says, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might;" but, perhaps, she never acted upon it so thoroughly as during the time she nursed Miss Grey. The unwearied patience—the never-failing thought and tenderness—the sweet, supporting cheerfulness with which she encouraged her husband, and her total self-forgetfulness, evinced a beauty of nature not one half of which had been perceived by him before. Often, when she little suspected it, was David lost in admiration and love, as he followed her movements about the bed of the invalid. Strange as it seemed, he could not mistake the fact, that Edith loved Miriam. Whether he had anything to do with the feeling, he knew not; but it was certain that his wife, who was not prone to conceive quick and violent friendships for strangers, had conceived a strong and tender love for the poor helpless Miriam, and could scarcely endure to be absent from her, even for the short daily relaxation which he insisted on.

Happy David! Happy, that two such lovely female natures had been revealed to him; happier still that he had perceptions clear, and strong, and delicate enough to apprehend all their beauty; happiest of all that he had the heart to offer thanksgiving to God for these blessings, and to pray that these two so dearly loved ones might live in heart-communion, for the rest of their earthly span, firmly trusting in His promise, that "all things" (seem they never so adverse) "shall work together for good to them that love Him."

Two months had elapsed since the occurrence of the events narrated in the last chapter. Those terrible days in August—those days when Miriam Grey, a prey to the most dangerous fever, frenzied and totally unconscious, hovered between life and death—those long, long, melancholy days that laid so heavy a load of fear and sorrow on the hearts that loved her, were all gone by. All the bright September noons, too; thirty glorious revolutions of the earth had been counted by the good Edith, as she sat beside the pillow of the exhausted sufferer. Through the still, monotonous days, scarcely daring to breathe or move, she sat thinking, thinking ever, and watching mechanically the changes of light and shadow in the room, which Miriam must have watched so often. Especially she observed the various effects of the painted window. She watched the first sunbeams light up the antique scutcheon of the Greys in the early morning; at noon, she watched the small, vivid reflex cast on the floor by the device and its surrounding ornaments, "heart-shaped and vermeil dyed;" and at eventide, she watched the gradual spreading of broad lines of colour all over the chamber. But Edith would have heeded little the beautiful hues which made the sick-room as glorious as the plumage of a tropical bird, if she had not begun to suspect, to hope, to be half sure that the invalid heeded them too.

Dr. Underwood shook his head incredulously when Edith asserted her belief that Miriam's eyes had actually seen her, in the first stage of the fever, when she first sat beside her bed; had seen her distinctly, as was intimated at the conclusion of the last chapter.

(1) Concluded from p. 300.

It was certain that she had seen nothing during the later and more alarming stages of the attack. Every other sense had been disordered also, or altogether suppressed, for a time; and it became a grave question with the physicians whether her constitution would ever become strong enough to restore them to their normal state after this fever was subdued. Then, for twenty days the matter remained doubtful. On the twenty-first day, Dr. Underwood ventured to make some experiments on the nervous system, which were, to a certain extent, satisfactory. She started at a sharp sound made purposely near her ear, and made an effort to turn away from a powerful perfume held close to her nostrils. But she gave no evidence of seeing. Pale, emaciated, utterly exhausted, without speech, without motion, lay the once beautiful Miriam Grey for several days more; only by faint fluttering respiration, and an occasional moan, did she give signs of life; but Dr. Underwood and Dr. Burns were both satisfied that it should be so; that she should recover slowly, slowly; the system was so much in need of rest, perfect unconscious repose.

At last there came a day when she showed signs of thorough consciousness, and moved her lips languidly but voluntarily to swallow whatever was presented to them. In the evening of that day, Edith woke up suddenly from a doze into which she had fallen while Miriam slept. Giving an anxious glance towards her charge, to her surprise she saw that her eyes were wide open. Never since the height of the fever had her eyelids been completely raised before, even for an instant. Now they were lifted to the fullest extent, and the large blue eyes gleamed out, star-like, from their orbits, hollowed so fearfully by the ravages of disease. Edith saw, at first, that there was no meaning, no intention in the look of those eyes; they gazed listlessly on the opposite wall, blankly, and without speculation, like the eyes of a blind person, or one whose mind is devoid of all thought at the moment. She sat quite still, watching for some sign of animation, for she was buoyed up with the hope that Miriam's sight might be restored, among the various changes which seemed to be working themselves in her constitution, now that she was really convalescent. With the eagerness of genuine affection, Edith watched; and watched so long, that hope was beginning to die away within her, when she saw a change come over Miriam's eyes. They glanced slowly over the wall, towards which they had been directed with a faint expression of wonder and curiosity. Edith looked immediately at the wall, and saw the same beautiful phenomena which had attracted her admiration every evening since she had occupied the post of nurse in that chamber. There were the bright colours of the window, purple, amber, crimson, and sapphire, reflected in quaint fantastic devices, and shifting at every moment with the fast-declining sunbeams. On comparing the movements of Miriam's eyes with the varying appearances on the wall, Edith became convinced that the invalid saw them as well as herself. She was sorry that neither David nor Dr. Burns was likely to come into the room just then, that she might convince them also; and very soon the poor thin eyelids dropped once more wearily over the eyes, as if they desired to see no more. But Edith did not forget the circumstance. The next day, she observed one or two trifles which tended to confirm the blessed hope that Miriam was no longer blind.

As yet all conversation, nay, all words, except of the barest necessity, had been forbidden to the patient, and therefore Edith had not asked her any question on this momentous subject, knowing well that there were few subjects which could be more exciting to her. Soon after she began to sit up a little, the listless, unconscious look left her face altogether, but she still kept her eyes shut habitually. She heard very acutely every sound, and asked what this and that noise was.

One October morning, on awaking early, she asked feebly, with closed eyes, if she had been ill.

"Yes, very ill," said Edith.

"What made me ill?" she asked again; "I don't recollect."

"No, my dear, I dare say not. You have had a fever. It came on suddenly. But you are getting well fast, now."

"Yes, I am easy now;" and the eyelids were half raised for an instant. "I am trying to remember who you are. Somebody I love very much, I know; but I have forgotten your name. You have been with me all the time. Once when they thought I was dying, you said, 'No, David, I am sure she will live.'"

"Do you remember that?" said Edith, gently stroking back the soft golden hair from the blue-veined temples. It was quite short now; all its luxuriant length had been cut off during the fever. "Do you remember that, Miriam?"

"Yes, and I remember the kiss you gave me then. I felt that you were right,—that I should live, because—" here the voice died away.

"Because what, Miriam dear?"

"Because I could not die while you all wished so much that I should live."

Edith pressed her lips gently on the white cheek, and murmured, "God bless you!"

"He does, He does," murmured Miriam in the same tone, and making an effort to raise her head, she continued; "He has sent me such happy dreams. I have been with every one I love: my mother, and David, and you, and Mr. Shepherd, and—" here she sank back.

"I am afraid we must not talk any more. It will tire you. Lie down now, quite still, and I will sing to you."

"Ah!" exclaimed the poor invalid, with a faint smile; "that will do me good. Can you sing?"

"Yes, very well, sometimes. I will try now."

Then arranging Miriam's head comfortably among the pillows, Edith sat down, and after a minute's reflection, began to sing something which she knew must be familiar to the listener, and which was calculated to please and soothe her mind without exciting any strong emotion. She sang "With verdure clad," from Haydn's "Creation." As she had a very fine voice, and had studied singing as an art and not as what is called a feminine accomplishment, Miriam, who was no mean musician herself, listened in a state of perfect enjoyment, supplying the accompaniment mentally, as Edith saw by the motions of the attenuated hand which lay near her on the coverlid.

When the last notes faded away into silence no words were spoken. After some time Edith leaned forward, and saw that Miriam had fallen into a deep sleep with a smile on her face. This was the very best effect she could hope for from her singing. It was precisely the effect anticipated by David, who had prescribed gentle unstimulating music in the present stage of the patient's recovery, whenever a fitting occasion should present itself. Edith was pleased to think that she had been so good a judge of the occasion; and was contemplating Miriam's benignant expression, as she slept under the influence of the music, when David entered the room. He had come as usual, to pay his first visit of the day to the patient, to inquire how she had passed the last few hours, to ascertain her exact state, administer medicine accordingly, and to take Edith's place while she, in her turn, lay down to sleep.

Edith met him with a smile; and as he folded her in his arms, she pointed joyfully towards the bed. Dr. Underwood advanced to it with one arm still round his wife, and drawing back the curtain cautiously, looked at the sleeper. He passed his hand over her temples, felt her pulse attentively; and then a flush of light came over his face as he uttered a deep and fervent "Thank God!" It was the first look of real gladness, the first tone of confident hope, that Edith had observed in her husband during the whole time of his attendance on Miriam.

She looked eagerly into his face.

"You think she is better this morning?"

"Yes. She is out of danger. This is the sort of sleep I wanted to produce. I began to fear it would not come. Your singing did it."

"Yes, I think so. You heard me, then?"

"Yes, mio bene! it was delicious. I woke just now fancying myself in a better world, where the angels 'touch their immortal harps with golden wires.' I wish you could have heard your own singing as I heard it in the next room! However, I knew it was not for my benefit you had raised that exquisite voice thus early in the morning, and so I hastened hither to ascertain its therapeutic effects on our poor patient."

"You think I did well to sing? She was beginning to talk—to question—to remember."

"You acted just as you ought to have done. This sleep is sweet and natural. She will wake up much refreshed, and when she is moved from the bed to-day, instead of carrying her into the next room, we may venture to carry her out into the warm sunny air for half an hour."

"Oh! I am so happy!" exclaimed Edith, resting her head on her husband's shoulder and gazing through soft tears on the pale, serene face of the sleeper. "I am sure you are right, David, even in this climate, to get a sensitive, nervous patient like Miriam into the fresh air as soon as possible. There is no restorative like it."

David smiled. "None; save always, loving tendance and singing such as yours. With these three our dear patient will soon recover strength."

Edith did not think it was for her utility only that David gazed on her so fondly then. A bright blush of pleasure illumined her cheek, and she bent down her face to hide it, feigning to be busy in arranging the coverlid. David caught the beautiful active hands within his own and drew her away towards the window.

"Miriam needs no care of ours just now, Edith. She sleeps soundly and will not wake for several hours. There is a time for everything. Love me a little, now. I am beginning to be jealous of our patient; all your gentle looks and soft words are devoted to her."

Edith smiled, and touched his cheek with her lips.

"Is that all you can give me now?" he asked half playfully, looking into her eyes; but still there was a tone of sadness in the words. He attempted to draw her close to his heart; she seemed to resist for a moment, and then, yielding to his embrace, buried her face in his breast and wept.

"My own darling! sweet one! best of God's creatures! Is it for my weakness that you weep?"

"Oh! no—no—only love me all you can, David."

"All I can! Ah, Edith!—If you knew yourself—if you knew how inexpressibly lovely your whole nature is—if you knew your power over me, you would not say love me all you can—you would caution me against loving you too much."

"You cannot love me too much," murmured Edith; "I have never measured my love for you."

"Do you forgive me, Edith, my true wife, for the pain I gave you long weeks ago?"

She looked straight into his eyes, and said, "I do, David. Freely, and from my soul, do I forgive you for that pain which you could not choose but inflict, and I could not but feel."

"Is it over now, Edith?" he asked gravely; "can you trust my love once more?"

"It is over. That agony of doubt, thank God! can come to me no more. I trust your love, David;—your true, worthy, reasonable love."

"Reasonable! are you mocking me with words?"

"Nay, my husband.—Your love is as it should be, a noble, reasonable, manly love, strong to maintain itself against the temptations of a fond but forbidden fancy, strong to withstand the power of memory and circumstance. I do not prize your love the less because it has been tried. If all wives knew the temptations of the world, the flesh and the Devil to which their husband's love for them is exposed, it might be the better for their mutual happiness. And though such temptations are now slight to you, David —though you smile at trials which would be sore enough to unsubdued youth and a temperament in which vanity and sensuality were predominant, yet you carry within your own heart the means of self-deception and temptation—even you have need to pray, 'Lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil.'"

"I have need also of the forbearance, the generosity, the unfailing love of my own Edith, my guardian angel—to restore me to the hope of being one day worthy of her. Tell me, Edith, how is it that I feel so sure—(as I could never have done with an inferior woman)—that you love me, in spite of your perception that my heart—no, it was but my fancy—had swerved from its allegiance? How is it that I feel so sure your love for me has never altered? Let me see your eyes, if you will not speak!—There! Let me read the answer!—I see! I see!—you are too delicate to shame me with the truth; but the great poet has said it, my noble one:

'Love is not love which alters as it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove.
Oh no! it is an ever-fixed star,
Which looks on tempests and is never shaken.'

Therefore, my Edith, I have still the great lesson of love to learn aright. I had thought that I knew it well, all the beauty and the inner meaning of it. But you have shown me how poor and inadequate were all my past conceptions of this glorious, infinite feeling. If love link us not to God and all good things—if it do not stir us up to the renunciation of self, and to the doing nobly all that is set us to do—if it do not make us press forward to those things which are before, nor turn back with forbidden longings to the idle paradise of youth—if it do not this, it is not the highest and best love of which our nature is capable."

The expression of David's face as he spoke was beautiful, with a noble self-reproach mingled with the love with which he regarded Edith.

She spoke with quick passionate words—sudden and warm they sprang from the heart, like the kisses which broke their flow.

"David! my own! why say such words!—you, so beautiful, so unspeakably attractive to all creatures, so brave, so full of genius and world-wide sympathy. Was there not room enough in your heart for several loves—ay, real, true, great loves? Do not all women love you? Then, if they don't, they ought. Nay! nay! smile if you will—never mind if my language be too strong; I will defend you from your own accusations. I never saw one whom I could truly love till we met. You saw so many worthy to be loved, and some you did love, before you saw me. Yonder sweet angel! dear, lovely Miriam Grey!—I should have hated you if you could have lived near her as a boy and not loved her."

"But to return to her as I did, Edith? A married man, one who possessed the best and loveliest woman in this world for his wife, and yet amuse his fancy by conjuring up romantic memories of the girl he loved in youth, so as to work on her mind and induce her to show the long-hoarded treasures of her gentle love! Oh! it is a thought not to be endured—I say it is unpardonable."

"And I say that I pardon it—that Miriam will pardon it, and that you must pardon it."

"But Miriam—Do not think me vain, Edith. Do you believe she has any lingering affection for me?"

"I should have a very poor opinion of her if she had not a pretty strong affection for you."

"You seem glad to think of it."

"Certainly I am. Miriam Grey's love is not passionate or headstrong. Had you been her husband, she would have loved you faithfully and devotedly until death. She will do so still—though not with a wife's love."

"I do not think Miriam could love me or any man as you have done."

"I am sure she could not."

"How? Are you women so learned in each other's nature?"

"It requires little depth of learning to judge of love by its evidence, in action. If Miriam Grey had loved as I love you, David, she would not have left you alone all those hard struggling years of youth. She would have hastened to share your trials. She had not even an opposing duty—no parent or near relative to support and tend. I say not this to her reproach or to my own honour. Nay, you know the world and your own sex well enough to confirm my words when I say, that the world honours Miriam more because she kept the comfort of her love from you; and that men love better the women for whom they toil and suffer and make sacrifices, than they love those who toil and suffer and make sacrifices for them. It is the passive and recipient nature in woman that you all love best."

"All?"

"Yes. Or with few exceptions." And then, as if to hide some painful feeling, she broke into a low singing, "Tu lo sai—tu lo sai, bel idol mio."

"Non lo so," rejoined David, smiling, and yet earnestly. "You and Beethoven united cannot make me admit that I know anything of the kind. Besides, you are unjust to yourself. Are you not all things—a very Cosmos—made of every creature's best? Not even Miriam as I knew her in girlhood was ever more gentle, more tender, more calm, or what you mean by passive and recipient, than you are very often. And who at other times so strong and wise, so full of originality and energy, as my Edith. Who at all times, whether active or passive, is so utterly unselfish—so good, so pure and true as my own Edith?—Oh! Edith, my beautiful one—(God only knows how beautiful)—let me tell you that in these past weeks a fresh, new love for you has sprung up from the strong, deep-rooted old affection. I tremble now when I think of the ineffable glory, the touching beauty of your woman's nature, which the sad circumstances of these days have revealed to me. I fear to sully them by the breath of praise. I thank God that he has made such a being,—perhaps, many such,—that he has vouchsafed to give me one for my wife. Edith, it is for me to say you must love me, ever, ever, all you can. Trust me, sweet wife, if I thought I had lost one atom of your affection by weakly yielding, as I confess I did, to thoughts of woman's love in which you had no part, if I thought that, it would act like a curse upon me."

"But you know that I do not love you less. Have I not felt for you? Oh, David! David! There is no such thing as love here on the earth, if I do not love you more than ever."

"Say it again—again. Make me believe it, Edith! It is so much more than I deserve. Kiss me—come close to my heart."

They remained silent, folded in each other's arms for some time. Then David whispered again,

"I have been keeping you all this time, and you are worn out for want of sleep. Stay, darling, I cannot part from you now. I must have you in my sight. Lie here and sleep while I sit beside you."

Edith was glad to remain, and after assuring herself that Miriam still slept, she soon fell asleep on a couch near her bed, for she was fatigued with watching.

David Underwood sat thinking deeply, with one arm flung over the head of his wife's couch, so that his fingers could touch her hair from time to time, and he could see the sleep deepen and deepen on her face. He always loved to look at Edith when she slept. She wore so innocent and childlike an expression. As a physician, he had had many opportunities of observing the effect of sleep on the expression of the face; and had come to the conclusion that the great moral attributes, apart from the intellect, are manifested most clearly in that state. He had seen many a face, handsome enough when its owner was awake, degenerate into ugliness during sleep, when the light of the intelligence no longer adorned it, and concealed its radical defects. Among women he knew some remarkable instances of the unmasking power of sleep; and had often been heard to declare that many a man would be saved from a desperate love-fit if he could only see how his charmer looked when she slept. Sleep is a sort of undress of the mind; and minds, like bodies, must be beautiful to appear to advantage in undress.

As David looked at Edith's peaceful face, so pure and noble in expression, with no light of thought or any intellectual faculty shining out from the eyes,—those eyes, which by common observers were esteemed the only beautiful features of her face,—he felt a thrill of sacred joy and love at sight of the moral beauty which was unveiled before him. It was a joy, fuller, completer and more rapturous than he, artist as he was by temperament, had ever felt at sight of the most perfect physical beauty or its ideal representation in statue or picture. Tears of happiness bedewed his eyes, as he gazed; and he sank on his knees in passionate love of pure Goodness, feeling then, more keenly than he had ever done, the truth which he always recognised with his intellect,—viz., that goodness, or spiritual beauty, is the only true beauty,—that there is, and can be, no other beauty on earth or anywhere in God's universe but that, in the abstract, and the manifestations of that, in the concrete. Therefore let all young artist-souls keep themselves pure, that they may be able to love and venerate the true idea of Beauty, and strive to embody that, and no other, in their works.

David Underwood's passionate rapture of love for his wife's moral beauty subsided again into calm affection; for the most nobly endowed mortal cannot sustain his soul for ever in the loftier regions whither it has power to soar sometimes. It is, indeed,

"—the most difficult of tasks to keep Heights which the soul is competent to gain"

But the memory of that hour did not pass away. It was more enduring in its results upon him than any rapturous ecstasy of more earthly passion that he had experienced in earlier years. He had drained the cup of earthly passion in his youth, and knew well all that it could yield of effervescent enjoyment; and he had tasted also the bitter dregs of disappointment and disillusion that lurked at the bottom, and must be swallowed too. When the present rapture passed away, it did not leave him weak, unstrung and indifferent to all that was to follow; on the contrary, he returned to ordinary life stronger, more steadfast in his determination not to be overcome of evil, but to overcome evil with good.

After a while, he turned his attention to Miriam Grey. She still slept. He examined her face carefully, and was pleased to see there the symptoms of returning vital power. There was a kind of awe in his look as he regarded her. She was to him as one restored from the dead; one whom he had injured unwittingly in life, and to whom it was permitted him to make compensation. There was no vestige of his boyish passion remaining. Those two long months of stern reality—the combat of his scientific skill with the powers of darkness for her life—had given a very different character to the love with which he regarded her. She was to him as a tender, helpless child, confided to his charge for a while. When he remembered the ebullition of momentary feeling on his part, which had so much helped to produce this illness, he was amazed at his own weakness and strange aberration of heart. He could not account for it. He had acted like those for whom he was wont to feel the utmost contempt—the men of feeble brain and heart—who are incapable of strong feeling or steady principle. He loved Edith at the time, more than ever he had loved Miriam—Edith, the dear, honoured companion of his manhood—the mother of his children, the consoler, the cheerer of his life.

As he recalled the whole circumstance to memory, he broke down the pride of his nature—that strong hereditary feeling which made him sympathise with the ancestor who had inscribed on his home, "I have set the Lord always before me. He is on my right hand, therefore I shall not fall." "Nay," said he within himself, "I have fallen. I was the miserable slave of weakness. Like a fool, I allowed myself to be the plaything of a sickly fancy; and like the veriest egotist I had no thought for others in my indulgence. What profit is it to me that I can say, I meant no evil? Henceforth, let me be less confident in my own virtue. It needed but a little more opportunity of wrong-doing, and I might have embittered the rest of life for both these true-hearted women, by my unprincipled and false sentimentality. Let me remember this when the besetting sin rises within me. Let there be no more virtuous self-satisfaction, no more secret assumption of 'holier than thou,' or 'wiser than thou.' When the hour of trial comes, let me say to my own heart as I have said to others:— 'Thou art deceitful above all things; boast not of thy own strength and goodness, but seek help where alone it is to be found.' And when I have to deal with other men, weak and erring, unto whom God may not have given as much as he gave to me, then let me remember that to me less than to another is scorn or contempt permitted. The words which Miriam first read to me when we were young together, come back to me forcibly now:—

'He who feels contempt
For any living thing, hath faculties
Which he hath never used. Be wiser thou;—
Instructed that true knowledge leads to love.
True dignity abides with him alone
Who in the silent hour of secret thought
Can still suspect, and still revere himself
In lowliness of heart.'"

David continued to sit in silent meditation, strengthening his soul and shaping out a course of action which involved the well-being of all he held most dear. He had well-nigh forgotten that this day was to be a busy day in Milford.

CHAPTER XXI.

MARRIAGES IN MILFORD.

WHILE Dr. Underwood meditated, and Miriam and Edith each slept, there were others in the Grey Tower who had risen early, intent on matters of importance. These were Philip Ward and old Dame Barnard, and her satellites, Tom Withers and his sister Sally. All these persons having been told many days before that Miss Grey's life was out of danger, and that she would soon be well enough to leave her room, began to talk and think about other things. On this very morning, affairs of the utmost importance to Milford and its inhabitants occupied them so fully, that they entirely forgot their late anxiety and fears. They quite forgot that the black shadow of the Death Angel had hovered long over the couch of one beloved by them all, and that they had been so lately plunged in grief.

When I inform the reader that the matters in question were two marriages, it will be seen that I have nothing very extraordinary to relate; for all the great events of human life are strangely jumbled together, and ere our tears are dried for the death of one friend, we are expected to smile at the marriage feast of another. While we stand with divided sympathy, gazing from the altar to the new-made grave there, between them walks, heedless of both, the happy mother, carrying her first-born to the sacred font. Throughout the earth the same sounds rise ceaselessly to the ears of listening spirits. Lamentation and woe from the sons of men weeping for their dead—the joyous voice of the bridegroom—and the feeble wail of the new-born child. Doubtless, to the ears of angels, sounds which to ours seem jarring and discordant blend in perfect harmony; and there is no harsh note vibrating painfully in a single heart but is necessary to complete the perfect music of humanity. "The pathetic minors" of the earth-sphere must have a strange sweetness to listeners who can anticipate the joyous harmonies of the final diapason;—but to those who cannot, they are unutterably sad.

The hope of Miss Grey's speedy recovery had been spreading for two weeks past throughout Milford parish. The hope had become certainty—as hope deferred always does, in the hearts of those who care but lightly for the thing hoped for. It is only when the hope is all in all to a heart, that it is made sick by having it deferred. People are so glad to get rid of a depressing feeling, that they lose no time in springing from the hope to the certainty that there is no occasion for them to grieve. Thus it was that Milford parish dismissed so readily the thoughts of death, and busied itself with gossip—never-ending gossip, about the marriage of two of Mr. Underwood's daughters.

Mr. Bang, seeing no reason, as he said, "why there should be no more cakes and ale" in Milford, because Miss Grey of the Tower happened to have had a fever, determined to get up a little festivity on his own account. He had made up his mind to be married to Rachel Underwood this autumn; and having made up Rachel's mind also, as a supplementary process necessary to the business, he took measures accordingly. Being of a social disposition, he began by trying to get a companion bridegroom; and being of an energetic and persevering disposition also, he soon succeeded. Mr. Crypt was spirited up, by his representations and strong advice, to petition Leah for her consent to speak to her father. The four being thus banded and leagued together, and the good Martha being taken into their confidence, an attack was made on Mr. Underwood, in manner following.

One fine morning in September, Mr. Bang, carrying his gun, (without which he was never seen to walk abroad in that and the succeeding month,) came up to the front door of the Grange, and demanded of the maid who opened it whether Mr. Underwood were at home. She replied that he was, and as she did so, smiled and blushed, as if she knew perfectly well what his business was. Indeed it would have been surprising if she had not known, seeing that all women scent out marriages as quickly as dogs scent out other game. Moreover this particular woman had just been put on the scent, by Rachel's ordering her to change her cap and apron, as it was likely she would have to open the door to Mr. Bang in the course of the morning. Now, as Mr. Bang never performed the ceremony of knocking at the front door, but came in by the back door or through a window on all ordinary occasions, the maid speedily concluded that the visit in question was an extraordinary one, and accordingly donned her smartest cap, and said to the cook with a mysterious air,—

"Cook! mark my words—we shall soon have a wedding in the family."

"Lor, Ann! you don't say so," was the reply. "Well! it's high time some of them got married. It don't look well to see a family of daughters hang on hand so."

"Why, it's precious little chance they've had of getting married, poor things, with such a Turk of a father."

"Mind what you say. I won't hear Master run down, specially now he's ill. He's been breaking fast ever since Miss Grey was took, and it's my opinion he won't live to— There, there's a knock. Don't stand chattering here."

As soon as Ann had shut the door of the back parlour upon Mr. Bang and her master, she returned to the kitchen to inform Cook that Miss Rachel was on the stairs, waiting to be sent for.

In due time Rachel was sent for by her father, and asked whether she wished to marry Mr. Bang. There was no evading her father's direct question, and in a few minutes the good Rachel found herself fairly engaged to be married that day month. She was not a "strong-minded young woman," or "a lady with a will of her own," otherwise she would have had a voice in fixing the time of the marriage. As both the gentlemen agreed that a long engagement in the circumstances was not to be desired, and as her father himself had said he could see no objection to fixing that day month for the performance of the ceremony, Rachel could not venture to say that she saw any. After receiving an affectionate embrace, and a few kind words from her father, Rachel left the room, crying as if her heart would break.

"What is the matter, my dear?" asked the anxious Martha, as Rachel fell on her neck dissolved in tears.

"Hulloa! here's a sudden change in the weather!" exclaimed Jack.

"There is nothing wrong, is there, dear?" asked the pretty Mary, patting Rachel affectionately on the shoulder.

"What did father say?" asked Leah, stroking her hair.

"He said—he said," sobbed Rachel, "that I am to be married this day month."

"Is that all!" said Leah, apparently relieved by the information.

"Why, there will not be time to get her new clothes ready," said Mary.

"It is a short time, certainly," said Martha. "But your mind was made up before, I know."

"That's what I call doing business properly," said

Jack. "What's the use of standing shilly-shally for a year after you've determined to have a man? especially when you've known him for half-a-dozen years before. You girls are the queerest cattle I know! Suppose father had flown into a passion, and sworn that neither you nor any of his girls should be married with his consent—and that's a very likely thing to have happened before David came back, I can tell you;—what would you have done then, Miss Rachel? Hulloa! it's your turn now, Leah! Here comes Crypt, by all that's Benedictine! And if he hasn't come upon Bang's errand, may I never see London. Why there's son in church (I mean son in law) written on his forehead as he stares up at the house."

The girls all turned to look at Mr. Crypt, as he advanced to the house door; even Rachel forgot her own case in her sympathy with Leah. Not that she or any one believed Mr. Underwood would refuse to let Leah marry Mr. Crypt, but women are always anxious till these things are settled.

In less than half an hour, Mr. Crypt had his quietus, and looked very happy for a man who was in the habit of calling himself a miserable sinner, as Jack observed. Jack took liberties with every one, and spent much small wit on his intended brothers-in-law; Leah and Rachel were very soon occupied in congratulating each other, and rejoicing that they were both to be married on the same day; Martha and Mary were wondering how everything was to be done in the time; and the cook was "hoping to goodness they wouldn't make the wedding cakes at home."

Come what come may, time and the hour run through the busiest pre-nuptial month. It was long since Milford had had such a subject of absorbing interest. The amount of discussion which it excited would have filled fifty folio volumes of the present type; therefore, the exigencies of time and space demand that it should be wonderfully abridged here. Indeed, much must be left to the reader's imagination. Can he or she (the latter would do it best) figure to himself the intense curiosity and excitement which agitated the public mind in Milford, when three large vans, (Pickford's,) and two small ones, (not Pickford's,) came at five several times through that remote valley, and disgorged their contents, the large vans at Mr. Bang's new house in the Fell, the smaller ones at the Vicarage? Of course Mr. Bang was going to furnish his house "in the first style." A London upholsterer, no less—was the Archimage who was to produce a perfect Paradise of tables and chairs. Was not Miss Rachel a happy young woman,—a most fortunate creature, to be going to marry a gentleman who could give her such curtains and carpets? Three vans of the very best London furniture! what could mortal woman ask for more?

But the two small vans that went to the vicarage? what did they contain, and what portend? Questions to be asked in the parish! They got themselves answered in time, and the answers afforded new matter for surprise and endless discussion.

These two vans, it was ascertained, contained household furniture also. Though it was not bran new, like Mr. Bang's, it was far more recherché, ecclesiastical, and mediævally elegant—more in the taste of Mr. Crypt and Leah, to whom it was presented by Mr. and Mrs. David Underwood as a marriage gift. Mr. Crypt had what is called "good prospects;" but at present he was only a curate, with nothing but a curate's salary, and therefore with very little disposable cash towards setting up an establishment. David Underwood, who entered, heart and soul, into the affairs of those dear to him,—talked Leah's marriage over with Edith during the first days of Miriam's convalescence, and between them, they concerted a plan, the details of which David worked out in his own mind, and the thorough execution of which he was determined to achieve.

The sending these said vans of furniture to the Vicarage was the first overt act, open to the eyes and tongues of the village. What could it mean? Was Mr. Shepherd going to be married, as well as his curate? Surely he was too old, and in his declining state of health too! No! it could not be; or Miss Shepherd would have stayed to superintend the arrangements, instead of going off to visit Mrs. Mark. At last the truth came out. Mr. Shepherd was going to give up the living of Milford, for a few years, to Mr. Crypt. Dr. Underwood had insisted on the necessity of complete change and relaxation from his present duties, for a time at least, as the only means of securing a healthy and active old age to Mr. Shepherd. He had spoken with the affection of a son, as well as with the authority of a physician. Both brain and body, in his case, he said, were over-wrought, the lungs were weak, and he must desist from regular preaching. A few years' residence in a warmer country would be all that he required. Very soon afterwards, David came to Mr. Shepherd with the offer of a chaplaincy to an embassy at one of the Italian Courts.

"You must make up your mind to go, my dear friend; and you must go before the winter. In a few years, by God's blessing, you will come back well and strong. In the mean time, Crypt will fill your post. The people like him. He is zealous and active, and has good sense; moderation and toleration will not fail to come soon."

"It is hard to leave my parish, David—to leave you all, to go and live alone among a strange people."

"You will not leave us all. You are not to live alone among strange people. Edith and I have settled that."

"Edith and you are very wonderful people. She can do anything she likes with me. What new thing have you to propose?"

"We propose to make up a party of Milford folks to go with you to Italy."

"Am I to head a colony, eh?"

"No; to take the direction of a small travelling party. My father's health gives me much anxiety; I hope much from the effects of a different climate, and removal from the scene of his recent anxieties."

"Is your father going to Italy?"

"He consents to go if you do. My sister Martha will accompany him. But the chief attraction in your eyes, perhaps, I have kept to the last. Miriam Grey must go with you. She must not remain in England during this winter, especially in the north. This illness has weakened her."

"Ha!" exclaimed Mr. Shepherd, "I had not thought of that. I am ready to go, David. I can be of use to Miriam. But why do not you and your wife go with us all?"

"Our duty is here in England. Edith cannot go far from her father; he grows old. And my father wishes us to take possession of the Grange, and live here with our children, during his absence. I have promised to attend to his property, and become a good yeoman. Mary will live among us all here. Jack goes to London; I have a place for him in the Admiralty. Philip is to be sent to Oxford by his cousin, Sir Ralph, and if he conducts himself well, Sir Ralph will make him his heir, for the love he bears to Miriam."

"These are all great changes, David. I must take time to consider them."

Mr. Shepherd considered them, and talked them over with Edith, and also with Martha. His conversation with the latter produced a marked change in Mr. Shepherd. He was more cheerful and hopeful; was reconciled to going abroad, since it would strengthen him for returning to his duties in Milford, and began to talk with enthusiasm of Milan and Florence, Rome and Naples. Martha entered into his enthusiasm, and Mr. Underwood began to read books about Italy, and to ask David many questions about foreign lands whenever he came down to the Grange.

From the first day that he brought thither a hope, —as yet he deemed it far from a certainty,—that Miriam's sight would be ultimately restored, they all thought more of that than of anything else connected with the travelling party.

But the travelling party, and everything else at this time in Milford, not excepting the double wedding, was fated to have its element of bitterness. This came from Miss Shepherd, and Mark Underwood and his wife. The former had never forgiven David Underwood for coming to Milford in the character of "a Strange Gentleman," and causing her to spread reports of an astonishing kind concerning him, whereby she gained much ridicule, and was pronounced by Jack to be quite "perdue de réputation as a scandal-monger, since she regarded neither the unities nor the probabilities in the stories she related." Her anger against David was heightened by the conduct of his wife, who, when she went, in all haste, to the Tower to examine into the nature of Miss Grey's illness, positively refused her admission into the house,—she, the head nurse and doctor of the village. Her rage against the new comers,—"the strangers," as she called them,—was warm enough all through Miss Grey's illness; but when she found that they had actually plotted her election from the post of tyrant-in-ordinary to her brother; that by their means he was about to escape from her, and perhaps become a happy man in the end—"might even marry that old maid, Martha Underwood," and defy her power to render his life miserable any more,—her rage knew no bounds; and she threw herself with open arms into an alliance with Mark and his wife, who she felt instinctively must hate David and his wife with all the hatred which it is natural that the selfish and the silly should feel against the generous and the wise.

But generosity and wisdom are more than a match for selfishness and silliness; let every one be assured of that. It was not long before David found that for his father's sake he must take stronger measures with Mark than he had meditated. They ended by Mark's finding it convenient to buy land in Canada with his ill-gotten money, instead of buying it near Milford. He did not oppose his wife's intimacy with Miss Shepherd, probably on account of the general opinion that Miss Shepherd had money, and also because his wife was very silly and lazy, and Miss Shepherd supplied her with practical sense and activity. Miss Shepherd despised little Mrs. Mark as much as ever, but she liked to have some one to dominate and to speak evil things to about her enemies in Milford; and little Mrs. Mark was just the proper person, for she was rather spiteful, as most very silly people are. When Miss Shepherd proposed to go with Mark and his wife to Canada, and board with them for a year, just by way of a change, since she did not choose to live any longer near Milford, Mark accepted the proposal, fully determined in his own mind to get rid of her speedily, if he found her more troublesome than useful.

Such was the general state of affairs in Milford, on the morning of the double marriage. It was a glorious October day, and the inhabitants of the Tower were astir with the earliest birds. Edith's song to Miriam was heard by Philip, while he dressed, and he drew a good augury from the sound. He rushed down-stairs to ascertain that Dame Barnard and the rest were busy as they ought to be. Yes! It was all right. There, in the old withdrawing-room, far away out of hearing from the invalid's chamber, were Dame Barnard, and Tom, and Sarah, noisily engaged in the preparation of a feast—a marriage breakfast. Mrs. David Underwood had persuaded her husband and her father-in-law to bring the whole party up to the Tower, after the ceremony. "For," said she, "if Miriam is well enough to look at the girls in their bridal dresses, it will give her great pleasure."

"Look! do you really think she can see us?" asked Leah.

"I am almost sure she can. At all events, if anything is good for the eyesight, my dear Leah, it would be the pretty picture which you and Rachel will present."

"Thanks to your taste. I wonder how we could have thought of dressing ourselves in white satin. It was ridiculous."

"Rococo, my dear, and very unbecoming by daylight, to people with complexions like you and me. It would require some one with a skin as fair and delicate as Miriam's, to look well on this occasion in white satin."

Thus Edith contrived that her sisters-in-law should be dressed simply, as suited the condition of their husbands, instead of spending half the money allowed them for a trousseau, upon a costly and unbecoming wedding-dress, that they would rarely have occasion to wear again; which is the provincial style of the middle classes in this matter. Thus she also contrived that the brides should take a last look of Miriam even if she were not able to look at them. Besides, David desired to have some share in the marriage, and she herself wished to save Martha the trouble of the breakfast, as that good sister would have quite enough to do, to get the whole party of sisters properly arrayed—to say nothing of helping Jack, who generally required as much assistance at his toilette as any one of his sisters.

"A blithe morning to you, Mr. Philip!" said the old nurse, looking at her latest favourite carefully through her spectacles. "And may I live to see your wedding day, sir."

"Thank you, Barnard; but I don't think there's much chance that either of us will live to see that."

"Deary me, now! hark to him! Why, ain't you the comeliest young gentleman in the three valleys?"

"What of that, if I am the poorest?"

"Poorest, indeed! What's to prevent you being master of this place, all in good time?"

"I can't wait for that time, Dame. I must go out in the world and work."

"Work! What do you mean, Mr. Philip? Who ever heard of a Grey working? Leave that to us common folks. You are a gentleman, sir. Come, come! this isn't a day to look grave. Two weddings to come, and Miss Miriam getting on so nicely! Remember, Mr. Philip, 'saint heart never won fair lady.' I shall see you married to the girl of your heart yet. She's a right bonny bird, that I will say for her, though she is an Underwood. And now I suppose you're away down to Mr. Crypt. Mind you both of you make a good breakfast before you start, for there's a deal to go through, and a long time before you'll sit down at this table. Good bye, sir, and my duty to Mr. Crypt, and I wish him joy. I shall be at the church; but there's plenty to do first. Here, Sarah, come and put these plates round, and mind you don't drop one for your life, you giddy-pated wench."

Time wore on. Edith woke from her sleep. She and her husband took breakfast together in an adjoining room; Edith went down stairs to inspect and approve all that Dame Barnard had done; returned and had some conversation with David, who then went to dress for the marriage, at which ceremony he was to be present. All this time Miriam did not wake.

"It is well," said Dr. Underwood, as he looked in and felt her pulse again before he set off. "Do not wake her. When she wakes naturally, try if she will take food, and then let her get up. Dr. Burns will be here before I return. Good bye, Edith. Now for the marriages! But I know how much the wife is dearer than the bride."

After he was gone, Edith conjured up a picture of the marriage. The pretty brides and their white dresses, the bright colours of the other ladies, the grave and studious Crypt, the energetic Bang, Jack and Philip, the youthful groomsmen, radiant in health and good looks, Mr. Underwood's relaxed sternness of expression, Mr. Shepherd reading the service with solemn benign air and noble voice. But conspicuous in her picture of the marriage in the little church yonder, was the figure of her own husband, looking on with brotherly love, and a thought of the future in his beautiful face.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE END.

ABOUT three hours later in the same day Edith and her charge were together in the ruined turret. Miriam lay, shrouded in pillows and cloaks, on the mossy couch that Gideon Underwood had made for her mother—where she had played in childhood—where she had heard David tell his love in youth, and where two months before she believed for a few moments that he loved her still. She was much changed, and looked with calm pleasure around.

"Are you quite warm and comfortable, dear?" asked Edith for the third time, as she wrapped a shawl more closely round Miriam's feet and moved a pillow beneath her head.

"Oh, yes! Ah! what a delicious sensation, to be in the open air again! Thank God! thank God!" murmured Miriam in a feeble but joyous tone.

Edith stooped down and kissed her pale cheek.

"Ah, Miriam! I wish I could tell you how glad we are to have you well—David and I."

"I know, I know! Let me look at you, Edith. I can see you and all things now. I seem to know your face. Where is David? I want to see him."

"You shall see him presently. Rest a little now."

At that moment a peal of joy-bells rang out from the village church. Sweetly they sounded on the still, warm air.

"What is that?" asked Miriam, eagerly.

"Joy-bells for the marriage."

"I remember! It is Leah and Rachel. May God's blessing be with them! They are dear good girls. How I wish I could see them!"

"You are to see them if you don't tire yourself first. They are coming here to see you."

Miriam looked pleased.

"I will be quite quiet, only you must let me turn so that I can look at the prospect as I lie. It is so long since I have seen it. Do you know, Edith,—nay, you must let me speak a little or my heart will burst, it is so full. Do you know I seem to have begun another life altogether—as if this illness had been a sort of new birth. All the past seems to have gone back, so far off I scarcely remember it; only I remember that once I could not see, and that I was alone, virtually alone, in the world, and now I have you and David for my friends. David is quite a new person now. I have got to learn him. I seem to know all about you—how good you are—how wise—how active for the good of others. If I live, will you teach me to rouse myself and be active for others, too?"

"Miriam, sweet Miriam! you need not rouse yourself; your very being is a good to others. You are beautiful—the sight of you gladdens and elevates the heart."

"But it does not heal a wounded heart, or succour the oppressed, or give helpful sympathy to the struggling soul. I, too, would exert myself for others; I, too, would get knowledge that I may help wisely."

"In good time, dear one, when God has given you strength. Meantime your first duty is to get strong. What say you to going for a time away from Milford—to Italy—with Mr. Shepherd and Mr. Underwood, who are both in delicate health, and with the good Martha, who will take care of you all?"

"I will go if it is best; but I shall not be with you then."

"No. David and I must remain in England with our children. We are to live at the Grange. But, when you are quite recovered, you will come back and live amongst us."

"Yes," replied Miriam, in a very low voice, "I know almost everything you tell me. I must often have heard you and David talking in my room. You are very noble and loving, Edith. Do not fear for me. God is daily inspiring me with courage and hope. I am anxious to get well and do some good in the world, that I may be worthy to be your friend and the friend of David Underwood."

After these words she remained silent for some time with closed eyes. Edith thought that she was exhausted and slept; but it was not so. Her newly awakened mind was busy with many things. Presently she opened her eyes again, and seeing Edith reading from a book, she said—

"What are you reading?"

"Poetry. English poetry."

"Show me a page. It is so long since I have seen any printed thing! How strange it looks! I do not think I could read it now. It dazzles my eyes."

"Your eyes are not strong yet. David wishes you to go with us to London as soon as you can bear the journey, that he may put you under the care of a celebrated oculist."

"David is very good. I should like to know what you were reading in that book just now. You glanced at me, as if you thought it concerned me."

"And so it does. It concerns all those who suffer—especially those who seem to suffer from no wrongdoing of their own. You shall hear:—

THE MAIDEN'S TOWER, CONSTANTINOPLE.

Not always fall of leaf, nor ever spring,
Not endless night, nor yet eternal day,
The saddest birds a season find to sing,
The roughest storm a calm may soon allay;
Thus with succeeding turns God tempereth all
That Man may hope to rise and fear to fall."

"It is very sweet," said Miriam. "Will you read it again?"

Edith did so; and as she pronounced the last line, she heard voices and steps outside the ruin. "They are coming, Miriam," she said rising. "Tell me truly, are you strong enough to see them?"

"Yes, I want to see them. Is your husband with them?"

"Yes. See! here he comes!"

It was truly a beautiful sight, that gay marriage group standing within the area of the old turret. David came first, leading his sister Martha. Mr. Underwood and Mr. Shepherd came next. The others stood aloof at first, till assured by Edith that Miriam was able to see and shake hands with them all. Then came the two brides in their soft white dresses, their flower-wreaths and veils; tears were in their eyes, and their voices were hushed as they knelt down by Miriam and looked half fearfully into those large eyes which had been sightless so long.

"Can you see us indeed, quite distinctly?"

Miriam smiled, her old calm smile. "Yes. Let me look; I do not expect to see so pretty a sight for a long time. Where is Mary?"

"Here she comes." Mary was walking slowly over the broken ground with Philip.

"That is Philip with her, is it not?" asked Miriam, gravely. "Yes, I am sure it is. You are all right; I think he is very handsome."

"He is very like his aunt Miriam," said David cheerfully. After a few more words and kind looks had been exchanged, David made a signal for every one to retire.

"There! That is quite enough gaiety and excitement for one day, my dear Miriam," he said, flinging himself on the grass beside her couch and taking her hand. "Ah! The pulse is disturbed of course. Now shut your eyes and lie quite still till I come back to carry you up-stairs—I, or Philip. You are not to speak a word to Edith for five minutes, and you are to drink whatever I send you. I wish I might stay with you both, here in this dear old place, where," he added in a lower tone, "I have prayed daily for your restoration, dearest Miriam, and that God would give me grace to be worthy of your friendship and my wife's love."

"God has heard you, David, my oldest friend. Give me your hand—yours too, Edith. Now let me make a marriage after my own heart, this day. Will you love each other as long as ye both shall live, nor ever let one thought of Miriam Grey come like a shadow betwixt you?" Miriam spoke with an earnest voice.

"We will," they both replied, fixing their eyes on hers, with an expression of perfect love and trust.

She pressed both their hands to her lips.

"Now go," she said. "Go both of you: I must be left alone for awhile. When you come back I shall be quite calm."

They went away as she desired. When they returned, she was sleeping peacefully with clasped hands, as if in prayer.

From that day, Miriam Grey began to gain strength; and from that day may be dated the commencement of a new bond of love between her and David Underwood. To him she has become dearer than a sister, and he is to her more than any brother could be. There is a secret sanctity and strength in their affection; but stronger and more devoted than their friendship for each other is their love of Edith. It is the strongest feeling in the heart of each.

Ten years have passed since the remarkable visit of "the Strange Gentleman" to the Grange at Millford. During that time, many changes have taken place there; but I have no more to relate concerning the fortune or character of its present owner, David Underwood.

THE MAIDEN'S TOWER, CONSTANTINOPLE.

EVERY traveller who has visited the capital city of the Ottoman empire, speaks in admiring terms of its exceeding beauty of situation and picturesque appearance. The connecting link, as it were, between Europe and Asia, it stands upon a gently sloping promontory secured by narrow seas, and stretching out in a triangular form towards the Asiatic continent. The area of this triangle is occupied by elevations, some of which are sufficiently high to be called hills, and on these are placed several of the most important edifices, such as the Seraglio, or Palace of the Sultan, the great Mosque of Santa Sophia, the lofty dome of the Osmanli Mosque, and the still loftier dome of that of Solymán the Magnificent. Fanned by the breezes which are wafted from the Bosphorus, the sea of Marmora, and the Thracian plains, and watered internally by numerous fountains and streams of waters, its inhabitants enjoy a pure and healthy atmosphere, save what the habitual uncleanness of the lower classes creates.

It is not a little remarkable that almost the first city ever founded by a Christian monarch and a Roman, should have outlived every trace of its earliest religious creed, and of the refined taste of the cultivated people from whom it sprung. It may fairly be presumed, that when Constantine rebuilt the metropolis of the eastern portion of the Roman empire, and enriched it with the treasures of art gathered from every quarter of the world, where his own legions and those of his predecessors had proved victorious, the edifices wherein those treasures were placed, and those which became the homes of the emperor and his followers, would have shown some resemblance to those they had quitted in Italy. If this were so originally, all traces of the fact have long been lost; indeed, history informs us that though Constantine despoiled the whole empire of statues, pictures, bas-reliefs, marbles, and bronzes, in order to decorate Constantinople, and make it a second Rome, the architecture of his new city was as inferior to that of the old, as its situation was superior to that on the banks of the dark and troubled Tiber. And now, whatever of classic elegance and beauty was originally reflected in the waters of the Bosphorus, has given place to painted Kiosques, fanciful domes, and spiral minarets. We seek in vain for a single fragment of those noble edifices, which, it may fairly be presumed, once stood in the "seven-hilled city of the eastern world," as the writers of the time used to speak of Constantinople, in contradistinction to the "seven-hilled city of the western empire."

It is scarcely necessary to inform the reader, that Constantinople stands on the European coast of the Bosphorus; opposite to it, on the Asiatic coast, scarcely a quarter of an hour's row in a boat, stands Scutari, a very populous town in itself, though considered a suburb of the European capital. Like the latter, it is built on the slope of a hill; it is also distinguished by its fine mosques and magnificent burial-grounds planted with majestic cypresses. Many of the wealthier Turks are buried here, under the impression, derived from an ancient tradition, that one day or another their race will be driven out of Europe. "Not an arrow's flight," writes Miss Pardoe, in her work entitled "The Bosphorus," "from the quay of Scutari, stands 'The Maiden's Tower,' a small and picturesque castle, built upon so diminutive a rock, that its foundations cover the whole surface, and give to the edifice an appearance of floating upon the waves."

Listless, and outwardly imperturbable as seems the modern Turk, when he sits cross-legged smoking his hookah, with a face of gravity that nothing can soften into a smile of cheerfulness, there is sometimes a touch of romance to be found in his disposition, mingled with superstition and a belief in old legends; of the latter, the "Maiden's Tower" forms one subject, which Miss Pardoe narrates in the volume just referred to:—A certain Sultan, whose name has been lost, had an only child, a very beautiful girl; she was growing into womanhood, when the father consulted a celebrated astronomer as to her future destiny. The man of mysteries prophesied that, in her eighteenth year, she was to become the victim of a serpent. Alarmed at so terrible a prospect, the Sultan erected the aforesaid tower, and immured his daughter in it, that by isolating her from the world around, and almost from the very earth itself, he might avert the impending calamity. But who can contend against his destiny? Death reached the fair captive in a basket of new figs from Smyrna, in which a small asp lay hid; and she was found, on her eighteenth birthday, dead upon the sofa, with the fruit beside her: the reptile had fastened itself upon her bosom, from which she was unable to remove it. Another version of the story, however, is,—and it is far more likely to be the true one, if there is any truth at all in it, and certainly it is a far pleasanter one,—that the serpent, by whom the Sultan lost his jewel, was a young Persian prince, who had been attracted to the tower by the fame of the lady's matchless beauty, and, having effected an interview with her, won her heart, and found opportunity and means of bearing her triumphantly away from her home on the waters.

To judge from the appearance of the "Maiden's Tower," as it stands prominently forward in the pretty little vignette engraving, it must be a charming place of occasional rendezvous and quiet enjoyment, when the sun-light falls upon the shining waters at its feet, and upon the hanging gardens of Scutari and the lofty domes on the opposite shore; but one would almost as soon think of "pitching our tent" in the Eddystone Lighthouse, as to make so misanthropic-looking an edifice our dwelling-place in all seasons and in all weathers, even to share it with the most beautiful Houris that ever walked in the rose gardens of the Prophet's paradise, or sat in the bowers of Amherabad.

NIEBUHR's services to historical literature are so well known and appreciated, that it is presumed the present publication, containing an outline of his life, and large selections from his correspondence, will be warmly and thankfully accepted by the cultivated public. The outward history and inward culture of such a man must be necessarily interesting, and that in a degree far exceeding the attraction which appertains to an ordinary biography. As far as we can judge, the work seems ably and honestly compiled; it being confessedly founded upon a German production, edited by Madame Hensler, Niebuhr's sister-in-law; but several additional letters have been added, and a considerable amount of further information has been woven into, or appended to, the biographical sections. Altogether, we believe, it is the fullest and most complete account of Niebuhr and his pursuits that has hitherto been published in a single book: and it seems to us that the record is one of exalted interest and value, a record full of just and noble teachings, such as may serve alike the uses of the matured scholar, the struggling and ambitious student, the man of the world, the conscientious politician, and indeed, to some extent, of all varieties of thinking and active persons.

The quality in Niebuhr with which we are most impressed, is not his greatness, for except in regard to acquired scholarship he cannot, perhaps, be reckoned a great man,—not his greatness, we say, but his truthfulness. Perfect honesty is his grandest and most commanding characteristic. Whatever may be the matter of speculation, he desires to learn the truth of it: to this end all else is to be sacrificed, all labour cheerfully and vigorously undergone. Such a patience in research, such a gigantic faculty for investigation, as he brings with him to his tasks, can scarcely elsewhere be witnessed. And these he employs with the sternest singleness of purpose, his sole aim being to eliminate clearness from confusion, to detach the true from the merely traditional or problematical. His main service in relation to history has been destructive: with his single arm he cleared away whole forests of mythical error and absurdity; but, after indicating the foundations for the future shrines and temples of historical art, he left the ground to be built upon by others. Yet the work he did was an excellent and needful one; and the temper and spirit with which he wrought commands the frankest admiration. We invite you, therefore, to some slight review of his life and labours; drawn, as you will understand, from the volumes now before us.

• Barthold George Niebuhr was born at Copenhagen, on the 27th of August, 1776. He was the son of the distinguished traveller, Carsten Niebuhr, who appears to have fallen in love for the first time in the fortieth year of his age, and to have married a young orphan girl, with whom, relinquishing all notion of a journey which he had previously planned into the interior of Africa, he set up his household in the Danish capital. A few years after his marriage he obtained his discharge from the military service, to which he had hitherto belonged, and received the appointment of Land-schreiber, or secretary, to the province of South Dithmarsh in Holstein. To Meldorf, its chief town, he removed with his family in 1778; and it was here, among a primitive and homely population, that the young Niebuhr passed his childhood and the first years of his youth.

His parents appear to have paid great attention to the training and education of their children; but the frequent indisposition of Madame Niebuhr, with whom the marsh-air of the country did not agree, and the occasional ill-health of Barthold from ague and other causes, somewhat interrupted the otherwise regular and happy tenor of his childhood. Yet, upon the whole, he and his sister (two years older than himself) led a very pleasant and cheerful life, "romping about with their playfellows in a spacious house, or in large court-yards and gardens." When the boy was about five years old, he took great delight in watching the building of a new house, which was then being erected for his father. "The elder Niebuhr was his own architect, and the child soon learnt to draw plans by watching his father at work, and asking him questions; he was constantly at his side during the progress of the building, and long afterwards retained an intelligent recollection of the proceedings of the workmen." Meanwhile, the worthy father was never weary of providing both his children with suitable occupations and entertainments. "He had a skittle-ground made in the large court-yard, and in the winter a Russian mountain was put up in the garden. A very considerable collection of seals and coins was made for them, from which on Sundays they were allowed, as a treat, to take casts, and they eagerly studied heraldry in connexion with these. . . . In summer he would help his son to build fortifications in the garden according to the rules of military art, which he afterwards taught the boy and his companions to attack and defend, likewise according to rule. In winter he used to collect other children at his house in the evenings, and then set them to dances while he played for them on the violin. The Christmas festivals were seasons of unbounded enjoyment to Niebuhr in his childish years." Afterwards, when he had grown up to manhood, he writes, with a keen remembrance of these joys:—"A many-coloured tissue of bright memories floats over me from those times. . . . With all of them there is associated a peculiar charm of eager outstretched expectation and dazzling surprise, succeeded by a vehement feeling of delight occupation, and gratitude."

Evidently, this father Niebuhr was a very excellent, sensible, and fatherly sort of man. Under such training and attention as his, it was natural that the children should grow up amiable, intelligent, and well-behaved. The boy, indeed, soon gave indication of extraordinary capabilities. As early as his fourth or fifth year he began to receive instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic; "he early distinguished himself by his quickness, ready apprehension and sure retention of what he learned, and, according to his sister's account, he soon got before her. He had always finished the tasks that were set them sooner than she had, and then would roughly dance round her, singing,

'Rest is sweet when work is done.'

Though both girl and boy had other teachers, their father himself attended very closely to their education. The son says, "He instructed both of us in geography, and used to relate stories to us from history; he taught me English and French, at all events much better than I could have learnt them from any instructor the place afforded, and also a little mathematics, in which he would have gone further had he not been discouraged by the want of liking and talent in myself."

Not without some paternal satisfaction and complacency did the father write to his brother-in-law, Eckhardt, in December 1782, when young Niebuhr was only six years old:—"Barthold has begun to-day to learn the Greek alphabet, and shall now proceed to write German in Greek characters." Somewhat later, writing to the same person, he says, "he studied the Greek alphabet only for a single day, and had no further trouble with it; he did it with little help from me. The boy gets on wonderfully. Boje says he does not know his equal; but he requires to be managed in a peculiar way. . . . He is no longer so passionate with his sister; but if he stumbles in the least in repeating his lessons, or if his scribbles are alluded to, he fires up instantly. He cannot bear to be praised for them, because he believes that he does not deserve it." Then he continues, "My wife complains that I find fault with Barthold unnecessarily. I did not mean to do so. He is an extraordinary good little fellow, but he must be managed in an extraordinary way, and I pray God to give me wisdom and patience to educate him properly."

The Boje mentioned in this letter was the editor of a literary periodical in Germany, who lived on terms of intimacy with the Niebuhrs. An anecdote related by this gentleman will serve to show the boy's early susceptibility to poetical impressions. Writing in 1783, he says, "A short time back I was reading 'Macbeth' aloud to his parents without taking any notice of him, till I saw what an impression it made upon him. Then I tried to render it all intelligible to him, and even explained to him how the witches were only poetical beings. When I was gone he sat down, (he is not yet seven years old,) and wrote it all out on seven sheets of paper, without omitting one important point, and certainly without any expectation of receiving praise for it, for when his father asked to see what he had written, and showed it to me, he cried for fear he had not done it well. Since then he writes down everything of importance that he hears from his father or me. We seldom praise him, but just quietly tell him where he has made any mistake, and he avoids the fault for the future."

For the first twelve years of his life Niebuhr was educated entirely at home, but his father, feeling at length that the desultory instruction he had hitherto received was insufficient for him, determined on placing him in the Gymnasium, or public school, at Meldorf; a step which appears to have been in accordance with the boy's personal inclinations. He was entered at Easter, 1789, and "found himself at once by far the youngest, and considerably the most advanced in his class." Notwithstanding this, he grew in great favour with his schoolfellows, but he only remained in the school until the Michaelmas of the ensuing year, owing to the circumstance that most of the senior pupils were withdrawn about that time, and he was too far advanced to mix with the younger set of boys who were then admitted into the highest class. The Principal, however, offered to give him an hour's private teaching daily, and this appears to have been continued until Easter, 1794. For a short time he had been sent to a celebrated school at Hamburg, but, growing restless and dissatisfied with the place, he was permitted to return home to Meldorf. Here he remained until the year just mentioned, assisting his father in his official duties, and amassing knowledge with great diligence and rapidity. By this time he had become acquainted with several modern languages, along with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew; and, taking into account his enormous medley of information in regard to other matters, it was justly concluded that he was sufficiently prepared to enter the University of Kiel.

Here, accordingly, in 1794, Niebuhr commenced his studies. A somewhat shy, rather awkward, retiring young man; he nevertheless found the society into which he was introduced in many respects agreeable. Writing home to his parents in the month of May, he says:—"When I remember the anxiety and sorrow we felt at parting, my gloomy ideas of this place, my melancholy at being transplanted from my quiet, peaceful occupations in the midst of you all, to this noisy town, and the deep silence of my solitary room, how glad and thankful I am to have found everything better than my expectations! I would give a great deal—yes, what I prize most of all, some days of my future stay with you—if you could know a little sooner how happy I am—if you could know it at this moment, while I am writing." Then he goes on to tell of his various visits to Professors; among whom he mentions with especial emphasis and respect a certain distinguished Dr. Hensler. This learned notability had been pleased to take an unusual degree of interest in the young student and his pursuits. "My ideas about the origin of the Greek tribes," says Niebuhr, "the history of the colonization of the Greek cities, and my notions in general about the earliest migration from west to east, are new to him, and he thinks it probable that they may be correct. He exhorts me to work them out, and bring them into as clear a form as I can." Hensler likewise prepared a plan of study for him, and seems to have given him a sort of general invitation to his house.

There it was his fortune to become acquainted with one or two intellectual and cultivated women, in whose society it soon became his wont to "cheer himself," when he happened to be getting "gloomy" from a too great severity of study. He very much complains, however, of his painful timidity and bashfulness before ladies generally. "However much I may improve," said he, "in other society, I am sure I must get worse and worse every day in their eyes; and so, out of downright shyness, I scarcely dare speak to a lady; and as I know, once for all, that I must be insupportable to them, their presence becomes disagreeable to me. Yesterday, notwithstanding, I screwed up my courage, and began to talk to Miss Behrens and young Mrs. Hensler." It would appear that he did not acquit himself much to his satisfaction in the conversation; but, as practice in most things gives expertness, he gradually became less diffident, and more gallant in his deportment; and we find him in the course of time, confessing to a tender attachment for Miss Behrens. Her sister, Mrs. Hensler, (widow of a son of Dr. Hensler's,) soon perceived his secret, and with the kindest consideration in the world, spoke to him distinctly on the subject, and brought him to a definite declaration. It was not until he had quitted college, however, and subsequently paid a visit to the Henslers, that the bashful student formally made a confession of his feelings. Then, in the month of August, 1797, he wrote to Madame Hensler in these terms:—"At every moment that I have had to myself for reflection, I have pondered on the idea, and asked myself whether the reality would be as happy as the prospect was entrancing. I found the question very simple, and the answer was, 'Were I to obtain the blessing of which I am not yet worthy, I should have more than I ever ventured to desire, and my happiness could only be disturbed by my own fault.' It is not necessary to know your Amelia long. Can one help believing in her at first sight? Why should I repeat what you know already, that her presence gave me such unspeakable, heartfelt delight! The first speaking glance of her clear beautiful eyes, her richly cultivated mind, that reveals itself so simply and unassumingly, almost timidly; her purity, her tenderness, shine out in all her words and motions, and would be evident to one less susceptible than I am. I see no shadow, not even a cloud, to dim this sunshine."

But before their marriage can take place, Niebuhr has to win for himself a name and a position in the world. His college days, indeed, are ended, and he is now holding the situation of private Secretary to Count Schimmelman, Minister of Finance at Copenhagen, and also the post of Secretary to the Royal Library; but his personal tastes incline him to aspire after a professorship in Kiel, as the readiest means of leading the quiet and studious life most suited to his disposition; and it is now accordingly his aim to qualify himself in all respects for the duties of such an office.

By way of preparation for the work he had assigned himself, it was decided that Niebuhr should make a journey to Great Britain, that he might have some of the advantages of foreign travel, prosecute and extend his studies, brace up and strengthen his mental and bodily energies, and acquire, as far as possible, a comprehensive view of the relations of the external world. Of his residence here we have no record, save what is presented in a series of letters to his betrothed, extending over a space of nearly eighteen months—from June 1798, to November 1799. These letters are almost entirely of a personal character.

In November, 1799, Niebuhr returned to Holstein, and in May of the following year he was married to Amelia Behrens. He had just been appointed Assessor at the Board of Trade for the East India Department, and Secretary of the Standing Commission of the Affairs of Barbary. In June, he took his wife to Copenhagen, and entered on his official duties. The young couple were in the highest degree happy in each other. Niebuhr writes thus to Madame Hensler in the month of August:—"Amelia's heavenly disposition, and more than earthly love, raise me above this world, and, as it appears, separate me from this life. A life of full employment, combined with serenity of mind, which we shall secure by rigidly maintaining our seclusion, protects and heightens the capacity for happiness. Happiness is a poor word: find a better! Even the toils and sacrifices of business contribute to the calm self-approval, which to me is the essential condition of enduring happiness. Amelia's cheerfulness, her contentment with her lot, untroubled by any wish for something beyond it, afford me as heartfelt joy as the contrary would give me pain. Her presence and conversation keep my heart at rest and my mind healthy. Thus I am gradually recovering from the impression made upon me in past times by the delusions and contradictions of the world."

Niebuhr resided in Copenhagen for the next six years, during which period the city was bombarded, and the Danish fleet destroyed by Nelson.

Ultimately, however, hostilities were suspended, peace followed, and Niebuhr was left to pursue his official avocations, and the historical investigations in which he now began to be engaged, without further interruption. In these employments, he was occupied until the autumn of 1806; when, growing dissatisfied with his position in connexion with the ministry, he embraced an opportunity which was now afforded him of relinquishing the Danish service, and of entering upon an important office under the Prussian Government. He removed to Berlin on the 5th of October, a few days before the battles of Jena and Auerstädt, when the Prussian army was defeated, and the French advanced upon the capital. For Niebuhr and his associates there was, of course, no quarter to be expected; most of them accordingly took to flight, and after various shiftings, Niebuhr and his wife, with whom alone we are here concerned, took up their residence at Memel, where they appear to have stayed until the following April. Niebuhr then took office in the finance department under Count Hardenberg, and subsequently under Stein, with whom he laboured for some time in an attempt to reorganize and regenerate the kingdom. Having returned to Berlin in December, 1807, he was met by the intelligence of his mother's death; and at this loss his grief was heightened, inasmuch as he was obliged to go upon a financial mission to Holland, instead of proceeding straightway to Meldorf, to visit and console his father. He remained at Amsterdam for upwards of a year, and can scarcely be said to have succeeded in his negotiation; but, nevertheless, he was afterwards nominated a privy councillor of state, and received a superior appointment connected with the administration of the funds. He was more or less engaged in various public duties until 1810, when, distrusting Hardenberg, who was now again installed as Prime Minister, and offended at the opposition given to some of his financial plans, he sought to be released from further service under government, and finally exchanged his situation for an historical professorship, in the new university just opened in Berlin.

Now it was that Niebuhr, for the first time, had ample leisure for those studies to which he had long been secretly attached, and now, accordingly, was published his first literary production—A Treatise on the Amphictyons—written in the summer of 1810. At the opening of the University, he delivered those lectures on Roman history which formed the foundation of the great historical work, by which his name has been rendered famous. The lecture-room was attended by a numerous and distinguished audience of students, professors, and even statesmen.

What Niebuhr proposed to himself, and eventually accomplished, may be gathered (as far as it can be indicated by a few disconnected paragraphs) from the following remarks, taken from Professor Loebell's Essay on his character as an historian. "In his History of Rome," says the Professor, "Niebuhr commenced the erection of an edifice, in the construction of which he would not employ the very smallest stone until he had carefully examined its fitness. Furnished with a comprehensive and profound acquaintance with the languages and literature of antiquity, he was fully qualified to apply the principles of the new tendency in philological criticism on a far wider scale, by the most acute examination and analysis of the original sources of history. What had hitherto (with a few exceptions which attracted no attention) been termed historical criticism, consisted partly in a reckless scepticism, which rejected entirely the remains of whole periods,—as Hume says, "The first page of Thucydides is in my opinion the commencement of real history,"—partly in testing contradictory statements in the accounts of the narrators of isolated events, by their greater or less probability. Another step had been taken shortly before Niebuhr's time. Instead of credulously receiving, or absolutely rejecting the whole, an effort was made to pick out the kernel of historical truth, from the midst of the mythical elements with which it was mixed up in tradition.

Niebuhr retained his professorship until the year 1813, publishing in the meantime the first and second volumes of his Roman History, and making liberal preparation for future works. In that year, however, the recurrence of war between France and Prussia called him once more away from the prosecution of his literary pursuits, and obliged him to take an active part in political affairs. He was now employed in various negotiations with foreign states, and was for some time in attendance at the head-quarters of the Allied Army at Prague, and other places. Returning to Berlin in October 1814, he wrote a pamphlet on "The Rights of Prussia against the Court of Saxony," which excited great attention, and for which he received the formal thanks of the Prussian Government. Whilst he was still occupied with public affairs, he received, in April 1815, tidings of the death of his father. About the same time, his wife's health, which had long been failing, had now become decidedly broken down, and it was evident to him that, in her case also, the end was nigh at hand. His apprehensions, indeed, were very shortly verified. On the 21st of June she died in her husband's arms. "He had never spoken to her of her approaching death, much as he longed to receive her parting wishes, because the physician forbade all excitement. Once only, a few days before her death, as he was holding her in his arms, he asked her if there was no pleasure that he could give her,—nothing that he could do for her sake; she replied, with a look of tenderness, 'You shall finish your History whether I live or die.' This request was ever present to his mind, and he regarded its fulfilment as a sacred duty, though years elapsed before he was able to resume his work."

And so now he had lost all that was most dear to him in the world, and the weight of his loneliness fell on him as darkness falls over the earth when it is night. The depth of his affection was proportioned to the happiness he had enjoyed, and he passed many solitary months in a state of extreme depression. Still it was not long before he recognised the duty of resignation and endurance. The dark calamity that bound him down, was indeed but an inevitable incident in the common lot. Every day this grave shadow intercepts the sunshine in its passage through some casement. So, with as much patience as was possible, he addressed himself to his wonted tasks, and strove to live in the endeavour and in the prospect of being useful to his fellow men. He could not, indeed, return to his Roman History, as it revived too many painful recollections; but he employed himself in various incidental studies, and, upon the whole, contrived to turn his hours to account.

In the spring of 1816, he prevailed upon Madame Hensler and her niece, Margaret Hensler, to come and live with him; and by their presence he was gradually brought back to a comparatively cheerful state of mind. Shortly, it became apparent to Niebuhr that this young Margaret was a very graceful and interesting girl; she soothed him with pleasant attentions, and delighted him by her singing; and in the end it came to pass that he won her young affections, and married her.

On the conclusion of peace, after the event of Waterloo, Niebuhr was rewarded for his services by the appropriate appointment of Prussian Minister at the Court of Rome. Thither, accordingly, he set out with his young wife in July, 1816, and there he remained for the space of seven years. In Rome and its neighbourhood he had the most favourable opportunities for working out his historical investigations.

The object of his mission being attained, Niebuhr quitted Rome in the summer of 1823, and after a brief stay in the Prussian capital, decided on taking up his residence at Bonn. While in Italy, his wife had borne him four children, the youngest of whom died in the spring of 1824. This event distressed him greatly. He was, at the time, away on a visit to Berlin, and on writing to console his wife, he says, "I have learnt to appreciate you, and your whole worth thoroughly, my Gretchen, and this misfortune has brought us nearer to each other, and perfected my love for you more than any happiness could have done. . . I am buying little presents for the children, but with what a weight at my heart! I feel as though I had lost all security that they were still mine."

Nevertheless, with the commencement of his residence at Bonn, began the quietest, and, as far as concerns posterity, the most important portion of his life. "His freedom from other occupations and cares, enabled him at last seriously to undertake the accomplishment of the promise given to his Amelia, and continue his Roman History. He returned to the vocation, which had in his youth floated before him as the true ideal of his life, namely, the position of a public instructor; and found ample opportunity to redeem the vow he had made in his early years, to extend guidance and assistance to any young men who might hereafter encounter the intellectual difficulties through which he had had to work his own way." Though holding no official appointment at the university, he yet frequently delivered lectures there—lectures on the History of Greece, Roman Antiquities, Ancient History, Ethnography, and Geography—making in the whole several distinct courses, which were continued up to the year 1830. For a year or two, he also assisted his friends Brandis and Hasse in the editorship of a philosophic journal; for the rest, he lived in pleasant intercourse with various literary and distinguished persons. But he did not confine himself solely to learned circles. "In all the civil affairs of the town and neighbourhood, he took an active interest from principle as well as inclination, for he considered a man as no good citizen who refused to take his share of the public business of the neighbourhood in which he lived; and the loss which left so great a blank in the world of letters, was also deeply regretted by his fellow-townsmen of Bonn."

Niebuhr's mode of life, in these latter years, was very regular, and all his habits simple. "He hated show and unnecessary luxury in domestic life. He loved art in her proper place, but could not bear to see her degraded into the mere minister of outward case. His life in his own family showed the erroneousness of the assertion, that a thorough devotion to learning is inconsistent with the claims of family affection. He liked to hear of all the little household occurrences, and his sympathy was as ready for the little sorrows of his children as for the misfortunes of a nation. He was in the habit of rising at seven in the morning, and retiring at eleven. At the simple one o'clock dinner, he generally conversed cheerfully upon the contents of the newspaper which he had just looked through. The conversation was usually continued during the walk which he took immediately afterwards. The building of a house, or the planting of a garden, had always an attraction for him, and he used to watch the measuring of a wall, or the breaking open of an entrance, with the same species of interest with which he observed the development of a political organization. The family drank tea at eight o'clock, when any of his acquaintance were always welcome. But during the hours spent in his library, his whole being was absorbed in his studies, and hence he got through an immense amount of work in an incredibly short time."

In this way the years span round, until the end which awaits every one, came in his case also. His life was at last shortened by a concurrence of calamities. On the 6th of February, 1830, his new house, in the arrangement of which he had been greatly interested, was accidentally burnt down; and before order and comfort could be created afresh from the ruins of his domestic existence, the news arrived of the second French Revolution—the notable Three Days of July. With respect to the first, he said, with sad composure, "If only the manuscript of the second volume of my Roman History is found again; I can get over everything else, and, at the worst, I feel I have still power enough left to replace my History, and will set to work again, with God's help, in a few days." The manuscript was found, and was greeted with great joy; but it is said, that the news of the Three Days utterly confounded him, and from that time he was saddened and distracted by what seemed to him the re-commencement of revolutionary outrage. When the trial of the ministers of Charles the Tenth took place, he was much excited by the reports in the French journals; and on the evening of Christmas day, after spending a considerable time in reading in the public news-rooms, without taking off his cloak, he caught a severe cold as, heated in mind and body, he was returning home through the frosty night air. His illness lasted a week, and was pronounced, on the fourth day, to be a decided attack of inflammation on the lungs. His faithful wife, who exerted herself beyond her strength in nursing him, fell ill, and was obliged to be carried from him. Then, with a painful presentiment, he turned his face to the wall, murmuring, "Hapless house! to lose father and mother at once." And to the children he said, "Pray to God, children; He alone can help us!" And his attendants saw that he himself was seeking comfort and strength in silent prayer. Finally, on the afternoon of the 1st of January, 1831, he sank into a dreamy slumber; once awakening, he said that pleasant images floated before him in his sleep; in his dreams he now and then spoke French; and as the night gathered, consciousness faded quite away, and the Great Darkness extinguished the light of his eyes for ever! Nine days afterwards, his wife followed him to the same grave.

The third volume of the Roman History, which Niebuhr had left in an unfinished state, was prepared for the press by Professor Classen. Of this performance we do not feel called upon to speak further in this place; and with respect to the extensive correspondence now before us, we can only say, that it contains the record of his whole literary and political life, and abounds with passages remarkable for sense and wisdom. Want of space has hindered us from making large quotations, but we can confidently recommend the book to the attention of all studious and thoughtful readers. It is full of sound knowledge and practical information: if "Biography" be "history teaching by example," few histories are more pregnant with lessons than this; it shows us what industry can do when combined with talent; and it shows us, also, that which some persons are occasionally inclined to dispute,—that "industry and talent" may be associated, may work together, and together produce the fruits of labour for the benefit of mankind.

A DANGEROUS CHARACTER!

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

ONE of the most tormenting persons who ever came into a neighbourhood is, "a great Quiz,"—a man who, having little or nothing to do, has, nevertheless, an active imagination and not a great deal of mind; who is perpetually injuring your taste by bad puns, insulting your honesty by gross untruths, turning your friends and your feelings into ridicule, and getting up practical jokes in a way that tempts you to call him out, or, if you are able, meditate "a thrashing" in defiance of the law. But your genuine, your perplexing and most dangerous "Quiz" has a provoking good temper; you get angry with him, and are ashamed thereof, for he will not get angry with you. He is full of mirth and mischief, and leaves the malice to you whom he aggrieves and laughs at; and then, if he offends you, and you resent it, your neighbour smiles as you pass, and if your neighbour is displeased, you smile as he passes, and, forgetting altogether how "glum" you looked yesterday, you wonder how it is possible he should look so "glum" to-day, when he knows of old that Mr. Mallay is "such a Quiz," and means "no harm." I am sure, while writhing beneath a joke, you could forgive him much more quickly if he intended harm than if he did not, for a desire to injure could be more easily forgotten than a desire to turn you into ridicule. We all like to laugh with, but cannot endure to be laughed at. Mr. Mallay never cared what we liked or disliked, so long as he had his laugh, and could quiz, or arrest attention by recounting "a capital quiz" he played off on "that dear kind fellow who would never get over it."

A man requires no capital of either wit or understanding to set up for "a Quiz." A certain degree of unrefined humour, and a fertile invention, were Mr. Mallay's stock-in-trade. He made lucky hits sometimes; got hold of a good story or a good listener, or a person whose nature was so truthful that he anticipated no untruth in others, and was loth to believe that any one could be so degraded as to make fun out of falsehood. He had a quick, sly, winking eye, that never looked you straight in the face; an uncertain, undefined mouth, that twisted, and set, and unset itself, in many different ways, sometimes puckering at one corner, and smiling at the other—a mouth, in fact, that looked as if it were born with a lie upon its lips. His carriage was ungentlemanly—for a gentleman must be erect and self-possessed, and your "great Quiz" is never the one or the other. Mr. Mallay exaggerated all things, and was as well read in appearances and omens as a fortune-teller. If a gentleman danced twice with the same lady, he was "violently in love;" if a widow changed her weeds, "she was going to be married," and both must be "quizzed;" if a poor girl got into ill health, and from being a rose, faded into a lily, the Quiz always inquired "if she was suffering from an affection of the heart." Then he had slang terms, from his Quiz dictionary, for all things—for funerals as well as feasts; and delighted in parodies, which he sung with singular emphasis and expression. He never omitted quizzing "the parson;" and thought it the triumph of his art to have sent four doctors and two undertakers down a dirty lane, to call on an old maid and an old bachelor, who had just quitted their single blessedness for the bonds and bands of matrimony. Whenever a bell-handle or a knocker was missed, Mr. Mallay was accused of the theft—and bad as he certainly was—mean and incomprehensible as were his ideas of that brilliant sparkling wit, which is the very jewel of society—low as was his understanding of the reciprocal duties of the salon, where there is neither a butt nor a butter, where each contributes to the pleasure of the whole, and that from the upspringing of a gracious desire to make others happy—incapable as the "Quiz" ever is of justice or generosity—prone as he must be to maumetogism, in its most mischievous moods—yet I have sometimes thought he was blamed more severely than he deserved to be. It was entirely for want of moral courage to cut him deliberately and at once that he continued lingering about our pretty neighbourhood—the very genius of mischief and idle talk—peeping in on our working evenings with little fag-ends of suppositions, and the very tatters of scandal—quizzing us all round, and managing to amuse us in the unhealthiest of all ways, by quizzing our neighbours; and while we were innocently sewing muslin, he was sowing mischief—libelling our visiting-societies, casting shadows upon our old maids, and discord among our young ones, setting the two churchwardens together by the ears, until the select vestry were going to call a meeting, and pass a vote of censure on the said most active and peace-loving churchwardens,—he was detected puffing snuff through a blowpipe among the charity children, to set them sneezing when the bishop preached,—circulating evil reports as to the sanity of our parish clerk, and the cretleness and security of our church steeple. We had been long remarkable on the fourteenth of February for the interchange of kindly, if not tender, good wishes to each other; and were justly rather proud of our Valentines—a great many had been inserted in albums, and it was rumoured that more than one had been absolutely printed. No wonder we were proud of our Valentines!—but on one particular fourteenth, the number increased so fearfully, that our postman was obliged to hire an assistant, to ensure their delivery, and instead of being the gentle, good-natured epistles they used to be, many were found to contain nothing but vulgar jests and unpleasant insinuations. "The Quiz" had grown into our evil genius; and yet the absolute dread of ridicule, the fear of being quizzed, or being thought to fear, getting rid of what we frequently whispered to each other, was growing into an incubus; it was quite curious how we endeavoured to qualify our cowardice. Mr. Mallay complained that he was deserted by the friends of his youth; and though we remembered that this complaint is seldom made by those who deserve to keep them, we either pitied him, or fancied we did so, and excused ourselves to ourselves and each other, by saying, "Poor Mr. Mallay! if we were all to cut him, what would become of him?"

We continued to live in a sort of mental nettles-rash, until relieved in a singular way, by as singular a person—a certain Major Harley took one of our "detached" cottages, a pretty little damp place in a hollow, covered with ivy and matted clematis, and a favourite residence of the insect tribe—a perfect halo of gnats hovered over it during spring and summer; and even in winter, when the sun came out, the gnats came also, and danced and stung as gaily as though the month were July; however, the Major was a naturalist, and seemed to like his companions—earwigs, black-beetles, and spiders—great mottled spiders, with gouty legs, who spun their insides out, and yet increased in size. Like all naturalists, he was a silent, patient person; he listened very quietly to all that Mr. Mallay said, as if it was all plain, straightforward truth, without a shade of colour, or an iota of exaggeration.

Mr. Mallay was delighted; he thought he had got a safe "butt"—he knew he had got a patient listener—one of those tame creatures who never complain, and whom you may know at first sight by the bend of the neck, as if it were bowed down by the weight of words;—the dropping of the eyelids in a sleepy sort of way, and a habit of repressing a half-drawn sigh before it has vigour to become a whole one; uttering occasionally an "Oh!" or an "Oh la!"—a "Dear me!" or sometimes a "Won-der-ful!"—indeed, the Major seemed determined to swallow Mr. Mallay's tales, and endured his "Quizzing," in a way that was unaccountable. One morning they both met at the house of a mutual acquaintance, having taken shelter from a heavy shower of rain.

"Did you ever see such rain?" exclaimed the fair hostess.

"Yes," said Mallay, "I did, in the Bay of Dublin; I saw a shower there that dashed into the Hill of Howth like grape-shot, sweeping the rocks like marbles into the Bay. What do you think of that, Major?"

"Dear me!" was the quiet reply; and he rested his wooden leg upon a footstool.

"However," continued the narrator, "it only lasted five minutes, but at the end of that time there was not a rag of canvass upon seven sail of the line that were awaying about like cockle-shells right in the Bay."

"Won-der-ful!" said the Major.

"But," continued the Quiz, "that was not as 'won-der-ful!' (and he winked at the company while mimicking the Major's voice and expression) as what occurred to me on the Shannon—I never was so near being smothered in all my life. A boat laden with flour was met by a high wind, and it blew all the flour across the water; I could hardly breathe for three days, and you may judge of the quantity when I tell you that the river was converted into so thick a paste that all the boats at Castle Connell were stuck together. Now 'dear me!' was not that 'wonder-ful?'"—another wink accompanied this mimicry.

The Major only bowed, but "the Quiz" having, as he considered, "caught his hare" in a roomful of young ladies, had no inclination to let him go, and continued, in a way which none but a practical Quiz could continue, probing the little weakness of the old officer's nature, and ridiculing those habits which he knew he was prone to indulge in. Elated with success, and excited by the foolish laughter of thoughtless girls, he surpassed himself, and, not being observant, imagined that the Major's silence meant subjection. The veteran's pale cheek had at first flushed slightly, but afterwards the colour gathered and gathered until it became a deep crimson spot on either cheek bone, and his "Lae!" and "Oh dears!" sunk into a murmur or an inclination of the head, when addressed or talked at.

The rain ceased, and the "great Quiz" departed, eager to repeat "his good things" at the next house he called at. He had not, however, gone far, when he heard the well-known sharp stumping of the Major's wooden leg advancing rapidly—not in the methodical way it usually did, the stump of the leg replying to the "tap" of the cane, but rat-tat, rat-tat, quite fast. Mr. Mallay was not a brave man—he never pretended to be a brave man—he only wished to be considered a "pleasant fellow;" and there was something bloodthirsty and determined in the rat-tap that struck upon his ear. He quickened his pace—he was in an awkward predicament; he could not return, and face the man he felt at that moment was his enemy; and he was sure to be overtaken by him in a few moments, for fast as he walked, the rat-tap came faster. He heard his name pronounced in the palpitating voice of an angry man, and he commenced whistling one of those popular opera airs which indicate so many moods—defiance, courage, indifference, or impertinence, according to the accentuation. The notes were rather confused, and ceased altogether, when the Major, as erect as a ramrod, passed before him, and turning suddenly round, exclaimed, "Sir! you have insulted me."

"Me, Sir!" replied Mallay. "Insult you? It is quite a mistake—I never insult any one—a little harmless jest—a simple quiz."

"Falschood upon falschood, and lie upon lie!" said the veteran. "Any man who attempts to pawn a lie in jest or earnest upon society, insults both its integrity and its understanding. I demand satisfaction for the affronts you have put upon me."

"Really, my dear Sir, you have misunderstood me."

"But you do not misunderstand me, I trust?" interrupted the Major. "My friend shall wait upon you in the course of an hour."

And so he did; the officer was implacable; he had got the idea firmly fixed in his mind that he had been insulted, and that he must have satisfaction. The meeting was arranged; the Major and his "friend" walked up and down on the damp grass, at the appointed place, for more than an hour, but they saw nothing of Mr. Mallay. The Major posted him with great form as a coward, and returned with fresh laurels to his animated museum in the pretty damp cottage, while we congratulated ourselves on the fact that Mr. Mallay had disappeared at midnight—that his furniture was to be sold—his house let—and we had got rid of the GREAT QUIZ.

THE autobiography of a gentleman who has, for more than fifty years, occupied a prominent position in letters, and who has directed for nearly a quarter of a century one of the most influential literary journals of modern times, cannot fail to prove very generally interesting. The press has sent forth the first part of the memoirs of Mr. William Jerdan; he lives to write, to publish, and to abide the issue: the task is one that requires no ordinary courage, and at the same time, no small degree of prudence: it may be dangerous to say too much; it may be dishonest to say too little: many of the persons, freely noticed and despatched upon, are living to praise or to blame; to uphold or to refute: personalities will be unavoidable: strictures will, no doubt, be frequently considered as calumnies: in short, there is no task which an author can set himself at once so difficult and so perilous; or which requires so much either of boldness or of recklessness. This task Mr. Jerdan has but commenced: judgment, therefore, would be premature; we have before us the first of four, five, or six volumes; and that first gives the writer's earlier life and adventures: less embarrassing, no doubt, than his work will be as he proceeds.

It would be, therefore, unwise to anticipate what the whole may be from this sample of the weaker portion: if it increase in interest as it proceeds; if, mingling among the men more immediately our contemporaries, and amid scenes more exciting because more directly associated with our own time, Mr. Jerdan speaks more thoroughly "out," and is original in proportion, he will have contributed to his age and country a work of deep interest and value, and one that will greatly aid the future historian of art and letters in the nineteenth century.

Considering, however, that this work is but commenced, we shall abstain from reviewing it until it is in its entirety before us; contenting ourselves for the present with extracting some interesting portions: and referring our readers to the volumes for the more extended information they will demand. Suffice it, for the present, that William Jerdan was born at Kelso in 1789; he is consequently 70 years of age; and his literary labours have extended over half a century; they are not yet closed, however; grim necessity pursues him even at threescore and ten; and he is still doomed to earn his daily bread by the work of his brain. This is not as it should be: and we will not now pause to inquire whether the fault is or is not entirely that of society, in not having dealt justly with the author. We copy the following passage from the introductory chapter:—

"My life has been one of much vicissitude, of infinite struggle, and latterly of very grave misfortune. On looking back from the harassed, would it were the calm untroubled goal of threescore and ten years, I can trace with a faithful pencil much that has been owing to mistakes, to errors, to faults, and to improvidence on my own side; and more to misconceptions, injustice, wrongs, and persecutions, unprovoked by any act of mine, on the part of others. I believe that the retrospect may be very serviceable to my fellow-creatures, and most signally so to those who have embarked, or are disposed to embark, in the pursuits of literature as a provision for the wants of life. Of all the multitude I have known who leant upon this crutch as a sole support, I could not specify ten who ever attained anything like a desirable status either in fortune or society. On the contrary, the entire class may be assured that although felony may be more hazardous, literature is, of the two, by far the most unprofitable profession."

From the sentiment expressed in the concluding passage, we presume entirely to dissent: we do not think Mr. Jerdan would have recorded it, if he had given himself time to think: it is true that very few have made fortunes by literature; comparatively few have amassed wealth by any profession; but we affirm that many men and women have lived by the pen, honourably and prosperously. This topic might afford scope for an article of some length: and we have no doubt, that as Mr. Jerdan's memoirs proceed, he will name many more than "ten" who have not found literature an "unprofitable profession," taking into account that which it produces, and that to which it leads.

But our present purpose is, as we have said, rather to select some interesting portions of this book than to review it or its author: when the latter is to be done, we shall have some grounds of quarrel with both; especially with such a sentence as this, which does not tell well for the writer, and may be dangerous, nay peripetous, to those who may be influenced by his autobiography:

"For myself, I can say that not many men have enjoyed so much of pleasure, and endured so much of pain as I have done. I have drained the Ciceronian to the lees, but I still gratefully acknowledge the enchanting draught of its exquisite and transporting sweetness, in spite of the emptiness of its froth, and the bitterness of its dregs."

This is not what should be written by an aged man whose highest duty is to train others "in the way they should go." Think we rather, at this moment, of the kindly critic of so many years, who, reviewing thousands, nay, tens of thousands, of books, not only did his spitting gently, but considerably, generously, and with the warm heart of a friend, wherever a tyro was to be encouraged or desert rewarded; we are happy rather in answering his question,

"Will ever those who have known me find interest in the re-awakened memories of scenes which we have shared together?"

(1) Publishers, Hall and Virtue: London.

And we are happy in answering it by a passage written by L. E. L. in 1833.

"Who lifts the fallen—who cherishes the desponding—who animates the weary—who encourages the fainting—who pities and solaces the unfortunate—who sustains the enthusiastic—who is the friend of talent—who the idolator of Genius?"

All this we verily believe Mr. Jerdan was—and is—for a long series of years, as editor of the "Literary Gazette"—when that Journal enjoyed a power of which we can now have little idea; and surely much of error, much of wrong, may be pardoned in a man who very rarely, if ever, used his strength for evil, but was continually exerting it for good.

We are to consider, then, this volume but as the Induction: and as such, it is highly interesting. It relates the incidents of Mr. Jerdan's early life, and those of his career up to his occupation as Editor of the "Sun" newspaper; of the companions of his younger days, some striking anecdotes are introduced: the following passages are not without their moral: happy would it have been had such ideas occurred to the writer at the commencement, rather than the close of his career.

"David and Frederick Pollock, and Thomas Wilde, were the most active and distinguished contributors, and when I reflect on the circumstance, and that the first died Sir David and Chief Justice of Bombay, the second is Sir Frederick and Lord Chief Baron of Her Majesty's Court of Exchequer, and the third, Lord Truro, the other day Lord High Chancellor of England, the foremost civil subject of the realm, I cannot but marvel at the fate of their fourth and their not very unequal competitor. My prospects were apparently as bright as theirs, my cleverness (not to use a vainer phrase) was only too much acknowledged, and my career has not been altogether fruitless in the service of my country and fellow-creatures. I have laboured, too, as constantly and severely, and produced effects which have had beneficial contemporary influence, and may, I trust, secure for my name a remembrance in times to come; yet look I with my aspirations crushed, from the clouded bottom of the hill, rejoicing in and admiring, not envying, my early comrades, who having bravely climbed the summit, they range along the height, and in happiness enjoy the brilliant region, on which, humanly speaking, warm and eternal sunshine settles.

"But what is the moral lesson I would draw from these facts? Why did my friends so nobly succeed, and why did I, ultimately, so grievously fail? The reasons are not far to seek. Frederick Pollock completed his education in an English University, where the highest honours were awarded to his great abilities, and indefatigable and zealous exertions. In every branch and class he was among the foremost, and, as Senior Wrangler, was the foremost of his year, carrying off the glorious prize from many a splendid and dangerous rival. In short, he had the vision of the future distinctly before his eyes, and he devoted himself heart and soul to its realization. He never flagged, and after the first great College step, his even path needed no more than unflinching perseverance in the course he had so auspiciously begun. From Edinburgh I corresponded with him in his onward movement, and occasionally added my mite of research to his studious investigations, which was of some advantage to me, though it could be of very little to him, and only proves the deep interest I felt in all that concerned his progress and welfare. A pleasing anecdote may illustrate this part of my narrative, as I had it from the lips of another conspicuous pattern of high exaltation through similar merits, from a humbler walk in life—the Bishop of London. In a conversation with his lordship a few months since, at Hatton, he informed me that his personal knowledge of the Chief Baron was nearly as old as my own, for he said, 'We were at College together forty-seven years ago, when Pollock read Greek with me in the forenoon every day, and I read mathematics with him every evening. This,' he added, 'was good for both, but I then went to my curacy, and he pursued his legal studies; and so we did not meet again together for some time.'

"I now turn to Thomas Wilde, who had to struggle against infinitely greater difficulties than his school-fellow of St. Paul's. In the first place his birth was not so respectable, in the second he had an impediment in his speech, and in the third he had no college connexions or reputation to lift him forward. But he had a strong and indomitable will, and a natural energy that could not be repulsed—unswerving firmness and untiring application were his marked characteristics: he would give up nothing he had determined upon; he would yield to no opposition; and his abilities were already of a very masculine order. Accordingly, when he entered the law as an attorney he was as sure of success as Pollock was at the bar, and thus they speedily outstripped and left me far in the distance.

"For why? I unsteadily forsook the choice of a profession, and, within a few years, found myself leaning for life on the fragile crutch of literature for my support. And here again would I earnestly advise every enthusiastic thinker, every fair scholar, every ambitious author, every inspired poet, without independent fortune, to fortify themselves also with a something more worldly to do. A living in the Church is not uncongenial with the pursuits of the thinker and scholar, the practice of medicine is not inconsistent with the labours of the author, and the chinking of fees in the law is almost in tuning with the harmony of the poet's verse. Let no man be bred to literature alone, for, as has been far less truly said of another occupation, it will not be bread to him. Fallacious hopes, bitter disappointments, uncertain rewards, vile impositions, and censure and slander from the oppressors are their lot, as sure as ever they put pen to paper for publication, or risk their peace of mind on the black, black sea of printer's ink. With a fortune to sustain, or a profession to stand by, it may still be bad enough; but without one or the other it is as foolish as alchemy, as desperate as suicide."

A subsequent chapter contains a minute account of the circumstances connected with the assassination of Mr. Perceval, in 1812. The subject is of little interest: and scarcely merits the importance Mr. Jerdan seems to have attached to it. There was nothing remarkable in the affair. The page which contains a plan of "the lobby" in which it took place, no one will now care for; while the expression of regret that the page was not big enough to give a tracing of the pistol used, savours somewhat too much of "the Victoria."

Subsequent chapters contain accounts of a visit to Paris, in the ever-memorable year 1814. These accounts are meagre: but they are written entirely from memory; unhappily, it was never the practice of Mr. Jerdan to make notes: he lived far too little with the past. From this part of the book we extract the following:—

"It was on the first or the second day I dined at Beauvilliers, that a fair Saxon-looking gentleman came and seated himself at my table. I think he chose the seat advertently, from having observed, or gathered, that I was fresh from London. We speedily entered into conversation, and he pointed out to me some of the famous individuals who were doing justice to the Parisian cookery at the various tables around—probably about twenty in all. As he mentioned their names I could not repress my enthusiasm—a spirit burning over England when I left it only a few days before—and my new acquaintance seemed to be much gratified by my ebullitions. 'Well,' said he, to a question from me, 'that is Davidoff, the colonel of the Black Cossacks. I shall not repeat my exclamations of surprise and pleasure at the sight of this terrific leader, who had hovered over the enemy everywhere, cut off so many resources, and performed such incredible marches and actions as to render him and his Cossacks the dread of their foes.' 'Is this,' inquired my companion, 'the opinion of England?' I assured him it was, and let out the secret of my editorial consequence, in proof that I was a competent witness. On this a change of scene ensued. My incognito walked across to Davidoff, who forthwith filled and sent me a glass of his wine (the glass he was using), and drank my health. I followed the example, and sent mine in return, and the compliment was completed. But it did not stop with this single instance. My new fair-complexioned friend went to another table, and spoke with a bronzed and hardy-looking warrior, from whom he came with another similar bumper to me, and the request that I would drink wine with General Czernicheff. I was again in flames; but it is unnecessary to repeat the manner in which I, on that, to me, memorable day, took wine with half-a-dozen of the most distinguished generals in the allied service.

"While this toasting-bout was going on, a seedy-looking old gentleman came in, and I noticed that some younger officers rose and offered him a place, which he rejected, till a vacancy occurred, and then he quietly sat down, swallowed his two dozen of green oysters as a whet, and proceeded to dine with an appetite. By this time my vis-à-vis had resumed his seat, and, after what had passed, I felt myself at liberty to ask him the favour of informing me who he himself was! I was soon answered. He was a Mr. Parris of Hamburgh, whose prodigious commissariat engagements with the grand army had been fulfilled in a manner to prosper the war; and I was now at no loss to account for his intimacy with its heroes. It so happened that I knew and was on friendly terms with some of his near relations; and so the two hours I have described took the value of two years. But the climax had to come. Who was the rather seedy-looking personage whom the alcove-de-camp appeared so ready to accommodate? Oh that was Blücher! If I was outrageous before, I was mad now. I explained to Mr. Parris the feeling of England with regard to this hero; and that amid the whole host of great and illustrious names, his had become the most glorious of all, and was really the one which filled most unanimously and loudly the trump of fame. He told me that an assurance of this would be most gratifying to the marshal, who thought much of the approbation of England, and asked my leave to communicate to him what I had said. I could have no objection; but after a short colloquy, Blücher did not send his glass to me—he came himself, and I hob-nobbed with the immortal soldier. I addressed him in French, to which he would not listen; and I then told him in English of the glorious estimation in which he was held in my country, which Mr. Parris translated into German; and if ever high gratification was evinced by man, it was by Blücher on this occasion. I had the honour of breakfasting with him at his hotel next morning, when the welcome matter was discussed more circumstantially, and he evinced the greatest delight."

We hope and believe that as these volumes proceed, they will increase in interest; no doubt by their aid we shall be enabled to make, or to renew, acquaintance with many of the notabilities of our age and country: we shall learn something too, it may be, of writers whose anonymous works have obtained fame while they are themselves forgotten. But again we warn Mr. Jerdan that he has undertaken a task of great difficulty: upon the issue of which more perhaps than he imagines may depend. The position of a man of letters is, as he well explains, one of peril, at the outset in life. Mr. Jerdan can do what many cannot do—speak of this peril for half a century, from the age of twenty to that of three-score and ten: but he must do so, with the full knowledge he possesses of the causes that make it perilous; and it will be his duty so to expose these causes as to warn, and thus secure, those who are to come after him. We believe he will not seek to wear the mask himself: but he must exhibit others also unmasked. We repeat, that upon the volumes here begun very much may depend. We earnestly hope that Mr. Jerdan will consider how much he may teach posterity. But one thing is certain; we cannot conclude the brief notice of his introductory volume, without bearing testimony to the character of the writer, in so far as regards his public career as Editor of the "Literary Gazette." Upon this subject it will be no doubt our duty to dilate, when we come to consider the publication in its completed state.

That the first part has been loosely put together, without plan or arrangement, is quite clear. Mr. Jerdan seems to have been embarrassed by the multiplicity of his memories, and the mass of correspondence through which he has had to wade; they are confused, mingled together without harmony; and although highly interesting and often valuable, lose much of their effect from the want of apparent purpose in putting them forth.

LONDON MAGAZINE

FOR GENERAL READING.

CONDUCTED BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

With Elegant Steel Engravings.

VOL. I.—NEW SERIES.

LONDON:
VIRTUE, HALL, AND VIRTUE, 25, PATERNOSTER-ROW.

P R E F A C E.

THE Editor of "SHARPE'S LONDON MAGAZINE" greets her subscribers on the termination of her first half-yearly task; hoping she has done well, yet promising to do better—inasmuch as her resources will be increased, and her plans more thoroughly developed during the year that approaches. She has already received much valuable co-operation, and can safely assure her readers, that in every respect the next volume will equal, and, in some of its arrangements, surpass, that which is now a candidate for public favour.

Will the subscribers permit her to say that she never "makes up" the table of contents, or cuts the leaves of "the last number," without surprise at the small price charged for a magazine combining so much artistic and literary attraction—every page of which is liberally paid for.

If "the public" will call to mind, that the Contributors forming the "Staff" of the Magazine, are among the best and most popular authors of the day; and, that, in addition to what is brilliant and amusing, there is much solid and useful information, hallowed by religious but not sectarian principles, in every Part—each adorned by two delicate line engravings, she thinks "the public" will agree with her, in considering "SHARPE'S LONDON MAGAZINE" to be the cheapest periodical published in London, and that the publisher deserves cordial and extensive patronage, risking, as he does, a large capital, to enable families to obtain so much of the best and purest literature, for the sum of ONE SHILLING!

The Editor would entreat the attention of Parents to the fact that she watches every page with minute care, so that nothing can creep in that may not be read aloud in the domestic circle. She congratulates her readers on the termination of "another year," and prays that they may meet together at the commencement of the new, with increased happiness, and increased trust—one in the other.

LONDON MAGAZINE.

RECOLLECTIONS BY A QUARANTINE DETENU.

TWO HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-EIGHT days, during my wanderings in the Mediterranean, having been unavoidably passed in the lazaretto of France, Italy, Egypt, and Malta, I feel I have some right to record a few jottings—ancient the miseries, impositions, and thousand torments, entailed upon unfortunate travellers by that monster-piece of charlatanism yecept Quarantine. When the Duke of Buckingham laid, as his heaviest anathema, upon the cur that snapped at his ducal fingers the wish that the brute “was married and settled in the country,” his grace evidently knew little of quarantine, or I woen the sentence of a banishment to Chowbent, or the depths of the New Forest, for the term of a life, would no doubt have been exchanged for a month’s residence in the lazaretto of Alexandria, amid the flies and other Egyptian plagues, and perhaps during a Khamseen wind, bearing upon its hot breath clouds of sand, so subtle as to penetrate even the recesses of a watch, to say nothing of the parched and excoiated throat and blood-shot eyes of the traveller but lately landed from Beirut or Jaffa, and stricken, perhaps, with the fatal Syrian fever.

Quarantine, as a sanatory measure, is, in reality, in the Mediterranean states, but of secondary importance, when compared with its other less ostensible uses, although the checking of contagion through its means is made the pretext for its troublesome enactments, and the fussy, provoking puerilities of the legions of officials living by the abuse; who seem, however, I must say, as far as they are concerned, to be in solemn earnest in their ideas of its importance as an efficacious stayer of the progress of the destroyer. The good people of Marseilles are devout adherents to the system, as they have not yet recovered the fright occasioned by the memorable plague of 1720, which carried off 45,000 persons. The barbarous codes of the Health-office, and their accompanying train of bugbears and extortion, are never-failing sources of patronage and profit, independent of being ready engines of tyranny in the hands of the petty despots who govern some of the shores of this sea. In the first place, shoals of hungry government hangers-on are provided for; secondly, the mulets imposed in the shape of fees are no contemptible addition to their finances; and thirdly, during seasons of popular excitement, the means afforded by the pretext of contagious disease raging in any other country possessing institutions of a liberal order, cut off all intercourse between the respective inhabitants until the dangerous period has passed by.

Malta, which is so dependent upon Sicily for supplies of nearly every description, has at various times suffered much inconvenience by this most arbitrary system, and more particularly during the late outbreak in the latter island, as the Neapolitan authorities were constantly spreading reports of small-pox and other diseases as having broken out in the former, solely owing to British policy having inclined towards the cause of the insurgent Sicilians: these falsehoods, until disproved, and in all cases with much delay and trouble, were the means of interrupting the communication between the islands,—the teeming productions of Sicily rotting in her fields, while the craving Maltese sighs in vain for the picturesque speronara,* with raking mast and tapering yard, and whose gaudily-painted hull, deeply submerged with plentiful stores of pulse, grain, and wine, and gunwales high-heaped with the orange, the grape, and the melon, once gladdened his eyes at the Marina, at the custom-house, and at the stairs of Nix Mangiare,* the soubriquet of these famous steps being at such a juncture very appropriate.

The intercourse between Egypt and Syria is greatly trammelled by quarantines, each country being considered, in the Health-office phraseology of the other, as "suspected;" an evil which told heavily upon the comforts of the crew of a little English schooner, named the Emmetjee, which for some years conveyed the mails between Alexandria and Beirut. Under this system of retaliatory measures, she rode quarantine at both places, and actually has had, for the period of a year or more, the yellow flag continually flying, and her crew confined to their diminutive bark, not larger than a fishing-smack—a run on shore being as unattainable by them as by the phantom mariners of the fabled ghost-ship of the Cape of Good Hope. The little Emmetjee was for some years the retreat of a venerable man, whose white hairs and services in every clime had given him just claims to the "red flag at the fore;" but, lacking friends and interest, he performed, as a lieutenant, the humble duty of guarding the letter-bag. The schooner being a merchant vessel, upon her services being dispensed with by the Admiralty, the fine old officer was sent adrift at Alexandria, nearly 3,000 miles from England, without government having made any provision for his departure, from a coast on which the comforts necessary to his declining years were so much abridged by the pitiless regulations of quarantine. The well-known liberality, however, of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, in giving this gentleman a passage from Alexandria, remedied the shortcomings of the Admiralty.

An absurd anomaly amid the strictness of Egyptian quarantine requires notice. Suppose, for instance, a traveller has arrived at Alexandria, by sea, from the Holy Land, and is desirous of proceeding to Malta by the English steamer; he is of course immured in the lazaretto until the vessel sails, and at the proper time is released from his prison, and placed in a wretched boat, both dirty and leaky, and which is dragged at the stern of another, rowed by Arabs, to the anchorage of the packet. Upon coming alongside, it is probable he discovers that the vessel is not ready for sea—the "mails" are not on board—and he is in consequence forbidden to ascend the gangway ladder, as such a proceeding would entail an immediate quarantine, and at once cut off all communication between the ship and the shore,—a very serious inconvenience at the busy hour or two previous to departure. In this predicament, the Arabs immediately make the poor voyageur's boat fast to the rudder-chains of the steamer, and leave him in solitary grandeur, perched on the summit of a pile of trunks, to contemplate, like another Marius, tawny ruins on the distant beach, their crumbling outlines wavering or trembling in the loom of the hot haze; or, nearer at hand, his eye rests upon the rudder, the cabin windows, and the keel of the jolly-boat which dangles above him; while ever and anon the old adage of "listeners never hearing any good of themselves," is exemplified, to the marvellous disturbance of his equanimity of temper, by facetious early arrivals among the passengers, who, stealing a peep, retreat a few paces from the taffrail, and, sotto voce, thus indulge, more candidly than politely, in speculations as to the unknown:—"I wonder who upon earth that is!"—"Did you ever see such an outrageous hat upon any man?"—"I wonder where did that fellow shave last?"—"How they would stare at him in the park!"—"I say, is it not preciously hot? come, let us see if we can't find a bottle of soda water."

Time wears on—one, two, three, four long hours run their sluggish sands out; the sun gets fiercer and fiercer still; in vain the eye, averted from the dusty palms and painfully glittering shore of the South, wanders seaward to the cooler North, in search of the long dark lines, which, making the blue deeper still, and tinging the shallower waters near the reefs with streaks of fainter green, till at last, over-leaping the rocky barriers of El Kot† and El Hout in snowy flakes, herald the welcome sea breezes;—fruitless is the search; the bird-like sail of the humble djerme‡—the white turban and swarthy face of her "rais," or steersman—even the chibouk, with which he soothes himself into a tranquillity rivaling Nature's calm—are faithfully reflected on the unruffled harbour. During these weary hours, our poor traveller has passed through the various stages of annoyance and irritation;

* Nix mangiare means, in Maltese dialect, "Nothing to eat;" and the stairs, having been made during a period of scarcity, to give employment to the poor, derive their soubriquet from that season.

† Rocks forming part of the barrier stretching across the mouth of the harbour, and between which are the passages.

he, however, is now completely "used up," and, in dreamy resignation, oscillates with the rocking of his boat upon the light groundswell; his head is aching violently; his nose is blistered; does he close his eyes to exclude the glare? millions of little bubbling atoms spring up and down in fantastic polkas, till, quite bewildered, he once more opens them, to cherish a very pardonable delusion of his having become, somehow or other, a denizen of a world in which sea, sky, land, trees, ships—all, are glowing copper; and in this hallucination, caused by the rays of a noontide Egyptian sun at his highest northern declination, at last approaches the welcome period of his release. A greater bustle ensues—the mails and captain come off together; the former are tossed on board without ceremony, and the latter, running up the ladder, says, in a breath, to the officer receiving him at the gangway, "Now, Mr. Topmail, bundle the mails in at once, if you please. Are you hove short?"—"Yes, sir, to a stay peak."—"Run a line out to that corvette to get her head round. Have your jibs clear," &c. &c. The busy skipper, then, at a glance, comprehends the occupants of the thronged quarter-deck,—the grizzled ex-commander-in-chief of Tank-square presidency, the collector of Apollo Bunder, the deputy-judge of Cooley Bazaar, and the senior kettle-drum of the Currywallahbad cavalry, with the political resident at the Ladrone Islands, are the great guns; a crowd of less distinguished liver-affected Qui-His, Ducks, and Mulla,* with a filling-in of little sore-eyed, rice-crammed babies, and their dingy ayahs, parrots, and Persian cats, complete his survey; during which, brief as it is, dire alarm seizes his soul, in consequence of unmistakable manifestations being made by some of the nabobs of a desire to appeal to him, at the early stage of four hours before dinner, to settle the important matter of precedence at table, generally a questio vexata among Indian passengers. By an eel-like manœuvre he escapes the snare, and gains the stern, where, looking over the taffrail, the hapless stranger, now almost baked to a turn, catches his eye. Inquiries are rapidly made and answered; the skipper, melted with pity, bawls out lustily, "Mr. Topmail, clear the ship at once of strangers from the shore."—"Bless me, here's a poor gentleman four hours under the stern."—"What a treat he must have had of it under such a sun!"

* Noms de guerre given in badinage to the residents of the three presidencies, Calcutta, Bombay, and Madras, among themselves.

The orders are quickly obeyed, and our traveller, scrambling up the ladder, rushes to his cabin, and, in an hour, bathed, shaved, and curled, is happily recognised, on his re-appearance, as the very Antinous of Curson-street and the embryo lion of the season, the Rothen of Belgravia.

In the meantime the ship, now placed in quarantine, emerges from amid the pasha's line-of-battle ships, and timber-carrying frigates of that great utilitarian; and, steaming past a perfect grove of windmills, turns sharp to the right, when, abreast of the Tombs of the Kings, and keeping to starboard the lighthouse and palace on Point Eunostos, and far to the left the island and fortifications of Marabut, threads her devious course amid the reefs, forming the Boghaz Pass † or Channel, and regains the open sea.

When the soundings, deepening to sixteen feet, signify to the Arab pilot that his knowledge is no longer needed, he descends from the paddle-box; the clanking engines pause for a space, and a boat, hitherto towed astern of the ship, is hauled up to the gangway, and the follower of the prophet prepares to leave the packet, but first begging the usual "back-sheesh" of a couple of bottles of booz or ale, and a loaf or two of bread; he also receives his certificate of pilotage on paper, and unavoidably comes in contact with the crew when going over the side. It is hardly to be credited, after all the fuss that had been made about the poor passenger, that the pilot and his boat's crew land again, in perhaps an hour, at Alexandria, freed from all restrictions imposed by quarantine; yet were the ship from any cause to put back, she would be subjected to the same length of quarantine as that allotted to the Syrian traveller,—such is one of the inconsistencies of this system!

Cloth, hair, wool, silk, feathers, and many other articles are, in the jargon of quarantine, styled "susceptible," that is, capable of conveying contagion. Does the skirt of a fellow-detenu in the lazaretto touch yours, you are detained to share the remainder of his captivity, even if your quarantine should expire this evening and his to-morrow morning. Does a poor bird escape from its cage, a whole garrison trembles,—as at Gibraltar, when a beautiful Himalayan pheasant, belonging to Lord E—, flew upon the rocks near the New Mole, from the packet on board which his lordship was passenger; yet, strange to say, the pigeons of Valletta seem to have a prescriptive claim to set all sanatorial regulations at defiance, and, although feathered, and of course "susceptible," keep up a regular communication between Valletta and the lazaretto in the following manner.

Malta imports large quantities of corn, principally from Ibraila, Galatz, and Odessa, and which is discharged into open lighters while in quarantine; the grain, thus temptingly displayed, attracts numbers of pigeons, that alight upon the rigging of the vessels, and from which clothes, perhaps, are hanging to dry, and thence, perching on the grain-lighters, fill their crops, and when-satisfied, wheel back in airy circles to their dove-cots in Valletta. Vessels, too, from Barbary and Egypt have generally several pigeons on board; I have frequently seen them vary the monotony of their floating homes by flights into the city, the regulations of the marine police being a dead letter to the pretty strayers.

A curious difference is made in the wisdom of this yellow-flag legislature with regard to the "susceptibility" of gold and silver, as specie, or when wrought into those ornaments for the fabrication of which Malta is so famous. All money taken from a person in quarantine is plunged into a bucket of water prior to the receiver touching it, and it is customary, when landing a quantity in bags, to rip the latter open, and pass the treasure through a mixture of vinegar and water, lest contagion should be communicated; yet, in the face of such needless particularity, articles of jewellery are handed from a seller in *pratique to a purchaser in quarantine on the end of a short board of two feet in length; the buyer handles the articles, and those rejected are again received by the jeweller without his having thought it at all necessary to submit them to the dipping process. Why such a distinction should be made is, I suppose, one of the choice subtleties of quarantine.

While thus arraigning the stupidities and annoyances of this bête noir of Mediterranean travel, it must be admitted that, in self defence, our possessions of Gibraltar and Malta are forced to adhere to its ordonnances; for, were they infringed by them, Spain, in the first place, and Naples, in the second, would rejoice in finding a pretext for their isolation; and, as it is known how much the comfort of the population of the Rock depends upon a daily intercourse with St. Roque and Algeciras, and also how indispensable Sicily is to Malta, we cannot marvel at the anxiety displayed by the authorities of our Mediterranean strongholds to maintain a state of free pratique.

I once, at Malta, was a witness of the inconvenience caused by that island being put in quarantine, occasioned by the captain of an English brig which had arrived from Alexandria, and was anchored, as usual, in the quarantine harbour. The unsophisticated Northcountryman landed in the most open and natural manner at Marsamuscetto steps, and, unquestioned, walked across the city with his wife tucked under his arm; the worthy couple took it leisurely, remarking this and wondering at that, until they found their way to the Marina, or quay of the grand harbour, where the agent of the skipper meeting them, was of course quite confounded at their appearance, and precipitately hurried the unwelcome visitors back to their brig. The news flew fast, and the foreign consuls in the island lost no time in advertising their various governments of the circumstance. The Neapolitan packet was sent away by the consul without being allowed to land her passengers; the French steamer was driven away in the same manner; the Bull-dog steam sloop-of-war, dispatched on a mission of importance to Italy, was placed in strict quarantine upon her arrival at Genoa, and all Malta declared to be in the same predicament. The poor skipper—the cause of all this hurly-burly—was imprisoned, and people spoke of hanging, or transportation at least, as his probable doom: however, upon its being discovered that he, not having visited the Mediterranean before, was quite ignorant of the subtleties of quarantine, government released him upon the payment of a small penalty.

A proof of the anxiety of the Maltese to preserve their pratique may be inferred from one or two anecdotes:—

A poor shopkeeper of Valletta, who, among others, flocked across to the parlutorio of the lazaretto to offer his wares to the homeward Indian passengers, had sold a pair of lace mittens to an officer of the Indian army; the latter, dissatisfied with his purchase, threw them back in the man's face. The moment they came in contact with him, the surrounding crowd, like the fellow herd of the hunted deer, at once drove him from amongst them, and sprang off in all directions, screaming "Quarantine, quarantine." The poor fellow was instantly made liable to the twelve days' imprisonment, and, in addition to the interruption of his business during that period, incurred the usual expense of a guardiano: his appeals to the gentleman for some remuneration were piteous; the latter, however, imperious and selfish, turned upon his heel, and again embarking for the good fare and comfort of the packet, bestowed not a thought upon the poor smaitch,* thus the victim of the proverbially insolent humours of a spoiled Anglo-Indian.

* Pratique signifies not being in quarantine; it is also applied to those who, having undergone quarantine, have just been released.

Another affair of this nature caused much merriment, as the sufferer happened to be one of the principal officials of the lazaretto, who, although attending to their duties at the establishment during the day, still are not in quarantine, by their taking good care to avoid coming in contact with those who are; having seen all the poor wights locked up for the night, they cross the harbour to enjoy the society of their families in Valletta.

The burly and smiling-countenanced Signor Janino had looked up all for the night, and wending his way to the boat, was happy in the anticipation of escorting his fair sposa in all her glories of silk faldetta,† massive car-rings, and weighty chain, to some fantasia | or other—whether the illumination of the church of St. John, the fête of St. Publio, or the baptism of the new cathedral bell—when all the gobe-mouches of Malta rejoiced in seeing the complaisant governor and his lady becoming its sponsors,—I know not; some pleasure expedition of the kind, nevertheless, he had in view, when a black-bearded, mustachoid, and spectacled commissaire, or purser of a French packet from Alexandria, landed for a moment to read some document to Signor J., and which, when perused, was by the polite Gaul torn up and thrown into the water; one tiny fragment, however, wafted back by an eddying zephyr, alighted upon the shiny boot of our poor Signor,—a tremendous assault, which frightened the attendant guardianos, and caused them to fly from their tainted chief, all uttering the terrible cry of “Quarantine.” The poor fellow, with rueful face, meekly ordered his own incarceration, and was locked up, to the intense delight of the other inmates, to share their imprisonment.

A young midshipman was very near being the cause of putting the squadron in quarantine upon one occasion: the little fellow was sent in a boat, with ten or twelve men, to Marsamuscetto harbour, to deliver despatches to one of the Oriental packets, which, as usual, had called at Malta on her way from Alexandria to England; the steamer was surrounded by coal-lighters and other craft, and, instead of putting his packet upon the gunwale of one of these, whence it would have been handed into the ship, the thoughtless boy ran up her side, and gave his letters to one of the crew. An outcry was immediately raised by the host of guardianos surrounding the vessel, by which he saw the mistake he had made; however, he rushed back to his boat, and of course placed his crew in the same dilemma. At once, they rowed away manfully to reach the Grand Harbour and regain their ship (one of the line); then ensued a most animating chase on the part of the quarantine and police boats: but our little hero, after a long pull, being unfortunately headed off by one of the yellow pack, was compelled to row to the lazaretto, where, for twelve days, he and his men rusticated,—the lulling melody of the grinding holystones,§ and the four o'clock reveille, being unheard by them until exactly one day after the packet had landed her passengers in free pratique at Southampton.

Among the many lazarettoes of the Mediterranean, that of Malta is, with regard to comfort, interior economy, and the civility of its officials, immeasurably superior to any other; and as a slight peep into the menages of such an establishment may be a novelty to those who “live at home at ease,” I shall place my reader's eye at the little hole in the show-man's box, and let him judge for himself.

On the north-east side of the island of Malta are two deep indentations, which, cutting into the coast for a depth of nearly two miles, form, with the aid of their interior and land-locked creeks of Bighi, Burmola, the Coradino, Missida, and Pietà, two safe and spacious harbours; they are parallel to each other, and on the tongue of land, which like a high ridge separates them, and about half-a-mile across, is built the city of Valletta. The easternmost, or largest basin, is called the “Grand Harbour,” and that to the westward is named “Marsamuscetto,” and appropriated solely to vessels in quarantine. The entrance of the latter haven is very narrow, and has on the right, when sailing in, a small fortress called Fort Tigné, which displays a union jack upon the arrival or departure of a packet; on the left, the fortifications and lighthouse-tower of St. Elmo overhang deep caverns, worn by the billows of fierce grecales,* and which, in the storms of each revolving winter, rush into their slippery recesses, threatening with hoarse roarings further to undermine the lofty bulwarks, and topple them with their dark tiers of iron cannon into the blue Mediterranean.

* Smaitch, the universal appellation bestowed by the English upon the lower classes of the Maltese.

The lazaretto is situated on the south side of an island, about half-a-mile in length by a quarter in breadth, and which is on the westernmost shore of the harbour; it resembles, however, a peninsula more than an islet, as it is joined by a short causeway and bridge to the main; on its eastern end, which juts out into the harbour, and directly facing Valletta, is Fort Manoel, sometimes used as a lazaretto, but more frequently as a garrison. The various buildings which form the lazaretto extend, in a slightly curved line, from east to west, for about five hundred yards, and forming hollow squares behind the long and continuous front facing the harbour, the upper part of which front, or screen, is occupied by travellers; the ground floor, as well as the interiors of the buildings, being generally appropriated to merchandize; some, however, of the apartments looking into the courts are fitted up for detenus. The range to the front consists of ground-floor, and one story above, which is reached by flights of stone steps projecting from each house; a flagged promenade, or rather a kind of quay, about fourteen feet in width, lies between the lazaretto and the sea, and having at intervals doors across, which shut off the portion of walk opposite one division of the range from the other. When all occupying the buildings are undergoing the same length of quarantine, the doors are open until night, but when for different periods, they are usually kept closed. Passing through several of these doors, the western extremity of the lazaretto is gained; here the dwellings are very indifferent, and are situated further back from the water, having dirty courts full of puddle-holes before them;—these places are mere dens, swarming with vermin, and are the retreats of the Maltese coal-porters who have been coaling the packets in quarantine, and also of the hadgis, or pilgrims from Mecca, who, in hundreds at a time, perform their purification at Malta, so as to sail from the island in pratique to their homes in Bengasi, Tunis, or Morocco. More to the westward, and near the little causeway, is a large isolated building, with extensive courts and cells, intended as an hospital and lodgings for plague patients; however, it is very fortunately but seldom required. Between this establishment and the apartments of the hadgis is a steep scrambling space, occupied by the cemetery and farm-yard;—the former is small and crowded with tombs, many of the inscriptions telling of travellers who, bearing in their bosoms the seeds of Syrian fever, found a resting-place in this desolate and neglected little burying-ground—it being a singular circumstance that this malady, in the same manner as the fever of Java, often proves fatal in regions possessing dissimilar climates, and more than a thousand miles distant from its legitimate hunting grounds.

This spot has an uncared-for and dismal aspect—a rank description of tangled weed overruns it—the foot-path has fallen in, in many places, and, owing to the heavy rains of winter and the friableness of the soil, several of the tombs are deflected from the perpendicular, being nearly on their sides, and the headstones of graves, once upright, are nodding in all directions,—sad evidences of the lack of that care which, in happier England, is piously bestowed upon the mementos of those sleeping below, but not accorded in this darker land, now that the hands which had raised the tablets were busy in other and distant scenes, and none remained to bestow a passing care upon the mausoleums of all that was left after the quick-lime—the only shroud permitted to those who die in the lazaretto. Among the inscriptions is a tribute offered to the good qualities of a faithful servant, who had attended Sir Moses and Lady Montefiore during their Eastern travel; and many monuments of pretension, erected by the cheerfully-given dollars of our kind-hearted blue-jackets and marines, record, in terms of honest and unmistakable affection, the manly virtues of their mess-mates, some of whom had died of wounds received during the “war in Syria;” and others who, while more peacefully employed in securing to their country the “marbles of the Xanthus,” had inhaled the pestilential vapours of the fever-stricken coasts of Asia Minor.

Quietly walking out of the cemetery, we are piloted through the farm-yard by the good Mr. Borg, who is the “chief” of this part of the premises. It is divided into several large courts, surrounded by stables and sheds, the latter accommodating cattle landed from the Barbary states, and which, with geese from Egypt, perform their due portion of quarantine as well as the nobler animal—man; when, at last being quite purified, they find themselves devoted, in the regular course of things, to appease the cravings of the queen's good subjects of Valletta, both civil and military.

In the eastern part of the lazaretto the offices of the superintendent and other officials are situated; the parlatorio, or place for conversing with those suspected, and also the savoury regions of the cucinière, are at this end.

And now, having seen the outside of the building, we shall have a look at the harbour, and tell of the very strict regulations in force upon this small sheet of water.

Sentries are posted on the shores of Marsamuscetto in all directions where a landing may be effected; and their orders are to fire upon any persons breaking the laws by forcing their way on shore. All ships must hoist a yellow flag, and their boats, when moving on the harbour, have to do the same; but none are permitted to be about after sunset except those belonging to the quarantine establishment, or to whom a special permission has been given, and upon no account without a guardiano. Should a boat require to pass from the Grand Harbour to Marsamuscetto a pass has to be procured for her from the office of the captain of the port; this paper, upon entering the latter harbour, has to be exhibited to a soldier, who from Fort Tigné hails before allowing her to pass in. A man-of-war's boat, and having her colours flying, is exempt; but still, should she be bound to the lazaretto, or to speak a vessel in quarantine, she is obliged first to repair to Marsamuscetto steps and embark a guardiano. This ceremony, however, is unnecessary when boats are merely crossing from these steps, or have come from the Grand Harbour bound to Sliema, a bathing-place scattered along the coast, which lies between the harbour and the open sea: the western part rounds off into the Bay of St. Julian; and Point Dragut, crowned by Fort Tigné, forms the eastern end.

All merchant vessels, both steam and sailing, must perform quarantine in Marsamuscetto; steamers of war must do the same; sailing ships of war, however, ride out their term in the Great Harbour, the former being more difficult of access, owing to a reef projecting from Point Dragut, and which narrows the entrance materially. When ships have performed quarantine they are obliged to move round to the Grand Harbour.

The duration of quarantine is fluctuating, being from twenty-one days to twelve and less, and depends much upon the ship having clean or foul bills of health from her last port; some places, also, being deemed more likely to possess contagion than others, are less favoured by the Health-office regulations: one rule is certain, that a sailing merchant vessel has a longer period than a man-of-war or a steamer; but her passengers, by going into the lazaretto, have their quarantine curtailed. Should a steam vessel, however, have susceptible articles on board as cargo, she lands them at once, her days of probation not beginning to count until such goods are discharged; the day of arrival reckons as one, even should she anchor at dark, as long as the island has been seen by those on board before sunset. Once, when thirty-two miles distant, we made Malta like a little streak in the rays of the setting sun, and thereby gained that day as a counting one.

A few words now with regard to those human screws and bolts indispensable in maintaining the integrity of quarantine, and dubbed guardianos, may not be amiss. They are generally elderly men, dressed in a blue jacket, with yellow cuffs and collars, the remainder of the costume having no pretensions to uniform; one is attached to each traveller in the lazaretto, unless there be a small family party, and one is stationed on board each vessel riding in quarantine. Should a barge of coal be seen moving up the harbour, a guardiano is perched upon the grimy heap; or do you desire to have a moment's chat with some friend incarcerated on board an unlucky packet, which, with sickly looking drooping flag and awning'd decks, simmers away her probation under the walls of *Sa Maison or off the Pietà,† your old man of the sea, the guardiano, shares in the little confidences passing between your friend and yourself, as the boat is obliged to lie at a respectable distance from the gangway of the vessel, and barely within ear-shot, for, should a stray end of thread, or an errant morsel of paper (as in poor Janino's case), be wafted from the anchored hulk and alight upon your boat, all it contains are doomed to the same imprisonment as those from whom the mischievous little flutter had descended. Government charges 1s. 3d. per day, and 7d. a day additional (for food) for the compulsory attendance of the guardiano, amounting, in twelve days, to 1l. 2s.

I shall now give a sketch of the routine connected with my first day's quarantine, as I think it will embrace nearly all the ceremonies of the Sanità, and no doubt will be recognized by some of my Indian friends. Upon the occasion of having seen Malta at so great a distance, I was a traveller in one of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamers, employed in running once a month with the Bombay mails on that portion of the route embracing Alexandria and Malta, the latter being the vessel's head quarters; part of the homeward mails being despatched by a government steamer to Marsailles for overland transport to London, and the heavier division, together with the passengers and baggage, transferred to one of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's vessels which called at Malta on her way from Constantinople to Southampton; en parenthèse, an old naval lieutenant was on board in charge of the letter-boxes, and which he accompanied in the other vessel to England. When the captain, from the summit of the paddle-box, pointed out the little hummocky object which we hoped would that night afford a haven to our capacious ship, spinning towards it at a rate of eleven miles an hour, a very strong faith was necessary to controvert the idea that our foaming iron monster would run over it in the night, and send it rolling to weedy grottoes deep below—awakening, perhaps, the slumbering divinities of this once classic sea.

The night set in dark and calm; our little island disappeared; ten, backgammon, and "Mary Blane" thumped upon the ship's piano by the little doctor from the county Cork, for an hour wiled away the time; when we heard the cry of "Light on the port bow." We went thudding and rumbling on; and soon on the port quarter a lumpy indistinct object was seen, which, I was told, was the high, detached, and uninhabited rock of "Tifola;" while stretching before the beam, the loom of Malta is perceptible, our little islet having grown up wonderfully during the last two hours. Several orders were now passed along, such as "All hands ahoy, bring ship to an anchor!"—"Forecastle there! keep a good look-out for fishing boats." A blue light was then burned, lighting up, in its glare, decks, men, boats, and rigging, and giving a druggist's-window kind of tinge to all; its fitful blaze, flickering and dancing upon the white funnels, presenting a strong contrast to the impenetrable gloom of the watery world outside us. In a minute or so, the impish-looking figure which, with outstretched arm, held the light from the lee paddle-box, hurled it into the sea, where, conquered by the antagonistic element, it yielded its life in a crackling hiss, and left us in deeper darkness than before. This forms one great disadvantage in showing blue-lights from a steam vessel when going very fast, as the vision of the look-out men, before its recovery from the effect of the glare, is unable to penetrate the pitchy murkiness through which the ship is careering, and which may render the best look-out of no avail. A few minutes after our signal had been burned, we saw, nearly a-head, a little light bobbing up and down—the reply of the pilot's boat awaiting us; we now were crossing the mouth of the Grand Harbour, and running at an obtuse angle, with the rows of twinkling lights indicating the whereabouts of the lofty terraces and auberges* of Valletta. Some large objects well up the harbour puzzled us, by their appearing to consist of two and three streaks of light, broken by patches of darkness at uniform intervals; however, some tapering tracery emerging from amid the gloom of town and fortifications, served to explain the mystery,—they were the bristling broadsides of Sir William Parker's squadron. We soon had the lantern of St. Elmo throwing its gleams upon our decks, through the halo which appears to surround a light when near it, and the engines were stopped for the purpose of throwing a rope into the pilot-boat to tow her with, no other communication being permitted while in quarantine. The boat, secured to a rope from the paddle-box, was dragged along at a fearful rate, the prow raised on high, and plunging up floods of silver foam, which, rushing past to the wake, revealed, in its phosphorescent brightness, the stern nearly submerged in a furrow amid high-heaped water, and the grey-headed, bull-necked pilot Paolo standing erect, and guiding his craft with a firm hand, the crew crouching in the bottom to preserve an equilibrium, and showing their pendant Maltese caps alone above the gunwale.

We skirted close to the land on the left side, and when a little way in, a gun was fired as a signal of the arrival of the packet, and which, reverberating loud and long, startled not a little the fairer portion of our passengers, whose curiosity, natural as that of Eve, had at that late hour tempted them to brave the damp decks. Hardly had our cannon's smoke cleared away, ere links of rusty chain, bounding along the deck and leaping round the windlass, daashing fire from its iron whelps,* proclaimed the fact of the anchor being let go, and which jumped into its sludgy bed, at the upper part of the harbour, in a snug creek called the Pietà. The stern was secured within a few feet of the rocks, and at an easy speaking distance of the fashionable drive which, winding round the various indentations of Marsamuscetto, passes through Sliema, and is terminated by the Bay of St. Julian.

The captain of the port's boat now came alongside, and a printed paper, having blanks left to be filled in by the captain and surgeon, and containing replies to the printed interrogations of "The name of the vessel"—"The port she is last from"—"Whether she has had communication with any other ship while at sea," &c. &c., was put into a little square box, with a handle of four or five feet long, and something like a wooden warming-pan, were such a thing possible. The end of the handle was held by a person in the boat, and the box rested on the ladder of the steamer; the bill of health, the list of passengers, and other business papers were put in; the lid shut close by the persons in quarantine, and the boatmen with their Pandora's box rowed to the lazaretto, where, cautiously handled with a pair of tongs, the documents undergo a depuration prior to their perusal by those who fortunately boast of pratique.

Simultaneous with the visit of the Health-office boat, the active officers of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, the agent, and the marine superintendent, came alongside, the former politely handing up a supply of the latest "Guligniani's" and English newspapers, as a present to the passengers; he brought besides, to anxious expectants, letters much looked and longed for, and which, at the posto restante, awaited their arrival at Malta. One of the steamer's cutters was next lowered, and the iron boxes containing the mails for England, and intended to go through France, were passed into her, and, with the Admiralty agent, were landed at the lazaretto, where a Maltese post-office clerk took charge, and, having given a receipt, transferred them to one of the government steam-packets, which, in a few hours, started with them for Marseilles. The worthy lieutenant returned on board; a guardiano came off at the same time; the cutter was hoisted up; all hands went below; and, after a quiet cigar on the dew-moistened deck, I also turned in, a little anxious to see what sort of a place we should find ourselves in at daylight.

The earliest dawn saw me sur le pont, as the French think proper to call a deck, dispelling the damps and the damps with a cup of coffee and a cheroot, the modicum of sleep I had enjoyed since I laid my head down being certainly an infinitesimal one;—the transition to the quiet of a calm anchorage from the shaking and bumping of our vans while crossing from Suez to Cairo,—the grinding upon sand-banks when descending the Nile,—the jostling against loaded corn djermes on the Mahmoudiyeh canal, and from the pounding and trembling of the powerful engines of our certainly very lively steamer, was rather too sudden to admit of the system fully appreciating the comforts of the former: so I, till morning watched the glimmer of the night-lamp through the zinc ventilators over my door, and, while listening to uncouth music played by the nasal organ of the political agent of the Ladrone Islands, now and then heard a rattling in the sideboard drawers, as the old Irish stewardess, in a coiffe de nuit of many plaits, foraged for a spoon, to administer some pappy quietus or another to an ill-tempered Indian child, whose monotonous wailing certainly was no anodyne to those who courted repose. My first impression, upon looking around me, was to wonder how we got into our cosy little creek, and many were my speculations as to which was the entrance, so completely land-locked were we. Alongside of us was moored a French packet from the Levant, and close under the fortifications opposite, and about two hundred yards off, the Oriental Company's steamer also from the Levant, and bound to England, was quietly at an anchor, waiting to receive our passengers. The harbour was as smooth as glass, and, in the deep shadow caused by the lofty ramparts, looked most delightfully cool; a grey-coated sentry was slowly pacing within a few yards of the stern, and a little further on, the cap of another was discernible above a low rocky point; and shortly, the door of the little guard-house being opened, two or three drowsy-looking soldiers, in shirts and plaid trousers, lounged out and commenced their ablutions, which having completed they returned to the guard-house—shortly afterwards emerging to relieve their great-coated comrades, in all the pride of the plumes, kilts, and trows, of the gallant Forty-second. Later in the day, some amusement was caused by a gentleman of the Company's civil service, naively asking, "Were those soldiers the Malta Fencibles?"—a doubtful compliment, certainly, to the war-honoured Highlanders.

Acting upon the principle of "the early bird catching the worm," I decided upon finding my way to the lazaretto, as soon as an opportunity offered, to secure good quarters, were a selection possible, and also to avoid the "row" beginning in the cabins below, as the whole hive was now in the full buzz of preparation for flight; red-eyed bristly gentlemen, as loosely girded as Mr. Smangle, of Pickwickian fame, were insanely tumbling against "overland trunks," and tripping over carpet-bags, and shouting loudly for the particular stewards allotted to their sleeping cabins, quite drowning the falsettos more gently piped from beneath coiffures of muslin, both becoming and the reverse, which timidly peeped around sundry doors ajar, the fair visages enshrouded in them exhibiting a most perplexed expression. The half-checked chirp for "stewardess," the anxiety to get the particular "canvass-covered trunk" from the hold, "No. 28," and their fluttering courage, while looking after their peculiar little interests, struggling with their bashful fears, at being seen in so unbecoming a costume, meeting, sorry I am to say, with little sympathy from the bustling "lords of the creation,"—a husband in proper training may certainly be of some use at such a stirring time. On deck things were no better,—the wash-deck pump was going clank, clank; a big black-muzzled boatswain, or some such sea-monster, in enormous boots, was squirting from a canvass hose and copper pipe great jets of water over the sooty ship, while his troop of bare-footed sailors, wielding brooms and scrubbers, cleansed away the abominations springing from chimney-blacks and the slime of muddy hawsers.

Happy at my escape, I took my seat in a boat going to the lazaretto, and was much amused at the anxiety shown by the old guardiano, perched in the bow, to display a little yellow flag from a staff about the size of a walking-stick. On landing at the Sanità I was introduced, by the young officer in charge of the boat, to the accommodating and portly Signor Garcin, to whom is intrusted the allotment of quarters; and following the worthy functionary up one of those flights of steps spoken of before, was shown my apartments, consisting of a large room in front, and looking up the harbour towards the Pietà,—this, with the aid of a folding screen, answered for both bed and sitting room; two small chambers behind, but having no communication with the large apartment, completed the suite. The floors of the rooms, being composed of soft stone, are easily cut into by ambitious travellers desirous of presenting themselves to the notice of the various twelve-day generations who may succeed them. Most of this sculpture is in the classic style of that school seen to so much advantage on the seats and trees of places of public resort in England. The apartments, although very good, were excessively dirty, having that morning been vacated by some rather uncleanly foreigners, evidences of their national foibles being very perceptible; however, S. Garcin, setting a couple of men to work, soon had them thoroughly cleansed, and, when I returned in the afternoon they were as fresh and tidy as possible—the arrangements with regard to the hire of furniture being also managed by him in a very satisfactory manner. I then walked to that part of the lazaretto dedicated to the cuisine, to have an interview with the chef, who was a sleek gentleman, boasting of a very comely olive-complexioned countenance and dark roguish eyes; his well-oiled, curly locks were crowned by a most fashionable crape hat; and a well-made, loose, cut-away coat, of some thin black material, a silk waistcoat, black trowsers, and glossy boots of patent leather, adorned the outside man of this pink of traiteurs. The carte submitted to the traveller enables him to make his arrangements according to his finances or state of health, a fixed tariff being placed by the quarantine authorities upon everything supplied by the traiteur of Sanità; however, dinners or provisions can be furnished by any of the hotels of Valletta, but subjected to the great disadvantage of having to cross the harbour, and thereby being cooled before they reach the table. Each morning you write upon the traiteur's slate (slate being not susceptible) the order for your various meals, and which, when cooked, are placed upon a large wooden tray, and left at the foot of the steps leading to you/quarters; from thence the tray is taken, and your table spread by the valet; the debris, with the soiled equipage, are again brought down, and placed at the bottom of the steps, whence they are removed by the traiteur's men, who, as well as their master, are in pratique, and returning to their homes in Valletta at sunset, after which no cooking is permitted.

I forgot to mention, that upon first coming on deck in the morning, I noticed a boat full of rather well-dressed young men, lying off a few yards from the vessel, and who, upon seeing my attention directed to them, sprang up, and acted a kind of pantomime, each holding up to view some papers. I was told, on inquiry, that they were valets de place, showing their testimonials, with the hope of being hired by persons about to spend their quarantine in Malta. The moment we pushed off from the ship, they followed us to the Sanità offices, and all in a row presented themselves at the barrier of the parlatorio, each endeavouring to insinuate himself into our good graces. A tall gentleman, possessing much aplomb in his manner, named Roberto, was the one selected, and proved himself to be a good servant. I dispatched him to Valetta, prior to his losing his liberty, with a commission to Mr. Quintana, of Strada Stretta, for a supply of books from his well-stocked store; Mr. Q. is a great favourite, and his library is much frequented by the élite of the English residents.

Having thus made all my dispositions, I returned to the ship by breakfast time, and that meal being finished, accompanied several of the passengers, who were bound to the parlatorio of the lazaretto, to make purchases. Imagine an enormous flagged room on the ground floor, certainly more than a hundred feet long, broad and lofty in proportion, and having a barrier, breast high, running the whole length, and being about twelve feet from each side wall. The avenue up the right side of the building accommodated those in quarantine, while that on the left was filled by a shoal of shopkeepers, who displayed quantities of jewellery (that of Cretion of Strada Forni being the best), Maltese mittens, lace, kid gloves, and articles of warm clothing—the latter being often required by shivering Indians, when nearing the drizzly chops of the English channel. Guardianos occupied the intermediate broad space or aisle, and, armed with pairs of tongs, handed the articles to the purchasers. Some of the travellers were visited amid this hurly-burly by friends, who wished to have a glimpse of them even in this unsatisfactory way, and managed to keep up a conversation as privately as the wide intervening space, and the presence of so many others, would admit of. We all returned to the packet to an early dinner, after which, the party bound to England moved to the other vessel, which sailed that evening for Southampton, and I found myself installed in my now comfortable apartments at the lazaretto, about five o'clock.

I spent my twelve days in one unvaried routine; turned out at daybreak, and eat an orange or some other fruit, then walked up and down before the buildings for two or three hours, bathed, and went to breakfast by nine; after breakfast, amused myself by sketching the various objects which on the harbour presented themselves before my windows, until at last, the increasing heat and glare compelled me to close the jalousies; took up a book, and in the softened light, studied till three; dined, and, for an hour or so, indulged in some lighter reading, until the less powerful rays of the setting sun permitted me again to seek the little promenade before the lazaretto, where, upon each projecting landing-place, an object in the fanciful costume permitted by the license of travel was generally seated, trying to dispel ennui by rod and line, while catching very diminutive flat-fish—his guardiano, with a bowl of moistened bread, diligently patting up bait, which required frequent renewal, it being continually nibbled away by persevering little tittlebats, which, too small to take the hook, in thousands voraciously twitched off the lure intended for the larger prey. It was quite as they say in dear Erin, regular “bite and sup,” the angler generally varying the bite of a little fish by a sip from a tumbler of golden-coloured brandy and water, which relaxation, accompanied by a hookah or chibouk, served to cherish a species of amiability towards the tittlebats, despite their profitless nibblings. Having bought a rod and line, I fished as well as my neighbours until dark, then took a little turn up and down, and retired to bed about ten.

On Sunday morning I witnessed a distant mass, intended for the benefit of the votaries of the Roman-catholic religion, who were spending quarantine, both in the lazaretto, and on board the ships in the harbour. A bell began to tinkle, and the front of a species of small turret, or sentry box, projecting from one of the bastions of Valetta, opened, and with a spy-glass were distinguished an altar, images, and candles, with a white robed priest, moving and bending hither and thither as he performed the service. Simultaneously, with the first tinkle of the bell, all the guardianos, valets, and washerwomen, emerged from the lazaretto, so as to be in sight of the chapel, and fell upon their knees; the sailors of the Maltese, Austrian, and Italian vessels doing the same on deck, and, with book and rosary, seemed to be as cognizant of the manoeuvres in the little turret as if they had heard the voice of the good padre, he being certainly five hundred yards off, and at a great height above them on the opposite side of the harbour. This seemed to me but an unsatisfactory way of getting the "benefit of clergy," and merely as a pis aller for the more substantial comforts of the church.

My guardiano was very particular in seeing all my luggage opened, and the contents put in the sun to air; even a gun, which was soldered up in a tin box, had to see daylight, as well as every other article, no matter how trifling. The evening before my quarantine expired, the doctor attached to the Sanità office inspected me, and pronounced me "all right," my bills at the same time were handed to me and discharged, and the next morning at sunrise my guardiano wished me "Good pratique, sar," and I was free. An hour afterwards found me curiously gazing upon the queer looking people one sees in the streets of Valletta, from a window of Mrs. Dunsford's hotel, in Strada Roale. My expenses in the lazzaretto were for the guardiano 1*l.* 2*s.*; hire of furniture, about 2*l.*; and wages of servant, with the waiter's bill, about 6*l.*; thus nine pounds, together with twelve days, were immolated to the Moloch of Quarantine, an abuse which, having teased the travelling world in the East for the last three hundred and sixty-five years, should no longer be permitted to remain as a blot upon the institutions of any nation pretending to be removed even one step beyond barbarism.

THE SCHOOLMASTER OF THE CATACOMBS.

BY THE REV. PHILIP B. POWER, M.A.

I.

ABOUT three miles from a great city of modern times the ground rises gradually; until you come to a shaded lane, each side of which is bounded by tall fir-trees, with here and there a sturdy oak. The hedges are full of wild roses, that are tangled together, and when a shower has fallen upon them, the bright rain-drops hang pendant from their thorns, or glisten upon their delicate leaves, as we sometimes see the maiden's tear, when it seems as though it would cool the first blush of love stealing over her virgin cheek.

But why talk of love? for love is joy; and there was one in that shaded lane who hated love, and life, and joy,—who could see no beauty in wild roses, and who could learn nothing from the rain-drops on their leaves.

If you had been in the lane, or behind the trees, you could have heard Sir Aubrey talking aloud, for he was in that mood in which men do not care whether the impatience and discontent of their minds be seen or not.

"Fir-trees!" said he, as he strode along, "fir-trees flourish best in cold and inhospitable climes; they did right in planting them here near this cemetery, where one's very heart is frozen with the monuments of death around. And oaks, too! it seems as though they would mock the short lives of men; for these oaks shall be green and gay, and sing in the summer's winds, and defy the winter's storms, long after those who planted them have gone and rotted in the ground, and have been forgotten, even by the unthankful wretches who lived upon them while they were alive, and have inherited all that they had when they were dead. And here are wild roses, too! dog-roses! who planted these? what good are they? well, perhaps they are as good as the rest; it might be that God himself planted them, but the rain has scattered their leaves, and they are full of thorns; they are all of a piece—and firs, and oaks, and roses, and my miserable self, are cursed all alike."

II.

An hour before Sir Aubrey walked down the lane, a young maiden had been rolled through it in a chair, in which she reclined, propped up with pillows on either side. She was of noble blood, for there was a coronet on the tiny panels of the chair, and the servant that drew it wore the livery of an earl; but you could have seen no signs of rank on the dress of the pale girl, who seemed as though rank and wealth would soon have no concern with her.

"Look, Aileen," said she to her nurse, "how green these fir-trees are! I suppose they were planted here to teach us that some things can survive the winter's storms, and be beautiful when all seems dead around. And there is an oak! perhaps some good man put it there, to teach whoever passes by, that what has a deep root shall outlive the wild blasting winds, and last when age has worn out every thing beside. But stoop down, Aileen, for I cannot speak very loud. There is the rose—the wild rose—God's own flower, and it has the rain-drops on its thorns and in its cups; look at their colours, Aileen, they are brighter than the diamonds in papa's jewelled star. I am very happy, Aileen; I think God sent them this morning, all hanging at the ends of the thorns, to teach me what I shall have, Aileen, at the end of this."

"Whisht, my lady, whisht," said the old nurse, "ye're young and rich, and may-be ye'll be wearing a coronet some day yer'self, and the jewels at the top of the spikes, just like the earl's—or may-be the young marquis will be asking for you—or may-be——" And perhaps Aileen might not have stopped short of royalty itself, but that she saw her mistress's hands had dropped over the sides of the chair, and that she was entirely unconscious of any thing that had been said.

III.

The nurse knew that it was in vain for her to address herself to her mistress any more, so she muttered her opinions to herself, only looking now and then to her charge, to see if she were still asleep. "An faith," said she, "but it was a mighty shame that the earl was so proud that he turned Masther Henry from his door like a dog, and tould him to show his face in Sheskin Park no more. Belike the day will come when he'll be sorry for his black looks and ugly words, and his heart 'll be broken like the corn in the mill, and he can never coax the sun to shine upon him agin. An faith, Mister Earl, but it's asier to break hearts than it is to mend them, and where 'll ye be when ye'r own Miss Mary is under the sod? The sun 'll shine on her grave that 'll never shine on ye'r sowl, and 'tis Aileen O'Connor I'd rather be myself this blessed day, than yer'self, with Sheskin, and the mountains, and all ye have. And why should n't Masther Henry have ye'r daughter? where did ye ever see the likes of him at court, or dance, or parlamin't, or wake, or fair? isn't his stock as owld as the round tower of Ardmore? and for the look of him, ye might drink the light out of his eyes, as the children do the wather out of the holy well; don't the heavens above wondher how they stole the colour out of it? and sorra a rose in ye'r own great garden that was as red as his cheek before ye made it white like the little lily's cups. May-be ye don't know, Mister Earl, that I nursed him, and that now I'm nursin Miss Mary for his sake; for never a day would I stay in the castle if she warn't to the fore to keep away the curse. Och, murder! and to think of his pride, that no one but a noble should touch the hand of his daughter, when God lets the poorest pull the roses and lilies, and touch the treasures He has made." And amid these soliloquies the chair passed out of the lane, and the invalid was soon at home.

IV.

Sir Aubrey's quick stride soon brought him to the gates of the cemetery, into which he entered, out of humour with the world, with religion, and himself. For a while he paced the broad gravel walks, as though, by dint of exercise, he would cast out the fever that was consuming him; and then he would stop, and clench his hands, and bite his lips, until the blood almost spirted from them. He was like the maniac who had his dwelling among the tombs; he alone seemed disturbed when all around was peace.

At last he saw a figure kneeling beside a grave that was dressed with flowers; there were two chaplets upon it—one was large, and the other was very small; the larger was composed of blossoms, the smaller of very little buds. The man that knelt was young, and he was so absorbed in his prayer that he did not see that he was watched. It was very strange, whenever he came to pray at that grave he saw two white clouds in the bright sky above his head—one cloud was large, and the other small; he could see many single white clouds over different parts of the cemetery, but over his part alone could he see two; they seemed to him, as they were lit up by the sunbeams, to be like the spirits of the departed, freed from the burden of the flesh, and looking down with joy upon the mourner's love,—such love as outlived the shock of death,—yes, lived with them in the true atmosphere of love—the other life.

At last Sir Aubrey shook the rose-bush behind which he stood, and the mourner saw him and turned round. He was not angry, but looked like Moses when he came down from the Mount,—his face appearing as though it shone. Sir Aubrey wished that he had frowned at him, for he hated all, and desired to be hated himself.

"Good day, sir," said the stranger.

"Good?" replied the other, "to whom? and why?"

The mourner was surprised, for he saw that his companion's eye had a wild and restless look. At last he recovered himself, and said,

"It is a good day, sir; it is good to me, for I have been communing with the dead, and have outrun the world hither, and been at peace; it will be good to you, if you can do the same."

The stranger passed on, and Sir Aubrey turned to read the head-stone of the grave; there was on it—

"Sarah St. O * * * died * * * * * aged 20 years.

Sarah St. O * * * * died the same day, aged 2 years."

"Ha!" said Sir Aubrey, "there is room for one more upon the stone; I suppose the fool has left it for himself."

Thus the baronet spent the day; funerals came, and from the distance he could hear the hum of the great city; he thought the sound was like that of a battle, and that these were the wounded or the dead carried off the field. But at length the evening came, and at six o'clock the gates were to be shut. The hour struck—the great bell of the cemetery rang—but Sir Aubrey did not stir; he intended to sleep, if he slept at all, among the dead.

V.

The night closed in over the burying-ground with its many dead,—the Lady Mary was sleeping, watched over by her nurse,—the mourner of the morning was in a lonely room, preparing his humble portion by himself; three portions he prepared, and set them upon the table; he placed a great arm-chair opposite his own, and a small chair by its side; he put plates opposite them—he put food on them; then he sat down, and when his meal was ended, he sent the two portions which were untasted to the poor.

VI.

But fine weather does not last for ever, and as the sun was setting the wind arose; small black clouds were driven on before it, and sped along like a pack of hungry wolves rushing after their prey. At last the whole heaven became overcast, the lightning flashed, the thunder rolled, and torrents of rain swept through the avenues, and pierced the trees beneath which Sir Aubrey had hoped to find shelter for a while. At length, when it became evident that it must continue thus for a considerable time, at least, he sought shelter in the doorway of the catacombs, where he had seen a funeral in the course of the day; he leant against the door, and it yielded to his weight, for the attendants had forgotten to turn the key and to bolt it fast. But shelter was all that this place could be said to afford; it was cheerless, and dark, and cold, and the wind whistled through its dreary passages with a mournful sound.

The wind is full of mystery, and has many voices, according to the places and circumstances in which we are. To Sir Aubrey it seemed as though a thousand evil spirits were hurrying along,—as though there was something to come which was very awful, but which he could not understand. Others, also, heard the wind that stormy night. The Lady Mary fancied in her dreams: at one time she thought her lover's voice was whispering in her ears; then she heard music from what she told Aileen was "her home." And the mourner, as he lay awake, and heard it whistling in the doors and chimneys, and moaning through the deserted street, thought that there were voices singing a requiem for those he loved.

The wind is full of inspiration: in the summer it seems as though it were an invisible being, waving the flowers to and fro, drawing out their perfume—God's messenger tithing the invisible fruit for him; it calls up strange memories of things long past,—we hear a voice, and start—but it was "only the wind!"

To-night the hurricane was busy with the subtle inspirations of thought: it swept through the catacombs, and it filled Sir Aubrey's heart with a consciousness of his immortality; it lulled the Lady Mary with the sweet foretastes of paradise; it consoled the mourner by giving him some companionship in his woe; it rushed in through a poor painter's ill-stopped windows, and gave him a conception that made him paint a picture which was the foundation of his fortune; it struck the chord in a poor poet's mind, and he left his scanty morsel to perpetuate a thought that won him deathless fame; and a priest, closeted amid his books, caught from it a thought of the judgment, which, on the morrow, he clothed with fiery eloquence, and, by God's grace, thus saved a soul!

There was a stone seat at the side of the catacombs, and on it Sir Aubrey sat, exhausted for want of food, and numbed with wet and cold; he would have gladly left his resting-place, if he could; but the storm still raged, and the catacombs were the only place where he could stay.

"It is strange," said he, half aloud; "one would have thought that there was some kind of wisdom in the government of this world of ours; one feels as though there ought to be some ruler of it, but I have been robbed of house and home, and I am a titled beggar, where, a few months ago, I was rich and loved, and a great man—yes!" cried he, with a peal of unnatural laughter, "a great man!" until the sides of the long passages rang again, and he heard the words echoed a long way off. "Ha! ha!" he cried, "they'll hear that I have been sleeping in the catacombs, and then they'll say, 'Sir Aubrey is a man of fertile wits; when we cast him out from the living he takes up with the dead,'—with old Death himself, if he likes,—and then I'll be in the company of the one they hate the most."

"There is no one allowed to laugh here," said an old man, touching him from behind; these are catacombs, and the dead are lying all around. The mourners laugh in their handkerchiefs as they parade the street, but they never smile when they chance to come in here. It is not allowed, sir," said the old man; "and when an heir laughed a few days ago, as they pushed his uncle's coffin into yonder niche, he sealed his own death-warrant,—he was buried here to-day."

The baronet would have given much to have asked who the intruder was, but he felt afraid to know. He stood still, and the old man, who plainly read his thoughts, said, "I am the guardian of these coffins—I am come to count that they are all right, for to-night we make up the muster-roll, and I must know the number exactly; but you disturb me—I cannot count the dead while the living are so near."

While this was being said, strange surmises came over Sir Aubrey's mind; he had not heard the stranger's footstep in coming near him, nor was his voice like that of any one that he had heard before; and he said "we make up the muster-roll"—what could he mean?

At last he made up his mind to ask, for any thing was better than the uncertainty he felt; so, with a subdued tone, he said, "Perhaps my unknown friend will tell me who he means by 'we'?"

"I am not your friend," said the old man, sharply; "keep your hypocritical words for the world; you are now among the dead, and I tell you I am not 'your friend'; I never saw you nor spoke to you until now!"

"Well, then," said the baronet, "good sir—" "Must I correct you again?" said the old man, in a solemn voice. "I tell you, once more, there are no compliments among the dead; keep your titles of courtesy and rank for such as have running blood; when it curdles and dries up they are wanted no more."

"Then tell me," said the baronet, leaving out every prefix which had offended the stranger so much; "who do you mean by 'we'?"

"We," said the old man, "means DEATH; this is the house of DEATH, and I am a part of DEATH."

VIII.

Sir Aubrey's heart, stout as it was, failed him at this unexpected meeting with one of whom he had spoken so lightly but a little while before, and his terror was increased as the old man proceeded, in his hollow and sepulchral tone.

"You will not leave this place," said he, "or rather, you cannot do it; your legs are stiff with cold, and the damp has curdled your blood; you shall die, then, while I am accomplishing my task, and to leave for a while the living, whom you seem so much to hate, might make you return to them a wiser and a better man."

Then the old man passed his hands over Sir Aubrey's cheeks, and they became colourless; his eyes were closed and hard, his nose became sharp and pinched, his lips grew pale and tight; and when he had touched him all over, he laid him out upon the stone seat; then he counted all the coffins, and when he had done, he retreated into some inner recesses of the catacombs,—and the only thing that moved was a shred of velvet on the corner of an old coffin, which the wind flapped to and fro as it swept through the catacombs, becoming colder as it passed over Sir Aubrey's icy face.

IX.

But the baronet was not dead, as men speak of death. Death is unembodied life; and Sir Aubrey now heard and saw as he had never done before. He was in a large chamber with coffins all around—it was large enough to hold hundreds, and it appeared to be lined quite round, so that not a single niche was without its proper occupant. But there was no one in the vault—there were only the bodies lying in their coffins; the wind was howling in through the iron gate, and he thought that it was louder and seemed more awful than before. At length there came a terrible gust—the grated door flew open, and, attended by a great crowd, a fleshless figure, with an earthen crown upon his head, moved into the vault. They all seemed borne in upon the wind-gust, as though it were their chariot, for it ceased when the last figure passed the gate. Then Sir Aubrey saw how Death holds his court.

X.

There was a high seat in the catacombs, and Death—the fleshless figure with the earthen crown—sat down upon it. But this was not the highest seat; there was one higher still, but he dared not sit on that, for it was claimed by one who was ruler over Death himself. They say that Death comes in many shapes to man, and there were many figures there. There was an old man, whose hair was white, and who leaned upon a stick; the stick had a heavy iron ferrule, worn very much, and it had on the top an iron crook. Next to him, there was a young man, hot and angry looking; his eyes were bright, and he seemed restless, as though he would depart, but dared not stir. Then came a maiden, whose cheeks were covered with a damask blush, whose eyes were bright like the evening star, whose gentle tread could scarce be heard, and whose soft touch could scarce be felt. A gloomy-looking man sat next to her; he was rude in his speech, and wore a knife and pistol in his belt, and a thin rope about his neck. Then came a strong, tall woman, dressed in black, and a youth with a silver cup in his hand; and a thousand more, with looks and dresses all varying, yet Sir Aubrey felt that their mission was alike.

XI.

The first voice heard was that of the monarch, as he rose from his throne: "Our trusty friends," said he, "our cousins, yea, our very selves, all know upon what terms we hold our sway; we pay homage as is our wont;"—and then he laid his earthen crown upon the step of the seat upraised above him. All now was silent in the hall, and a hand was put forth, which crowned the king with his diadem of clay again. "And now that we have owned the highest lord, we would hear the numbering of the dead, as touching what we have gained since last we met within these walls."

Then the king beckoned Sir Aubrey to his side, and said, "Thou art my guest to-night; it is thy soul's last chance; be taught by the numbering of the dead."

XII.

The first that stood up was the old man whose hair was so white, and who leaned so heavily upon his staff. Slowly and carefully he unfolded a parchment roll, and, having read from it some fifty names, addressed the monarch in a feeble voice.

"Thy servant," said he "hath done but little; much more would he have done, if more had been put within his power; he hath brought fifty under thy dominion, and he hath inscribed upon this roll the names of fifty more. Alas! my lord," said he, "thy servant hath but the gleanings of many reapers,—a few scattered stalks which other hands have left after they have passed through the fields,—what can be expected from thy servant, when some here present cut down the stalks while they are yet green? Fifty hath thy servant brought," continued the old man, "and he hath conquered where all else have failed; for some of these stalks are gashed with other sickles, which they withstood, but at last thy servant cut them down; it is, at least, something, that he hath succeeded where all others have failed."

"Are there any notable persons," said the monarch, "amongst those whom thou hast subjected to our sway?"

"Notable persons there are, O king!" replied the grey-haired old man, reading out some of the names inscribed upon the parchment roll. "There is Crusos, whom I tore away from a golden pillar to which he clung; and Senex, who was held so fast by his children's children, that I thought at one time I must have left him, for I had no power over the young; long, indeed, might he have withstood me, had it not been for Poretos, who drew away the children,—and then thy servant was enabled to accomplish his design."

"My servants' work is seldom light," responded the king; "and that which seems the easiest to accomplish is often toilsome and very hard."

"It is true, O king," said the old man; "and for many a year have I carried on my labours on these two, whose names have just been read. It was marvellous to see Crusos sitting day by day amid his gold, and sleeping on it at night; and, though I never left him, he never thought that he should die."

"And how was he brought hither at the last?"

"The price of bread rose a trifling coin, and he grudged the loss. For three days he waited for the markets to fall again, and lived on the crumbs which were in his bag; then I had him at a vantage; and, as on the fourth morning he held a coin in his hand and kissed it, before he parted from his store, I found that he was within my grasp, and I stole the light out of his eyes even while they were fixed upon the coin...."

"So please you," interrupted Poretos, "but the work was slowly done."

"It was slowly done," replied the king,

"but it was done surely. But how was it with Senex?"

"Senex!" replied the old man, "was at one time easy to be overcome, even before he came to my lot; he waited for me as though I were a friend; so calm and even was he in his spirit, that when Purotos ran upon him, and endeavoured to supplant me, he could have him at no advantage. He often thought that it would be sweet to leave the world, when I called: he said that it was the sunset of a fitful day; it was the fruit-gathering of a laden tree; it was peace, and sleep, and rest! Yes!" continued the old man, "but he was like the evening sky, which at times is lit up with a second brightness, before it shrouds itself in night: he was like the tree that throws out a second blossom after the fruit has been gathered in; his children had children born to them, and then he became young again, and he thought of me no more. He might not have been in the roll to-day, O king, had it not been that Purotos killed the children, and then I brought away the old man from life. He fell into my arms. The storm that uprooted the little sprouts around the stem also shed the autumn blossoms upon them, and we gained them all at once."

Then the king said, "I will take the roll;" and the old man, with a low obeisance, laid it by his side.

"We will next hear," said the monarch, "what Purotos hath done;" and as quick as thought the young man started to his feet. His hands were dry and burning, and he held nervously in them a roll, much larger than the old man's.

"May it please the king," said the speaker, "there are a thousand names upon this list. I have been driven from the palace, and from the houses of the nobles, but I have found a home where nothing interferes with my daily work. Thrice have I essayed to do something at the court; but, at the mere mention of my name, every precaution was taken that I might be foiled. They knew my mortal enemies, and they called them in to drive me forth. I could not grapple with the light which oppressed me, and the air which chilled me, and the water which deluged every foot-print that I made within its walls; then I retired to where the menials lodged, but even thence I was driven, without having gained one name upon this roll; until, in despair, I took up my home amongst the poor, and from thence I gathered almost all that I have brought. Some names there are of those who have been maddened by speculation; and there are three priests who have perished amongst the sick; but all the rest are from the poor."

"Thou hast done too much," interrupted the king; "an alarm will be raised, and thou wilt be driven forth ere long."

"Pardon, my lord!" said the young man. "Thou wilt see that all the names are of the poor, and where the poor dwell I am always safe."

"Thou art not safe," said the king, "if the poor dwell near the rich; for, if the stricken poor be near the rich, then the rich, for their own sake, will drive thee from the poor."

"But herein is my stronghold," replied the young man, "that I am dwelling in alleys and in courts, where no rich men come; the water is measured out, and the light has no entrance; and all that I require is fitted to my hand. If my lord wants proof of my being safe, let it suffice that there are weeks in which I slay the father and the mother, with the children, and no one hears or heeds what I have done. They will not disturb me," said he, with energy, "for, of the thousand upon this roll, five hundred died without a drop of water to quench their burning thirst. I heard them often ask that they might be supplied, but they were answered that their houses had not paid; and then I knew that I was safe."

"Let me see the roll," said the king; and he outstretched his hand, and took it from the young man's burning grasp.

"Who are these? Here are the names of Industria, of Miseria, and Sacerdos. Where are their coffins; are they around us in the hall?"

"They are not," said Purotos; "they are in the portion of the cemetery allotted to the poor."

"Is not Sacerdos here?" said the king.

"Nay," said Purotos; "he had given away all that he possessed; he had not a coin in his possession when he died; and, as no one knew him save the poor, who were unable to help, he was buried amongst those for whom he lived, and no one could tell his grave from theirs."

"We will hear," said the king, "of thy success with these three names."

"Industria," said Purotos quickly, "was the mother of three children. She wrought from morning to night, and almost from night to morning. She had once been rich, but her husband died, and then she had to work for their support. They were a long time before they came within my domain; but, like the moth, when he is doomed for the flame, they came nearer every day. As they lost all their goods, they had to change from house to house, and each was more wretched than the one before, until at last they were lost to the sight of all who knew them: they were absorbed, as some said, in the great city, but I knew they were engulfed; they were obliged to come to where I was busiest at the time, and I slew them with the rest. And yet she died bravely, too," said Purotos; "she wrought to the very last. Her work was coarse and rough, such as they generally give to men; but she died with the needle in her hand. A neighbour found her sitting in the corner of the cellar where she slept, who drew down the lids over her parched and staring eye-balls, and covered the body with the work she found in its hands. She was an easy prey," said the young man, "for her day's earnings could not buy a small loaf for her children, and, as she tasted but little food, she was very weak. There was great gain, however, in her death, though she was so poor; for, two days after she died, the master for whom she laboured, not having received his work, came to her room to charge her with a theft; and having taken it away from the corpse, I hid myself in the folds, and he died in a week."

"It was well done," said the king. "Let us now hear how Sacerdos died?"

"Sacerdos died, as it were, full of life: he seemed to mock me," said Purotos; "he was so calm and tranquil at the end. I tried to dash his arms about, as I have done to stronger men, but I could not stir them: so fast were his hands joined together in prayer, that no power could sever them, and thus he died."

Then the young man handed the king the roll, and he joined it on to the one he had received before.

"We will now hear Consumptia," said the king; "our fair cousin is generally as diligent as the rest.

At this word the fair girl arose, and read from her roll a multitude of names. There were some titled, and some seemed as though they also belonged to the very poor; for Consumptia was so gentle, that she had access to all.

"I have done much, yet I have done gently," said the sweet-toned voice. "I have bound up some broken hearts with a touch insensible; some who have been worsted in life's battle I have led from the field with a hand invisible: I have not killed, but I have persuaded men to die; and so softly have I whispered to them, that, bending over them, my cheek has rested upon theirs, and I have coloured it with my own bright blush. I have gazed upon them until their eyes have reflected back so bright a lustre, that none would believe the sick ones were about to die. I love not rude and uncourtous words," said the maiden, "and such have never passed my lips. I have wooed and won. I have filled the heart with hope, while I dried its springs of life; I have floated fairy visions across the eye, even while I stole its light. Men have passed with me from the world as the stars steal silently away before the dawn: while there was a promise of more light, they faded to be seen no more. I have been very patient," said the maiden. "I have sat with the lawyer as he pored over his books; I have stood beside the priest as he preached to the living, and as he buried the dead; I have waited for the mother until she had nursed her babe; and as gently and as gloriously as autumn falls upon the forest tree and lowly shrub, have I laid my hand upon the rich and poor. I have done," said she, "by the peasant in his cot as I have done by the peer in his marble hall; I have lent hope and beauty to them all—I have wooed and won them all."

The grey-haired old man smiled, for he loved Consumptia; she was so gentle, like himself; and the king took her roll, and added it to the rest.

Then followed the gloomy-looking man, who told horrible deeds of suicide and murder; and the strong, tall woman, dressed in black, who read a list of such as had died of Malice or Revenge; and the youth with the silver cup, which he handed to the king as his instrument of death.

All then read the contents of their long rolls, and the king took them, that they might be safely stored up until he held his court again.

XIII.

While the attendants at Death's court gave in their rolls, and told the particulars of their achievements, the mind of the baronet was attentively fixed on each. He was now awed and softened, though, as yet, he was not convinced. He had seen that there was so much misery in the world, that his own was nothing when compared with it; but how a merciful and good spirit could preside over an earth with so much wretchedness in it he could not understand.

But the lesson so well begun was not to be left unfinished. When all these rolls were added together, the king turned to Sir Aubrey, and said:—"There is wisdom in mortality; there is goodness even in death." Then he bade one of the company, whose name was Tempus, read from the roll of his prophecies concerning all the cases on which the old man, Purotos, and Consumptia had dwelt, that the baronet might learn from death a lesson concerning life.

Tempus, who had wings upon his shoulders and his feet, and a measuring line in his hand, drew from his girdle a roll, which was written with ink so pale, that no mortal eye could have deciphered its contents.

"What saith it of Crusos?" said the king.

"Had Crusos lived but one week more, tempted by the high price of bread, he would have purchased up all the corn in the city; and so fast would he have held it, that thousands must have perished for want of food."

"What saith it of Sonex and of the three children?"

"Had the children lived, the old man would have never been content to die: he would have been wedded to the earth, and have lost his soul."

"What is written concerning Industria?"

"Had Industria remained in affluence, there were two demons commissioned to slay her soul with haughtiness and pride; but, under the guidance of a maiden called Paupertas, who was sent to draw her from their reach, she has escaped, and Purotos has finished the kindly work."

"Sacerdos also died young! What is written of the priest?"

"Had Sacerdos lived, the fame of his doings amongst the poor would have reached the ears of the high ones of the land, and being bent upon rewarding merit, they would have preferred him to a post of honour and of wealth; then Sacerdos must have fallen from his simplicity and charity, and only through a long course of trial and of chastisement, far more bitter than any death, could he have been restored again."

"Thou hearest," said the king, as he turned to Sir Aubrey, "that all that we have done hath been both just and good. Go back to life, and live for death."

Then the king received from the hand that had crowned him a roll, on which were inscribed the names of such as were to die before they all met there again, and portioning out the names amongst his court, he dismissed them to carry out their work.

XIV.

Long while might Sir Aubrey have remained in the catacombs, had not a loud knocking been now heard at the gates. Violently were they shaken to and fro, and in strode a man whose tall figure was bent as though he had been very aged, and whose hair was white, as though it had been silvered with the snows of many years. His name was Sapiens; and although so young, he had read and studied more than many of the wise men of the city, and had been a philosopher of no small renown. Only a year before, he had been an oracle of wisdom; now his intellect was shattered, the home of thought was desolated, and its tenant had for ever fled. The pockets of the stranger were filled with many small articles of clothing, such as would be used by a little girl of three or four years old, and he held some broken toys most carefully in his hands. Amongst them was a ball of many colours, which had apparently been unused as yet.

"Give me back my child, O Death!" said he; "I never gave thee leave to keep her here so long. Have I not written much in thy praise; then why requite me by stealing my only joy?"

Then he listened, but no one answered; and he cried out again and again, until the heavy velvet on the coffins seemed to absorb the sounds, and they loomed back heavily upon his heart, like the beatings of a muffled drum.

At last he grew weary of his exertions, and sat down opposite the coffin of a child. It was that which held the form of the one he had loved so well. When he had seated himself, he drew from his pockets all his store, and spread them out upon the ground. First, he settled them in one way, and then he changed them to another, until he had made them as attractive as he could; then he stole gently to the coffin, and put his mouth close to it, and whispered in a low, sweet voice, "Amie! we will have no books to-day, but it shall be all sport until the evening comes. Come, Amie, come; for here are Amie's clothes, and Amie's little toys."

He listened for a while, as though he expected to receive an answer, and then returned to his seat, and took up a little toy: it was the figure of a woman, whose dress was bedizened with much tawdry gold, but which had once seemed very fine. He spent a few minutes arranging its ruffled dress and burnishing the dimmed lace upon its cloak, and then rose from his seat, and said, "Come, Amie; here is your favourite! the maid of honour to the queen! Come and play with her again!" Then he took the figure's arms, and made its wooden hands beat upon the coffin-lid. "Here, Amie, she is alive; she is trying to wake you; come and play again." Then he listened as he had done before, but there was no answer.

It was in vain that he tried every art: he rolled the coloured ball into the dark recesses of the vault, and back again, and called and called, but no one stirred. At last he gathered all the toys and clothes, and put them up, saying, "Amie is not yet awake; the doctor said that her sleep would be very long."

But Sapiens had been missed, and he had been traced to the catacombs; and now his attendants came to take him home; and there they found Sir Aubrey cold and stiff.

They thought that he was dead, for the cold of the vaults had stiffened his damp clothes, and he was so numbed, that at first he gave no signs of life. With care, however, the keeper of the cemetery succeeded in restoring him; and having explained how he happened to have been there, he was allowed to return to the crowded city—to the small lodging where he lived.

But Sir Aubrey was a changed man; for years he lived in obscurity, spending the remnant of his fortune, and his energies and time, in softening the hardships of the poor, and in reconciling them to their lot; and when the relation that robbed him of his estate was dead, and it was found that the baronet had been left his heir, the only change that it made to Sir Aubrey was one of place: he carried out on his own broad domains, until he died, the lessons which he had learned from "The Schoolmaster of the Catacombs!"

THE MYSTERIES OF A FLOWER.

BY PROFESSOR R. HUNT.

FLOWERS have been called the stars of the earth; and certainly, when we examine those beautiful creations, and discover them, analyzing the sunbeam, and sending back to the eye the full luxury of coloured light, we must confess there is more real appropriateness in the term than even the poet who conceived the delicate thought imagined. Lavoisier beautifully said—"The fable of Prometheus is but the outshadowing of a philosophic truth—where there is light there is organization and life; where light cannot penetrate, Death for ever holds his silent court." The flowers, and, indeed, those far inferior forms of organic vegetable life which never flower, are direct dependencies on the solar rays. Through every stage of existence they are excited by those subtle agencies which are gathered together in the sunbeam; and to these influences we may trace all that beauty of development which prevails throughout the vegetable world. How few there are, of even those refined minds to whom flowers are more than a symmetric arrangement of petals harmoniously coloured, who think of the secret agencies for ever exciting the life which is within their cells, to produce the organized structure—who reflect on the deep, yet divine philosophy, which may be read in every leaf:—those tongues in trees, which tell us of Eternal goodness and order.

The hurry of the present age is not well suited to the contemplative mind; yet, with all, there must be hours in which to fall back into the repose of quiet thought becomes a luxury. The nervous system is strung to endure only a given amount of excitement; if its vibrations are quickened beyond this measure, the delicate harp-strings are broken, or they undulate in throbs. To every one the contemplation of natural phenomena will be found to induce that repose which gives vigour to the mind,—as sleep restores the energies of a toil-exhausted body. And to show the advantages of such a study, and the interesting lessons which are to be learned in the fields of nature, is the purpose of the present essay.

The flower is regarded as the full development of vegetable growth; and the consideration of its mysteries naturally involves a careful examination of the life of a plant, from the seed placed in the soil to its full maturity, whether it be as herb or tree.

For the perfect understanding of the physical conditions under which vegetable life is carried on, it is necessary to appreciate, in its fulness, the value of the term growth. It has been said that stones grow,—that the formation of crystals was an analogous process to the formation of a leaf; and this impression has appeared to be somewhat confirmed, by witnessing the variety of arborescent forms into which solidifying waters pass, when the external cold spreads it as ice over our window-panes. This is, however, a great error; stones do not grow—there is no analogy even between the formation of a crystal and the growth of a leaf. All inorganic masses increase in size only by the accretion of particles—layer upon layer, without any chemical change taking place as an essentiality. The sun may shine for ages upon a stone without quickening it into life, changing its constitution, or adding to its mass. Organic matter consists of arrangements of cells or sacs, and the increase in size is due to the absorption of gaseous matter, through the fine tissue of which they are composed. The gas—a compound of carbon and oxygen—is decomposed by the excitement induced by light; and the solid matter thus obtained is employed in building a new cell—or producing actual growth, a true function of life, in all the processes of which matter is constantly undergoing chemical change.

The simplest developments of vegetable life are the formation of confervæ upon water, and of lichens upon the surface of the rock. In chemical constitution, these present no very remarkable differences from the cultivated flower which adorns our garden, or the tree which has risen in its pride amidst the changing seasons of many centuries. Each alike have derived their solid constituents from the atmosphere, and the chemical changes in all are equally dependant upon the powers which have their mysterious origin in the great centre of our planetary system.

Without dwelling upon the processes which take place in the lower forms of vegetable life, the purposes of this essay will be fully answered by taking an example from amongst the higher class of plants, and examining its conditions, from the germination of the seed to the full development of the flower—rich in form, colour, and odour.

In the seed-cell we find, by minute examination, the embryo of the future plant carefully preserved in its envelope of starch and gluten. The investigations which have been carried on upon the vitality of seeds appear to prove that, under favourable conditions, this life-germ may be maintained for centuries. Grains of wheat, which had been found in the hands of an Egyptian mummy, germinated and grew: these grains were produced, in all probability, more than three thousand years since; they had been placed, at her burial, in the hands of a priestess of Isis, and in the deep repose of the Egyptian catacomb were preserved to tell us, in the eighteenth century, the story of that wheat which Joseph sold to his brethren.

The process of germination is essentially a chemical one. The seed is placed in the soil, excluded from the light, supplied with a due quantity of moisture, and maintained at a certain temperature, which must be above that at which water freezes; air must have free access to the seed, which, if placed so deep in the soil as to prevent the permeation of the atmosphere never germinates. Under favourable circumstances, the life-quickenng processes begin; the starch, which is a compound of carbon and oxygen, is converted into sugar by the absorption of another equivalent of oxygen from the air; and we have an evident proof of this change in the sweetness which most seeds acquire in the process, the most familiar example of which we have in the conversion of barley into malt. The sugar thus formed furnishes the food to the now living creation, which, in a short period, shoots its first leaves above the soil; and these, which rising from their dark chamber are white, quickly become green under the operations of light.

In the process of germination a species of slow combustion takes place, and—as in the chemical processes of animal life and in those of active ignition—carbonic acid gas, composed of oxygen and charcoal, or carbon, is evolved. Thus, by a mystery which our science does not enable us to reach, the spark of life is kindled—life commences its work—the plant grows. The first conditions of vegetable growth are, therefore, singularly similar to those which are found to prevail in the animal economy. The leaf-bud is no sooner above the soil than a new set of conditions begin; the plant takes carbonic acid from the atmosphere, and having, in virtue of its vitality, by the agency of luminous power, decomposed this gas, it retains the carbon, and pours forth the oxygen to the air. This process is stated to be a function of vitality; but as this has been variously described by different authors, it is important to state with some minuteness what does really take place.

The plant absorbs carbonic acid from the atmosphere through the under surfaces of the leaves, and the whole of the bark; it at the same time derives an additional portion from the moisture which is taken up by the roots, and conveyed “to the topmost twig” by the force of capillary attraction, and another power, called endosmosis, which is exerted in a most striking manner by living organic tissues. This mysterious force is shown in a pleasing way by covering some spirits of wine and water in a wine-glass with a piece of bladder; the water will escape, leaving the strong spirit behind.

Independently of the action of light the plant may be regarded as a mere machine; the fluids and gases which it absorbs, pass off in a condition but very little changed —just as water would strain through a sponge or a porous stone. The consequence of this is the blanching or etiolation of the plant, which we produce by our artificial treatment of celery and sea-kale,—the formation of the carbonaceous compound called chlorophyle, which is the green colouring-matter of the leaves, being entirely checked in darkness. If such a plant is brought into the light, its dormant powers are awakened, and, instead of being little other than a sponge through which fluids circulate, it exerts most remarkable chemical powers; the carbonic acid of the air and water is decomposed; its charcoal is retained to add to the wood of the plant, and the oxygen is set free again to the atmosphere. In this process is exhibited one of the most beautiful illustrations of the harmony which prevails through all the great phenomena of nature with which we are acquainted—the mutual dependence of the vegetable and animal kingdoms.

In the animal economy there is a constant production of carbonic acid, and the beautiful vegetable kingdom, spread over the earth in such infinite variety, requires this carbonic acid for its support. Constantly removing from the air the pernicious agent produced by the animal world, and giving back that oxygen which is required as the life-quickenning element by the animal races, the balance of affinities is constantly maintained by the phenomena of vegetable growth. This interesting inquiry will form the subject of another essay.

The decomposition of carbonic acid is directly dependent upon luminous agency; from the impact of the earliest morning ray to the period when the sun reaches the zenith, the excitation of that vegetable vitality by which the chemical change is effected regularly increases. As the solar orb sinks towards the horizon the chemical activity diminishes—the sun sets—the action is reduced to its minimum—the plant, in the repose of darkness, passes to that state of rest which is as necessary to the vegetating races as sleep is to the wearied animal.

These are two well-marked stages in the life of a plant, germination and vegetation are exerted under different conditions; the time of flowering arrives, and another change occurs, the processes of forming the alkaline and acid juices, of producing the oil, wax, and resin, and of secreting those nitrogenous compounds which are found in the seed, are in full activity. Carbonic acid is now evolved and oxygen is retained; hydrogen and nitrogen are also forced, as it were, into combination with the oxygen and carbon, and altogether new and more complicated operations are in activity.

Such are the phenomena of vegetable life which the researches of our philosophers have developed. This curious order—this regular progression—showing itself at well-marked epochs, is now known to be dependent upon solar influences; the works its mysterious wonders on every organic form. Much is still involved in mystery; but to the call of science some strange truths have been made manifest to man, and of some of these the phenomena must now be explained.

Germination is a chemical change which takes place most readily in darkness; vegetable growth is due to the secretion of carbon under the agency of light; and the processes of floriation are shown to involve some new and compound operations: these three states must be distinctly appreciated.

The sunbeam comes to us as a flood of pellucid light, usually colourless; if we disturb this white beam, as by compelling it to pass through a triangular piece of glass, we break it up into coloured bands, which we call the spectrum, in which we have such an order of chromatic rays as are seen in the rainbow of a summer shower. These coloured rays are now known to be the sources of all the tints by which nature adorns the surface of the earth, or art imitates, in its desire to create the beautiful. These coloured bands have not the same illuminating power, nor do they possess the same heat-giving property. The yellow rays give the most LIGHT; the red rays have the function of HEAT in the highest degree. Beyond these properties the sunbeam possesses another, which is the power of producing CHEMICAL CHANGE—of effecting those magical results which we witness in the photographic processes, by which the beams illuminating any object are made to delineate it upon the prepared tablet of the artist.

It has been suspected that these three phenomena are not due to the same agency, but that, associated in the sunbeam, we have LIGHT, producing all the blessings of vision, and throwing the veil of colour over all things—HEAT, maintaining that temperature over our globe which is necessary to the perfection of living organisms—and a third principle, ACTINISM, by which the chemical changes alluded to are effected. We possess the power, by the use of coloured media, of separating these principles from each other, and of analyzing their effects. A yellow glass allows light to pass through it most freely, but it obstructs actinism almost entirely; a deep-blue glass, on the contrary, prevents the permeation of light, but it offers no interruption to the actinic, or chemical rays; a red glass, again, cuts off most of the rays, except those which have peculiarly a calorific, or heat-giving power.

With this knowledge we proceed in our experiments, and learn some of the mysteries of nature's chemistry. If, above the soil in which the seed is placed, we fix a deep pure yellow glass, the chemical change which marks germination is prevented; if, on the contrary, we employ a blue one, it is greatly accelerated; seeds, indeed, placed beneath the soil, covered with a cobalt blue finger-glass, will germinate many days sooner than such as may be exposed to the ordinary influences of sunshine;—this proves the necessity of the principle actinism to this first stage of vegetable life. Plants, however, made to grow under the influences of such blue media present much the same conditions as those which are reared in the dark; they are succulent instead of woody, and have yellow leaves and white stalks,—indeed, the formation of leaves is prevented, and all the vital energy of the plant is exerted in the production of stalk. The chemical principle of the sun's rays, alone, is not therefore sufficient; remove the plant to the influence of light, as separated from actinism, by the action of yellow media, and wood is formed abundantly,—the plant grows most healthfully, and the leaves assume that dark green which belongs to tropical climes or to our most brilliant summers. Light is thus proved to be the exciting agent in effecting those chemical decompositions which have already been described; but under the influence of isolated light it is found that plants will not flower. When, however, the subject of our experiment is brought under the influence of a red glass, particularly of that variety in which a beautifully pure red is produced by oxide of gold, the whole process of florination and the perfection of the seed is accomplished.

Careful and long-continued observations have proved that in the spring, when the process of germination is most active, the chemical rays are the most abundant in the sunbeam. As the summer advances, light, relatively to the other forces, is largely increased: at this season the trees of the forest, the herb of the valley, and the cultivated plants which adorn our dwellings, are all alike adding to their wood. Autumn comes on, and then heat, so necessary for ripening grain, is found to exist in considerable excess. It is curious, too, that the autumnal heat has properties peculiarly its own,—so decidedly distinguished from the ordinary heat, that Sir John Herschel and Mrs. Somerville have adopted a term to distinguish it. The peculiar browning or scorching rays of autumn are called the parathermic rays: they possess a remarkable chemical action added to their calorific one; and to this is due those complicated phenomena already briefly described.

In these experiments carefully tried, we are enabled to imitate the conditions of nature, and supply, at any time, those states of solar radiation which belong to the varying seasons of the year.

Such is a rapid sketch of the mysteries of a flower; "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you, Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."

Under the influence of the sunbeam, vegetable life is awakened, continued, and completed; a wondrous alchemy is effected; the change in the condition of the solar radiations determines the varying conditions of vegetable vitality; and in its progress those transmutations occur, which at once give beauty to the exterior world, and provide for the animal races the necessary food by which their existence is maintained. The contemplation of influences such as these realizes in the human soul that sweet feeling which, with Keats, finds that

"A thing of beauty is a joy for ever;
Its loveliness increasing, it will never Pass into nothingness, but still will keep
A bower quiet for us, and a sleep
Full of sweet dreams, and health, and quiet breathing.

Trees old and young, sprouting a shady boon
For simple sheep; and such are daffodils,
With the green world they live in."

ITALY AND HER FOREMOST MEN.

IN our preceding remarks on Italy, and on the men who are likely, from their abilities or position in society, to exercise an important influence upon her destiny, happy or sinister, according to the principles by which that influence may be directed, we have endeavoured to account for the apathy which England in general has shown towards Italian affairs, by presuming that she is in reality little acquainted with them in their true aspect; and that in proportion as she shall be enabled to form an impartial judgment of them, she will extend to the Italians that generous sympathy which she never long withholds from any cause that she sees to be based upon justice and honour. Indeed, to be utterly indifferent to the welfare of Italy, to the physical comforts and moral happiness of her gifted children, would be to evince ingratitude for all the refinements, social and intellectual, for which Europe is indebted chiefly to her, who has been to modern ages all that Greece was, to surrounding countries, in the days of paganism.

Before, then, we resume our biographical sketches of Italy's "Foremost Men," we will give a brief statement of the circumstances that have called forth the energies of those men; what they are in search of, what they require, what they wish for; whether they have a right to demand it, and, if refused, to endeavour to obtain it; leaving the delicate question of "how?" the modus operandi, for discussions more purely political than we pretend to enter into.

All historical evidence, as well as the daily experience of civilized society, will bear us out in the assertion that a country can only be happy and prosperous, intellectually, morally, and physically, in proportion as it is justly, wisely, and virtuously governed. Under a tyrannical government, the national character, however happily it may have been endowed by nature, must deteriorate, physically or morally; almost invariably it does so in both respects.—An oppressed people, forbidden to give utterance to their complaints, to assert their rights as rational beings, gradually succumb to brute force, and take refuge in sensuality and the vices invariably attendant upon it. Under this sort of régime, however, whole nations would finally disappear from the face of the earth, did not the wisdom of Him who rules over the whole of it decree, that even among the most degraded and abject there should always be found, when most needed, some master spirits, who, rising above the trammels that surround them, not only shake off their own fetters, but turn all their energies to the relieving of others also from them. They look around—they call on their more fortunately situated fellow-creatures for aid—and shall not the call be responded to? Yes, surely; as long as that sacred bond of sympathy exists by which the human race is held together. But they must show their claim to this sympathy. They complain—they must show their complaint to be well founded.

and in England, at any rate, none but a just quarrel will find champions. Let us then ascertain, if we can, how far the quarrel of the Italians with their rulers is just. They complain of their government—is their complaint just? Let us inquire. We will not go back century after century, through the annals of oppression and misrule: where is the country that could not show the same, at one period or other? No: "let by-gones be by-gones;" excepting as far as occasional reference to them may be useful, from the prudential consideration that what has been may be again, if not guarded against in good time. So for the present we will confine ourselves to the present, and limit our inquiries into the actual estate and administration of "Imperial Rome;" for if absolutism be any claim to that proud title which she once assumed, she has as good a right to it now as Imperial Paris may have, under the fiat of her wonder-working dictator.

In considering modern Rome, however, we cannot help referring to ancient times; for this very good reason, that, with respect to her constitution, she has nothing modern in her whole composition.

The Roman government is at this moment, as it has ever been, a government entirely sui generis, and therefore difficult to be comprehended by any one unacquainted with its internal principles. All other governments in the world are changeable, according to times and circumstances, and are reformed or modified, according to the different conditions of different generations; for, as reasonable governments, governing rational beings, they aim at benefiting civilisation, by keeping pace with civil progress. The Papal government alone maintains other principles: pretending to derive its existence, and its consequent claims to implicit deference and passive obedience, from the divinity of the Word of God, and the sanctity of Christian revelation, it professes to be immovable, immutable, and infallible; and hence it of necessity abhors all change—at least all change from bad to better; though from bad to worse it by no means sets itself so obstinately against.

Many governments, aiming at absolutism, have promulgated the doctrine that the right of ruling is conferred by God; but none of them have ever carried this divine right so far as to attest that the laws framed by themselves were unalterable, as descending from on high. To the Papal government alone, belongs this monstrous and absurd falsehood. Its civil legislation consists in a heterogeneous mixture of sundry ancient Roman laws, such as are contained in the digest of the Justinian code and the Pandects. How is it to be expected that decrees and regulations promulgated centuries ago, under totally different forms of government and states of society, can be equally applicable to the manners and requirements of the present generation? These laws, moreover, are subjected to all the modifications of the Canon law, which is declared to be of so far more noble a character than any other, as to be held supreme in the Roman states. Let us then see what this redoubtable law is, and in what its excellence may consist.

In remote ages, times of barbarism and ignorance, the Church, and especially the Roman Curia, undertook to decide and decree in lay affairs—a right which properly belongs solely to the civil government; these decisions and decrees were put forth sometimes by the Roman Pontiff, sometimes merely by individual bishops: they were first formed into serial order by the monk, Gratian, in 1050; they were thus continued by Raimondo di Pennafort, in 1230; by Clement V., and John XXII. in 1317; these were respectively termed Decretali, Clementine, and others more recently, and we may add more appropriately, Straganti.

It is these united decrees that form the Canon law, through which the popes, in the middle ages, ventured upon every kind of usurpation; even so far as to declare themselves supreme judges, and absolute masters of all monarchies, and the rightful sovereigns and lawful distributors of all newly discovered territories. This law, according to the assertion of the Church of Rome, is sacred, immutable and unalienable because it is not derived from human reason, and the contingencies of the age, like other human legislative systems, but from an anterior divine right, from the very source of religious authority and faith, from Christianity itself. It is the unjust pretensions founded upon it that have kept the Papacy in a continual struggle with the whole of civilized Europe for the last five centuries. Science, reason, and progress have constantly resisted it, as an obstinate and inveterate enemy; and civilization has so far overthrown it, everywhere else, that we have been obliged to enter into this account of it, as it yet exists, in its last stronghold, Rome, in order to make the influence it still maintains there, and its effects upon the unfortunate people still subject to its rule, evident to our readers.

In all civilized countries, it is a grand and fundamental axiom, that in the eye of the law all men are equal. But, according to the Canon law, a priest is held to be so far elevated above his fellow-creatures, as not to be subject to the common judgment of an ordinary tribunal. A priest or clerk, therefore, only depends on his bishop, or on the ecclesiastical authorities. This privilege extends not merely to his personal safety, but to his property and interests also; not only his ecclesiastical benefices, but likewise his private fortune, hereditary or acquired. Hence, a layman, who is unfortunate enough to have a clerk or priest for his debtor, cannot summon him before a civil tribunal, but only before that of the bishop, or some other ecclesiastical authority: these worthies, again, being ignorant themselves of the law, are obliged to keep an auditor, who is nominally paid with a pittance miserable enough, but who generally manages to make himself amends for its deficiencies by his power over the fortunes and properties of the citizens, thus submitted to him, instead of, as they ought to be, to the collegial tribunals which were introduced into the Papal States, under the government of the regno Italico, or kingdom of Italy.

This absurd and much abused privilege of the Canon law, carries its claims so high as to assert a retrospective influence on such individuals as may formerly have been clerks, and have afterwards assumed the secular garb; and if any public company or society should be found to contain one single clerk or ecclesiastic, any lawsuits connected with that company or society, either as plaintiffs or defendants, even if entirely of a commercial nature, must be submitted to the ecclesiastical tribunal, which has the absolute power of decision on the case; although, by the Canon law itself, priests are forbidden to interfere in commercial matters, in any way, directly or indirectly. By a still more extravagant regulation, neophytes and Jews are also required to plead before the ecclesiastical tribunals, in purely lay and civil suits.

In order to understand the full importance of this abuse, which continually gives rise to contrary decisions between the civil courts and the episcopal tribunals, it is necessary to recollect the enormous extent of ecclesiastical property in the Roman States, and the great number of young men who assume the clerical garb, in order that they may enjoy the privileges annexed to it: and if even the humblest grade of the ecclesiastical order thus derive advantage to themselves, individually, over their fellow-citizens, it may easily be imagined that the higher the grade, the more offensively unjust these advantages become. A cardinal, for instance, can never be summoned, even before an ecclesiastical tribunal, for any debt, contract, or obligation whatsoever; unless, like the Irishman, in the more pleasing case of matrimony, he "gives his own consent;" and this consent is only to be obtained by sending a petition for it to the office of the secretary of state. Would such proceedings be tolerated in England? would they be tolerated in France, even under the paralysing effects of the late coup d'état? would they, in short, be tolerated in any civilized country in the world? What then are we to think of the restoration of such a system of law, under the force of French arms! Nor let it be thought that we are speaking of things obsolete, or abandoned—the forgotten abuses of former ages—we can bring forward too many instances of their present actual existence, in all their original force. Cardinal Cesari, for example, Bishop of Jesi, was, according to a very emphatic phrase of common parlance, "over head and ears in debt," but it was only after many and repeated petitions on the part of his unfortunate creditors, that he could be summoned; nor did they even then derive any benefit from the success of their perseverance; for though his "Eminence" acknowledged his debts, he declined to liquidate them; and as his person was sacred, in virtue of his rank, his creditors had no other remedy open to them but that of seizing his property: and even this was somewhat in the predicament of that proposed by the rats in council, in the fable, that a bell should be hung round the neck of the cat that worried them, to give notice of his approach: but "who was to bell the cat?" and who was to serve the warrant? Not a single bailiff throughout the whole territory of Jesi could be found sufficiently courageous to carry it into execution; for every one was aware that the Bishop could reply to it by immediately ordering the arrest, under any pretext whatsoever, of the individual who might have the hardihood so to do. At length a bailiff in a neighbouring diocese undertook the office, and presenting himself before the Cardinal, courteously begged leave to know on what part of his property his Eminence would prefer the execution to be made. The Cardinal ironically offered him his episcopal crozier, which the prudent bailiff declined, as being a sacred object; his Eminence then, not to be behind-hand in courtesy, politely advised him to lose no time in getting out of the diocese of Jesi, as quickly as he could; as he might otherwise find himself provided with lodgings in it, longer than he had either anticipated, or might desire, even though rent-free,—in gaol.

To avoid, however, any appearance of invidiousness in selecting a single example of this kind, we will lay one more before our readers, from the number that we could cite, if called upon.

Cardinal de Gregori, Penitentiary of Holy Church, hired the Palazzo Mignanelli from its proprietors of the same name. They were wards, in straitened circumstances. Nevertheless, the Cardinal only paid them four hundred scudi, for a palace which now produces four or five times that sum; but, his Eminence, on entering, took the precautionary measure of obtaining a rescript from the pope, that the rent should not be increased during his natural life; nor could he ever be summoned for the arrears of it, even at that inadequate rate; partly through fear of incurring his displeasure, and partly through the privileges he enjoyed in virtue of his rank. It was still worse at his death, for a body of priests belonging to the Penitentiary Office had interest enough to get it established in the palace, and as the institution was one of the very many "declared to be dependent only on God, and as such not subject to the summons of any human tribunal," they persisted in retaining possession of the premises, despite the remonstrances of the proprietors, who at last drove them out by the ingenious device of planting a body of bricklayers and whitewashers upon the common staircase, not to "repair and beautify," but to bespatter the ascendants and descendants with mortar, and whitewash them, as they passed.

It may be difficult, in our fortunate land of justice and equity, to believe in the existence of such disorderly proceedings in any country pretending to the administration of a civil government; but we have yet more arbitrary measures to relate.

We have just shown how the Canon legislation sanctions all these acts of injustice, which are declared to be sacred, unalienable privileges, derived from the very essence of Christianity itself. Sometimes, however, it happens that these very arbitrary and exorbitant laws are not respected by the executive power. One of the means resorted to for the alteration of them is the issuing of declaratorie, or declarations assuming the force of laws, from the office of the secretary of state. If, for instance, a legal question be in discussion between two litigants, the secretary of state, by a declaration of the law, obliges the tribunal to decide in favour of the party who may have the strongest interest at court; and this power, again, gives rise to a world of arbitrary and unjust decisions. A single example will suffice to exhibit its effects; and this example we will select from the time of Gregory XVI., when ministerial despotism was at its zenith. A declaration was obtained upon a petition of a litigant party, from the secretary of state, cutting the matter short in favour of the applicant, in direct opposition to the opinion of the Rota Tribunal. The tribunal, however, stuck to its decision, maintaining that in this instance the good faith of His Holiness and the secretary of state had been abused. On this, a new declaratoria appeared, in the name of His Holiness, stating that he had not been deceived at all; and this, again, was followed by another decision of the Rota Tribunal, confirming its first sentence, on the supposition that His Holiness would not decide upon a question reserved for the sacred tribunal. This courageous conduct was finally sanctioned; but for one such instance of independent justice there are hundreds to the contrary, especially in the inferior tribunals, which would never dare to enter into a contest of the kind.

Another mode of exercising arbitrary decision is by papal rescripts. By a papal or most holy rescript, as it is termed, though in most instances the epithet unholy would be much more appropriately applied, Count Menaldo Leopardi, a man of extremely bad conduct, and of a character altogether opposite to that of his estimable son Giacomo, the celebrated letterato, was authorized not to pay his debts, for a certain number of years, during which term his creditors were forbidden to commence or prosecute any suit or action against him: the consequence of which was that many of these unfortunate creditors were put to the greatest inconvenience, embarrassment, and loss; one of them, indeed, was utterly ruined, and finally thrown into prison; in consequence of being thus long deprived of the sums due to him from his noble debtor.

Much about the same period, Cardinal Lambruschini, then secretary of state, by virtue of one of these same most holy papal rescripts, cancelled and erased from the sacred mortgage register a mortgage on the Caffarelli Palace, made over to the Hereditary Prince of Prussia, as security for the sum of twenty thousand scudi, advanced by his Royal Highness, and of which he was thus wronged upon some frivolous accusation of Protestant propagandism.

We cite these two instances in order to show the height to which ministerial despotism may be carried in matters of civil justice in Rome. We do not mean to say that such very flagrant ones are of frequent occurrence; but examples daily present themselves of rescripts, termed interdictions of administration, which, at the good pleasure of the most holy auditor, deprive honest citizens of their civil rights, frequently without any ground or motive whatsoever being alleged for so doing, and often honourable advocates and solicitors are suspended from the exercise of their professional functions by the police, solely for having defended the rights of persons thus aggrieved.

But if civil justice be thus arbitrarily interfered with by the ecclesiastical authorities in the Roman States, what shall we say of the administration of the criminal courts, which, at this most calamitous period more especially, are stained with cruelties and atrocities fully equalling those dragged forth from the dungeons of Naples, by the manly feeling of Mr. Gladstone, and by him held up to the just indignation of all who lay claim to humanity, or possess one spark of feeling for the sufferings of their fellow-creatures.

Every citizen of the Roman States is liable to be imprisoned at any moment, and without any charge against him being specified, by one or all of five different authorities. First, by the legate or delegate of the province in which he may reside; secondly, by the director of the police; thirdly, by the commander of the political force, or gendarmarie; fourthly, by the bishop or cardinal-vicar; fifthly, by the father inquisitor. We do not speak of civil or criminal tribunals, because they, when the arrest of an individual is agreed upon, at any rate follow the regular course of justice, by serving a warrant in due form, and alleging some reason for it; whether that reason be really a true one, or only a pretext suited to the occasion.

determined by no law; the bishop and the inquisitor being independent of ordinary tribunals, and the other authorities having no fixed term, at the expiration of which they may be obliged to bring the prisoner forth for examination. There is, indeed, a nominal period of thirty days, during which the police may detain any one at their own sole will and pleasure; but as they are never called upon to render any account of their conduct, and as their victim or his friends have no competent tribunal to appeal to, this period may be prolonged month after month, and even year after year; moreover, a recent secret circular authorises this indefinite prolongation, in order to give the examining judge sufficient time to look into the cases of the prisoners. And time enough, indeed, it must require, when we consider that in one single prison alone—that of Monte Citorio—in the first seven months of the past year, the names of 3745 persons consigned to incarceration between its walls, were inscribed upon its books! and this, too, in a city of which the population did not exceed 120,000 souls, even before the commencement of its troubles, and which is now reduced full one-fourth of the number, by exile, banishment, imprisonment, the galleys, and capital punishment,—to say nothing of the fearful state of privation, bordering on actual misery and want, to which thousands more are reduced by the deportation or imprisonment of their natural protectors, and providers of their means of sustenance.

It may easily be believed that, under such a system of things, respectable persons may be detained in prison for months without being brought to trial. Signor del Frate, a most estimable young man, was incarcerated, utterly ignorant why, for seven months, and at last was set at liberty without any sentence being passed upon him; indeed, without any charge having been made against him. Signor Pistrini has, in the same manner, been thirteen months in prison, equally ignorant of his offence, but without the same prospect of release. Upwards of 240 custom-house officers have been in prison nearly two years, without any hope of being brought to trial; in that time, one of them has gone mad, and two others have attempted suicide—a crime hitherto more rare in Italy than in any country in Europe; but, under the present circumstances of the country, who can be surprised if suffering and despair should render it more frequent!

Even at the very moment we are writing these pages, a tragical instance of long detention in prison, terminating in the mockery of a secret trial, and a most cruel and unjust sentence to death, by decapitation, is exhibited in Rome, in the case of Edward Murray, the son of a brave British officer, he himself being married, and the father of a family.

This young man was made an inspector of the police, at Ancona, where he had resided ten years, in the time of the Republic, during which he received orders from the then existing authorities to imprison a certain Count Severino, and another individual, both of them staunch adherents to the Papal cause. An order afterwards came from the governor that they should be released, and safely conveyed out of the city. Murray accordingly informed them that they were at liberty to depart, and walked with them himself out of the prison gates at night, arm in arm with Severino. Unhappily, the prisoners were attacked in the street almost directly after, and stabbed, and Murray was arrested, under the pretended accusation of being in league with the assassins. Nearly three years he languished in prison, first in Ancona and subsequently at Rome, under privations and amid filth which brought him into a pitiable state of suffering. All that time he was refused permission to consult with a legal adviser, and was debarred the consolation of visits from his mother, his wife, his child, or his friends, save through the bars of his prison, and in presence of two sbirri, alias spies, who insisted that all the communications which passed should be made in the Italian language. All that time his unhappy mother, an Ionian lady, besieged, and is even now besieging with her tears and entreaties, the secretary of state, the British consul, and every one whom she imagines to have a shadow of influence in her son's behalf: meanwhile, his trial has taken place, if trial it may be called. The amnesty granted by the Pope, after his return from Gaeta, prevented this unfortunate young man from being treated as a political offender; the proper way, therefore, of proceeding against him was to try him before the ordinary criminal tribunal of Ancona, with a right of appeal to the superior tribunal there, and of final appeal to that of the Consulta at Rome, as well as allowing him to choose his own advocate. Instead of this, he has been tried at once by the Consulta, without power of appeal to any other tribunal—without being allowed any other advocate than the one allotted to him by the government—without any knowledge of the witnesses against him, that advocate being sworn to reveal nothing to his client respecting them—without any public hearing; in short, without any of the observances which, in England, are so inseparably interwoven with the administration of justice, that without them no sentence or decision whatever would be considered valid, more especially in the solemn and most responsible question of life and death.

The question of this treatment of our unfortunate countryman is now under discussion in a British parliament, and advocated as it is by some of the most able and energetic members of both the upper and the lower house, it will have the effect, doubly advantageous, of showing the English what wrongs the Italians labour under, and the Italians, what privileges the English have secured to themselves, by a rational appliance of the principles of liberty, civil equality, and justice, which render their political constitution the admiration of the world, and their own security and happiness.

It would swell our pages into volumes were we to enumerate one half the instances of unjust detention in Roman dungeons that we might do; we might bring forward cases of obscure individuals being actually forgotten for years, in the confusion of the prison administration. One of these unfortunates, who, with others, was set at liberty at the accession of Pio Nono, had been incarcerated twenty years; his very name was unknown to his gaolers, and as for the original accusation against him, there was not even a tradition or conjecture remaining. An unfortunate Levant woman was imprisoned by the police authorities, because her passport was not quite en règle. As she spoke nothing but Arabic, she could not, of course, vindicate herself, and as the police could not understand her, the officers of the police pronounced her mad, and sent her to recover her senses in the hospital of the Longara, where she remained three years: at the end of that time, happily for her, an inspection of the patients took place, and suspicions arising that she was not insane, the Bishop of Valperga was requested to see her, and interpret for her. He did so, and found her to be in perfect possession of all her mental faculties. She was accordingly set at liberty; but how many miserable wretches may have languished out their days under similar circumstances!

The power of the police, as if not already too wide and unrestrained, received additional extent and license in 1850, under the restored government,* by certain articles authorizing it to condemn an honourable citizen not to leave the commune in which he resides; to oblige him to retire to his home at a certain hour—often, at sunset; not to leave it before an hour equally specified; not to attend spectacles, festivals, theatres, fairs, or markets; not to frequent particular places, or associate with particular persons, mentioned by name! And all these tyrannical and insulting restrictions, known by the name of precetti, are to be warranted by an order from the head of the province, the assessor-general, the director of the police, or the local governor, with a summary verification of his motives. The person thus arbitrarily condemned can appeal to no one but the head of the province, who is himself, as we have just stated, one of the authorities with whom the power of condemnation rests.

The police may also levy fines at their own will and pleasure, of from one to thirty scudi, with restriction to the house, barrack, or prison, for any period they may think fit, of from one to thirty days. Can we imagine for a single moment what such a state of things would be in London!

Nor let it be thought that these odious precetti are inflicted only for serious causes, or after mature deliberation. During the carnival of 1850, Dandini, the director of police, summoned before him, in virtue of his office, eighty individuals, mostly of the most honourable personal character and professional position, among whom it may be enough to those who know Roman society, to mention Dr. Clito Cartucci, Advocate Petrocchi, Signor Ballanti, the brothers Doria and Castellani, making it known to these eighty that he should hold them responsible for any disorder whatsoever, that might occur during the approaching carnival. This Dandini, a count, by the bye, was known, on account of the harshness, malignity, unceasing watchfulness, and unrelenting obstinacy of his disposition, by the cognomen of the Hyena of the police. An unhappy lady, a widow, waited upon him humbly to inquire—not to dispute them—into the grounds upon which her four sons, her consolation and her maintenance, had been arrested, by his order. He kept her waiting three long hours, weeping, languishing, almost fainting; at length he condescended to appear in person before her; but it was only to tell her that he was astonished at her assurance, in coming to him on behalf of such mauvais sujets (anglice, good-for-nothings); that she ought to be ashamed of herself for having such worthless sons, and that it was evident she must have given them an extremely bad education, for it to have produced such abominable fruits. What wonder that parties respectable as those we have just named, should have preferred rusticating altogether at Albano, Tivoli, and other places within reasonable distance, during the carnival, rather than be answerable for anything that might occur in the course of it, among the thousands of discontented still left in the population of Rome, even imprisoned, watched, exiled, confiscated as it has been, and continues to be? But it was not only for a brief season that hundreds left Rome on this account; many, many of those hundreds expatriated themselves entirely solely from the same cause; and of the refugees that sadly track the streets of this busy metropolis, reading in the face of every hasty passer-by occupation which they cannot hope to obtain, viewing in every splendid equipage either a type of the rank they themselves have been accustomed to, or of which the patronage, under happier influences, would have given them the means of honourable subsistence, under their own azure skies,—of these unfortunate refugees—we may venture to pronounce that one-third have been compelled to seek an asylum in our own generous world-embracing England solely through disgust, not dread of the debasing thralldom, bodily and mental, of the presetti. And shall England ever withdraw her protection of the oppressed, the calumniated, the wronged? No! she holds the principle of social liberty and equal rights too sacred a blessing from Him who is the Giver of all good, to appropriate it to herself, and to deny its benefits to others, as long as she has the inestimable privilege of extending them to all who step upon her honoured shores.

Great as are the abuses we have already shown as existing at this moment in the Papal dominions, greater remain to be unfolded; but of these at a future opportunity. Enough has been said already to prove that the Romans, at any rate, do not complain without cause, and that, complaining with cause, they have a right to our sympathy, and consequently to our aid.

A VISIT.*

BY FREDERIKA BREMER.

ONE winter evening, it so happened that I was alone at home. A slight indisposition had kept me for two or three days within doors, and, though I was now well, it was thought advisable for me to remain quiet this night, and not go to any of the parties that carried off the rest of the family. And I was quite satisfied—then I used most to enjoy myself, when all alone at home; and with much good humour and many good wishes I said adieu to father and mother, sisters and brothers, as some went to the opera, and some to a ball, and some to a concert. Then, though we were generally a very quiet household, with a drop or two of gloominess coming from no matter what—we had just obtained a brighter place than usual: my eldest sister having become engaged to an excellent young man, and my youngest brother being just returned from college with very flattering testimonials, and full of hope and joyfulness, and love of his youngest sister, who also was equally in love with her brother. For myself, I was at that interesting period in a woman's life where she, young still, but not in her first youth, feels disposed to settle down in some way, and is not without offers or opportunities, but still does not feel bound to sacrifice her freedom to anything below her heart's choice.

Well, they—my kith and kin—all went out, and I was left alone. I felt quite pleased with it. Putting out the lights, except one in each of the chandeliers in the two drawing-rooms, I began to walk slowly up and down the soft carpets, enjoying the solitude, and the pleasant light shedding itself from above over the rooms and their furniture. It was a romantic clair obscur, soft, and a little melancholy—and this evening I felt very romantic. A slight, not unpleasant, weakness remained after the past illness; but I was perfectly well, and with every moment a fresh gush of health and delicious life seemed to swell my heart and pervade my whole being: a certain soft motion kept rising within me. On the whole, I felt not quite so happy at being alone the whole evening, I wished somebody would come and partake of my solitude; it was too full for me. My heart bounded with sympathy towards my fellow-creatures; with good will to love, and to be loved; to interchange endearing words and good offices. I wanted only to give; I wanted only somebody good enough to receive; I felt my heart overflowing with good will for all the world and all the people in it. I left the door to the vestibule unlooked, in hope—not as in the extravagant fancies of my childhood—

* It will no doubt add to the interest with which this paper may be read, to know that it was written in English by Miss Bremer, and that it has not been necessary to alter a dozen words. Ed.

in hope that robbers and burglars would come in and give me an opportunity to develop some wonderful acts of courage or présence d'esprit;—no, I did not wish for robbers to come, but I did wish for somebody; and I had a strong presentiment that somebody would come, that I should not remain alone the whole evening. I felt sure that I should have a visit—a visit that could not but become of importance either to me or to somebody else. Then, anybody that would come in this evening must feel my influence—must experience something uncommon from the very volume of life that rolled in my veins, and that I would roll on him or her. A thousand feelings—a thousand thoughts—were in my heart and mind. But I walked silently to and fro in the rooms, now and then looking curiously down the street. Our house was a corner house: at the corner of the house opposite hung a street-lamp, not very bright nor brilliant, but still shedding a light clear enough on the spot under it, and on the objects nearest around. Right under the lamp hung, and swung in the evening wind, a huge red wooden glove (a glovemaking's sign), with the forefinger (a very long forefinger) pointing right down. The snow fell in large flakes round the lamp and the red glove on the frozen white ground. Now and then came persons—mostly men—wrapped up in their cloaks, passing right under the lamp and the red glove, and were, as they passed, lighted up by the former. I thought I recognised friends or acquaintances in some of them, and often it would seem as if they steered their way directly towards my house, but then again they were wrapped up in the darkness, and the great red glove swung, and the lamp shed its light, and the snow fell fast over the solitary spot—and again I paced the carpets of the drawing-rooms. No matter: it was yet good time for visiting, it was early yet, and a visit I should certainly have that night; and many a face passed in the camera obscura of my mind—many a vision of my expected visitor. First, I saw one that had been very kind to me, but that I had been less kind to; one of those that we esteem, but can neither like nor love, but now, this night, if that person would come, I should be so kind, so—it would not be my fault if that person did not feel amiable and loveable. And then there was somebody who had wronged me, and made me suffer. Oh! that she might come, that I might do her good instead—that I might make her rich and happy; it would give me the greatest pleasure. And then there was a man that was more to me than I to him—that I liked; a brilliant, interesting man, that did not like me, but who was interested by me, liked to talk with me, and was a friend of mine. Oh! if he should come; he would love me, perhaps fall in love with me that evening! There was in me so much of that fire which makes everything light up and radiate. Was he quite fireproof? Well, still his spirit would light up by the light of mine; I knew it, and we would have such a talk about stars and showers of stars; about Copernicus, and Taylor, and Newton; and about electricity, and alchemy, and Berzelius: we would have such a great intellectual treat and conversation! And then there was another man, that liked me well, and would offer me heart and hand, if I would like him. Like him I could not; but feel very kindly, respectfully, almost tenderly for him, that I could—I did; and then he was a very good and very stately gentleman, and of a rank and fortune that well could flatter a little worldly vanity, and I had my share. Ah! if he should come this evening, and ask the question, I fear that I should not find heart to ask delay to consider, and so forth; I fear I should say "Yes," at once, and fix my destiny before I was sure it was well. My heart was too warm to be wise. I almost feared that he would come and ask me. But then there was an elderly married man, and a genius, that I loved as young women love elderly gentlemen who are geniuses, and are kind to them—adoringly, passionately. Oh! that he might come. No danger of his asking dangerous questions; no danger of becoming engaged to him, and fixing one's destiny before the heart was right fixed. If he should but come—what a delight to indulge looking at him—to give vent to the flow of thoughts and feelings with such a mind—to be inspired, and foolish, and nonsensical, in a sublime sense, as well he could be—to hear the effusions of that great heart, great as the world. He never had quite understood me; I never had been quite myself with him; this evening I should be so, he should know my heart. May-be he would ask me to do something for him—to give my purse, every shilling I possessed, to some poor persons—what a delight! And how I should treat him with tea, and wine, and cake, just as Hebe did Jupiter; and how he should enjoy it. Dear me, what an Olympian treat it would be! And then I saw a lady, whose very shadow on the wall I loved. Oh! that if she would but come, my dear, my bosom friend! What a delightful time we should have together, with tea and chat, and the outpourings of the heart. I would tell her everything: she would counsel me wisely, as she was wont to do. Dear soul, how I loved her; tears filled my eyes in thinking of her, and that she would come—to be sure she was a hundred miles away, on her estate; but, no matter, it could very well happen that she should come. She liked to surprise people, and come unawares upon them, like the Emperor Nicholas. Very likely she would come this evening. My heart asked for it, and then I looked out of the window; the street-lamp flamed and flickered red; the great red glove swung to and fro, with the long forefinger pointing right out; the snow fell fast. I heard sleigh-bells ringing—a carriage was coming—may-be my friend in it. There it comes, right up against the house—my house. The light of the lamp glances over it—how snow-covered! Oh! I will kiss off the snow from her clothes—I will make her so comfortable and happy!

Away flew the carriage, with the lady and the snow-cloak, and the merry jingling bells. But there, now, the great red glove stands still, and the long forefinger points right down on a man wrapped up in a big cloak! I am sure it is the genius, and he is coming to pay me a visit. Dear great man! he comes right up to the house,—yes, no—he comes not—he turns to the left hand, it could not be he, he would not have passed me so! There, again the glove stands still, the finger points, and a slender figure passes under it—how like my friend the naturalist!—and he is coming right here,—no, he is not—he turns to the right hand. And the light flickers, and the snow falls, and the glove swings over the now solitary spot,—and I am still alone, and walk up and down the soft carpets in the romantic twilight.

After all, how gaudily life wears away! why should we not make the best of it? why not take the love and kindness that are offered, and make happy those that we can make happy? why should we think so much of ourselves alone, and be so afraid of not being so happy as happy can be? we must think also of others, and be content for ourselves with a moderate share of happiness.

Well! if the friend so kind and noble-hearted, whose heart I can claim, now claims my hand, this evening he shall have it, I believe! I will make him happy, and his whole house comfortable, and everybody about him! I must have something to do, to love, to live for! Well!—if he comes! . . . And then I looked out of the window. There now, this time the forefinger of the red hand points most decidedly down on a tall, stately figure,—and he is coming—yes, he is certainly coming—coming right to this house; he enters the door! It must be he! how I felt my heart beat! I almost wished it was not he. And to be sure, if it were he who entered the house, he never came up the steps, nor opened the unlocked door of my house and heart—no, not this time; and the half-dreaded, half-wished-for question, was not asked now.

The next time I looked out of the window the lamp was obscured by a lowering mist, and the great red hand was swinging—and black figures were seen passing under it, as through a black veil—my heart began to feel a little low and sad. But—it was not too late yet for a visit; some of our friends used to come very late; somebody would yet come!

Next time I looked again for my visitor, the mist had fully come down, and I could not see a bit more of the lamp, nor the red glove, nor of the mystical figures passing under it. But as I happened to look upwards, I saw that the sky had cleared, and that the stars shone bright and brilliant; the City of God stood all in light over the earthly city, obscured by mist and darkness. I was struck by the sight of a constellation that I had not seen before; and the truth was, that taken up by earthly objects since a time, I had forgotten to follow up the study of the firmament, that I had begun, with the help of my friend the naturalist. Now I took my map and globe, and began to study; I put out the light in the great drawing-room, so as to leave the star-light alone, and made there my observatory. That side of the room looking towards a square was a fine space of sky to range over; and I began to range among the stars. After a while, I ascertained the names of several of the constellations new to me, and the names of their brightest stars; I made the acquaintance of several greater and smaller notabilities of the higher sphere, and read about them what wise men have thought and said. Then would come of themselves enlarging thoughts about the connexion of our planet and its human beings, and those shining worlds where lights and shadows, and weight and measure, are the same as here, and who, consequently, are related to us in soul and matter, in weal and woe, and who tell us of it in lovely shining stars. All this gave me great pleasure.

The servant came with the tea-tray; I was sitting alone, but had forgotten it. I enjoyed my tea and sandwiches, but only to return fresh to my study; and continued visiting among the stars, and making friends with them, till I felt bodily weary. I looked at the watch,—it was near midnight; I sat down on the sofa in the small drawing-room; the light shone calmly and romantically as before; and I was as before—alone. Yet there was a pleasant calm—a feeling of plenitude and elevation in my soul—my heart was at rest. What was it that made me feel so well, though I had been disappointed in my visit? Left alone, I had not felt lonely nor at loss; I had studied the works of the Great Father; I had learned and adored, and so forgotten time, solitude, myself, earth and earthly wishes, and my expected visit. Oh! was it not clear that I had had a visit after all—a visit, not from mortal friends, but from immortal? They had whispered to me, "Hereafter thou shalt never feel lonely when alone; then we will come to thee." And I was glad and thankful!

BIRDS IN CAPTIVITY.

INTRODUCTORY.

THE immediate subject of consideration is one of the most popular of the day—the management in health and treatment under disease of our indigenous and imported birds.

There cannot be a doubt of the increasing interest upon the subject of Natural History, various treatises teem from the press receiving their impetus from the vox populi calling aloud for wholesome food. Alack a day! the era of fables has passed away; wiser in our generation, the veriest toddler would lisp out its incredulity on the subjects of "Red Riding Hood" and "Puss in Boots," were a nurse-maid to be found daring enough to promulgate any history less veracious than the predatory habits of the wolf, or the amiable instincts of the domestic cat.

The opportunities afforded by the increase of steam navigation, for the importation of foreign birds, has an obvious tendency to induce the scientific naturalist to write of their habits, their instincts, and their homes; such histories treating only of the subject in a wild state, involve the serious considerations of voluminous matter and great expense. Yet, while admitting the full merit of learned disquisitions, I fearlessly assert the want of practical information for the management of our little helpless prisoners.

A treatise adapted to the daily use of the possessor of a bird or birds, free from the errors of prejudice and inexperience, is much required; and this deficiency has suggested, through the medium of a popular channel, the offer of a correct guide, for the preservation, in health and in song, of our caged favourites, affording to the public the results of long observation and practice, together with tried and approved remedies, under the many ills, that even the feathered race are "heirs to." I write avec connaissance de cause; there is no teacher like experience; the medical treatment of my numerous dependents was once a source of perplexity; a foreign authority knew nothing of our British song birds—(the sweetest in the world!)—an English writer treated the German canary as if, instead of the stove-rearing among the miners, the dainty importation had all its lifetime fed upon rank seeds and inhaled our fogs. Being for many years the possessor of both home and foreign specimens, and bringing to the aid of my object the results of inquiries personally instituted among amateurs of every class, I may say I have "taken my degree," and shall, I trust, be found "qualified" to furnish a desideratum, the absence of which I have too frequently regretted.

I have found that the best informed upon the subject of birds in captivity, are those persons whose habits of life are sedentary; their monotonous pursuits lead them to observation, and a well-directed enthusiasm producing care, gentleness, and kindly feelings; and it may be set forth as an axiom, that where healthy and lively birds are found, their possessors love their pets, and have their advantage in the reflected gratification afforded by their meed of care, while others, only self-indulgent, weary of the charge.

I trust I may be able to induce a more general acquaintance with the nature and habits of our little cheerful companions, to the advantage of both parties. It is an old saying, and a good one, that "whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well;" and, when to this aphorism is added a consideration involving animal suffering, or the contrary, I feel assured I shall not have spoken in vain, by trying to serve that class in creation which more than any other has a peaceful and holy influence on our nature. A bird can only by mute signs complain, but in its contentment has a voice of gladness and of praise.

Birds and flowers are among the inexpensive elegances of life; their possession adds to the pleasures of the rich, and the labours of the poor are refreshed from a purifying source. In proportion to the means of each class will be found their several belongings. The gorguous bird, transplanted from his native land; the gentle linnet, taken from the nest; the captured nightingale, that "bears no rivalry," are each and all sufferers through ignorance—an ignorance not wilful, but from the want of a proper guide—a plain, practical adviser.

The "too much" or the "too little" of advice must be ever a matter of opinion. I have very much to say about cage management, which must be reserved until brought under the heads of the several birds to be discussed, confining myself in this place to a few brief hints as to the general care of hard-billed and soft-billed birds. The necessity for condensing even a popular theme in the pages of a periodical, as well as the consideration that the possessor of any particular bird would seek its history and interests under its name, have induced this arrangement.

The distinctive appellations of "hard and soft billed" have given rise to much error in the treatment of the former. Being styled "granivorous," they are too frequently limited to seed. The class so called includes Grosbeaks, Finches, and Buntings. Of the first-named and the latter we have but few natives. Each and all require, in addition to seed, soft food, as a substitute for the variety provided by nature. Canary, millet and hemp are common to the home and foreign birds; rape and flax are shunned by the latter, and paddie (or unshelled rice) avoided by the former. In an aviary these little variations are of no consequence, the supply being equal to the demand; but where each bird has its own habitat, the provision should be made accordingly.

The soft food, to be given in glass, japanned tin, or zinc vessels, should be changed daily. Bread and milk, (toast and milk is even better,) German paste, chopped egg and crumbs of roll or sweet bun, potatoes mashed alone or with oatmeal added, bread and butter cut thin and finely chopped, and in most cases a little bit of scraped or chopped raw beef. A vessel of new milk, and green food in season, (never to be given during frost,) of which I consider the small-leaved chickweed, salad, cresses, and grass-seeds the best. Lettuce and maw (or poppy) seeds should be sprinkled over the vessel of bread and milk occasionally.

A little watchful care will soon point out the preference shown by a bird to any particular supply; yet it frequently happens that he will leave untouched one day the food that the next he may enjoy. These little caprices are in accordance with all animal nature. I therefore enjoin it as a rule to give the regular bill of fare daily, and withdraw in the evening that portion liable to become objectionable.

Exercise, air, and cleanliness do more for birds than even an abundance of food. By the former I mean suitable cages, and in some cases a flight about the room, under due precaution from accidents; by the latter I am to be understood as advising well-cleansed cages weekly, fresh sand or fine gravel, sometimes clay, every other day, water-fountains and baths renewed daily, the latter cold in summer, tepid at other seasons.

The evils of an unnatural state of confinement can only be alleviated by our just and careful attendance; by these the owner of a little dependent being will find his reward—through the contrary, sad suffering must be the result. We are bound to foster and protect the little creature whose life is at our mercy—whose melody is at our service. A few minutes each morning will serve to avert the merited reproach of cruel neglect; deaths by starvation; bad feet, from soiled perches; parasites, from unwashed cages; asthma and consumption, from sour soft food, and withered vegetable matter, from exposure to draughts of air, an uneven temperature, a broiling sun, or an easterly wind, leaving the defenceless, unsheltered bird in misery, leading on to death. Let not my readers look lightly upon sufferings inflicted upon that which is a portion of the creation. "The sparrow on the housetop" is not despised of God!

The soft-billed birds are generally called Songsters, and embrace several genera. The LARK SPECIES may be pronounced as on the outskirts, being to a certain degree granivorous; the bill varies from both orders; the claw is peculiar; and these birds dust themselves, instead of bathing; the food must therefore accord. For SKYLARKS it should be German paste, mixed with crumb of roll, and occasionally hard boiled yolk of egg added; also oats, varied by substituting groats—the former being heating. Hempseed is given by some amateurs, and it is difficult to deprive the bird afterwards of it; but it is objectionable. Fresh water and sand, chopped cabbage and cress, with a fresh sod of turf, a cheerful sunny aspect, without draughts of air, will, combined, preserve both health and song. The cage best adapted will be noted elsewhere.

The WOODLARK'S food should consist of German paste, crumb of roll or sweet bun, crushed hemp (one-fourth), and occasionally chopped egg; fresh water daily. Clay, dry, not too fine, is better than sand; their feet being delicate, it cuts like glass. A small sod of peat, in addition to a perch, is necessary.

The lark species, together with the bullfinch and chaffinch, are generally classed under the head "granivorous and insectivorous." I am inclined to place the two latter birds with the seed-eaters, which, according to my rule, get soft food in addition. Larks eat ants and mealworms, and ant-mould improves their condition.

THRUSHES AND BLACKBIRDS are berry and insect eaters; but an artificial state of life brings them readily to prepared food. German paste, with bread-crumbs, is the most nourishing; a little scraped raw beef, bread and butter, and occasionally chopped egg. Fruit, slugs, and mealworms, ad occasio, may form a desert. Many disorders may be averted by giving a change of food to soft-billed birds. To this hardy kind an alteration in diet once a week is desirable: crushed scalded hempseed, made into a paste with bread-crumbs, or bean-meal and potato, the latter blended, and the meal mixed through it; but observe if the thrush or blackbird will partake of these varieties; they are capricious—some disliking moist food, others loathing the dry. The latter has great advantages, giving strength, liveliness, and song. Fig-dust and crushed hemp are given to nestlings.

NIGHTINGALES were once a puzzle: they are too delicate for experiments, and the only suitable food is the yolk of a hard-boiled egg, pressed through an iron sieve, with an equal quantity of scraped raw beef, moistened with water. Ants, ants' eggs, and the mould in which they are found, are all desirable; mealworms occasionally, if ailing especially. When nightingales are not fat, (they become so generally in autumn,) the water may be omitted, prescribed for moistening the egg and beef. Apoplexy is threatened, when any soft-billed bird begins to totter; immediately change the food from dry to moist. Sand, water, cleanliness, and quiet management are essential. The skin of the nightingale is so porous, that a bath in winter would cause death. At no time allow the water given for bathing to be below the temperature of the room.

ROBINS must also have a change of food at times: the best for general use is German paste, roll-crumbs, and hard-boiled yolk of egg, reduced to a pulp by a few drops of water, and a little raw scraped beef. A change may be made to German paste, bread-crumbs, and bullock's liver grated fine and mixed: the latter ingredient creates thirst, and the flavour it once possessed is disappearing. These birds like bread and butter also, and mealworms entice them to great familiarity. They are wonderful bathers. At the spring season they droop, their feathers look ruffled, then clammy—before the last state emancipate a bird unfit for the cage, for the imprisonment of which its captors are doubly culpable; for this little friend of man volunteers his visits, and asks but liberty in return, for his merry bow and his song. One taken from London to the neighbourhood of Dublin was mercifully set free when the spring gladdened his little heart. Every day until the year following "Bob" paid his visit at the window; he then introduced his wife; the cares of paternity caused a decline in his diurnal salutations, but I have no doubt the returning autumn will find him at his post. A white feather marked him above his kind; indeed, he permitted "no (robin) near his throne."

Of the wholly insectivorous class it is here useless to write: they are the most delicate birds, mostly unfit for confinement, and their various treatment requiring separate heads. The wren family—the wagtail species—the redstarts, wheatears, blue-breasts, stone-chats, and black-caps are the true syliade (warblers). In the proper place, I purpose giving to each bird its history, with all the attention and effects of research in my power. I cannot add much of personal experience in this most difficult division, for, with very few exceptions, I think the hand of man is fatal.

A chapter will be devoted to the "large-beaked birds:" a few words will in this place suffice.

PARROTS are as injudiciously treated as petted children: where any sensible management is shown them (the birds), they thrive well, and repay all care. Subject to many ailments, in consequence of an ill-adapted climate, want of exercise, and over-feeding, attention on the part of the owner should be directed to great simplicity of diet. Bread soaked in water or tea, and squeezed rather dry, with a few chillies throughout; a vessel containing biscuit, or, better still, toast, on which boiled milk has been poured. In a division of the feeding vessel place wheat, (new if possible,) Indian corn pounded, also canary seed; water to drink —(the most comical error has been bruited about that parrots do not drink, originating, I conclude, in some of the tribe inhabiting spots far from streams; but in a free state how juicy are the fruits they obtain!) Eschew hempseed; it is, as a dietary supply, deleterious to the feathered race. A few grains of the small or Russian hemp may be admitted to the store-closet, but only "exhibited" as a treat, indicative of a rendre being looked for—your bullfinch to "pipe" an extra waltz, your canary to perform his feats of love—but parrots are more than any other birds subject to ailments, the "cure" for which has puzzled learned ornithologists; the "prevention" should be addressed to preserving a pure state of blood. A chicken-bone is not hurtful to a healthy bird; but, to the pampered, gouty "individual," plain fare is advisable: fruits are wholesome. On these matters I shall hereafter fully treat, confining myself to this additional observation, that atrophy is among their complaints; therefore, nourishing plain food will best avert the evil. The French call one disorder "s'arracher les plumes," and it is among the most serious. The greediness of this class is proverbial, indigestion results, and, like all over-indulged "darlings," they carry out by temper those unwholesome measures once injudiciously indulged. The food of parrots being succulent, they do not appear to drink; but so necessary are liquids to them, that sugar-candy is frequently added to the water in the cup to tempt them.

One great and general error is the cold to which these poor sufferers are exposed. In neither the Old nor the New Continent are they to be found, with few exceptions, in a colder latitude than 25 degrees. I therefore recommend a night covering, only descending, for obvious reasons, half-way downwards,—a plan I adopt successfully with all my birds. If the cage is circular, the covering fits the upper portion; if oblong, it extends over half of the two sides, one end and top; thereby giving warmth and seclusion, with pure air and morning light—the instinctive attraction with all unsophisticated nature.

I have been, in this resumé, desirous to preserve to their possessors these justly-deserved favourites. While, in reality, they are sufferers from captivity, they are supposed to be gifted with endurance proportionate to their size,—a too common error!—their endearing ways—their extraordinary powers of imitation, both of words and actions, would almost argue a sense beyond that of instinct. Companionable, capable of strong attachment, and ready to forgive us the misfortune of imprisonment, are strong appeals to considerate treatment.

These prefatory pages touch only upon general management; the peculiarities of individual species will elicit, in future chapters, observations upon natural tendencies, seasonable distribution, and migratory impulses, so far as to render easy the transition from birds on the wing to those in confinement.

Birds are, to the observer, harbingers of all changes in nature; they are the keys to natural history, and, if we persist in keeping them in a state never designed, let us, at least, substitute care, kindness, and the nearest approach, in their treatment, to the provision so bountifully supplied where they are indigenous to the soil.

It may here be observed, that while some of our natives and strangers require to be placed in separate cages, as much from their shy habits as from some peculiarity in their allotment of food, others—and by far the most numerous—delight in the freedom of an aviary or aviary-cage. Of the provision necessary—of the suitability of the proposed inmates—I am prepared to write, having been the possessor of birds, in both positions, for many years.

INNOCENCE.

THE works of Jean Baptiste Greuze, the painter of the elegant little picture from which the engraving entitled "Innocence" is taken, may be cited as exemplifying the general character of the French school of art during the past century, prior to the appearance of David, who seems to have arrived just in time to rescue it from the low state of inanity, feebleness, and falsehood, into which it was rapidly sinking; though he perpetuated many of its errors, especially its affectations; from these it seems almost impossible for the majority of the French artists to disengage themselves.

The terms here applied may seem somewhat harsh and unjust in the opinion of those who regard art as intended only to confer a transient enjoyment, and feel not that its highest and holiest end is to exercise an efficient moral power on mankind.

The corruptions which had spread over the whole surface of society in France before the great Revolution, and which broke out in those terrible convulsions that to this day still agitate it, penetrated even to the retirement of the artist's studio, and too often infected his labours with their unhealthy and unworthy influences;

so that the result of those labours, as a modern writer eloquently and enthusiastically remarks, when speaking of the state of art generally, "has never taught us one deep or holy lesson; it has not recorded that which is fleeting, nor penetrated that which is hidden, nor interpreted that which was obscure; it has never made us feel the wonder, nor the power, nor the glory, of the universe; it has not prompted to devotion, nor touched with awe; its power to move and exalt the heart has been fatally abused, and perished in the abusing. That which ought to have been a witness to the omnipotence of God has become an exhibition of the dexterity of man, and that which should have lifted our thoughts to the throne of the Deity has encumbered them with the inventions of his creatures."*

It is impossible to separate national art from national tastes and habits; the philosophy of the studio, so to speak, is derived from the pursuits and the predilections of the community. The mythology of the ancient Greeks peopled their groves and temples with the statues and paintings of their deities; the saint-worship of the middle ages called into existence the host of great names which have immortalised the schools of Italy and Spain, and, later still, a few in that of the Low Countries; while Watteau and Greuze found amid the gaieties and frivolities of the time of Louis XIV and his successors fit subjects for their pencils. The argument applies equally to every period and country; few among us but would prefer a group of dogs by Landseer, a "Boy's School" by Webster, or a landscape by Creswick, to any "St. Jerome" or "St. Agnes" that ever was painted. But we are not prepared to argue that such preferences are, in all cases, to be encouraged; apart from the pleasure to be derived from pictures, is the consideration—certainly of no less importance—what mental enjoyment will their possession afford? Like books, unless they teach us something, they are comparatively worthless, and may be classed only among the ornamental furniture of the apartment where they hang.

Greuze was born in 1726, at Tournus, in Burgundy, and studied painting first in Lyons, afterwards at the Academy of Arts in Paris, and subsequently in Rome. His pictures are chiefly of what is called the genre kind, that is, they refer to domestic scenes and ordinary incidents of life, and he frequently painted portraits; the only historical work from his hand is "Severus reprimanding his son for calling." The titles of some of his most popular pictures will best explain the sort of subjects he usually selected: "The Good Father," "The Little Girl and the Dog," "Good Education," "The Blind Man cheated," "The Broken Pitcher," "The Village Bride," &c. &c. He had a decided partiality for exciting and pathetic scenes, but generally treated them with a degree of extravagance and affectation that destroyed their natural truth and simplicity. The same remark will apply to his portraits, especially of young females; they are graceful but not refined, and sometimes not chaste in expression of character. Greuze was long an associate of the French Academy; but upon being elected a full member, he was placed in the genre class, which he considered below his deserts, and therefore retired altogether from the institution. He died at an advanced age in 1805.

Within the last few years the pictures of this painter have been much sought after in this country by collectors, but for what reason it is difficult to understand, inasmuch as they have comparatively little merit as works of real art. His figures are generally correct and vigorous in drawing, but, as previously remarked, extravagant in expression; his colouring, except his flesh tints, is cold, feeble, and inharmonious, and his light and shade are unskilfully and ineffectually managed. But he has recently grown into fashion, and consequently large sums are now offered for productions that scarcely exhibit either mind or matter. As an instance of this, the writer was present at a sale of pictures a year or two since, when a small oval painting, representing only the head of a young girl, was knocked down to the present Marquis of Hertford for upwards of eight hundred guineas; a dozen works, better in every respect, might have been purchased out of our annual exhibitions for less than the sum paid for this single piece of prettiness.

The original of the "Innocence" is certainly among the best pictures of its class which Greuze painted; it is more free from affectation, and charms no less by its sweetness of expression than by its purity; it shows, that if the artist had been thrown amid other scenes, or had his mind been directed by more elevated principles, he might have risen to the rank of a great painter; but now, as one of his countrymen writes of him, he is only "unique" in the French school.

THE LUCKY PENNY.

DR MRS. S. C. HALL.

CHAP. I.

"AND what will you do with yours, Willy?"

"I dun know," replied the heavy-looking urchin, while he turned the halfpence over and over in his hand; "two hap'nees; it's not much." Ned pirouetted on one broad bare foot, and tossed a summerset on the pavement, close to the pretty basket shop at a corner of Covent Garden Market, while "Willy" pondered over the halfpence. When "Ned" recovered his breath, and had shouldered the door-post for half a minute, he again spoko:

"And that one, just riding away on his fine responsible horse, thought he'd make our fortunes, this frosty new-year's morning, with his three pence betwixt three of us—and his grand condition—that we should meet him on this spot, if living, this day twel'months, and tell him what we did with the pennies! Hurroo! as if we could remember. I say, Willy, suppose you and I toss up for them—head wins?"

"No, no," replied the prudent Willy, putting the halfpence into his pocket, and attempting to button the garment; an unsuccessful attempt, inasmuch as there was no button: "No; I'll not make up my mind jist yet; I'll may-be let it lie, and show it him this day twal'month. He may give more for taking care of un."

"Easy, easy," persisted Ned, "let tail win, if you don't like head."

"I'll not have it, no way."

"But where's Richard gone?" inquired the careless boy, after varying his exercise by walking on his hands, and kicking his feet in the air.

"I dun know" replied the other; "it's most like he's gone home: that's where he goes most times: he comes the gentleman over us because of his education."

"He has no spirit," said Ned, contemptuously; "he never spends his money like—like me."

"He got the 'lucky penny,' for all that," answered Willy, "for I saw the hole in it myself."

"Look at that now!" exclaimed Ned; "it's ever the way with him; see now, if that don't turn up something before the year's out. While we sleep under bridges, in tatur-baskets, and 'darkies,' he sleeps on a bed; and his mother stitches o'nights, and days too. He's as high up as a gentleman, and yet he's as keen after a job as a cat after a sparra."

The two boys lounged away, while the third—the only one of the three who had earned his penny, by holding a gentleman's horse for a moment, while the others looked on—had passed rapidly to a small circulating library near Cranbourne Alley, and laying down his penny on the counter, looked in the bookseller's face, and said, "Please, sir, will you lend me the works of Benjamin Franklin—for a penny?"

The bookseller looked at the boy, and then at the penny, and inquired if he were the lad who had carried the parcels about for Thomas Brand, when he was ill.

The boy said he was.

"And would you like to do so now, on your own account?" was the next question. The pale pinched-up features of the youth crimsoned all over, and his dark deep-set eyes were illumined as if by magic.

"Be your messenger, sir?—indeed I would."

"Who could answer for your character?"

"My mother, sir; she knows me best," he replied with great simplicity.

"But who knows her?" said the bookseller, smiling.

"Not many, sir; but the landlady where we live, and some few others."

The bookseller inquired what place of worship they attended.

The lad told him, but added, "My mother has not been there lately."

"Why not?"

The deep flush returned, but the expression of the face told of pain, not pleasure. "My mother, sir, has not been well—and—the weather is cold—and her clothes are not warm." He eagerly inquired if he was wanted that day. The bookseller told him to be there at half-past seven the next morning, and that, meanwhile, he would inquire into his character.

The boy could hardly speak; unshed tears stood in his eyes, and, after sundry scrapes and bows, he rushed from the shop.

"Holloa, youngster!" called out the bookseller, "you have not told me your mother's name or address." The boy gave both, and again ran off. Again the bookseller shouted, "Holloa!"

"You have forgotten Franklin."

The lad bowed and scraped twice as much as ever; and muttering something about "joy" and "mother," placed the book inside his jacket and disappeared.

Richard Dolland's mother was seated in the smallest of all possible rooms, which looked into a court near the "Seven Dials." The window was but little above the flags, for the room had been slipped off the narrow entrance; and, stowed away into a corner, where there was space for a bedstead, a small table, a chair, and a box; there was a little bookshelf; upon it were three or four old books, an ink bottle, and some stumpy pens; and the grate only contained wood ashes.

Mrs. Dolland was plying her needle and thread at the window; but she did not realize that wonderful Daguerrotype of misery which one of our greatest poets drew; for she was not clad in "Unwomanly rags," though the very light coloured cotton-dress—the worn-out and faded blue "comforter" round her throat—the pale and purple hue of her face, proclaimed that poverty had been beside her many a dreary winter's day. The snow was drizzling in little hard bitter knots, not falling in soft gentle flakes, wooing the earth to resignation; and the woman, whose slight, almost girlish, figure, and fair braided hair, gave her an aspect of extreme youth, bent more and more forward to the light, as if she found it difficult to thread her needle; she rubbed her eyes until they became quite red; she rubbed the window-glass with her handkerchief (that was torn); and at last her hands fell into her lap, and large tears coursed each other over her pale cheeks; she pressed her eyes, and tried again; no—she could not pass the fine thread into the fine needle.

Oh, what an expression saddened her face into despair! she threw back her head, as if appealing to the Almighty; she clasped her thin palms together, and then, raising them slowly, pressed them on her eyes.

A light quick bounding step echoed in the little court—the mother knew it well; she arose, as if uncertain what to do—she shuddered—she sat down—took up her work; and when Richard, in passing, tapped against the window, she met the flushed excited face of her son with her usual calm, quiet smile.

"Here's a bright new-year's-day, mother!" he exclaimed.

"Where?" she said, looking drearily out at the falling snow, and dusting it off her son's coat with her hand.

"Everywhere, mother!"—he laid the book on the table—"I earned a penny, and I've got a place—there!"

"Got a place!" repeated the woman; and then her face flushed—"with whom? how?"

He detailed the particulars. "And I gave the penny, mother dear," he added, "to read the 'Works of Benjamin Franklin,' which will teach me how to grow rich and good; I'll read the book to you this evening, while you work."

The flush on her cheek faded to deadly paleness.

"I don't know what's the matter with my eyes, Richard—they are so weak."

"Looking on the snow, mother; mine grow weak when I look on the snow."

How she caught at the straw!—"I never thought of that, Richard; I dare say it is bad. And what did ye with the penny, dear?"

"I told you, mother; I got the reading of the 'Works of Benjamin Franklin' for it, and it's a book that will do me great good; I read two or three pages here and there of it, at the very shop where I am to be employed, when I was there for Thomas Brand, before he died. It was just luck that took me there to look for it—the book, I mean—and then the gentleman offered me the place; I'm sure I have worn, as Ned Brady says, 'the legs off my feet,' tramping after places—and that to offer itself to me—think of that, mother! Poor Tom Brand had four shillings a-week, but he could not make out a bill—I can; Benjamin Franklin (he wrote 'Poor Richard's Almanac,' you know) says, 'there are no gains without pains;' and I'm sure poor father took pains enough to teach me, though I have the gains, and he had the—"

The entrance of his future master arrested Richard's eloquence; he made a few inquiries, found his way into a back kitchen to the landlady, and, being satisfied with what he heard, engaged the lad at four shillings a-week; he looked kindly at the gentle mother, and uncomfortably at the grate; then slid a shilling into Mrs. Dolland's hand, "in advance."

"It was not 'luck,' Richard," said she to her son, after the long, gaunt-looking man of books had departed; "it's all come of God's goodness!"

There was a fire that evening in the widow's little room, and a whole candle was lit; and a cup of tea, with the luxuries of milk, sugar, and a little loaf, formed their new-year's fete; and yet two-pence remained out of the book-seller's loan!—

When their frugal meal was finished, Mrs. Dolland worked on mechanically, and Richard threaded her needle; the boy read aloud to her certain passages which he thought she might like, he wondered she was not more elated at his success; she seemed working unconsciously, and buried in her own thoughts; at last, and not without a feeling of pain, he ceased reading aloud, and forgot all external cares in the deep interest he took in the self-helping volume that rested on his lap.

Suddenly he looked up, aroused by a sort of half-breathed sigh; his mother's large eyes were fixed upon him,—there was something in the look and the expression he thought he had never seen before.

"Richard," she said, "is there any hope in that book?"

"Hope, mother! why, it is full, full of hope; for a poor lad, it is one great hope from beginning to end. Why, many a copy my father set from Poor Richard's Almanac, though I don't think he knew it. Don't you remember 'Help hands, for I have no lands,' and 'Diligence is the mother of good luck,' and that grand long one I wrote in small-hand—'Since thou art not sure of a minute, throw not away an hour.'"

"Yes, dear, those were pleasant days; I mind them well; when he went, all went.

"No, mother," replied the boy; "and I don't know what is the matter to-day, you are not a bit like yourself; you used to say that God was always with us, and that hope was a part of God.—And it is new-year's-day, and has begun so well; I have got a place—and a nice one; suppose it had been at a butcher's or green-grocers?—we should have been thankful,—but among books, and such like, with odd minutes for reading, and every penny of four shillings a-week;—mother, you need not work so hard now."

"I can't, Richard," she said; and then there was a long pause.

When she spoke again her voice seemed stifled. "I have been turning in my own mind what I could do; what do you think of ballad-singing—and a wee dog to lead me?"

"What is it, mother?" inquired the boy; and he flung himself on his knees beside her. "What sorrow is it?"

She laid her cheek on his head, while she whispered—so terrible did the words seem—"I am growing dark, my child; I shall soon be quite, quite BLIND." He drew back, pushed the hair off her brow, and gazed into her eyes steadily.

"It is over-work—weakness—illness—it cannot be blindness; it will soon be all right again; they are only a very little dim, mother."

And he kissed her eyes and brow until his lips were moist with her tears.

"If God would but spare me my sight, just to keep on a little longer, and keep me from the parish (though we have good right to its help), and save me from being a burden—a millstone—about your neck, Richard!"

"Now don't, mother; I will not shed a tear this blessed new-year's-day; I won't believe it is as you say; it's just the trouble and the cold you have gone through; and the tenderness you were once used to—though I only remember my father a poor schoolmaster, still he took care of you. You know my four shillings a-week will do a great deal; it's a capital salary," said the boy, exultingly; "four broad white shillings a-week! you can have some nourishment then." He paused a moment and opened his eyes. "I suppose I am not to live in the house; if I was, and you had it ALL—Oh, mother, you would n't be so comfortable!"

Presently he took down his father's Bible, and read a psalm—it was the first Psalm:—

"Blessed is the man that walketh not in the council of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful;

"But his delight is in the law of the Lord, and in his law doth he meditate day and night;

"And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper."—

The boy paused.

"There, mother! is there not hope in that?"

"There is, indeed—and comfort," answered the widow; "and I am always glad when you read a book containing plenty of hope. The present is often so miserable that it is natural to get away from it, and feel and know there is something different to come; I have often sat with only hope for a comforter when you have been seeking employment; and I have been here without food or fire, or anything—but hope."

"And I used to think you so blythe, mother, when I came into the court, and heard you singing."

"I have often sobbed through a song, Richard, and yet it was comfort, somehow, to sing it. I dare say there is a deal of hope in that new book of yours, but I wish it may be sanctified hope—hope of the right kind. Your poor father used to talk of unsanctified philosophy, but he was too wise, as well as too good for me—you ought to be good and wise, my child—God grant it!"

"To look at it, mother," said the boy, with an earnestness beyond his years; "I was so full of joy at being employed, that I thought my heart would break, and now—" his young spirit bounded bravely above the trial—"no—not now will I believe what you fear; rest and comfort; you need not embroider at nights now; you can knit, or make nets, but no fine work."

Strangers, to have heard him talk, would have imagined that his luxuriant imagination was contemplating four pounds instead of four shillings a-week; only those who have wanted, and counted over the necessities to be procured by pence, can comprehend the wealth of shillings.

These two were alone in the world; the husband and father had died of consumption; he had been an earnest, true, book-loving man, whose enthusiastic and poetic temperament had been branded as "dreamy"—certainly, he was fonder of thinking than of acting; he had knowledge enough to have given him courage, but perhaps the natural delicacy of his constitution rendered his struggles for independence insufficient; latterly, he had been a schoolmaster, but certain religious scruples prevented his advancing with the great education movement beginning to agitate England; and when his health declined, his scholars fell away: but as his mental strength faded, that of his wife seemed to increase. She was nothing more than a simple, loving, enduring, industrious woman, noted in the village of their adoption as possessing a most beautiful voice; and often had the sound of her own minstrelsy, hymning God's praise, or on week-days welling forth the tenderness or chivalry of an old ballad, been company and consolation to her wearied spirit.

Books and music refine external things; and born and brought up in their atmosphere, Richard, poor, half-starved, half-naked, running hither and thither in search of employment, and cast among really low, vicious, false, intemperate, godless children, was preserved from contagion. It was a singular happiness that his mother never feared for him; one of the many bits of poetry of her nature, was the firm faith she entertained that the son of her husband—whose memory was to her as the protection of a titular saint—could not be tainted by evil example. She knew the boy's burning thirst for knowledge; she knew his struggles, not for ease, but for labour; she knew his young energy, and wondered at it; she knew the devotional spirit that was in him;—yet in all these things she put no trust: but she felt as though the invisible but present spirit of his father was with him through scenes of sin and misery, and encompassed him as with a halo, so that he might walk, like the prophets of Israel, through a burning fiery furnace unscathed.

These two—mother and son—were alone in their poverty-stricken sphere; and that new-year's-day had brought to the mother both hope and despair: but though an increasing film came between her and the delicate embroidery she wrought with so much skill and care,—though the confession that she was growing "dark," caused her sharper agony than she had suffered since her husband's death,—still, as the evening drew on, and she put by her work, her spirit lightened under the influence of the fresh and healthful hope which animated her son. She busied herself with sundry contrivances for his making a neat appearance on the following day; she forced him into a jacket which he had out-grown, to see how he looked, and kissed and blessed the bright face which, she thanked God, she could still see. Together they turned out, and over and over again, the contents of their solitary box; and Richard, by no means indifferent to his personal appearance at any time, said, very frankly, that he thought his acquaintances, Ned Brady and William, or Willy "No-go," as he was familiarly styled, would hardly recognize him on the morrow, if they should chance to meet.

"But if I lend you this silk handkerchief, that was your poor father's, to tie round your neck, don't let it puff you up," said the simple-minded woman, "don't; and don't look down upon Ned Brady and William No-go (what an odd name); if they are good lads, you might ask them in to tea some night (that is, when we have tea); they must be good lads, if you know them."

And then followed a prayer and a blessing, and, much later than usual, after a few happier tears, another prayer, and another blessing, the worn-out eyes, and those so young and fresh, closed in peaceful sleep.

"Neddy, my boy!" stammered Mrs. Brady to her son, as she staggered to her wretched lodging that night, "it's wonderful luck ye' had with that penny; the four-pence ye' won through it at 'pitch and toss' has made a woman of me; I am as happy as a queen—as a queen, Neddy." The unfortunate creature flourished her arm so decidedly that she broke a pane of glass in a shopkeeper's window, and was secured by a policeman for the offence; poor unfortunate Ned followed his mother, with loud incoherent lamentations, wishing "bad luck" to every one, but more especially to the police, and the gentleman that brought him into misery by his mean penny;—if it had been a sum he could have done anything with—but a penny! what could be done with one poor penny, but spend it!

Willy's penny went into a box with several other coins; his mother lacked the common necessaries of life,—still Willy hoarded, and continued to look after his treasure as a magpie watches the silver coin she drops into a hole in a castle wall.

THE BIRMAN EMPIRE—THE SEAT OF WAR.

BY HORACE ST. JOHN.

THE British are once more carrying on war in Asia; the succession of their conquests is close and rapid. Scarcely was the army returned from Afghanistan, than Sir Charles Napier was routing a host at the gates of Sindh; and no sooner was his victory ratified by peace in the valley of the Indus, than a hundred great guns were roaring along the banks of the Sutlej. All these episodes awakened in England much interest concerning the independent territories contiguous to our own in the East; and it became important to inquire into the nature and condition of the countries thus connected with British India. We are now again at war, not with a petty state, but with the most extensive, and one of the most ancient sovereignties in the neighbourhood of Hindustan. It is, therefore, interesting to glance at its situation, extent, resources, and actual advance in the arts and advantages of civilization. The information is the more necessary to be diffused, because a considerable division of its territory will probably fall under our rule.

In the south-eastern extremity of Asia, or India beyond the Ganges, is situated the extensive empire of Birmah. It is enclosed between Assam and Tibet on the north, the Indian Ocean and Siam on the south, and on the east the unexplored regions of Laos, Laetho, and Cambodia; the river Nauf and a ridge of hills separate it on the west from the British districts of Tipperah and Chittagong, in Bengal. From the rapacious character of its sovereigns, however, the limits of the Birman Empire, except where confined by the sea, have perpetually fluctuated, and generally continued to enlarge. Conquest has added province after province to its original dominion; its length may now be estimated at about a thousand miles, and its breadth at six hundred; while its total area has been computed at a hundred and ninety-four thousand. Ava Proper, however, which constitutes the seat of the ancient monarchy, is a moderately-sized country in the centre,—various subjugated territories lying around,—Pegu, Martaoan, Junk Ceylon, Yunshan, Lowashan, and Cassay, with, formerly, Arracan, Tenasserim, Mergui, and Tavoy, which were conquered by the British in 1826. There are some good harbours on the coast, with several rivers of considerable size,—the Irrawaddy, the Kinduen, the Lokiang, and the Pegu, besides one or two beautiful lakes.

Throughout the cleared tracts of this large country, except over the hot and moist lands of the Delta, there prevails a very healthy climate; its seasons are regular, and the extremes of temperature are seldom experienced, except just previously to the rains, when the heat becomes, for a few days, sultry and oppressive. Indeed, with the exception of a broad delta, formed by the mouths of the Irrawaddy, the surface is generally hilly and dry. In the south are provinces with a remarkably fine soil, producing crops of rice as heavy as are yielded by the richest lands in Bengal, which is considered the Lombardy of Asia. In the north, the rugged and mountainous tracts are comparatively poor, as all such regions are, but the small plains and valleys are everywhere of superior fertility; they grow excellent wheat, with all kinds of grains and legumes found in other parts of India. Among the indigenous productions are sugar-canes, tobacco of remarkable quality, indigo, cotton, and innumerable tropical fruits. In one province, towards the north-east, tea is cultivated, but of a poor flavour, and seldom used by the inhabitants, except as a pickle. Several districts contain forests of the celebrated Avan teak-tree, flourishing principally among hills. Every species of timber found in Hindustan thrives in Birmah, with the fir, though this, on account of its soft wood, is of little value, except for the turpentine it yields. Unfortunately, also, the forests are exceedingly unhealthy, and none can follow the occupation of wood-cutters except men of certain particular tribes, born and bred on the mountains: even these are said to be very short-lived.

minerals than Ava. In the north, about six days' journey from Bunoo, are mines of gold and silver. On a hill near Kinduen are others, and rubies and sapphires are found there in great numbers, as well as near the capital. So long have these localities been famed, that in the sixteenth century the jewellers of Europe travelled to them for their costly gems. Iron, tin, lead, antimony, arsenic, and sulphur, are found in vast abundance; amber, pure and pellucid, is dug up near the streams, in the beds of which rich auriferous deposits are discovered. One which flows between the Kinduen and the Irawaddy is called among the natives the "River of Golden Sand." There are no diamonds or emeralds in Birmah, but amethysts, garnets, chrysolites, and jasper, with marble, which, when polished, is almost transparent, and equals the finest of that from which the unrivalled genius of Italian art has created forms of all but living beauty. The Emperor monopolises this article, which is held sacred, because from it are sculptured the images of the gods, to be seen in the bell-shaped temples of the country. Among royal privileges, also, is that of possessing the celebrated wells which yield petroleum oil, universally used in Birmah, and producing for the crown a large revenue.

Between Amarapura, in Ava, and Yunnan, in China, is carried on a lucrative trade. The principal export is white and brown cotton, which is carried up the Irawaddy in capacious boats as far as Bamoo, where a number of merchants from the Celestial Empire congregate to buy, and transport it to their own city in caravans. Amber, ivory, jewels, betel nuts, and edible birds' nests, from the blooming islands of the Indian Archipelago, are also exchanged with them for raw and wrought silks, velvets, gold leaf, preserves, paper, and hardware. Several thousand boats are continually passing up and down the great stream with rice, salt, and pickled sprats; the Irawaddy, indeed, is the principal channel of commerce into the heart of that extensive population. A few trains of men, however, proceed once a-year over the mountains, from Arracan, bearing on their heads packs of various merchandize—English broad-cloths, Bengal muslins, silk handkerchiefs, china, and glass. Cocoa-nuts from the Nicobar Isles are esteemed a great delicacy, and sold at a high price. In return, these primitive traders carry back precious stones, gumlac, and silver, though the export of that metal is prohibited.

Teak and other timber is exported to British India, but being a royal privilege, the trade is restricted. At one time, the king, having granted a monopoly of it to some favourite, the teak planks were sold at more than five pounds sterling a pair—that is, the equivalent of so much English money; for in Birmah, as in China, there is no minted coin,—the currency is silver bullion and lead. All common articles are exchanged for so many weights of lead, a metal which has thus acquired an artificial value: the finer substance is reserved for more dignified negotiations; it is not very plentiful, but highly prized. Among the laws of the empire is one,—“that no females and no silver be exported.”

The king of Ava, monarch of the Birman Empire, is the inheritor of enormous pride. Like his neighbour of China, the brother of the Sun and Moon, and the ruler of Assam, whom he conquered, though he was styled “Sovereign of Heaven,” he acknowledges no equal on earth, entitles himself Boa, and, with the arrogance of feeble and inflated vanity, pretends to dispose, his own majestic way, the destinies of Asia. Occasionally, he has been condescending enough to concern himself, also, for the settlement of affairs in Europe. Thus, in 1810, during the general war, he was so far kind as to inform the British envoy, that if England had made application to him “in a proper manner,” he would have sent an army, beaten all her enemies, and put her in possession of “the whole continent of France.” About the same time, among the “vassals” of his Birman majesty, was formally included “the king of England;” he described us, in a letter, as a petty nation, inhabiting a small island in a remote sea, and took to himself credit for more than mortal magnanimity, when he offered to forgive the governor-general “for the numerous falsehoods he had told,” because he was not desirous of breaking the general peace by calling forth his armies to drive us out of India!

It was this wretched Chinese vanity that induced him then to risk a conflict with us, and the same ignorant presumption prevents him yielding reparation for his continual offences. With his chief ministers of state, his assistant-ministers, his ministers of the interior, his secretaries, his notaries, his great chamberlains, his receivers and readers of petitions, his banners, umbrellas, globes, swords, thrones, canopies, and imperial seals, he imagines himself in his capital—the “City of the Immortals”—to be a potentate, excelling in wealth, splendour, and power, the most awful monarchs of the earth. He is the fountain of all grace in his realms, for there are no hereditary honours except his own; all officers holding their functions at the pleasure of the king, who rewards them meanly, but allows them pernicious privileges in trade. To his viceroy in Pegu he once granted a monopoly of supplying coffins; but as this favour depends on the temperament of an hour, the reverse is frequently experienced, and the governor of a province may one week be rioting in the oppression of a large population, and the next be dragged to court with a chain about his neck. One of them was punished in this manner for too much leniency in his administration, though only a few days before he had ordered the stomachs of twelve men, women, and children, to be ripped up, because they were suspected of disaffection. This horrible massacre was prevented through the influence of the British,—an influence which directly, as well as otherwise, has been an unmingled blessing to the races of India.

The population of the Birman empire is probably less than eight millions, though it appears to have been larger at a former period. Its condition is one of decay; weak and wicked governments, tyrannical conscription, and cruel burdens, reduce to misery a region capable, from its natural resources, of so much prosperity. Cities have sunk to villages, villages disappeared; cultivation has dwindled, and general industry decreased. Those who cannot pay their taxes are sold as slaves—and this often occurs from the severity of the imposts. One-tenth of all produce nominally belongs to the government; but this is far from the proportion usually exacted. Consequently, in spite of the impoverished state of the country, the treasures of the sovereign appear to be immense—the revenues accumulating; since it is a maxim, that whatever goes into an Oriental exchequer, very little ever gets into circulation again. However, the British seem likely to sink his coffers a little. They have already demanded a quarter of a million sterling of him, and will charge him £10,000 a day, as the cost of the war, until its conclusion.

The Birman are a military nation, every man being liable to be called upon to serve as a soldier. The standing army, however, is very small; and the largest force ever levied was sixty thousand men. The infantry are armed with muskets and sabres, and the cavalry, mounted on small but active horses, with spears. Every considerable town on the river's bank furnishes, in addition, a number of war-boats, which constitute the most respectable part of the imperial armaments. As many as five hundred have been collected at one time. Each has from forty to fifty rowers, with thirty soldiers, and one gun.

Their fire-arms are of the worst description; their artillery, though numerous, ineffective and ill-served; and their fortifications, though sometimes imposing to the eye, possessed of few qualifications to resist the assault of Europeans. Almost all the towns and villages, however, are cleverly stockaded.

Though close neighbours of the slim, effeminate, and listless Bengalese, the people of Birman differ essentially from them. A narrow range of hills, indeed, appears there to form a division between two distinct families of mankind. They are an active, energetic, inquisitive race; irascible and impatient, but with the capacity to learn. They do not confine their women, allowing them, indeed, all the freedom they enjoy in Europe; yet the condition of the sex is degraded, and their treatment, far from being delicate or chivalrous, is not even humane. They are sold without repugnance to strangers, but are never allowed to be taken out of the country. All the children of Europeans born there, also, are subjects of the Avau King, and forced to remain, leading a life of misery and humiliation. In general, the women are faithful to their husbands, whose servants, in fact, they are. Marriage is purely a civil contract, and one wife only is allowed, though numerous female slaves are included in a rich man's household. When he dies, without writing a will, three-fourths of his property go to his lawful children, and one-fourth to the widow. The dead are not burned, but buried; though, in Avau, a priest's body was formerly shot out of a huge cannon, which, it was supposed, sent his spirit to Heaven on a flash of fire!

The people have a Chinese cast of feature, and obviously are to be reckoned among the Hindu-Chinese nations. The men are of low stature, but athletic and active, long preserving a youthful appearance, because, instead of shaving, they pluck the hair from their faces. The women are fairer, but less delicately formed than the Hindus. Both sexes blacken the teeth, and the lids and lashes of the eye. They are comparatively an uncleanly race; and, though to kill domesticated animals is forbidden, game is eagerly sought for as food by the rich, and all kinds of reptiles by the poor. If a stranger happens to shoot a fat bullock, they are not, like some in India, fanatical to revenge the offence. Indeed, though a vain, presuming people, encouraged by the example of their rulers to arrogance and barbarian pride, their demeanour is far from insolent or supercilious. Some travellers have erroneously described them as rude in manners, because they do not rise from their seats on the approach of a stranger, but among them the sitting posture is considered most respectful. In their mode of living a general simplicity prevails, their habitations being slight structures of bambus and mats, with a thatch of leaves, raised on posts three or four feet from the ground. No subject is permitted to employ any gilding in the decoration of his house, and only a few favourites are allowed to paint or lacquer the pillars.

The king reserves as his own prerogative the use of these ornaments. Everything appertaining to him has the word "shoe" or "gold" prefixed to it. Even his person is never mentioned except in conjunction with the imperial metal. When the petition of a subject has been transmitted to his majesty, "it has reached the golden ears;" when audience is granted, you have been "at the golden feet;" attar of roses is "grateful to the golden nose." Gold, therefore, is of too exalted a quality to be commonly used, and only very rich women wear ornaments of it, while none but a highly-privileged noble can put rings of it into his ears.

From this it may be imagined that the pride of rank in Birmah runs somewhat high. A chief journeying on the river will not sit in the same vessel with the oarsmen, who there go ahead in a boat, and tow his barge along. Neither will he enter the habitation of any inferior man, but sends servants on in advance of him, to build a house for his reception. A few bambus, a little grass, and some pliant rattans, are all the materials required; not a nail is used, and the whole might fall without injuring a lap-dog. Formerly, however, as many ruins remain to testify, masonry was well understood by the Birmese; but wooden buildings now supersede all others, and the degeneracy of the useful arts has followed the decay of the people.

The laws and religion of the Birmese are fundamentally Hindu; but they have no caste prejudices, and education is largely diffused among them. Music and poetry are highly admired; and the king has an immense library, the books being deposited in chests, with the contents described in letters of gold on the lid.

There are three important personages, or "estates of the realm," in Birmah. The first, is the king; the second, is the white elephant; the third, is the queen. To the white elephant all presents from foreign ambassadors are made.

The one seen by Captain Canning was a small animal of a sandy colour, apparently diseased. His residence is contiguous to the royal palace, and consists of a lofty hall, hung with velvet curtains, and supported by gilded pillars. His forefeet are secured by silver chains to two posts, and his hinder feet by links of a baser metal. Thick soft mattresses, covered with blue cloth and crimson silk, serve him as a bed; his body is adorned with trappings of cloth of gold, studded with diamonds, sapphires, and rubies; his feeding-trough is equally rich; and a thousand attendants wait upon him. This extraordinary custom originates in the belief that a white elephant is the last stage of a human soul, in millions of transmigrations, after which the spirit is absorbed in the essence of divinity, to enjoy the pure beatitude of heaven. "Lord of the White Elephant, and of all the Elephants in the World," is one of the king's titles, and he is actually lord of all the elephants in Birmah, since no one but a noble, privileged by the sovereign, is permitted to possess or employ one of these animals.

The king, the queen, and the white elephant dwell at Amarapura, or the City of the Immortals, built on the shores of a deep and extensive lake, enclosed by a curving sweep of hills, and embosomed amid scenery the most fresh and picturesque. It is reputed to contain vast treasures, and its fortifications are said to be strong; but there is no doubt of their easy reduction by an English force. The principal defence of the country, indeed, is the heat of its climate; for this, though salubrious to the natives, is formidable to Europeans, compelled to expose themselves in the sun. Otherwise, as we have said, Birmah is healthy, and among its hills may be found spots with an atmosphere as genial as that of the pleasant valleys lately discovered in the Himalaya.

Since the war is only now begun, and every mail may be expected to renew and increase the public excitement as to the Birman empire, this slight sketch, affording an idea of its actual characteristics as a country, may be found interesting by our readers. The information is the most authentic, and such as is not yet popularly diffused. It will be seen that a very important region, a very curious people, and a very singular state of manners exist there, to be brought under the influence of British power and, gradually, of British civilization.

THE PROGRESS OF THE ROSE.

BY D. F. M'CARTHY.

THE days of old—the good old days,
Whose misty mem'ry haunts us still,
Demand alike our blame and praise,
And claim their share of good and ill.

They had strong faith in things unseen,
But stronger in the things they saw;
Revenge for mercy's pitying men,
And lordly right for equal law.

'Tis true, the cloisters, all throughout
The valleys, rais'd their peaceful tow'rs,
And their sweet bells ne'er wearied out,
In telling of the tranquil hours.

But from the craggy hills above,
A shadow darken'd o'er the sward;
For there—a vulture to this dove—
Hung the rude fortress of the lord;

Whence oft the ravening bird of prey
Descending, to his cry wild,
Bore, with exulting cries, away,
The pow'rless serf's dishonour'd child.

Then Safety lit with partial beams
But the high castled peaks of Force,
And Polity revers'd its streams,
And bade them flow but for their Source,—

That Source from which, meandering down,
A thousand streamlets circle now;
For then, the monarch's glorious crown
But girt the most rapacious brow.

But individual force is dead,
And link'd opinion late takes birth;
And now a woman's gentle head
Supports the mightiest crown on earth:

A pleasing type of all the change
Permitted to our eyes to see,
When she herself is free to range,
Throughout the realm her rule makes free;

Not prison'd in a golden cage,
To sigh or sing her lonely state—
A show for youth or doating age,
With idiot eyes to contemplate.

But when the season sends a thrill
To ev'ry heart that lives and moves,
She seeks the freedom of the hill,
Or shelter of the noontide groves;

There, happy with her chosen mate,
And circled by her chirping brood,
Forgets the pain of being great,
In the mere bliss of being good.

And thus the festive summer yields
No sight more happy, none so gay,
As when amid her subject-fields
She wanders on from day to day.

Resembling her, whom proud and fond
The bard doth sing of—she of old,
Who bore upon her snow-white wand
All Erin through, the ring of gold.

Thus, from her castles coming forth,
She wanders many a summer hour,
Bearing the ring of private worth
Upon the silver wand of Power.

Thus musing, while around me flew
Sweet airs from Faney's amaranth bow'rs,
Methought, what this fair Queen doth do,
Hath yearly done, the Queen of Flow'rs.

The beauteous Queen of all the flowers,
Whose faintest sigh is like a spell,
Was born in Eden's sinless bowers,
Long ere our primal parents fell.

There, in a perfect form, she grew,
Nor felt decay, nor tasted death;
Heaven was reflected in her hue,
And Heaven's own odours filled her breath.

And ere the angel of the Sword
Drove thence the founders of our race,
They knelt before him, and implor'd
Some relic of that radiant place,—

Some relic that, while time would last,
Should make men weep their fatal sin—
Proof of the glory that was past,
And type of that they yet might win.

The angel turn'd; and ere his hands
The gates of bliss for ever close,
Pluck'd from the fairest tree that stands
Within Heaven's walls—the peerless Rose;

And as he gave it unto them,
Let fall a tear upon its leaves—
The same celestial liquid gem
We oft perceive on dewy eves.

Grateful, the hapless twain went forth
The golden portals backward whirl'd
Then first they felt the biting north,
And all the rigour of this world;

Then first the dreadful curse had power
To chill the life-streams at their source,
'Till e'en the sap within the flower
Grew curdled in its upward course.

They twin'd their trembling hands across
Their trembling breasts against the drift,
Then sought some little mound of moss,
Wherein to lay their precious gift,—

Some little soft and mossy mound,
Wherein the flower might rest till morn;
In vain! God's curse was on the ground,
For through the moss outgleam'd the thorn!

Outgleam'd the forked plant, as if
The serpent tempter, in his rage,
Had put his tongue in every leaf,
To mock them through their pilgrimage.

They did their best; their hands eras'd
The thorns of greater strength and size;
Then 'mid the softer moss they plac'd
The exil'd flower of Paradise.

The plant took root; the beams and showers
Came kindly, and its fair head rear'd;
But lo! around its heaven of flowers,
The thorns and moss of earth appear'd.

Type of the greater change that then
Upon our hapless nature fell;
When the degenerate hearts of men
Bore sin and all the thorns of hell.

Happy, indeed, and sweet our pain,
However torn, however tost;
If, like the rose, our hearts retain
Some vestige of the heaven we've lost.

Where she upon this colder sphere
Found shelter first, she there abode;
Her native bowers, unseen, were near,
And near her still Euphrates flow'd.

Brilliantly flow'd; but ah! how dim,
Compar'd to what its light had been;
As if the fiery cherubim
Let pass the tide, but kept its sheen.

At first she liv'd and reign'd alone,
No lily-maidens yet had birth;
No turban'd tulips round her throne
Bow'd with their foreheads to the earth.

No rival sisters had she yet—
She with the snowy forehead fringed
With blushes; nor the sweet brunette
Whose cheek the yellow sun has ting'd.

Nor all the harbingers of May,
Nor all the clustering joys of June;
Uncarpeted the bare earth lay,
Unhung the branches' gay festoon.

But Nature came in kindly mood,
And gave her kindred of her own;
Knowing full well it is not good
For man or flower to be alone.

Long in her happy court she dwelt,
In floral games and feasts of mirth,
Until her heart kind wishes felt
To share her joy with all the earth.

To go from longing land to land
 A stateless queen—a welcome guest—
 O'er hill and vale—by sea and strand—
 From North to South, and East to West.

And thus it is that every year,
 Ere Autumn dons his russet robe,
 She calls her unseen charioteer,
 And makes her progress through the globe.

First, sharing in the month-long feast—
 "The Feast of Roses"—in whose light
 And grateful joy, the first and least
 Of all her subjects reunite.

She sends her heralds on before :
 The bee rings out his bugle bold,
 The daisy spreads her marbled floor,
 The butter-cup her cloth of gold.

The lark leaps up into the sky,
 To watch her coming from afar;
 The larger moon descends more nigh,
 More lingering lags the morning star.

From out the villages and towns,
 From all of mankind's mix'd abodes,
 The people, by the lawns and downs,
 Go meet her on the winding roads.

And some would bear her in their hands,
 And some would press her to their breast,
 And some would worship where she stands,
 And some would claim her as their guest.

Her gracious smile dispels the gloom
 Of many a love-sick girl and boy;
 Her very presence in a room
 Doth fill the languid air with joy.

Her breath is like a fragrant tune,
 She is the soul of every spot;
 Gives nature to the rich saloon,
 And splendour to the peasant's cot.

Her mission is to calm and soothe,
 And purely glad life's every stage;
 Her garlands grace the brow of youth,
 And hide the hollow lines of age.

But to the Poet she belongs,
 By immemorial ties of love;
 Herself a folded book of songs,
 Dropp'd from the angels' hands above.

Then come into his heart and home,
 For thee it opens, for thee it glows;
 Type of ideal beauty, come!
 Wonder of Nature! queenly Rose!

June, 1852.

THE TRIAL BY BATTLE.

A TALE OF CHIVALRY.*

CHAPTER I.—THE CORONATION.

EASTER-EVEN, in the year of our Lord 1099, was held as a high festival in the fine city of Barcelona: it was the coronation-day of the young Count Raymond Berenger the Third, whose twelvemonth's mourning for his lamented father and sovereign was to close with his own solemn inauguration. The count had accordingly, by his letters patent, convoked to his good city of Barcelona the bishops, barons, knights, and also the ambassadors from foreign courts, to witness him take his knighthood, and receive from the altar, and place upon his head, the garland of golden roses which formed the coronet of the Counts of Arragon.

At the appointed day, not only the prelates, barons, and chivalry of Spain repaired to the festival, but a great many foreign lords and princes: the Judge and the Archbishop of Albeda, from Sardinia; the King of Arragon, from Saragossa; and the King of Castile, from Madrid. The Moorish sovereigns of Meccen and Granada, not being able to come in person, had sent rich presents to the count, with congratulatory epistles by the hands of their ambassadors. Indeed, so great was the concourse to Barcelona on this day, that thirty thousand stirrups belonging to gentlemen of condition were counted in the city and its environs.

This concourse was too great for the count to receive at his own palace of Aljaferia, which stood a short distance from Barcelona: he was therefore compelled to limit the number of his guests to kings, prelates, princes, ambassadors, and their suites; and there were present in Barcelona at that time four thousand persons who claimed his hospitality as their right.

Throughout the day an immense crowd traversed the streets, visited the churches, or amused themselves with the tricks of the jugglers and mountebanks, passing from devotion to mirth, and from mirth to devotion; but towards evening every one took his way to the palace, for the count was to watch his arms that evening in the church of St. Saviour. The whole road to the palace, two miles from the city, was illuminated by torches, which were kindled before the close of the day, the moment the vesper-bell was rung. This broad avenue of light defined the route to the church of St. Saviour, and as soon as this was effected, the heralds appeared with the banners of the Count of Barcelona, and marshalled the people on each side, that the cortège might have room to pass, unobstructed by the pressure of the crowd. At the last stroke of the vesper-bell, the gates of the palace opened, amidst the joyful shouts of the multitude, who had been awaiting that event since the hour of noon.

The first who appeared in the procession were the noble knights of Catalonia, on horseback, wearing the swords of their forefathers; valiant blades, gapped by hard service in battle or tournament, bearing names like those of Charlemagne, Roland, and René.

Behind them came their squires, bearing the arms and naked swords of their masters, which, unlike the ancestral brands the knights had displayed, were bright and unstained; but they knew that in the hands of their owners they would soon lose their virgin brightness and lustre in the turmoil of battle.

Next appeared the sword of the lord count, made in the form of a cross, to recur continually to his mind that he was the soldier of God before he became an earthly prince. Neither emperor, king, nor count had ever before worn a sword better tempered, or more richly embossed with jewels on the hilt. It was in the hands of Don Juan Ximenes de la Roca, one of the bravest knights in the world, who held it till the time should arrive when it would pass into those of its master. He was supported on each side by the Baron Gulielmo di Cervallo and Sir Otto de Monçada.

After the sword of the lord count came his equerries, in two chariots, bearing lighted torches, and charged with ten quintals of wax, to be offered as a gift to the church of St. Saviour, because the count had vowed a taper to the altar, to expiate the fault his filial duty had obliged him to commit, since, detained in his own country by the long illness of his father, he had not departed for the Crusade. This wax taper had gone in solemn procession through the city, to prove the penitence of the count, who felt grief as a knight, and remorse as a Christian.

* This tale of chivalry is a free translation from one entitled Praxède, by Alexandre Dumas, and presents a complete description of the ancient trial, or appeal by battle, as formerly practised in the middle ages. The champion was supposed to depend upon God for making the cause he had undertaken good, provided the party he represented were clear of the crime of which he or she was accused. This law remained on the statute book of Great Britain un repealed until a few years since, when it was finally abolished. To those who love ancient customs, this translation from an eminent living author, deeply versed in such lore, may not prove either unacceptable or uninteresting.—JANE STRICKLAND.

After the chariots came the lord count himself, mounted on a steed magnificently caparisoned. He was a beautiful youth between eighteen and nineteen, wearing long ringlets on his shoulders, waving on either side, but restrained from concealing his open brow by a fillet of gold. He wore his close-fitting coat of war, for during the watch he would have to assume his armour; but this vestment was covered with a large mantle of cloth of gold, which fell even to his stirrups. Behind him followed his arms, carried by two nobles, consisting of a helmet, with the visor closed; a coat of mail of polished steel, inlaid with gold; a buckler, on which was engraved the garland of roses, the well-known sign of sovereignty of the Counts of Barcelona. The nobleman who bore these arms was accompanied by Roger, Count de Pallars, and Alphonse Ferdinando, Lord of Ixer, both with their swords drawn, to defend, if necessary, the royal armour.

After the armour of the lord count came, in pairs, the nobles upon whom he was to confer the honour of knighthood. They were twelve in number; and these, in their turn, were each to arm ten knights as soon as they had received the order; and these hundred and twenty came also in pairs, their fine horses magnificently caparisoned, and covered with cloth of gold.

Last of all, four abreast, came, first, the prelates; then the kings and the ambassadors from foreign courts, who represented the persons of their sovereigns; then the dukes, counts, and knights; each degree separated by the musicians, who rent the air with their trumpets, timbrels, and flutes. The last rank in the pageant was followed by the jongleurs, or jugglers, in the costume of savages, running on foot, or mounted on little horses without bridle or saddle, on whose backs they exhibited a variety of tricks.

Thus, by the aid of the flambeaux, which changed night into day, and darkness into light, and with the mighty sound of drums, tymbals, trumpets, and other musical instruments, aided by the shouts of the jongleurs, and the proclamations of the heralds, who called out "Barcelona! Barcelona!" the count was conducted to the church, having been seen by every one, on account of the slow progress of the procession, and the length of way between the palace and the sacred edifice. The hour of midnight, indeed, struck the moment the count alighted at the porch, where he was met by the Archbishop of Barcelona and all the clergy.

The lord count, followed by all the nobles who were to receive their arms, entered the church, and watched them together, according to old custom on such occasions, reciting prayers and singing psalms in honour of their Saviour. They passed the night very happily in these devotional services, and attended matins, which service was performed by the archbishops, bishops, priors, and abbots.

When the day broke, the church was opened to the congregation of the faithful, who filled it in such a fashion, that it was wonderful how so many men and women could be so closely crowded together without injury to themselves or their neighbours. The archbishop then made himself ready to say mass, and the lord count put on a surplice, as if he intended to assist him; but over the surplice he wore a richer dalmatica than emperor or king had ever appeared in, clasped at the throat with a diamond star, set round with pearls of inestimable value. Then he assumed the manipule or girdle, which was also very splendid; and every time he was invested with a new garment, the archbishop repeated a prayer. This ceremony being finished, the archbishop said mass; but when the epistle was ended he paused—when the two godfathers of the count, Don Juan Ximenes de la Roca and Don Alphonse Ferdinando, Lord of Ixer, approached the count, and one affixed the spur to his right heel, the other to his left—the solemn notes of the organ accompanying this part of the ceremonial. Then the count, approaching the altar, knelt before the shrine, and repeated to himself a whispered prayer, while the archbishop, standing by his side, prayed aloud.

When this prayer was ended, the count took the sword from the altar, kissed meekly the cross that formed its handle, girded it to his loins, and then, drawing it from its scabbard, brandished the knightly weapon three times. At the first flourish he defied all the enemies of the holy Catholic faith; at the second, he vowed to succour all widows, orphans, and minors; and at the third, he promised to render justice all his life to high and low, rich and poor, to his own subjects, and to foreigners who might require redress at his hands. At this last oath, a deep sonorous voice replied "Amen." Everybody turned round to see the person from whom this response proceeded: it came, however, from a Provençal jongleur, who had crowded into the church, notwithstanding the opposition made by those who did not consider him fit to be in such good company; but the count, having heard the quality of his respondent, would not allow him to be turned out, declaring, "that it would ill become him at such a moment to refuse the prayer of any one, be he lord or vassal, rich or poor, provided it came from a pure and contrite heart." The jongleur, in virtue of this declaration on the part of the lord count, was permitted to keep his place.

The lord count then, returning his sword to the scabbard, offered his person and his blade, by a solemn act of dedication, to God, praying him to take him into his holy keeping, and to give him the victory over all his enemies. The archbishop, after the lord count had uttered this prayer, anointed him with the holy chrisme on the right shoulder and arm; then he took the crown of golden roses from the altar and set it on his head, the godfathers of the lord count supporting the diadem on each side. At the same instant, the archbishops, bishops, abbots, kings, princes, and the two godfathers of the lord count, chaunted in chorus, with loud voices, Te Deum laudamus, during which the lord count took the golden sceptre in his left, and the globe in his right hand, and held them while the Te Deum was chaunted and the gospel read. He then replaced them on the altar, and seated himself in his chair of state, before which twelve nobles led up twelve knights, whom they armed one after the other; these, in their turn, retired to one of the twelve chapels belonging to the church, and armed, in like manner, ten knights.

The coronation being concluded, the lord count, with his crown on his head, bearing the golden sceptre and globe in his hands, and wearing the dalmatica, star, and belt, came out of the church, and mounted his horse; but as he could not guide his steed, encumbered as he was with these insignia of his high power and dignity, two pairs of reins were attached to the bridle, that on the left being held by his godfathers; the others, which were of white silk, and forty feet in length, were held by the barons, the knights, and the most eminent citizens of Catalonia; and after these came six deputies from Valencia, six from Saragoessa, and four from Tortosa; those who held the reins to the right or left marched on foot, to denote their subjection to the count their lord paramount, who in this stately manner, and with this magnificent cortège, towards noon returned to his palace of Aljaferia, amidst loud hurrahs and flourishes of trumpets. As soon as he alighted, he entered the dining-room, where a high throne had been prepared for him between two golden stools, on which he deposited the sceptre, the globe, and the crown. Then his two godfathers seated themselves near their sovereign, and the kings of Arragon and Castile, the archbishops of Saragoessa and Arboise, placed themselves by their side. At another table the bishops, dukes, and all the new-made knights, took their places; after them, the barons, envoys of the provinces, and the most eminent citizens of Barcelona, all marshalled according to their degree, were seated in due order, the whole assembly being waited upon by the junior nobility and knights.

The lord count himself was served by twelve nobles. His major domo, the Baron Gulielmo di Cervallo, brought in the first dish, singing a roundel; he was followed by twelve noblemen, each carrying a dish, and joining in full chorus. As soon as the roundel was concluded, he placed the dish before the lord count, and cut a portion, with which he served him; then he divested himself of his mantle and vest of cloth of gold, trimmed with ermine and ornamented with pearls, and gave them to a jongleur. As soon as he had arrayed himself in vestments of the same rich material, the major domo brought, in like manner, and followed by the same nobles, the first dish of the second course, singing a roundel, as before, and concluding the ceremony by the gift of his magnificent costume. He conducted, after this fashion, ten courses, with songs, and concluded with the usual rich largess, to the great admiration and astonishment of the whole assembly.

The lord count sat three hours at table, after which he rose, took up the globe and sceptre, and, entering the next chamber, placed himself on a chair raised on a platform, with steps. The two kings were seated on each side the throne, and round them, on the steps, all the barons, knights, and eminent citizens. Then a jongleur approached, and sang a new sirvente, which he had composed for this august occasion, entitled "The Crown, the Sceptre, and the Globe"—

"The crown being quite round, and this circle having neither beginning nor end, signifies the great power of God, which he has placed, not on the middle of the body, nor yet on the feet, but on your head, as the symbol of intelligence; and because he has placed it on your head, you ought always to remember this omnipotent God; may you, with this earthly and perishable crown, win the celestial crown of glory in the eternal kingdom.

"The sceptre signifies justice, which you ought to maintain and extend to all ranks; and as this sceptre is a long rod with a curve, fit to strike and chastise, thus justice should, in like manner, punish, that the wicked may leave off their bad ways, and the good may become better and better.

"The globe signifies, that as you hold the globe in your hand you also hold your country and your power; and since God has confided them to you, it is necessary that you should govern with truth, justice, and clemency, that none of your subjects may sustain injury from yourself or any other person."

The lord count appeared to hear this sirvente with pleasure, like a prince who laid the good counsel it contained to heart, and intended to put it in practice. The sirvente was followed by a song in twelve parts, and the song by a poem in three cantos; and when all was said and done, the lord count, who was much fatigued, took up the globe and sceptre, and went into his chamber to get a few minutes' sleep, of which, indeed, he was much in need. His attendants had scarcely unclasped his mantle of state, before he was informed that a jongleur must speak with him, having affairs of interest to communicate, which would not bear delay. The lord count ordered him to be admitted.

The jongleur advanced two steps, and bent his knee to the ground.

"Speak!" said the count.

"May it please your lordship to order that you should be in private with your servant?"

Raymond Berenger made a sign to his people that he wished to be alone with the jongleur.

"Who are you?" asked he, as soon as the door was shut.

"I am," said the jongleur, "the person who answered 'Amen,' in the church of St. Saviour, when your lordship vowed, sword in hand, to render justice to the high and low, the rich and poor, to foreigners as well as your own subjects."

"In whose name do you ask justice?"

"In the name of the Empress l'Axida of Germany, unjustly accused of adultery by Guthram de Falkenberg and Walter de Than, and condemned by her husband, the Emperor Henry the Fourth, to die, unless a champion, within a twelvemonth and a day, successfully defend her innocence against her accusers."

"Why has she chosen such a singular messenger for this important mission?"

"Because none but the poor jongleur dared expose himself to the anger of a powerful prince, and the vengeance of two renowned knights like Guthram de Falkenberg and Walter de Than; and certainly I should not have ventured to do so myself, if my young mistress, Douce, Marchioness of Provence, who has such fine eyes and such a touching voice that no one can refuse what she asks, had not required it of me. I went, therefore, by her command, in search of a knight sufficiently brave to defend, and sufficiently powerful to dare to vindicate, the fame of an injured and innocent lady. I have traversed, in obedience to my mistress, France and Italy in vain, and even Spain, the very holy land of chivalry, and found no one disposed to championise the Empress of Germany. On the way to Barcelona I heard you named as a generous and courageous gentleman. I entered the church at the moment you vowed, sword in hand, to defend the oppressed against the oppressor; and it appeared to me that the hand of God had led me there. I raised my voice, and cried 'Amen, so be it!'"

"So let it be, then," chivalrously replied the count; "for the honour of my name, and the increase of my renown, in the name of the Lord, I will hold myself ready to undertake this enterprise."

"Thanks, my lord, for this grace; but, saving your good pleasure, you have no time to lose, for ten months have already elapsed, and you will have little left for your journey to Cologne."

"Well; these festivals will be ended by Thursday night; on Friday we shall offer up our public thanks to God; and on Saturday we will put ourselves en route for Cologne."

"Let it be so, according to your lordship's pleasure," replied the jongleur, making his farewell devoir to the Count of Barcelona. Before he could withdraw from his presence, the count detached from his neck a magnificent gold chain of great value, and threw it round that of the jongleur; for the lord count was as generous as he was brave, and the union of these qualities acquired for him the surname of Great, an appellation which the judgment of posterity has confirmed to the sovereign of Barcelona. He was pious, too; for these festival-days were designed to do honour to Easter, the day of the resurrection of the Redeemer; and the gracious rain that, after a long period of drought, descended on Catalonia, Arragon, and the kingdoms of Valencia and Murcia, the evening on which these religious fêtes concluded, gave to his people the presage of a long and happy reign, of which, indeed, Barcelona still preserves the memory.

YOUGHALL CHURCH.

I do not think we sufficiently appreciate the power we enjoy in these our days of easily and rapidly passing from country to country, accompanied by the actual living beauty of the land, associated with histories of the past; this combination of sight and memory makes travelling so full of interest, and so delicious to an observant and cheerful spirit. The mere power of looking upon the beautiful—of imbibing its essence—of feeling its necessity and fulfilment—of thanking GOD for its holy and purifying influence—is a mighty blessing,—and then, the memory of a pleasant journey, in a pleasant country, is

"A joy for ever."

Ireland, so full of beauty and legend—the one so actual, the other so suggestive—affords ample theme for all who wield either pen or pencil, and YOUGHALL, situated at the mouth of the beautiful Blackwater, has an English as well as an Irish immortality; for there Sir Walter Raleigh lived, and there he held communion with his friend, the poet Spencer. In a garden, still preserved with care and attention, it is believed the first potatoes planted in Ireland took root and flourished,—whether for the good or evil of the "green Island," is a disputed point; I believe it has not been a blessing, because it gave a bare animal subsistence—a "living" without thought, or skill, or labour, to a people whose ambition did not tend to elevate their comforts.

"The earth yielded its increase;"

the potato grew while the mother begged, and the father delved a master's soil; and, like the squirrel or the mole, they returned to their horde in the winter, and were abundantly content with what, after a few years' residence in other lands, they would spurn.

Since we sat in Sir Walter Raleigh's garden at Youghall, beneath the shadow of the yew-trees which, it is pleasant to believe, were planted by his hands—pestilence, famine, and emigration, have swept over the country; its great features remain unchanged; but the pleasant faces, the pleasant voices, are gone from us for ever!

The house in which Raleigh lived is still standing close to the church and the wall of the ancient city. When we were there, it was occupied by Colonel Fount, who carefully preserved all the objects that are associated with the memory of the gallant but unfortunate knight. It has, however, undergone many modern "improvements."

"Ah!" exclaimed the aged gardener, "it was a fine ould ancient place on't; the wardens of the holy church lived and died in it, and a great man, by name Sir Richard Boyle, and another, Sir George Carew, besides the great man entirely, that Queen Elizabeth smiled on, who loved 'the sod' with all his heart;—and sure he was happy under them trees, dreaming of the goolden country, which brought his head to the block in the end!"

The collegiate church of Youghall is one of the most interesting in the kingdom; part of it is still used for service, but a large portion is a ruin, and, we fear, one of those which neglect is consigning to utter destruction. The east window is considered especially beautiful, although its effect is considerably impaired by being partially built up. It is divided into two distinct compartments, each consisting of two slight mullions, surmounted by open circular tracery, and terminating in a trefoil ornament. These compartments become one window by the outside line of their arches uniting in a common point over the double massive mullion, thus made the centre; and the intervening space is filled up by a Catherine wheel. The nave is now used as the parish church; it has six pointed arches, supported by pilasters, with two transepts and two side aisles.

In the south transept, "the great Earl" of Cork is buried beneath a monument that was erected by him during his life-time; he is represented in armour, in a recumbent posture; on each side is a female figure, kneeling (his two wives), and underneath are figures of his nine children, with the dates of their several births. The church is full of curious and remarkable monuments, among which those of the Boyles and Fitzgeralds are the most conspicuous.

Now that English capital is, with English energy, influence, and example, making way in Ireland, Youghall and its beautiful neighbourhood cannot fail to attract the attention of those "producers" who see in a fine harbour, a rapid river, and a fertile soil, the sure means of obtaining wealth, and the thousand blessings that may come with it. There are few districts in the island, indeed, which possess so many beauties, in combination with so many real and practical advantages; and Youghall will, we doubt not, ere long, be familiar to the tourists from all lands.

THE ART-INDUSTRY FESTIVALS AT CORK.

THE newspapers have been full of reports concerning Ireland; and, almost for the first time in its history, the theme has been one of Peace! An Exhibition of the Works of Irish Industry, and the Natural Productions of Ireland, was opened at Cork on the 10th of June, by the Lord Lieutenant, in a building specially erected for the purpose. The structure is one of very considerable elegance; the collection of objects of manufacture highly important; and the fetes which accompanied the Inauguration were of a nature more than commonly interesting, as associating all parties in the great triumph which their City had achieved. This Exhibition of art and industry is, then, the first successor of the great gathering of the world's wealth in Hyde Park. It will, no doubt, be followed, in time, and in due course, by all the leading cities of the Kingdom; thus introducing a rational means of enjoyment, and a wholesome stimulus to trade. We therefore look upon the success of this experiment in Cork as an earnest of good to come.

We do not intend to enter upon this topic at length, although the "natural capabilities" of Ireland may supply us with a rare theme hereafter; but, in recording the event, we desire to print the Inauguration Ode, written by John Francis Waller, (the "Slingsby" of the Dublin University Magazine), and composed by R. P. Steward, Mus. Doc. This ode was sung by two hundred voices, and its effect was exceedingly grand and effective, in the building, opened for the first time, and for a purpose so entirely good. It is a graceful and vigorous poem—one of the very best of its class which the modern age has produced—doubly beautiful, and doubly welcome, because its theme is so novel, but so truly august.

INAUGURATION ODE

OPENING OF THE NATIONAL EXHIBITION

ARTS, MANUFACTURES, AND MATERIALS,

AT CORK,

On the 10th of June, 1852.

STROPHE a.

Man arise! and speed thy mission—
Labour of the brain and brow.
God assigns a high ambition;
Glorify thy Maker now.

ANTISTROPHE a.

Genius! for thy heaven-taught heart
Bring the jewels of thy thought—
Pensive Science, keen-eyed Art,
Toll give all thy hand hath wrought.

EPODE a.

Earth, which Deity at first
For the sin of man had cursed,
Conquered by his tameless will,
Yield thy treasures to his skill:
All thy bosom, all thy heart,
Yield to Labour, yield to Art.
Air lend all thy favouring wings.
Ocean give thy hidden things.
Elemental Fire inflame,
Till the stubborn ore thou tame,
Plastic to man's stern command
As the wax to infant's hand.

STROPHE b.

See with soul the canvass glow!
See to life the marble start!
Hear from string and syphon flow,
Sounds that soothe and shake the heart!

ANTISTROPHE b.

Raise the song to praise and bless—
Raise the song with glad accord.
GOOD to Man and HAPPINESS—
HOLINESS unto the LORD.

EPODE b.

Thine the fulness of the land,
Lord we lay it at thy throne.
In the hollow of thine hand
Thou dost hold the earth thine own
Lauding thee with hearts o'erflowing
Who dost make the morn's outgoing
Evermore to give thee praise,
Lord, to thee our souls we raise.
Let Peace and Wealth upon us smile,
Bless our Monarch! Bless our Isle!

STROPHE c.

Shadows of the deep, long night,
Draping all the moonless sky,
Darkest ere the coming light
Of the morning dawns on high.—

ANTISTROPHE c.

Lo! they melt before the glancing
Of the radiant light advancing,
Till the glorious day arise
Lustrous o'er the reddening skies.

EPODE c.

See the sun above the hills
All the earth with splendour fill.
Hues of Beauty—Shapes of Glory
Such as bard ne'er feign'd in story
Burst upon the wondering sight—
Forms of Wisdom—Forms of Might Throng the world, from slumber waking,
While the morning pean breaking.

In the vast and mellowed voice
Of a Nation's heart, upspringeth,
Till with praises heaven ringeth
And the Isles rejoice !

STROPHE d.

Honour to the swinking arm,
Glowing brow and earnest heart !

ANTISTROPHE d.

Honour to the potent charm
Wizard Science gives to Art !

EPODE d.

Spirit adorable ! whose will doth move
All life to be thy ministrant—
Spirit of Wisdom, Potency, and Love !
To Thee we raise our loftiest chant,
Great primal Mind ! great primal Hand !
Artificer of all that Thou hast planned.

The fast foundations of the beauteous world
Into the deep dark chaos Thou hast hurled.
What time pealed out the grand sidereal song :
Thyself invisible—serene—alone—
Amid the clouds and thunders round thy throne,
Thou did'st control each orb that moved along.

And Thou didst breathe into man's lifeless frame
The sacred breath of thine Almighty flame,
Making thy last, best work—a living soul ;
Then all the sons of God, in loud acclaim,
Shouted for joy Jehovah's holy name,
And to the farthest bounds
Of space, in thunder sounds,
Creation's jubilant hymn to God did roll !

Although we do not at present propose to treat this subject—interesting and important as it is—we may avail ourselves of the occasion to make note of the Exhibition as, at this moment, adding to the other motives for visiting Ireland. Under any circumstances, indeed, it is impossible for a tourist in search of enjoyment to visit a country that will repay him so amply. Formerly, a tour to Ireland was a matter that required time: it was costly; a tedious sea-voyage was to be encountered, and there were many difficulties and obstacles in the way. These have all vanished: the journey from London to Dublin involves but twelve hours; only four and a half of which are on ship-board—or rather on board a large and comfortable steam-packet—where sea-sickness is rarely or never felt in summer weather. The Chester and Holyhead Company have issued tickets which take the traveller all the way, and all over Ireland, for a few pounds: there are railways through the principal districts of Ireland; neither difficulties nor obstacles are to be encountered now; and certainly it is impossible to devise a party of pleasure so comfortable, in all respects, as a visit to Killybegs, to the county of Wicklow, to the Giant's Causeway, or even to Connemara, may be to-day.

No country in the world will so largely recompense the Tourist. In Ireland, "the stranger" has been always welcomed—welcomed heartily: whatever quarrels may be going on there, they never affect him; all parties combine to give him pleasure, and keep annoyance from his path. The scenery in no country of Europe is more grand or more beautiful: nowhere is there a people so full of character—so interesting to study, or so agreeable to know; a drive upon "the outside car," through any district, will exhibit much of both, while affording a clear insight into its wildly poetic superstitions, and its mournful history of the past, as exemplified by the ruins—ancient castles and venerable abbeys—that are met with upon every road. We repeat, therefore, that while in Ireland, the tourist travels in greater safety than he can do in any other country of Europe—safety from imposition, insult, and annoyance of any kind—nowhere can he be so amply furnished with so many or so varied sources of enjoyment.

We presume, then, to counsel those who are just now considering where they can most pleasantly, and most profitably, spend a month of autumn, to arrange to spend it somewhere IN IRELAND.

THE POETRY OF DAVID MOIR.*

LITERATURE, like life, has its accidents of good and bad fortune, and while the names of some writers are greater than their works, the works of others are greater than their names. To the former class belongs the author of these volumes. The chance which made him the standing poet of Blackwood's Magazine, during the palmy days of its vigorous manhood, gave him a position in the current literature of the day, higher than that of many writers of far superior powers, and which the strength of his own genius would never otherwise have achieved. Some little lustre he may have given to the pages of the dashing and successful magazine, but his own name borrowed more from the brilliancy of those with whom it was associated. His graceful verses, poured forth month by month, read with the rapid eye, which glances not too critically over the pages of a periodical,—and forgotten almost as soon as read,—habituated the public to the name of "Delta," in connexion with the prevailing power of the popular magazine, and hence his poetry took a rank, in general estimation, less upon its own merits than upon the merits of the medium through which it was presented. That this was so, has been always felt by critical observers of our poetical literature of the last thirty years; but it becomes strikingly apparent, on a perusal of the present selection of the best of Delta's voluminous works. Were his reputation now to make, these volumes would not make it; and the reader of another generation will probably deal with them as we do now with the unread authors of "The British Poets." Something of the repute in which the poet was held was, no doubt, owing to the worth and amiability of the man; and for a time this will give a charm to his poetry in the eyes of those who knew him, however slightly. But all such influences are necessarily short-lived, and they cannot be taken into account in estimating the value of what Delta has contributed to poetical literature, or the position which he is entitled to take upon the muster-roll of the Sons of Song.

It was natural that Moir's biographer, Mr. Aird, should set a higher value upon the productions of his friend than will be accorded by less interested critics. In his case, the personal charm of their author necessarily mingles with the verses themselves, and gives to them a significance and beauty which they cannot have for other eyes. Being himself, moreover, one of "Maga's men," he falls into the mistake of assuming the fact of being a writer in that periodical, as of giving itself the stamp of excellence. In this respect, Mr. Aird might have taken warning by Delta's "Lectures on the Poetical Literature of the Last Half-Century," where this tendency is carried to an extent that is almost ludicrous. Wilson, Hogg, Lockhart, Aird, and Aytoun are there placed in the front rank with the "dear sons of memory, great heirs of fame;" and the whole poetry and poets of the day are looked at from the Blackwood point of view, and subjected to the Blackwood standard, and condemned or praised according to the poetical creed of that somewhat wayward and dogmatic Aristarch. In like manner, Mr. Aird, looking at his friend's works with the partiality of a brother contributor, bursts into apostrophes of admiration, in which he is not likely to carry with him the sympathies of those who have not breathed the atmosphere of Christopher North's sanctum. His criticism is consequently the least valuable part of his contributions to the present volumes.

With all Mr. Aird's admiration of his friend's power, however, he has found it necessary to act upon Professor Wilson's judgment, that the selection for these volumes "should be a searching and severe one," excluding "all decidedly inferior matter, and all slight, hasty sketches, with touches of good poetry in them, but yet not poems, properly so called;" and all "poems of tolerable merit, superseded, however, by after poems, finished and fine, which have obviously taken birth and shape from the inferior predecessors." Taking this statement of the principles which have guided the selection, along with the selection itself, the reader cannot but feel, that amid all the verses written by Delta, the proportion of poetry must have been very small indeed, when, after a winnowing of all "decidedly inferior matter," so much should have been left that does not rise above the level of musical common-place. Delta's habits of composition were hasty and desultory. The hours devoted to composition during the best years of life were stolen from sleep, when the fatigues of a country medical practice, occupying from twelve to sixteen hours of every day, must have exhausted both body and brains. He did not pause to correct or condense what was written under circumstances so little favourable to the display of power. Is it then to be wondered at, that the characteristics of these volumes should be a level and far from original turn of thought; versification smooth, but monotonous, and marked by none of that subtle music by which all fine poetry is individualized; and a strain of feeling genial and pleasing, but rarely deep, and never continuous? Except in one or two instances, arising out of emotions purely personal, the poems in these volumes bear few traces of originality, either in subject or manner. You are continually reminded of something better, which seems to have given both impulse and tone to the writer. An undoubted command of the usual poetical metres, an ear for verse, not "numerous" in its highest sense, but in some degree refined, and an eye for observing the features of nature, are the best qualities of Delta's poetry. Where he wrote from direct observation of particular features of nature, he is generally excellent, as, for example, in the following description of some of the characteristics of an inclement winter season, in his poem of "The Fowler":—

"I do remember me the very time—(Though thirty shadowy years have laps'd between)
'Tis graven as by the hand of yesterday.
For weeks had rav'd the winds, the angry seas
Howl'd to the darkness, and down-fallen the snows ;
The redbreast to the window came for crumbs ;
Hunger had to the coleworts driven the hare ;
The crow at noontide peck'd the travell'd road ;
And the wood-pigeon, timorously bold,
Starv'd from the forest, near'd the homes of man.
It was the dreariest depth of winter-tide,
And on the ocean and its isles were felt
The iron sway of the North ; yea, even the fowl—
That through the polar summer months could be
A beauty in Spitzbergen's native isles,
Or on the drifting icebergs seek a home—
Even they had fled, on southern wing, in search Of less inclement shores."

But where, as is but too often the case, the poet is merely reviving the echoes of another's music, or embodying in respectable verse the feeble impression of what has been said much more vividly before, the habit of the magazine writer, urged not by poetic impulse, but writing for writing's sake, is alone apparent ; take, for example, the following verses :—

"THE STORMY SEA.

"Ere the twilight bat was flitting,
In the sunset, at her knitting Sang a lonely maiden, sitting Underneath her threshold tree ;
And, as daylight died before us,
And the vesper star shone o'er us,
Fitful rose her tender chorus—
'Jamie's on the stormy sea !'

"Warmly shone that sunset glowing ;
Sweetly breathed the young flowers blowing ;
Earth, with beauty overflowing,
Seem'd the home of love to be,
As those angel tones ascending,
With the scene and season blending,
Ever had the same low ending—
'Jamie's on the stormy sea !'

"Curfew bells remotely ringing,
Mingled with that sweet voice singing ;
And the last red rays seem'd elinging
Lingering to tower and tree :
Nearer as I came, and nearer,
Finer rose the notes, and clearer,
O ! 'twas Heaven itself to hear her—
'Jamie's on the stormy sea !'

"Blow, ye west winds ! blandly hover
O'er the bark that bears my lover ;
Gently blow, and bear him over
To his own dear home and me ;
For when night winds bend the willow,
Sleep forsakes my lonely pillow,
Thinking of the foaming billow,
'Jamie's on the stormy sea !'

"How could I but list, but linger,
To the song, and near the singer,
Sweetly wooing Heaven to bring her
Jamie from the stormy sea :

And, while yet her lips did name me,
Forth I sprang—my heart o'ercame me—
'Grieve no more, sweet, I am Jamie,
Home returned to love and thee !'

It is obvious that the suggestion of these lines was taken from the concluding verses of the ballad of "Auld Robin Gray ;" but how poor and feeble are they, compared with the direct pathos and concise expression of that ballad !

On the whole, of all Delta's poems, those only are likely to secure a niche for him in the temple of Fame which are based upon his personal experiences, and touch upon those chords common to all who have loved deeply, and lost what they have deeply loved. Here the beautiful nature of the man, simple, affectionate, and earnest, finds expression. Strength of feeling in some measure does the work of genius. His heart overflows in music ; and that facile "accomplishment of verse," which was fatal to him when he went in search of a theme, did not interfere with, but aided, while it regulated the utterance of emotions that might otherwise have struggled in vain to shape themselves in language. Of all his poems of this class, the best—and it is one which our readers will thank us for repeating—is his poem on the death of a favourite child, who was self-styled

"CASA WAPPY.

"And hast thou sought thy heavenly home,
Our fond, dear boy—
The realms where sorrow dare not come,
Where life is joy ?
Pure at thy death, as at thy birth,
Thy spirit caught no taint from earth,
Even by its bliss we mete our dearth,
Casa Wappy !

"Despair was in our last farewell,
As closed thine eye ;
Tears of our anguish may not tell,
When thou didst die ;
Words may not paint our grief for thee,
Sighs are but bubbles on the sea
Of our unfathom'd agony,
Casa Wappy !

"Thou wert a vision of delight
To bless us given ;
Beauty embodied to our sight—
A type of Heaven :
So dear to us thou wert, thou art
Even less thine own self, than a part
Of mine, and of thy mother's heart,
Casa Wappy !

"Thy bright, brief day knew no decline—
'Twas cloudless joy ;
Sunrise and night alone were thine,
Beloved boy !
This morn beheld thee blithe and gay ;
That found thee prostrate in decay ;
And, ere a third shone, clay was clay,
Casa Wappy !

"Gem of our hearth, our household pride,
Earth's undefiled,
Could love have saved, thou hadst not died,
Our dear, sweet child!
Humbly we bow to Fate's decree;
Yet had we hoped that Time should see
Thee mourn for us, not us for thee,
Casa Wappy!

"Do what I may, go where I will,
Thou meet'st at my sight;
There dost thou glide before me still—
A form of light!
I feel thy breath upon my cheek,
I see thee smile, I hear thee speak,
Till oh! my heart is like to break,
Casa Wappy!

"Methinks, thou smil'st before me now,
With glance of stealth;
The hair thrown back from thy full brow
In buoyant health:
I see thine eyes' deep violet light,
Thy dimpled cheek carnation'd bright,
Thy clasping arms so round and white,
Casa Wappy!

"The nursery shows thy pictured wall,
Thy bat, thy bow,
Thy cloak and bonnet, club and ball;
But where art thou?
A corner holds thine empty chair;
Thy playthings idly scatter'd there,
But speak to us of our despair,
Casa Wappy!

"Even to the last, thy every word—
To glad—to grieve—
Was sweet, as sweetest song of bird
On summer's eve;
In outward beauty undecay'd,
Death o'er thy spirit cast no shade,
And, like the rainbow, thou didst fade,
Casa Wappy!

"We mourn for thee, when blind blank night
The chamber fills;
We pine for thee, when morn's first light
Reddens the hills;
The sun, the moon, the stars, the sea,
All—to the wall-flower and wild-pen—
Are changed: we saw the world thro' thee,
Casa Wappy!

And though perchance a smile may gleam
Of casual mirth,
It doth not own, what'er may seem,
An inward birth:
We miss thy small step on the stair;
We miss thee at thine evening prayer;
All day we miss thee—everywhere—
Casa Wappy!

"Snows muffled earth when thou didst go,
In life's spring-bloom,
Down to the appointed house below—
The silent tomb.
But now the green leaves of the tree,
The cuckoo and "the busy bee,"
Return; but with them bring not thee,
Casa Wappy!

"Tis so; but can it be—(while flowers Revive again)—
Man's doom, in death that we and ours
For aye remain!

Oh! can it be, that, o'er the grave,
The grass renew'd should yearly wave,
And God forget our child to save!—
Casa Wappy!

"It cannot be; for were it so
Thus man could die,
Life were a mockery—Thought were woe—
And Truth a lie—
Heaven were a coinage of the brain—
Religion frenzy—Virtue vain—
And all our hopes to meet again,
Casa Wappy!

"Then be to us, O dear, lost child!
With beam of love,
A star, death's uncongenial wild
Smiling above!
Soon, soon, thy little feet have trode
The skyward path, the seraph's road,
That led thee back from man to God,
Casa Wappy!

"Yet, 'tis sweet balm to our despair,
Fond, fairest boy,
That Heaven is God's, and thou art there,
With Him in joy!
There past are death and all its woes,
There beauty's stream for ever flows,
And pleasure's day no sunset knows,
Casa Wappy!

"Farewell, then—for a while, farewell—
Pride of my heart!
It cannot be that long we dwell,
Thus torn apart:
Time's shadows like the shuttle flee;
And, dark how'er life's night may be,
Beyond the grave I'll meet with thee,
Casa Wappy!"

In the biography prefixed to these volumes, Mr. Aird has furnished a most interesting memorial of his friend. Delta's life was singularly uneventful. It served, however, to illustrate the strength of perseverance and of manly worth, which made his character respected by all who knew him. An earnest student—a good husband—a wise and loving father—a true friend—most active in a profession, which he practised with honour, and with an amount of unostentatious beneficence towards those who, while they most needed, could least have purchased his help—an accomplished man of letters, who contributed much both to the instruction and the amusement of the public, by his works in prose as well as verse, at the same time that he discharged all the duties of a good citizen—David Macbeth Moir may not take rank with the great poets of the world; but he has left behind him the pattern of a life in which all the powers with which he was endowed were used to their fullest extent, and to the noblest ends. This exemplar Mr. Aird has set before his readers with much skill, and with a feeling worthy of his friend. Higher praise he cannot desire.

BOOKS AND THEIR AUTHORS.

The Life of Marie de Medicis, Queen of France, has been written by Miss PARDOE, and published by Colburn and Co., in three goodly volumes, embellished with portraits of Marie, Louis XV., and Cardinal Richelieu. It is known in the literary world that Miss Pardoe has been exclusively occupied about this comprehensive biography for three years, and that she resided in France during that period, where she was liberally supplied with the necessary documents, and had access, through private influence, to others which have never before been referred to. Of her industry, those who recall her labours can have no doubt; and after the publication of a former work, when she was accused of having quoted "second hand," and drawn her materials from the "historical romances of the day," we chanced to know that she had applied herself with intense pains to select and collate facts; and that, far from having quoted "second hand," she had, in every instance, gone to the highest and best sources for information. Some years ago, history was "hedged in" with so much mystery, that, like the "holy of holies" of the Jews, it could only be entered upon by sacred priests; the historian was a myth, rather than a man—a dweller amongst catacombs, and those closed-up holdfasts of literature, monastic libraries, where the light entered through painted windows, where footsteps fell wearily, and shadows were pale and indistinct.

"The dignity of history" was a fine-sounding, sonorous sentence: kings and queens, princes and nobles, passed in array before the reader, sceptred and crowned, and chronicled, until it became difficult to imagine that such creatures were ever endowed with the actual life which animates the pulses of the kings and queens of our time. This opinion has been gradually changing: a belief has gone forth that the records of the past may be rendered interesting without descending to familiarity; and that history, hallowed by time, and dignified by circumstances, does not need the ceremonies of dry and stately sentences to preserve it to our children. The brilliant and animated history which MACAULAY has given to the world—toned, as all histories must be, by the author's individual belief in what may be true or false—proves that the past can be brought to the present, teeming with the activity and energy—the very life and soul—of our ancestors. But for biography, that pleasant handmaid of the myth, we should really know nothing of the secret springs—the under current—which moved the stately machinery of past centuries: and yet, with some few exceptions, but for the sacred sake of truth, it would be much more pleasant to admire the exterior, than to dive into the interior of the courts of kings. When closing the last volume of Miss Pardoe's careful biography of the proud, affectionate, impetuous, ill-used, and most unfortunate Marie, we felt that all the bright romance with which, in our youth, we enshrined HENRI QUATRE floated away like a vapour, leaving the gorgeous apostate, despite the vastness of his intellect, the greatness of his conceptions, a heap of sensuality so gross, that only the admirable care and tact of an Englishwoman saves the biography (until Henri is removed by the dagger of Ravillac) from being a catalogue of debauchery and court intrigue.

The Duc de Sully stands out in fine relief from the tainted canvas; and the widow, as regent and queen-mother—tossed on the unsettled waters of France—buffeted by circumstances which she had neither the power nor the temper to control—abandoned by her family and friends, after having occupied the throne of France, presided over its councils, and given birth to the ancestor of a long line of princes—was indebted to the sympathy and attachment of a foreign artist, of whom she had once been the zealous patron, for a roof under which to terminate her existence!

Well may her generous, yet truthful biographer, say that "Marie's" life was full of startling contrasts, from which the mind shrinks back appalled: "Her active career is so freighted with alternate grandeur and privation, that it is difficult to reconcile the possibility of their having fallen to the share of the same individual; and this, too, in an age when France, above all other nations, boasted of its chivalry, and when some of the greatest names that ever figured in its annals gave grace and glory to its history."

The work, though sometimes overlaid with ornament, is so accurate in its facts, and yet conducted with so much spirit, that it is a living panorama from first to last. The period is as remarkable as the men by whom it was illustrated. The arts flourished amid the beat of drum and ring of trumpet; political liberty sounded her note of preparation for the deadly contests which, in due time, became fatal to the aristocracy and to the instruments of the law,—paving the way to the absolutism of Louis XIV.—to the "saturnalia" of the Regency—to the degrading excesses of the fifteenth Louis, who may justly be said to have prepared by his licentiousness the scaffold of his successor.

We cannot close this too brief notice without complimenting Miss Pardoe on the womanly chivalry which has erected a lasting monument over the remains of a great woman and an unfortunate QUEEN.

THE POET MOORE.—It has been announced that LORD JOHN RUSSELL (one of the earliest and most cherished friends of the poet) has undertaken the task of editing his memoirs—thus complying with a request contained in his Will. It is known that Moore left a carefully and regularly kept journal—a Diary, in fact—and that for some years past he assiduously collected from his friends such letters as he had, from time to time, addressed to them on topics of importance. It will, therefore, be from no meagre or exhausted mine that Lord John Russell will have to draw the treasure that cannot fail to prove of rare interest and value. He will discharge the honourable duty that devolves upon him with loving kindness to the memory of his friend; and the world will learn—with surprise, no doubt—that the most luxurious of all the poets was simple in his habits; almost childlike in his amusements; one whom the comparatively humble enjoyments of home were the truest of delights, and whose highest hopes, brightest joys, and purest pleasures were centred in "wife, children, and friends." Of all the great men we have ever known, Moore was the sweetest and best "at home;" in his small cottage, at Sloperton, he seemed to have no wish associated with the world beyond; in all his words, looks, and actions there was a total oblivion of self; and of a surety there could be no mistake in believing that he was most happy when pleasing those about him most. It was, indeed, a delicious treat to pace with him up and down the terrace (so to call it) which separated his garden from the adjacent field, and chat with him of the many graceful things that make "joys for ever." Millions owe him gratitude for exceeding delights; but these delights are enhanced a thousand-fold to those who knew the man—the most lovable man, perhaps, that ever lived, judging him in the shade of his own home, apart from the artificial glare of society. But our present business is limited to the announcement of his "Memoirs"—an autobiography, under the editorship of Lord John Russell. It will be a monument more worthy, more honourable, and more enduring than Art can raise. It is cheering, however, to find that a monument, other than his works, is to be erected to his honour: meetings have been held in Dublin, and sums subscribed, after many excellent speeches by the most eloquent of the poet's countrymen. We earnestly hope the project will be carried out to the full.* Yet, when some mass of sculptured marble shall be raised—as it ought to be—in the city of his birth, there will be, in the humble and out-of-the-way churchyard of Bromham, a plain stone, that will more truly touch the hearts of all who loved the poet and the man. It contains this inscription:—

ANASTATIA MARY MOORE,
BORN MARCH 16, 1813,
DIED MARCH 8, 1829.

ALSO

HER BROTHER, JOHN RUSSELL MOORE, WHO DIED NOVEMBER 23, 1842, AGED 19 YEARS.

AND THEIR FATHER,
THOMAS MOORE.

TENDERLY BELOVED BY ALL WHO KNEW THE GOODNESS OF HIS HEART:
THE POET AND PATRIOT OF HIS COUNTRY, IRELAND,
BORN MAY 28, 1779,
SANK INTO REST, FEBRUARY 25, 1852, AGED 72.
GOD IS LOVE.

Not many years have passed since it was our high privilege to visit this lonely churchyard, accompanied by the poet, discoursing with him of the good youth who had been interred there but a short time previously, and whose promise had been to do honour to both his names. Now, of his children none remain; and, as with so many other renowned men, the poet Moore is succeeded by no member of his family. His admirable widow survives, to cherish the memory of one she loved with the holiest and most beautiful devotion; whose life she gladdened by a perpetual sunshine; the dearest theme of his muse, the joy and hope of his manhood, and the trust and faith of his age.

MISS BREMER'S Homes of the New World will be published in the autumn, by Messrs. VIRTUE,

* A meeting to aid the Dublin Committee has been since held, at the house of the Marquis of Landowne, and a committee for England was named there. We fear, however, it is of too aristocratic a character to be in "working order."

HALL, and VIRTUE. Part of the M.S. is now in the hands of Mrs. Howitt, who has undertaken the translation. The work cannot fail to excite much attention, both in England and in the United States. It will be original, notwithstanding the many works to which America has given rise; for Miss Bremer saw perhaps more than any living writer has seen of the "domesticity," so to speak, of the Americans. We have reason to know that her impressions were highly favourable: that, indeed, she is greatly attached to the United States, and her warmest affections are with the great people of the New World. Nevertheless, with her keen and inquiring mind, and her justly-balanced faculties—notwithstanding the exceeding charity and amiability of her disposition—she will have seen the faults it will be her duty to examine and dissect. The volumes will, we are sure, be not only interesting, but instructive, and become additions to our literature of the very highest value. Miss Bremer was, altogether, nearly three years in the States; she is now at home, in the neighbourhood of Stockholm, having spent but a few weeks in England on her way to Sweden.

Mr. GROVERIDGE has published two interesting volumes—Lydia, a Woman's Book, by Mrs. NEWTON CROSLAND, and The Days of Bruce, by the late GRACE AGUILAR. Mrs. Newton Crosland, in an introduction—by which much meaning is conveyed in few words—writes that, "as long as the world lasts, each sex will have its separate sphere of trials and temptations, so that many of the lessons of life must be more appropriate to the one than to the other." Mrs. Crosland is essentially a feminine writer: she has studied, understands, and sympathises with her own sex thoroughly; the character of "Lydia" is conceived and worked out in the very spirit of truth, not that we consider the heroine a type of women generally, but she represents a very extensive class, brought up as "Lydia" was—beautiful and vain—when loving, loving blindly, but rising against appalling circumstances which awaken all that is right and brave in her nature, and conquering herself at the last with entire heroism. There is more power in this Woman's Book than in any work its author has yet produced: it must add to her reputation as a thinker and a writer. Mrs. Crosland, as many of our readers know, obtained her earlier fame as Miss Camilla Toulmin. She has written much that is of interest and value both for old and young.

The Days of Bruce, by the author of the Women of Israel, may be accepted as another proof of the "catholic," or universal spirit of the admirable Jewish lady—whose enlightened mind and genuine charity were never limited to the service of sect or class. Her devotion to her own people was simply her first duty; her heart was of "kin" with the whole world. This book was written so far back as 1841, when in the vigour of intellectual strength, she was planning many things—and all for good; it was, we know, her especial favourite: it is full of deep interest, and the characters are well drawn. It is not, however, equal, in originality and power, to those productions of her pen in which she is unrivalled, because they illustrate a "peculiar people;" but it may be read with profit, and certainly with pleasure. Grace Aguilar died at Frankfort, and is buried in the Jewish cemetery there.

Castle Deloraine, a novel, in three volumes, published by Mr. BENTLEY, and written by a cousin of Miss Maria Jane Jewsbury's, (who married the Rev. Mr. Fletcher, and died at Bombay, when all who knew her looked for the fulfilment of the rich promise of her youth,) is a very remarkable book, penned in the fervour and enthusiasm of a frank young spirit, eager to arrive at truth, but mistaking the bubble on the surface for the jewel at the bottom of the well—misled by a desire to say all she thinks, without considering that she may not always think correctly, and that it is possible to argue wrong from right principles. The mere story, though an often told tale, is well conceived, and well developed; the characters are skilfully drawn, and cleverly contrasted; the scenes are natural and forcible; there are occasional passages of great power and pathos, and the interest continues even through long political and religious disquisitions, which recel a passage in one of Lady Dufferin's clever songs—

"What a pity when charming women
Talk of things that they don't understand."

The author, Miss MARIA PRICILLA SMITH, makes vigorous war with what she calls prejudices, and doubtless in many cases she has reason on her side; but she is too impetuous and too unskilful to bring about social reformations, even if a novel were the legitimate arena for political contention. Every Christian mother in England would avoid a heroine of seventeen who eulogises Shelley to a young man during their first interview. There is no doubt Shelley would have recanted his heresy; he had the fashion only of infidelity, and his manly spirit, when he put away his childish and sinful follies, would have acknowledged its error. There is a strange opinion expressed by the young philosophy school—that great minds are prone to doubt. The contrary is the fact—poor minds, uncomprehensive minds, weak minds, "doubt," because they can neither comprehend nor trust. The author of Castle Deloraine has studied, at times, in a dangerous school. She has not been true to her better nature. Her desire to throw off what is old and feeble leads her into the danger of shaking off what is venerable, frequently mistaking boldness for strength, and rashness for bravery. We had almost forgotten to mention her Irish scenes, which are vigorous and life-like. We shall look anxiously for this author's next book, convinced that all she requires to become one of the ornaments of our literature, is a more extensive acquaintance, not with theories, but with life, and greater patience to "mark, learn, and inwardly digest," before she takes up a cause or a party.

The publishers of this Magazine have issued a curious volume, and one for which the scholar and the poet must be deeply indebted to them—Specimens of Old Indian Poetry, translated from the original Sanscrit into English verse. We must refer to the gracefully printed little book all those who have the good taste to appreciate the learning and poetic feeling which Mr. GRIFFITH, of the Royal Asiatic Society, has brought to bear upon this "labour of love;" for such it has undoubtedly been. It cannot fail to enlighten and interest those who have hitherto considered Indian poetry—like Eastern flowers—

"In ellmes full of sunshine, though splendd their dyes, Yet faint is the odour the flowers shed about."

These poems breathe a delicious "odour;" and those who have tasted Sir William Jones's paraphrase of one of the Persian Hafiz's exquisite songs, or felt the beauty of Professor Wilson's translation of a fragrant little poem—The Cloud Messenger—which is well known at Hailesbury College, will joyously avail themselves of this treasury of Eastern gems. If we should really have no summer this year in "Merrie England," this sweet book may make a sunshine in the shady place of many an English home.

We believe it is not generally known that Mr. AGUILAR, who has been gaining so much on the public as a pianiste, is brother to the late Grace Aguilar, whose recently-published tale of The Days of Bruce we have just noticed. Despite the sums we pay for music, we are as yet only on the threshold of this ennobling art: we understand but little of its philosophy, and are seldom thoroughly roused by its humanizing sympathies, our popular idea of an "artist" is connected with painting, and even now—with two Italian Operas, and concerts innumerable—the great body of the English people consider music neither an art nor a science—simply a trade. May we not hope for better days! when music, in its highest and holiest sense, will be appreciated as it deserves, and its professors—no longer undervalued as "mere musical men"—take their places amongst "the teachers" of a noble science—the propagators of an enlightening art—veritable artists, as in truth they are. We avail ourselves gladly of this occasion, to render to the accomplished brother of our lamented friend homage akin to that he has so abundantly received in Germany—indeed, in all parts of Europe—and which he is gradually but surely obtaining in England, as the reward of genius combined with industry.

Messrs. ADDEY & Co. are aiming to sustain the reputation which Mr. Cundell, their predecessor, acquired by the publication of juvenile books. We are greatly indebted to those publishers who introduce good taste into our nurseries. We should not have been so far behind our neighbours in Art, had it not been for the distorted quality of the so-called "establishments" of children's books. Well do we remember when the art of such publications taught nothing that was not evil: distorted forms in daubs of colour were the "familiar friends" of the very young, with pernicious lessons to eye and mind. We cannot be over-grateful to Mr. Cundell for largely assisting to introduce a better state of things. In his children's books—those more especially which bear the name of "Felix Summerly"—the best artists were auxiliary to instruction; and those who learned from them had nothing to unlearn in after-life. But the most important step Mr. Addey has yet taken is in the publication of a Magazine, "for boys and girls," and boys and girls "putting away childish things"—this being rather a magazine for the schoolroom, with tales which may be read aloud in the nursery. The first numbers are pleasant and profitable. The editor gives an assurance that The Charm, (the title given to the magazine), shall ever have "the charm of PURITY;" that its moral tendency shall be plainly apparent; that it shall inculcate brotherly love, gentleness, and kindness to all God's creatures; that it shall endeavour to instil into young minds the love of the beautiful, and lead them to appreciate "the smiles of Nature and the charms of Art." So far all is well; but, while we would carefully avoid all cant or sectarian teaching, we cannot altogether approve of any publication for the young without a devotional principle pervading and hallowing the whole. It may be "felt, though unseen;" never intrusive, but always influencing; inculcating all the virtues—none of which can ever have a solid foundation, where Religion is not the corner-stone.

It will, we are assured, give many of our readers much pleasure to know that AMELIA OPIE is still living and enjoying life, her bright affectionate spirit creating sunshine in the pretty home where she resides, opposite to the time-honoured Castle of Norwich.

Mr. WILLIAM HOWITT has left, or is about to leave England, to visit Australia—for a few months to visit the "diggings," to place there two of his sons, perhaps under the charge of his brother, who ranks among the highest physicians of the colony—and, we take for granted, on his return, to publish a book. Such are the wonderful facilities for travelling in modern times, that this voyage, to and from Australia, is about upon a par with what a journey to Ireland was some fifty or sixty years ago. There will be little or no time lost to a busy man—for Mr. Howitt will have pen, ink, and paper in his cabin on board; and he may see, with his practised eye and observant mind, a vast deal in half a year or so on shore. Of a surety, the world will derive much profit from his trip; and we heartily and cordially bid him bon voyage.

A very charming book has been issued by Messrs. CONSTABLE, of Edinburgh—Art and Nature under an Italian Sky. There is nothing strictly new in its pages, yet much that is fresh, while all is pure: many well-known objects are placed in a novel light. Occasionally it recalled to us passages in that most graceful of all books of travel, in which Mrs. Jameson made her début in literature—The Diary of an Ennuyée. In Art and Nature we have a happy mingling of both: Nature is felt and Art is understood by the writer. The tone of the volume is healthy: the observations are generous and full of true sympathy; and, as a contribution to a class of literature far too scanty, it is of no ordinary value. Moreover, the book is welcome, as again bringing before us the time-honoured name of Constable. The publishers are the representatives, in blood and station, of those whose repute is inseparably associated with that of Sir Walter Scott.

England will be inundated with "Christmas Books" at the close of the present year. Information has already reached us concerning at least ten of them. We cannot say that any one of their authors is of the highest literary rank, although they each and all enjoy a share of popularity. There may be so many of these books, however, as to elbow one another out of the way; and the chances that would be very favourable to two or three may be as nothing when divided among a dozen. It may be well to put forth this warning in time.

Few books of its class came to us more unexpectedly than did Mistress Margaret Maitland.

The author, in many scenes, assumed the wisdom of age; but the freshness of youth at once endeared the volumes to the reader; and, followed as they were, fleetly and bravely, by Merkland, they established an almost new generation of Scotch novels in our hearts and homes. Adam Grene, of Moss Gray, will not be as popular with the "general reader" as either of those we have mentioned; though, in many respects, its tone and feeling are higher than the tone and feeling of its predecessors. There is something painful in commencing an acquaintance with the hero of a novel when he is old; the burden falls on memory, and not on hope. It is pleasanter to pass through life, and its adventures with our hero of the hour, than to hear how he suffered and triumphed—won or lost—when his oil is nearly burnt out, and the flickering light shows that the world, and the things thereof, must soon pass away. Those who read merely for amusement, and enjoy the whirl of "novel life"—going hand in hand with its activity, its hopes, its fears, its miseries, its excitements—may lay these volumes aside, and declare that the author has "fallen off;" but those who love to trace patiently the workings of the "actual," and note how this brought that to pass—will enjoy to sit with us at the feet of the Scottish Gamaliel, and learn the gentle, loving, and unselfish lessons of a well-spent life. The author, we imagine, felt that she commenced Adam Grene in an unpopular fashion: the volumes are divided into "books," and, with considerable skill, the second "book" brings forward a new generation, with whom Moss Gray is linked, and to whom, as well as to the conduct of the story, he is necessary. This introduction of new life was certainly indispensable, as the tale was trembling beneath the malediction of three volumes, which has brought many a finely-conceived story to an untimely grave; but, despite the fascinations of the young and the trials of the good, the old man is the hero and the interest. Adam Grene, of Moss Gray, is a perfect treasure to mothers who dread the influence of careless modern novels in their domestic libraries: every page is sanctified by the pure spirit of its author: it might be read on a Sabbath evening, beneath the shadows of the "ivied tower" of an old church.

We presume that there is no breach of confidence in mentioning that the author of these books—Miss Wilson—has very recently changed her name, and is now Mrs. Oliphant.

We believe it is not generally known that JOHN HOWARD PAYNE, U.S. Consul at Tunis, who died lately, was the author of Hone, sweet home,—a song that made the celebrity of Mary Tree, now Mrs. Bralshaw, and which Madame Otto Goldschmidt has been singing in America to the delight of all hearers. In his early life Payne was a dramatic performer, and a man of versatile genius. He was appointed consul in 1851, and had just established himself under his flag, when he was called "home."

When we read in the dedication to The Head of the Family, that it was the "last novel the author would write for some time," we hoped she might not be tempted to break her resolve; yet we learn that another tale, of altogether different construction from those before the public, is nearly ready for the press. This is hardly doing herself justice: her forte lies in the development of sympathies and feelings; and to develop them well entails not only a great deal of thought and comparison, but much positive suffering, on the writer.

We are indebted to Mr. HORATIO TOWNSEND, an Irish barrister, for a singularly interesting account of the great HANDEL's Visit to Dublin. The book is published by James McGlashan, the proprietor of our able and brilliant cotemporary, the Dublin University Magazine. No musical library should be without it. Its pages contain undoubted proofs that the Messiah was first performed in Dublin. This fact Mr. Townsend has placed beyond the possibility of doubt, and he has drawn together, with a judicious and sympathising hand, all that is of interest (and what is not) connected with the great high priest of music—the MILTON of sound. We might extract pages from this charming book, all tending to elevate HANDEL's moral character and benevolent heart to the height of his genius; but we have said enough to create a desire to possess it; and we expect the thanks of our readers for showing where they can obtain so much pleasurable information at easy cost.

Those who desire to take note of the Irish superstitions, once so popular, but now passing rapidly away before the utilitarian spirit of the age, will be more than pleased with a volume—one of the Readings in Popular Literature—from the versatile pen of DOCTOR WILDE, of Dublin. He says truly, in his animated preface, that had not Shakespeare embalmed, in the Midsommer Night's Dream, the popular superstitions and fairy lore current in England at the time of Elizabeth, the present generation could form but a very faint idea of the ancient belief of our forefathers, in the witcheries of their sylvan deities and household gods. "No man in Ireland" was better able than the brilliant Doctor to gather these things together: his knowledge of, and well-known sympathies with, "the people"—his wanderings among them—his partisanship with whatever is quaint or peculiar—his national enthusiasm—his energy, and the terms of intimacy he has been on, at one time or other, with everybody who was anybody—rendered "Willie Wilde," as he is affectionately called in Dublin, the fittest of all chroniclers for these Irish Superstitions. He is "up to" fun and frolic, as well as to those graver disquisitions on all manner of things—antiquarian, social, medical, and political—which are not half so pleasant to deal with as that which he has here so skillfully set forth. We shall endeavour to make room some day for an especial article on these superstitions—where all is not mythical. Doctor Wilde is too true to his subject, and understands his country too well, not to mingle tears and smiles together.

Mr. MACREADY, whose early retirement from the dramatic world, will long be deplored by all who remember his exertions before, as well as behind, the curtain, to maintain the honour and purity of the stage, has given an eloquent lecture, at the Victoria Rooms, in aid of the Bristol Athenæum: the subject was—On the Influence of Poetry as an Element of Popular Education. It was heroic in Mr. Macready, when poetry is at such a fearful discount, to spring into the breach, and stand forth its champion. The Bristol Mirror has published the lecture, and we hope to see it in the second edition of a most valuable book, just given to the world by the Griffins, of London and Glasgow—The Importance of Literature to Men of Business; a Series of Addresses delivered at various popular Institutions.

They know how to honour great men in the United States. An "association" has been formed, with the view to erect a worthy monument to the memory of FENIMORE COOPER; and not that only, a volume has been printed, which contains the tributary speeches and eloquent letters of a very large proportion of the "men of mark" of America—Bryant, Bancroft, Washington Irving, Webster, Emerson, Prescott, Dana, Longfellow, and others. Such "testimonials" are, truly and indeed, the best excitements to a career of "glory in letters." In England, perhaps, a triumphant soldier, or a successful sailor, might have as many from his contemporaries—"brothers in arms;" but the writer of a hundred books occupies here a very different position from the victor in a hundred fights: it is much, if he go down to the grave glorified by half a dozen newspaper paragraphs to keep his memory green for a month.

We are glad to read the announcement of a THIRD edition of The Physician's Holiday, by Dr. FORBES. It is a charming and very useful work: it was literally the result of that rarity to the physician—a holiday; and it is so full of genuine nature, of the love of the beautiful and good, that the reader is continually tempted to regret that the excellent Doctor has not had his month's relaxation at least once a year. The name of Dr. Forbes is so intimately associated with so many Metropolitan Charities—he is so well and so widely known for pure philanthropy—he has so many friends, because he is the friend of so many—that no wonder his book has obtained popularity: but it is valuable for itself; and if it had been written by an apprentice to virtue, instead of by one of its highest professors, it could not but have found favour with all who love the pure and the true.

THOMAS WRIGHT, M.A., F.S.A., has added another to the many useful and instructive books he has produced. It is entitled The Celt, the Roman, and the Saxon, and is published by Messrs. VIRTUE, HALL, and VIRTUE. To collect, condense, and render available for the uses of the general reader, the mass of scattered facts which have been given from time to time to the world through the explorations of the antiquary, and thus to construct a history of early Britain from the facts its relics adduce, was a worthy labour; it was more than usually necessary, inasmuch as it was avoided by the general historian, as the few pages devoted to this portion of the subject in ordinary histories of England will show; even this scanty detail generally abounding in errors which modern research has refuted. As a clever résumé of all that has been done in this way for many years past, Mr. Wright's book is without a rival.

A LADY'S NARRATIVE OF CAPTIVITY AMONG ALGERINE PIRATES.

In the early part of the month of June, 1827, I embarked on board the trading brig, "Perseverance," to accompany its captain, my husband, in a voyage to Seville. Although we sailed at the commencement of summer, the weather proved boisterous and winterly in the extreme: continued heavy gales and incessant rain attended our progress. I have been a bad sailor under all circumstances, but upon this occasion I suffered even more than I usually do. My husband himself, though long inured to the exposure and hardships of a sea life, was not insensible to the unpropitious circumstances that attended the beginning of our voyage; for before we had been many days out of sight of English shores, he was attacked by a severe form of ague and fever, and the mate assured me that his master would not hold out long if the same dreadful fits persisted in returning daily. Aroused from the lethargy of sea-sickness by this alarming assurance, I betook myself to the medicine-chest, and learned from the book of directions accompanying the drugs, that powdered bark was the only remedy. On examining the contents of the bottles, I found, to my great relief, an abundant store of the precious substance. For twelve long days I gave the bitter dose, without the slightest sign of good resulting from its use: at the self-same hour, the chills, and then the burning heats, returned. But afterwards I had the exceeding joy to see the severity of the fits decline: at first they were slighter, and lasted a shorter time; soon they came but on alternate days, then the intervals lengthened, and at last my patient was his own strong self again.

During the progress of this cure, external circumstances were keeping pace with my inner experiences. We had now crossed the Bay of Biscay, and had done with its storms. The air was getting warm, the weather became gradually fine, and the adverse tempest was changed into a balmy and propitious breeze. On the 6th of July, the ship's officers conversed at breakfast regarding the beautiful sunrise they had witnessed over Cape Finisterre, then ten leagues east of us. The sunset proved as fine. Even now I can see, in fancy, the clearness of that evening atmosphere, the glory of its fleecy clouds with their crimson and gold fringe, and the fulness of the vast undulating waves, that swept, with their little load of rippling billows, onwards towards the circular line that bounded the watery field. I felt lighter and better than I had done since we had left England. I remembered to have read somewhere of a king, who could only recall to his mind eight happy days out of a life of sixty years; and I thought, as I had already enjoyed three calm and peaceful sunsets in succession, how much more favoured I had been. But this state of pleasurable repose was not to be long continued. I was lying on the sofa in the cabin, about noon the following day, when I was suddenly startled by the report of a heavy gun. I felt the concussion as well as heard the sound, and in an instant I was on my feet. A second report followed, and then a third; at the same instant, my husband called to me down the companion not to be alarmed, as it was a French man-of-war that was firing the guns, and he supposed they wanted some information from him. I had just reached the foot of the cabin stairs, when a fourth explosion shook the vessel, and one of the sailors exclaimed, "That was a shot, sir, and pretty near us too." Creeping up the stairs, and looking out from the companion-hatches, I saw all the ship's company gathered round their master, upon the quarter-deck, in consultation. Immediately afterwards, the carpenter, who had been eying our noisy neighbours suspiciously, shouted out, "They are Algerine pirates, sir, by —!"

How little can we tell beforehand how circumstances will affect us! As I stood there, a conversation of the previous day flashed across my memory, in which I had stated my belief that I should die of terror if we were stopped by pirates. I did not now die, however, when I heard the carpenter's exclamation; on the contrary, I was impelled by an anxious desire to gaze upon the object I had imagined I should so much dread to see. Accordingly, I cautiously advanced under cover of the high rails, and peeped through a small aperture in the quarter-boards. There, close under our lee, I beheld a large brig of war, with crowds of strange-looking figures upon her deck. Most of them were of large stature, with dark copper-coloured, naked limbs, wearing long beards, and turbans and sashes of scarlet colour, after the Moorish fashion. Now, indeed, a sensation of sickening horror crept over me. Our brig had been lying-to from the time we were favoured with the third shot. The captain had taken his speaking-trumpet, and he now commenced a bellowing duet, in Italian, with the question, "What do you want?" A seven-foot high negro answered in the same language, "Send your boat on board."

I found that I had seen enough, and, during the little bustle occasioned by getting out and manning the boat, I made my escape to the cabin. The boat was placed under command of the chief mate, who was ushered, when he reached the stranger's deck, into the presence of a dignified Moor, reclining upon a couch, and surrounded by a staff of officers standing. This potentate managed by some means to make the mate understand that he was high admiral of the Emperor of Morocco's fleet, and he further told him, that he held a commission under the British Government, and examined all ships he fell in with to ascertain whether they had with them a proper Mediterranean pass. The mate's captain must, therefore, himself come on board, and bring his papers with him to be overhauled.

The boat came back with the mate, and then went again to the Algerine with the captain and his papers. Soon, however, the captain returned, and brought with him some of the Moors. They descended at once into the cabin, and entered upon a polite system of plundering. They requested the steward to oblige them by handing out his stores of tea, sugar, and vinegar, and they unceremoniously took possession of some articles of wearing apparel and a looking-glass. A few dozens of wine, and some fine salt and eggs, they considerably seized in the name of the admiral. I remained concealed in the state room until these unwelcome neighbours were again on deck; I then went out to my husband, who had remained behind them. He told me we were certainly in the hands of pirates, but that they seemed inclined at least to carry on their depredations civilly, and under the pretence of legal authority. They had not, however, done with us yet: he had returned merely for some document he had omitted to take with him the first time, and was going back with it to the Moorish vessel; the Moors on deck were waiting for him.

I know not how I passed the period of his second absence. I shut myself up in the state room, and knelt down and prayed fervently for divine protection. I then took a large draught of wine, and endeavoured to feel resigned and patient; but apprehension for my husband's safety, and lengthened suspense, were too much for me, and I was just going up on deck again, when the steward met me, and told me that the captain was returning with what he called "a boat-load of Turks." I looked out, and there I saw a larger second boat accompanying our own, with two-and-twenty Moors on board. The ship's company were gathered round the companion, and the second mate was detailing to them his knowledge of pirate proceedings. "First," said he, "they murder all on deck, then they go below."

When stout-hearted men quailed at the prospect which was before them, it was hardly surprising that a woman should find herself quite unnerved. Terrified and trembling, I hastened back to my hiding-place, and tried to collect my scattered thoughts and reason down my fears. I endeavoured to convince myself, that the Moorish admiral would not have taken so long to decide upon his proceedings if his purpose had been open violence and plunder.

The boats reached our ship just before sunset, and the Moors, as they jumped on board, performed their evening devotions, prostrating themselves, and bowing with their faces towards the east. The captain immediately came to me, to tell me how matters stood. The suspicious-looking ship he had left so recently was really in the service of the Emperor of Morocco, although under French colours when it stopped us. During the previous winter, the "Perseverance" had lain beside it at the Mole of Gibraltar, and its commander used frequently to cross our decks. Upon one occasion, he jestingly said to my husband, as he passed, that he should very much like to have his brig as a prize. My husband remembered his face the instant he entered his presence, and also recognised some of the surrounding officers. The Moorish ship had been fitted out in the Government dockyard of Gibraltar, but had been slightly altered in the appearance of her hull, by the substitution of two red streaks along the side for one white one. The self-styled admiral, after pretending to examine the ship's papers presented to him, had held a long consultation with his officers, and then reprimanded my husband in a vehement tone for coming to sea without a formal Mediterranean pass. The captain answered as vehemently that he did not need any such license, seeing that he was bound to a port without the straits. The reply to this remonstrance was, that he had better not cause them any trouble, as his ship and crew were the rightful prize of the Emperor of Morocco, and he must, therefore, forthwith receive an officer, a prize-master, and twenty men on board the brig, and proceed under their guardianship to the port of Tangier. This, then, was the meaning of the steward's "boat-load of Turks."

My husband having put me in possession of these facts, next endeavoured to allay my fears. He told me he had no doubt we should fall in with a British ship of war on our way to Tangier, but that, if even we did not, we had no cause for dread, since England had a consul resident at that port. Prudence forbade all show of resistance on his part so long as no direct violence was attempted, seeing that the Moorish vessel was a ten-gun brig, manned by somewhere about 150 hands, while his own crew numbered but twelve men, and had only four small guns to serve. His wisest course was manifestly to temporise, rather than to give his antagonists the excuse, they might be themselves desiring, for open attack, and to make a virtue of necessity as far as he was able. He, therefore, had acquiesced in the arrangements with as good a grace as he was able to assume, and hoped soon to lose sight of the ugly-looking craft that was at present in such dangerous proximity. By the time I had comprehended all these particulars, the Moorish boat was on its way back to the gun-brig; and as soon as it had reached its destination, the high and mighty admiral of the piratical empire held on his honourable course. Our sails were then once again set, and our bows turned towards the coast of Africa. The "Perseverance" for once was untrue to her name. The thing I had feared so much had really come to pass: we were captives, and going towards the land of captivity.

The Moors, who had first come on board, were aware that our ship was soon to be entirely at the mercy of some, at least, of their messmates; they had, therefore, satisfied themselves with a very cursory examination of the cabin, and I had remained in the privacy of my concealment. As our second party of visitors had, however, unceremoniously established themselves in possession of our home, I saw that all further hiding must be useless. The prize-master had given notice of his intention of living at the captain's table, and sleeping in one of his state rooms. I therefore took the opportunity of making my début in Moorish society during the evening meal. As I came forward, the Moor's eye fell upon me, and he started to his feet with an exclamation, extending to me both his hands. My husband placed himself between us, however, when he immediately recovered from his surprise, and endeavoured to make me understand that he was a good and benignant man, and would not injure us. I sat myself down opposite to him, and contrived at length to take a close survey of his person. He appeared to be between forty and fifty years of age, and was of middling size, with a narrow chest and stooping shoulders. His countenance was handsome, on the whole, but marked with a sinister and treacherous look, at least so I thought. I could not help fancying that I must have seen it before somewhere, its general aspect seemed so familiar to me. I afterwards remembered that it was its striking resemblance to the head of Judas Iscariot, in Rubens' painting of the "Last Supper," which I had recently seen at Antwerp, that had given me this thought. The man appeared to be very desirous of making himself sociable with me. He had only two English phrases in his vocabulary—"Sit down," "Never mind;" these he continued to repeat, and gave me his name, Allan Ruberic. He seemed greatly delighted when he heard that my name was Ellen, imagining that we both bore the same designation. His favourite beverage was English gin, which he constantly demanded in large quantities, and relished greatly, notwithstanding the prohibitions of Mahomet and the precepts of the Koran.

On the morning following our capture, Allan Ruberic told the captain, while at breakfast with him, that his mate must give up his berth to the chief officer of the Moors, who was sick. I saw by the flash of resolution and anger in my husband's eyes, that he would not submit to this, and feared it would be the signal for some desperate affray. He answered that this was an arrangement he could by no means allow, and that the sick officer must remain on deck where he was. The object of the dispute at this instant entered the cabin, and presented an apparition that I had never before even dreamed of, as possibly connected with the human form. Imagine a hideous countenance of a greenish-black hue, with the mouth extravagantly wide, all on one side, and unable to keep the huge projecting teeth hidden within its aperture; with the chin covered by a long black beard, and with large prominent dark eyes, overhung by a bush of coarse black hair: place this ugly head upon a pair of stalwart shoulders, and you will have a fair notion of the giant who was now introduced under the name of Abdallah. The captain immediately requested Abdallah to take himself off to the deck again, as he did not intend to permit more than one stranger to dwell with him below. Abdallah refused to go, and an angry altercation ensued, consisting chiefly of vehement expostulation on one side, and determined refusal on the other. This alarming scene was at last terminated, by the captain telling the Moors firmly, that while he remained on board the ship he would be master of his own cabin; for, if they took his head off, he should still defy them, seeing that they could not put it on again. This, to my surprise, settled the matter, for the Moorish officers gave up their point, and Abdallah moved his huge body off to the deck again.

During this morning, Allan Ruberice partook very freely of gin, and, when he came to the dinner table, seized the mate by the collar and hurled him from his seat, that he might take possession of it himself. The mate had in some way affronted him on deck, regarding the steering of the ship, and, in his rage, he now said, that he had but to give the word and his people would murder the whole of us; we were entirely at his mercy, and he would punish us by taking the ship to Salee instead of Tangier, where our doom would be a sure one.

When the captain came down this conduct was reported to him, and he at once determined that he would not go to Salee, if he could find any means of helping himself. Salee, in the kingdom of Fez, was everywhere known as a nest of lawless pirates, while Tangier was at least half civilised, and was the residence of a British consul, to whom we had all along been looking as our hope. The captain affected to feel drowsy in the afternoon, and at last pretended to be asleep. This was too agreeable an example to Ruberice, after his own heavy potations, to be long withstood; his head, therefore, soon declined, and he fell into a heavy sleep. The captain then rose lightly, and went forward among his own crew to impart to them his suspicions, and to sound their resolution. Ruberice soon after awoke, and, missing the captain, went up on deck, and joined the little council of war that was sitting on the fore-castle. He was now wide awake enough, for he dogged the captain's steps wherever he went, following him backwards and forwards from the deck to the cabin, and from the cabin to the deck, as he restlessly shifted his position in the hope of shaking him off. All was, however, to no purpose: the suspicions of Ruberice were evidently aroused, and the captain had no further opportunity of communicating with his men.

But where, all this while, was the giant Abdallah? The strong man was sick unto death. His huge frame was extended upon a mattress we had sent to him, on the quarter-deck, and there he lay groaning and writhing with pain. When I heard this, I went to him, and took his hand to feel his pulse. I looked at his tongue, and then touched his head, his chest, and his side, making signs to express to him my desire to know where he suffered. At length he suddenly apprehended my purpose, and uttered some uncouth words; then, finding that Arabic was Greek to me, he pointed to his stomach. Upon this hint, I undertook the treatment of his disorder; administered some laudanum in hot brandy and water, and then had him carefully covered up with cloaks and the warm cabin carpet. My patient fell into a sound sleep, and from this time recovered so rapidly that, two or three days after, he was able nearly to starve his doctress, by watching the steward and seizing from him the larger portions of the little delicacies that had been prepared for her especial use. I had occasion, more than once, to wish that my remedies had not led to so rapid a restoration of the sick Moor's appetite.

Shortly after the day when Allan Ruberice had attacked the mate in his fit of intoxication, my husband found an opportunity to reproach him with his conduct, and told him he had made himself drunk. To this bold charge he coolly answered, that gin always made him feel brave, and on that occasion led to his using the language he had employed. But this had been merely done to frighten the mate; for the fact was, that he did not himself know our destination, as the admiral's instructions were in a sealed packet, which he had orders not to open until the ship had crossed the 36th parallel of north latitude. This, as well as all other dialogues that passed between the prize-master and the captain, was carried on in the Italian tongue; and, as neither spoke this language so that the other could understand it without a considerable amount of hesitation and guessing, I was always impressed with the idea that the stammering and gesticulating which I witnessed, boded some immediate outbreak of violence.

The vessel continued to hold on her proper course for Tangier. All on board, nevertheless, anticipated treachery, and were prepared to see the direction of her progress altered at any moment. Allan Ruberice had frequently sworn by his beard that he was going to Tangier; but notwithstanding this, he manifested constant fear lest we should fall in with some British cruiser. We were by no means surprised, therefore, when, at noon on the 16th of July, being then on the parallel of 36 degrees north latitude, and somewhere south-west of Cape St. Vincent, he produced his secret instructions, and said, "I read here that it is the will of the admiral that we go to Salce." The captain answered him, with an air of indifference, "If we must go, we must;" but added in English, "It is now time, then, for us to be doing." He took a box of dominos, and sat down with me to play; Allan Rubrice smoked and watched the game. During the game my husband detailed to me, in broken sentences, the plan he had prepared in anticipation of our present emergency. Towards evening, he intended to ply the prize-master again with spirits, in the hope that he would once more intoxicate himself. Having done this, he and the mate were to thrust him under the cabin deck, and I was to stand guard over him there, with a loaded pistol pointed at his head, and, if he attempted to release himself, or to give any alarm, I was to silence him for ever by drawing the trigger beneath my finger. The captain was then to seize the instant of the sunset prostration of the Moors on deck, to hand up a supply of cutlasses and fire-arms through the window of the state room, and, as he ascended the cabin stairs, he was to give the signal by firing a pistol; the apprentices and mates were then to join in the melée; the men from the fore-castle were to rush upon deck with handspikes, the steersman was to give the ship a shake up in the wind and lend a hand, and thus the Moors were to be driven down the open hatchways and battered in. The ship was immediately to be put about for Gibraltar. Our men were all prepared and anxious for the onset, my husband having contrived to communicate with them in spite of the close watching to which he had been subjected.

Allan Rubrice left us this afternoon, as usual, to take his repose, for he never slept at night. During his absence, my husband instructed me in the art of loading the pistol, in case I should find any further occasion to use it after despatching the prize-master. He was now thoroughly roused, and sanguine of success, although the odds were fearfully against us: with only nine nearly unarmed men, three youths, and a woman on one side, and twenty-two well-armed barbarians on the other. I did not think the attempt altogether desperate, for my husband had served fourteen years in the navy, in active times, and was an experienced as well as a high-spirited man, and he had charged me never to be disheartened until I saw him cast down.

About an hour before the sunset that we expected was to prove so eventful to us, three of the strongest of our men, two Englishmen and one Dutchman, lounged sullenly up to the captain, and told him they had thought again of the affair, and would not fight; they had had fighting enough in their time, and did not want any more of it; it was of no consequence to them where they went; for aught they knew, they would be as well off at Salce as elsewhere. But if they were wounded and disabled, what were they to do with themselves? This was, in truth, a heavy blow to all our hopes. Our little force could ill spare what had been reckoned on as its most effective portion. From this time the poor captain's countenance fell. He did not altogether abandon his purpose; but what had before appeared to him to be an act of well-considered courage, now took the form of fool-hardy temerity.

Circumstances, however, deprived him of all power of making the desperate attempt with these diminished numbers. The Moors on deck had noticed the dogged, sulky look of the men, who had failed us in the hour of need, and the angry bearing of their indignant comrades; and this was enough. Abdallah roused himself as a lion from his lair: he shook himself and tightened his girdle, discharged his pistols and re-loaded them, loosened his dagger in its sheath, tightened his sandals, stretched his brawny arms, and sat himself down far aft upon the taffrel-rail, so that no one could get behind him. There he remained all that night, with his eye incessantly upon the compass, prepared for any emergency that might arise.

Allan Rubrice was now no whit behind his companion in caution. Neither food nor gin had any longer power to tempt him down below. From this time, ten Moors, with drawn sabres in their right hands, and loaded pistols in their left, incessantly paced the deck, so that some were always going in one direction while the rest went the opposite way. A stationary sentinel was placed at each side of the companion doors; and the Prophet had henceforth to rest satisfied with having his devotions offered to him from standing votaries.

During this sad night we were left to ourselves in the cabin. The captain was afraid, as we neared Salce, our captors might become more imperative in their demand for spirits, and that this might lead to some ungovernable outrage; he, therefore, with the assistance of the steward, emptied a cask of brandy, another of rum, and several gallons of gin, through the stern windows into the sea. This was a work of several hours, for it had to be done in darkness and silence, and by small portions at a time, while I stood sentinel at the state-room window to prevent surprise. I also wrote upon paper a notice of our capture, which was placed in a dry bottle and sealed in. The bottle was taken into the hold and put into a cask, while the Moors were changing their watch, and this was carried up to the fore-castle deck and left standing there. It was unnoticed, as it had a harmless, empty look, and was subsequently dropped quietly over the bows into the water, under favour of the darkness.

From the 15th of July, Allan Ruberice and Abdallah kept watch alternately: the former paced the deck from sunset to sunrise, the latter from sunrise to sunset. Our own men were compelled to work the ship, but the Moors watched them narrowly, and had enough of seamanship to detect the slightest deviation from the proscribed course.

As we approached Salce, an expiring effort was made, by attempting to bribe Allan Ruberice to take the ship to Tangier. The captain with great difficulty succeeded in getting him into the cabin once more, and offered him one hundred Spanish dollars, a gold and silver watch, four silver table spoons, twenty sovereigns, and a quadrant, if he would connive at the alteration of our course, and induce his men to let us resume our possession of the ship. He evidently felt the temptation of the bribe, and was much agitated. He intimated, however, that Abdallah was too much for him; and said that, as he had but one head, he could not afford to lose that.

How strange and unstable are the currents of human thought! I now began to feel it a relief that we were to have no fighting, and imagined that Providence had kindly interfered to keep from our hands the responsibility of bloodshed. Hour by hour we neared our destination. Soon we saw a continuous line of uneven rocks ahead of us, with the sea breaking over their rugged summits. This we were told was Salce, but we could discover no trace that indicated the presence of a town. The anchor was shortly afterwards dropped in about forty fathoms water, at a distance of three miles from land, and the "Perseverance" swung round in her chains, thus near to the inhospitable-looking coast of that Africa which had been associated from childhood in my thoughts with torrid suns and desert sands.

We contemplated for a short time, in silence and sadness, the uninviting prospect before us, and then turned seriously to the consideration of what our own destiny might possibly have in store for us. We had no doubt whatever that we must look forward to an early removal from our ship; most probably, we might be separated from each other as soon as we were taken to the land. With this fearful thought present to our minds, we went below, and busied ourselves in making such preparations for whatever was to come as prudence seemed to dictate. I hastily stowed away, in a small carpet-bag, a change of raiment for each of us, and we then concealed the large sum of ready money, which we chanced to have with us on board, in long canvas cases, rolling them as girdles round our waists, beneath our outer clothes. We left two sovereigns in gold, and nineteen dollars in silver, within my husband's desk, in the hope that our inquisitive friends might estimate our probable personal wealth by their own, and take this sum as our principal capital. We had barely time to complete these hurried arrangements before we heard the splash of ours, and the confused sound of approaching voices. We went on deck, and found that a large number of boats had come off from several Moorish vessels lying in the anchoring ground. When these boats had approached sufficiently near, the crews by which they were manned vociferously insisted upon boarding our ship; but our old acquaintance, Allan, did not seem at all desirous for the visitation, and persisted in refusing to permit it. In the end, he exerted his authority so strenuously, assuring the boisterous crew that no one could possibly be allowed to touch our decks until the captain of the port had inspected the prize, and interrogated the prisoners, that all the boats were again pulled towards the respective vessels to which they belonged, amidst the shouts and yellings of their discomfited and discontented occupants.

About noon, the captain of the port arrived on board, accompanied by a rather imposing retinue of Moors and negroes. The entire party seemed to view themselves as expected guests, for they proceeded forthwith to the cabin, and established themselves at the dinner-table, that had just been prepared for our mid-day meal, without the slightest exhibition of ceremony. They saved the steward all the trouble of furnishing them with knives and forks, by plunging their jewelled fingers at once into the dishes, and upon several occasions I observed that one snatched from his neighbour some morsel that had especially captivated his fancy. During the progress of the dinner, a violent altercation was going on upon deck.

Some of the port captain's boatmen, who had been left there, were attempting to carry off the British flag, that they might disgrace it, by hanging it over the ship's head; and my husband and the mate were resolutely defending it from the threatened indignity. The captain of the port went up on hearing the increasing noise of the scuffle, and gracefully interposed his authority, by presenting the object of contention to my husband. There was evidently something in this dignitary's reception that had tended to please and conciliate him. My husband, emboldened by this proceeding, and finding that he spoke a little Italian, asked him if he could inform him how it chanced that an Englishman had been forcibly captured, and brought against his will to the port of Salee, where there was no consul to protect him, when his nation was at peace with all the powers of the world. The port captain answered, that he was of opinion the admiral had disbelieved that we were British subjects, and had taken possession of our ship because we could not show a Mediterranean pass. He then requested us to let him see some of our books and money. My husband gave him an almanac and a large prayer-book, bearing the stamp of the ensign-armorial of the Sovereign of Great Britain. He inspected them closely, and then gravely assured us that he was perfectly satisfied that we were what we asserted ourselves to be, and added, "There is a British consul here; I will go to him, and tell him you are English subjects, and at sunset I will send off a boat, that you may come on shore, and meet him in the presence of the Governor of Salee."

Surprised by the agreeable turn affairs were thus unexpectedly taking, we addressed ourselves to wait, with what patience we could, the arrival of the governor's boat. The assurance that we should find a resident consul on shore had greatly relieved our fears, and already the hope was rising within that something like a fair inquiry might be obtained. But almost immediately this hope was crushed; for our men, with that singular facility for gleanings information, which is acquired by constant intercourse with foreigners, and frequent sojourn in foreign lands, had contrived to make out from the Moorish boatmen that a large brig anchored near to us was an Austrian vessel, which had been captured a few days previously, and was now manned only by Moors, her own crew being prisoners at Salee. Thus suddenly was the brightening horizon of our future obscured again. Anticipations of evil, in which gloomy prisons and clanking chains formed the prominent features, once more took possession of my own reflections.

At sunset, the governor's boat arrived, manned by about thirty Moors and negroes. One of the Moors had been frequently at Gibraltar, and knew a little of the English tongue; he also seemed to have acquired there a small notion of what the courtesies of civilized life required, for he came up to me smilingly at once, and said, "Oh! mam, you no fraid;—at Salce, all gentlemen;—you go, me think, on camel, to Tangier;—and ship go Gibraltar;—me no know;—but you no be fraid;—you go you consul." Then, turning to the captain, he asked, "You ready, sir?" The captain replied by demanding to know what his orders were concerning us. He answered, "You take lady wife, and four you men; Salce governor and you consul there on shore; take bed for sleep,—but no more." "Who is the consul, and can he speak English?" asked the captain. "No speak English, sir," was the answer. "Consul no Englishman; consul Jew and Algerine." Our consul, the object towards whom our hopes had been directed since we had heard of his existence, an Algerine Jew, and unable to speak English! Here was indeed a reversal of the morning's promise. If even this problematical personage were possessed of the consular dignity, there could be no doubt we should find him exercising his office as a creature of the Moors, and abetting the pretences of our captors, whatever those pretences might at last turn out to be. I had heard too much of the plans of Mahometan rulers, for an instant to entertain a thought that a Jew consul was at all likely to prefer the interests of unprotected strangers to the safety of his head.

We selected a mattress, in accordance with the direction we had received, and with some difficulty we at last procured permission to take with it the poor little carpet-bag, that I had stored so scantily with the necessaries of our toilet. We then placed ourselves in the boat, and very soon were on our way to the shore. As we passed through the three miles of distance that intervened, I watched narrowly for the first appearance of the town; but all in vain; not a trace of any human habitation could I perceive. An uninterrupted line of bare, rocky coast stretched itself out before us, and it was not until we were close in upon this that I was able to notice a trifling break in its outline, with a small, sandy point projecting therefrom. This point proved to be one side of the entrance to the River Rabat. The boat rounded a little promontory, and came into comparatively smooth water, and almost immediately afterwards it touched the land.

As soon as we had effected our disembarkation, we were led up a precipitous ridge of rocks, stretching in front of us. Upon attaining the summit of the ascent, we looked before us, and there, towards the south, the town of Salee was spread out beneath our view. Impossible would it be for me to express even the shadow of an idea of the surprise which this singular scene occasioned in me. A cluster of square, isolated buildings was scattered around, without either chimneys or windows to break the uniformity of their lines. Low quadrangular doors opened in the front of each block, and the walls were everywhere covered with whitewash, as a protection against the plague. In front of these sepulchral-looking structures, or mounted upon their level tops, there stood a crowd, each figure in it enveloped in folds of snow-white flannel, and with naked legs and feet protruding from beneath. This crowd was composed of the entire population of Salee, assembled to witness the arrival of the barbarians. All grades of the community were there, and all were clad alike. Priests and soldiers—gentry and beggars—nobles and plebeians—women and men—and young and old—all wore the same white wrappings. It seemed to me as if I had suddenly come upon some vast cemetery of a race of the olden time, and the dwellers of the tombs had all arisen from their long repose at my approach, and come in their ceremonies to offer me their greeting. The first glimpse of Salee that I caught presented it to me as a town of enormous sepulchres, with a ghostly population of recently-arisen dead. I shall never forget the sense of awe that crept over me as this strange and unearthly spectacle burst upon my sight.

But I was soon recalled to myself, and my more worldly fears. The instant after we appeared above the ridge, shouts and yells burst forth from the terrific and now no longer ghostly multitude: and my feeling of apprehension was by no means diminished, when I saw advancing from the crowd a band of tall flannel men, with knotted cords in their hands. Were these cords to be our scourges or our bonds? My friend, the Gibraltar-taught Moor, now rendered me really kind and effective service, for he managed to get close to my side, and said, "You see you no want fruid;—governor send soldiers;—take care lady;—take lady custom-house." Here he was separated from us, and our military escort surrounded us.

As we proceeded in our march, I was able to observe that there were numbers of women in the crowd. They were marked out from the men by the particulars of their costume; their faces were all covered over, excepting where small holes were left for the eyes to peep through; their arms also were enveloped in the folds of these head-muffings. We were afterwards told that it was a very unusual thing for the Moorish females to leave their houses; but, upon this occasion, curiosity was too strong for custom, or even Moorish notions of propriety; for, although not less than three thousand of the interesting recluses were abroad, some few only of the oldest had ever beheld a Christian woman. I, then, in my own person, was the great centre of attraction to this heterogeneous crowd: for myself in particular, the honours of this flannel reception had been designed.

During our advance towards the custom-house, our escort had to ply their knotted thongs with vigour and activity; but even their utmost exertions did not entirely succeed in protecting our persons from outrage. Again and again we were spat upon, and struck with sticks. I received one blow upon the back of my head that nearly stunned me. My husband caught many similar proofs of the extent of Moorish humanity, in warding off strokes that his quick eye perceived to be aimed at me. As we walked through this crowd of malicious savages, I felt that at least I had come to a school where I might learn lessons of thankfulness. I could not but contrast the life of civilization, in which my favoured lot had been hitherto cast, with the barbarous scene around me, in which an unprovoked multitude were showing themselves so wretchedly dead to every generous feeling of human nature, that not a hand, save the hircling soldier's, was raised in the cause of two defenceless and offending captives.

Fortunately for us, the distance from the landing-place to the custom-house was very short, for our guard found the difficulty of their task increasing with every step. When we reached this building of pretending name, we found ourselves opposite to a spacious mud barn, defended in front by heavy, prison-like iron gates. The soldiers, as we arrived at this place, all at once made a furious onset upon the crowd with their knotted scourges, and, during the scuffle which ensued, we were safely lodged within the welcome shelter its portals afforded. Looking round upon the interior into which we now advanced, we saw, ranged along on its sides, a tribunal of ten or twelve churchyardlooking old fathers, in fleecy hosiery robes, sitting cross-legged upon piles of carpets, and finished off above by scarlet turbans. One of them was elevated upon piles of carpets, and was at once distinguished from them, as well by his august presence as by his splendid turban of green and white. This dignitary I soon discovered to be the Governor of Salce, and a very fine specimen of masculine Moorish beauty he seemed to be. The complexion of his face was rich olive-brown; his forehead high and massive; his eyes black, brilliant, and full of intelligence; his nose delicate and well formed; his mouth handsome, and furnished with brilliant teeth. His gigantic limbs and upright bearing, as he sat there majestically rolled in the folds of his full-long, flannel robes, assured me that if he rose he would stand at least a head and shoulders above his fellows of the council. The only trace of the ninety years, that I afterwards found had passed above his venerable head, was presented in his full moustache and ample beard of snowy whiteness. His person was scrupulously neat and clean, a qualification which I had already discovered to be a highly exceptional one among the Algerines. The dignified appearance and deportment of this patriarchal Moor at once impressed me with an involuntary feeling of respect, such as I had been far from feeling towards any other member of the race I had yet seen. I subsequently learned that he was in reality of princely descent, and had a reputation with the populace for exceeding sanctity, having won his green turban, the only one I observed in Salce, by a pilgrimage to the prophet's shrine, at Mecca.

Behind this conclave of fathers there stood two figures, who appeared in strong relief, in consequence of the contrast afforded by their dress. Their costume consisted of blue cloth cloaks and velvet caps. One of them was old, the other young. The fine agreeable face of the elder was strongly stamped by the distinctive mark of Israel's sons: I at once knew that he was the consul, to whom we were looking with so much anxiety. His companion was a handsome youth, having also the Jewish cast of countenance. The inclination of the body, and the respectful attitude of both these figures, at once assured me that my anticipation had been correct, and that the so-called British consul was not a very likely person to trouble the council of the Moors with any inconvenient interference.

As my husband and myself were placed immediately in front of the president of this turbaned conclave, and as we had to wait the arrival of the Moor who spoke English before any proceedings could commence, I had ample opportunity to observe what I have described. When this important and accomplished personage had at length succeeded in joining us again, the governor opened the business, by asking how much money there was concealed on board the prize. As the interpreter delivered this question, he added a caution to the captain to be careful in his replies, for, if he told any falsehoods, the governor would relieve him of his head without asking permission of the consul. My husband answered that "there were not twenty dollars on board." This was literally true, for we had only left them nineteen. The next question seemed a very puzzling one. The old fox wished to know "why we had been sent to Salce." My husband, however, was ready with his reply. He said he must refer that for solution to the questioner, as "he was himself very anxious to know why he had been molested on the high seas, and brought against his will into the dominions of the Emperor of Morocco, when his own king was on perfectly friendly relations with that potentate." The governor answered him, that the admiral of the emperor's fleet had written to him, "that we had no contra signal, or Mediterranean pass, and that we had refused to show him the papers of the ship." "That," said my husband, "is altogether false: I can prove by the testimony of my officers and men that I did show my papers when asked to do so; and, as to the Mediterranean pass, what had I to do with that, if I was not going to the Mediterranean?" He then, to my horror, proceeded to censure vehemently the conduct of the Moorish commander, remarking that "he supposed it would not be long before he sailed up the London river, and captured the ships at anchor there, because they were without passes for the Mediterranean." This boldness and freedom of speech seemed, however, to amuse, rather than to irritate, the old man, who smiled from time to time, merely edging in, now and then, a word of cautious inquiry about the money we had left on board the brig.

So agitating and fatiguing had the occurrences of the day been, that I now began to find they were all too much for me. During the continuation of this dialogue concerning our capture, and our hidden wealth, the white-bearded governor and his corpse-like companions of the red top-knots began to dance and float about before my eyes. All at once my consciousness left me, and I fell to the ground. When I recovered my senses, I found that I had been placed on a sort of ottoman, close to the president of the assembly, and that he was himself trying to re-assure me, by making the interpreter tell me "I had nothing to fear now, as I was close to him." I do not think the information did much for me, for, clean and venerable as the old man was, I should have been more relieved to have learned that I was a hundred miles away from him.

As soon as the disturbance which this little episode had caused was passed, the governor gravely told my husband that it was necessary he should write a letter to the Emperor of Morocco, admitting the legality of his capture, and stating that neither he himself, nor any of his crew, had been ill-used. A pointed cane was then presented to him as the instrument wherewith he was to effect this deed of exoneration; but the captain did not find either the instrument or the order to his liking. He, therefore, adroitly managed to get permission that the letter should be written from the consul's house, to which we were to go to wait the emperor's pleasure concerning us. But the consul was made responsible for the letter being written in accordance with the governor's order; and he was further directed to despatch it for its destination, by a special courier, at daybreak. With this final determination the court of inquiry broke up, and consigned us to the care of our Jewish friend of the blue cloak. It was at least a relief to find we were not to go with any of the flannel grave-clothes.*

ADELAIDE.

BEING FRAGMENTS FROM A YOUNG WIFE'S DIARY.

(Communicated by the Author of "Oliver," "The Head of the Family," &c.)

* * * * I HAVE been married seven weeks. * * * I do not rave in girlish fashion about my perfect happiness—I do not even say I love my husband. Such words imply a separate existence—a gift consciously bestowed on one being from another. I feel not thus: my husband is to me as my own soul.

Long, very long, it is since I first knew this. Gradually, not suddenly, the great mystery of love overshadowed me, until at last I found out the truth, that I was my own no more. All the world's beauty I saw through his eyes—all the world's goodness and greatness came reflected through his noble heart. In his presence I was as a child: I forgot myself, my own existence, hopes, and aims. Everywhere—at all times and all places—his power was upon me. He seemed to absorb and inhale my whole soul into his, until I became like a cloud melting away in sunshine, and vanishing from the face of heaven.

All this reads very wild and mad; but, oh! Laurence—Laurence! none would marvel at it who had once looked on thee! Not that he is a perfect Apollo—(his worshipped husband of mine: you may meet a score far handsomer. But who cares? Not I! All that is grand, all that is beautiful, all that makes a man look godlike through the inward shining of his godlike soul,—I see in my Laurence. His eyes, soft, yet proud—his wavy hair—his hand that I sit and clasp—his strong arm that I lean on—all compose an image wherein I see no flaw. Nay, I could scarce believe in any beauty that bore no likeness to Laurence.

Thus is my husband—what am I? His wife—and no more. Everything in me is only a reflection of him. Sometimes I even marvel that he loved me, so unworthy as I seem: yet, when heaven rained on me the rich blessing of his love, my thirsty soul drank it in, and I felt that had it never come, for lack of it I must have died. I did almost die, for the joy was long in coming. Though—as I know now—he loved me well and dearly; yet for some reason or other he would not tell me so. The veil might never have fallen from our hearts, save for one blessed chance. I will relate it. I love to dream over that brief hour, to which my whole existence can never show a parallel.

We were walking all together—my sisters, Laurence Sheldermine, and I—when there came on an August thunder-storm. Our danger was great, for we were in the midst of a wood. My sisters fled; but I, being weak and ill—alas! my heart was breaking quietly, though he knew it not—I had no strength to fly. He was too kind to forsake me: so we stayed in an open space of the wood, I clinging to his arm, and thinking—God forgive me!—that if I could only die then, close to him, encompassed by his gentle care, it would be so happy—happier far than my life was then. What he thought, I knew not. He spoke in hurried, broken words, and turned his face from me all the while.

It grew dark, like night, and there came flash after flash, peal after peal. I could not stand—I leant against his arm. At last there shone all round us a frightful glare, as if the whole wood were in flames—a crash of boughs—a roar above, as though the heavens were falling—then, silence.

Death had passed close by us, and smote us not—and Death was the precursor of Love.

We looked at one another, Laurence and I: then, with a great cry, our hearts—long-tortured—sprang together. There never can be such a meeting, save that of two parted ones, who meet in heaven. No words were spoken, save a murmur—“Adelaide!” “Laurence!”—but we knew that between us two there was but one soul. We stood there—all the while the storm lasted. He sheltered me in his arms, and I felt neither the thunder nor the rain. I feared not life nor death, for I now knew that in either I should never be divided from him.

* * * * * Ours was a brief engagement. Laurence wished it so; and I disputed not—I never disputed with him in anything. Besides, I was not happy at home—my sisters did not understand him. They jested with me because he was grave and reserved—even subject to moody fits sometimes. They said, “I should have a great deal to put up with; but it was worth while, for Mr. Shelmerdine’s grand estate atoned for all.” My Laurence! as if I had ever thought whether he were rich or poor! I smiled, too, at my sisters’ jests about his melancholy, and the possibility of his being “a bandit in disguise.” None truly knew him—none but I! Yet I was half afraid of him at times; but that was only from the intensity of my love. I never asked him of his for me—how it grew—or why he had so long concealed it: enough for me that it was there. Yet it was always calm: he never showed any passionate emotion, save one night—the night before our wedding day.

I went with him to the gate myself, walking in the moonlight under the holly trees. I trembled a little; but I was happy—very happy. He held me long in his arms ere he would part with me—the last brief parting ere we would have no need to part any more. I said, looking up from his face unto the stars, “Laurence, in our full joy, let us thank God, and pray Him to bless us.”

His heart seemed bursting: he bowed his proud head, dropped it down upon my shoulder, and cried, “Nay, rather pray Him to forgive me. Adelaide, I am not worthy of happiness—I am not worthy of you.”

He, to talk in this way! and about me! but

I answered him soothingly, so that he might feel how dear was my love—how entire my trust.

He said, at last, half mournfully, “You are content to take me then, just as I am; to forgive my past—to bear with my present—to give hope to my future. Will you do this, my love, my Adelaide?”

I answered, solemnly, “I will.” Then, for the first time, I dared to lift my arms to his neck; and as he stooped I kissed his forehead. It was the seal of this my promise,—which may God give me strength to keep evermore!

We were laughing to-day—Laurence and I—about first loves. It was scarcely a subject for mirth; but one of his bachelor friends had been telling us of a new-married couple, who, in some comical fashion, mutually made the discovery of each other’s “first loves.” I said to my husband, smiling happily, “that he need have no such fear.” And I repeated, half in sport, the lines—

“‘He was her own, her ocean treasure, cast
Like a rich wreck—her first love, and her last.’”

So it was with your poor Adelaide.” Touched by the thought, my gaiety melted almost into tears. But I laughed them off, and added, “Come, Laurence, confess the same. You never, never loved any one but me?”

He looked pained, said coldly, “I believe I have not given cause—” then stopped. How I trembled; but I went up to him, and whispered, “Laurence, dearest, forgive me.” He looked at me a moment, then caught me passionately to his breast. I wept there a little—my heart was so full. Yet I could not help again murmuring that question—“You love me? you do love me?”

“I love you as I never before loved woman. I swear this in the sight of heaven. Believe it, my wife!” was his vehement answer. I hated myself for having so tried him. My dear, my noble husband! I was mad to have a moment’s doubt of thee.

* * * * * Nearly a year married, and it seems a brief day: yet it seems, also, like a lifetime—as if I had never known any other. My Laurence! daily I grow closer to him—heart to heart. I understand him better—if possible, I love him more: not with the wild worship of my girlhood, but with something dearer—more home-like. I would not have him an “angel,” if I could. I know all his little faults and weaknesses quite well—I do not shut my eyes on any of them; but I gaze openly at them, and love them down. There is love enough in my heart to fill up all chasms—to remove all stumbling-blocks from our path. Ours is truly a wedded life: not two jarring lives, but an harmonious and complete one.

I have taken a long journey, and am somewhat dreary at being away, even for three days, from my pleasant home. But Laurence was obliged to go, and I would not let him go alone; though, from tender fear, he urged me to stay. So kind and thoughtful he was too. Because his engagements here would keep him much from me, he made me take likewise my sister Louisa. She is a good girl, and a dear girl; but I miss Laurence; I did especially in my walk to-day, through a lovely, wooded country, and a sweet little village. I was thinking of him all the time; so much so, that I quite started when I heard one of the village children shouted after as "Laurence."

Very foolish it is of me—a loving weakness I have not yet got over—but I never hear the name my husband bears without a pleasant thrill; I never even see it written up in the street without turning again to look at it. So, unconsciously, I turned to the little rosy urchin, whom his grandam honoured by the name of "Laurence."

A pretty, sturdy boy, of five or six years old—a child to glad any mother. I wondered had he a mother! I stayed and asked.—I always notice children now. Oh! wonderful, solemn mystery sleeping at my heart, my hope—my joy—my prayer! I think, with tears, how I may one day watch the gambols of a boy like this; and how, looking down in his little face, I may see therein my Laurence's eyes. For the sake of this future—which God grant!—I went and kissed the little fellow who chanced to bear my husband's name. I asked the old woman about the boy's mother. "Dead! dead five years." And his father? A sneer—a muttered curse—bitter words about "poor folk" and "gentle-folk." Alas! alas! I saw it all. Poor, beautiful, unhappy child!

My heart was so pained, that I could not tell the little incident to Laurence. Even when my sister began to talk of it, I asked her to cease. But I pondered over it the more. I think, if I am strong enough, I will go and see the poor little fellow again to-morrow. One might do some good—who knows?

To-morrow has come—to-morrow has gone. What a gulf lies between that yesterday and its to-morrow!

* * * * Louisa and I walked to the village—she very much against her will. "It was wrong, and foolish," she said; "one should not meddle with vice." And she looked prudent and stern. I tried to speak of the innocent child—of the poor dead mother; and the shadow of motherhood over my own soul taught me compassion towards both. At last, when Louisa was half angry, I said I would go, for I had a secret reason which she did not know.—Thank heaven those words were put into my lips!

So, we went. My little beauty of a boy was not there; and I had the curiosity to approach the cottage where his grandmother lived. It stood in a garden, with a high hedge around. I heard a child's laugh, and could not forbear peeping through. There was my little favourite, held aloft in the arms of a man, who stood half-hidden behind a tree.

"He looks like a gentleman: perhaps it is the wretch of a father!" whispered Louisa. "Sister, we ought to come away." And she walked forward indignantly.

But I still stayed—still looked. Despite my horror of the crime, I felt a sort of attraction: it was some sign of grace in the man that he should at least acknowledge and show kindness to his child. And the miserable mother! I, a happy wife, could have wept to think of her. I wondered, did he think of her, too? He might; for, though the boy laughed and chattered, lavishing on him all those pet diminutives which children make out of the sweet word "father," I did not hear this father answer by a single word.

Louisa came to hurry me away. "Hush!" I said: "one moment, and I will go."

The little one had ceased chattering: the father put it down, and came forth from his covert.

Heaven! it was my husband!

* * * * I think I should then have fallen down dead, save for one thing—I turned and met my sister's eyes. They were full of horror—indignation—pity. She, too, had seen.

Like lightning there flashed across me all the future: my father's wrath—the world's mockery—his shame.

I said—and I had strength to say it quite calmly—"Louisa, you have guessed our secret; but keep it—promise!"

She looked aghast—confounded.

"You see," I went on, and I actually smiled, "you see, I know all about it, and so does Laurence. It is—a friend's child."

May heaven forgive me for that lie I told: it was to save my husband's honour.

Day after day, week after week, goes by, and yet I live—live, and living, keep the horrible secret in my soul. It must remain there buried for ever, now.

It so chanced, that after that hour I did not see my husband for some weeks: Louisa and I were hastily summoned home. So I had time to think what I was to do.

I knew all now—all the mystery of his fits of gloom—his secret sufferings. It was remorse, perpetual remorse. No marvel! And for a moment my stern heart said, "Let it be so." I, too, was wronged. Why did he marry me, and hide all this? O vile! O cruel! Then the light broke on me: his long struggle against his love—his terror of winning mine. But he did love me: half-maddening as I was, I grasped at that. Whatever blackness was on the past, he loved me now—he had sworn it—"more than he ever loved woman."

I was yet young: I knew little of the wickedness of the world; but I had heard of that mad passion of a moment, which may seize on a heart not wholly vile, and afterwards a whole lifetime of remorse works out the expiation. Six years ago! he must have been then a mere boy. If he had thus erred in youth, I, who knew his nature, knew how awful must have been the repentance of his manhood. On any humbled sinner I would have mercy—how much rather must I have mercy on my husband?

I had mercy. Some, stern in virtue, may condemn me; but God knoweth all.

He is—I believe it in my soul—he is a good man now, and striving more and more after good. I will help him—I will save him. Never shall he know that secret, which out of pride or bitterness might drive him back from virtue, or make him feel shame before me.

I took my resolution—I have fulfilled it. I have met him again, as a faithful wife should meet her husband: no word, no look, betrays, or shall betray, what I know. All our outyard life goes on as before: his tenderness for me is constant—overflowing. But oh! the agony, worse than death, of knowing my idol fallen—that where I once worshipped, I can only pity, weep, and pray.

He told me yesterday he did not feel like the same man that he was before his marriage. He said I was his good angel: that through me he became calmer, happier, every day. It was true: I read the change in his face. Others read it too. Even his aged mother told me, with tears, how much good I had done to Laurence. For this, thank God!

My husband! my husband! At times I could almost think this horror was some delicious dream, cast it all to the winds, and worship him as of old. I do feel, as I ought, deep tenderness—compassion. No, no! let me not deceive myself: I love him; in defiance of all I love him, and shall do evermore.

Sometimes his olden sufferings come over him; and then I, knowing the whole truth, feel my very soul moved within me. If he had only told me all: if I could now lay my heart open before him, with all its love and pardon; if he would let me comfort him, and speak of hope, of heaven's mercy—of atonement, even on earth. But I dare not—I dare not.

Since, from this silence which he has seen fit to keep, I must not share the struggle, but must stay afar off,—then, like the prophet who knelt on the rock, supplicating for Israel in the battle, let my hands fall not, nor my prayer cease, until heaven sendeth the victory.

Nearer and nearer comes the hour which will be to me one of a double life, or of death. Sometimes, remembering all I have lately suffered, there comes to me a heavy foreboding. What, if I, so young, to whom, one little year ago, life seemed an opening paradise—what, if I should die—die and leave him, and he never know how deeply I have loved—how much I have forgiven?

Yes; he might know, and bitterly. Should Louisa tell—But I will prevent that.

In my husband's absence, I have sat up half the night writing; that, in case of my death, he may be made acquainted with the whole truth, and hear it from me alone. I have poured out all my suffering—all my tenderness: I have implored him, for the love of heaven, for the love of me, that he would in every way atone for the past, and lead for the future a righteous life; that his sin may be forgiven, and that, after death, we may meet in joy evermore.

I have been to church with Laurence—for the last time, as I think. We knelt together, and took the sacrament. His face was grave, but peaceful. When we came home, we sat in our beautiful little rose-garden: he, looking so content—even happy;—so tender over me—so full of hope for the future. How should this be, if he had on his soul that awful sin? All seemed a delusion of my own creating: I doubted even the evidence of my own senses. I longed to throw myself on his bosom, and tell him all. But then from some inexplicable cause, the olden cloud came over him; I read in his face, or thought I read, the torturing remorse which at once repelled me from him, and yet drew me again, with a compassion that was almost stronger than love.

I thought I would try to say, in some passing way, words that, should I die, might afterwards comfort him, by telling him how his misery had wronged my heart, and how I did not scorn him, not even for his sin.

"Laurence," I said, very softly, "I wish that you and I had known one another all our lives—from the time we were little children."

"Oh! that we had! then I had been a better and a happier man, my Adelaide!" was his answer.

"We will not talk of that. Please God, we may live a long and worthy life together; but if not—"

He looked at me with fear. "What is that you say? Adelaide, you are not going to die? you, whom I love, whom I have made happy, you have no cause to die."

Oh, agony! he thought of the one who had cause—to whose shame and misery death was better than life. Poor wretch! she, too, might have loved him. Down, wife's jealousy! down, woman's pride! It was long, long ago. She is dead; and he—Oh! my husband! may God forgive me according as I pardon you!

I said to him once more, putting my arm round his neck, leaning so that he could only hear, not see me. "Laurence, if I should die, remember how happy we have been, and how dearly we have loved one another. Think of nothing sad or painful; think only that, living or dying, I loved you as I have loved none else in the world. And so, whatever chances, be content."

He seemed afraid to speak more, lest I should be agitated; but as he kissed me, I felt on my cheek tears—tears that my own eyes, long sealed by misery, had no power to shed.

I have set my house in order. Now, whichever way God wills the event, I am prepared. Life is not to me what it once was: yet, for Laurence's sake, and for one besides—Ah! now I dimly guess what that poor mother felt, who, dying, left her child to the mercy of the bitter world. But, heaven's will be done. I shall write here no more—perhaps for ever.

It is all past and gone. I have been a mother—alas! have been; but I never knew it. I woke out of a long blank dream—a delirium of many weeks—to find the blessing had come, and been taken away. ONE only giveth—ONE only taketh. Amen!

For seven days, as they tell me, my babe lay by my side—its tiny hands touched mine—it slept at my breast. But I remember nothing—nothing! I was quite mad all the while. And then—it died—and I have no little face to dream of—no memory of the sweetness that has been: it is all to me as if I had never seen my child.

If I had only had my senses for one day—one hour: if I could but have seen Laurence when they gave him his baby boy. Bitterly he grieves, his mother says, because he has no heir.

My first waking fear was horrible. Had I betrayed anything during my delirium? I think not. Louisa says I lay all the time silent, dull, and did not even notice my husband, though he bent over me like one distracted. Poor Laurence! I see him but little now: they will not suffer me. It is perhaps well: I could not bear his grief and my own too: I might not be able to keep my secret safe.

I went yesterday to look at the tiny mound—all that is left to me of my dream of motherhood. Such a happy dream as it was, too! How it comforted me, many a time: how I used to sit and think of my darling that was to come: to picture it lying in my arms—playing at my feet—growing in beauty—a boy, a youth, a man! And this—this is all—this little grave.

Perhaps I may never have another child. If so, all the deep love which nature teaches, and which nature has even now awakened in my heart, must find no object, and droop and wither away, or be changed into repining. No! please God, that last shall never be: I will not embitter the blessings I have, by mourning over those denied.

But I must love something, in the way that I would have loved my child. I have lost my babe; some babe may have lost a mother. A thought comes—I shudder—I tremble—yet I follow it. I will pause a little, and then—

In Mr. Shelmerdine's absence, I have accomplished my plan. I have contrived to visit the place where lives that hapless child—my husband's child.

I do believe my love to Laurence must be such as never before was borne to man by woman. It draws me even towards this little one: forgetting all wife-like pride, I seem to yearn over the boy. But is this strange? In my first girlish dreams, many a time I have taken a book he had touched—a flower he had gathered—hid it from my sisters, kissed it, and wept over it for days. It was folly; but it only showed how precious I held everything belonging to him. And should I not hold precious what is half himself—his own son?

I will go and see the child to-morrow.

Weeks have passed, and yet I have had no strength to tell what that to-morrow brought. Strange book of human fate! each leaf closed until the appointed time,—if we could but turn it, and read. Yet it is best not.

I went to the cottage—alone, of course. I asked the old woman to let me come in and rest, for I was a stranger, weak and tired. She did so kindly, remembering, perhaps, how I had once noticed the boy. He was her grandson she told me—her daughter's child.

Her daughter! And this old creature was a coarse, rough-spoken woman—a labourer's wife. Laurence Sheldermine—the elegant—the refined—what madness must have possessed him!

"She died very young, then, your daughter?" I found courage to say.

"Ay, ay; in a few months after the boy's birth. She was but a weakly thing at best, and she had troubles enow."

Quickly came the blood to my heart—to my cheek—in bitter, bitter shame. Not for myself, but for him. I shrank like a guilty thing before that mother's eye. I dared not ask—what I longed to hear—concerning the poor girl, and her sad history.

"Is the child like her?" was all I could say, looking to where the little one was playing, at the far-end of the garden. I was glad not to see him nearer. "Was his mother as beautiful as he?"

"Ay, a good-looking lass enough; but the little lad's like his father, who was a gentleman born: though Laurence had better ha' been a ploughman's son. A bad business Bess made of it. To this day I dunnot know her right name, nor little Laurence's there; and so I canna make his father own him. He ought, for the lad's growing up as grund a gentleman as himself: he'll never do to live with poor folk like granny."

"Alas!" I cried, forgetting all but my compassion; "then how will the child bear his lot of shame!"

"Shame!" and the old woman came up fiercely to me. "You'd better mind your own business: my Bess was as good as you."

I trembled violently, but could not speak. The woman went on:—

"I dunnot care if I blab it all out, though Bess begged me not. She was a fool, and the young fellow something worse. His father tried—may-be he wished to try, too—but they couldna undo what had been done. My girl was safe married to him, and the little lad's a gentleman's lawful son."

Oh! joy beyond belief! Oh! bursting, blessed tears! My Laurence! my Laurence!

* * * I have no clear recollection of anything more, save that I suppose the woman thought me mad, and fled out of the cottage. My first consciousness is of finding myself quite alone, with the door open, and a child looking in at me in wonderment, but with a gentleness such as I have seen my husband wear. No marvel I had loved that childish face: it was such as might have been his when he was a boy.

I cried, tremulously, "Laurence! little Laurence!" He came to me, smiling and pleased. One faint struggle I had—forgive me, poor dead girl!—and then I took the child in my arms, and kissed him as though I had been his mother. For thy sake—for thy sake—my husband!

I understood all the past now. The wild, boyish passion, making an ideal out of a poor village girl—the unequal union—the dream fading into common day—coarseness creating repulsion—the sting of one folly which had marred a lifetime—dread of the world, self-reproach, and shame—all these excuses I could find: and yet Laurence had acted ill. And when the end came: no wonder that remorse pursued him, for he had broken a girl's heart. She might, she must, have loved him. I wept for her—I, who so passionately loved him too.

He was wrong, also, grievously wrong, in not acknowledging the child. Yet there might have been reasons. His father ruled with an iron hand; and, then, when he died, Laurence had just known me. Alas! I weave all coverings to hide his fault. But surely this strong, faithful love was implanted in my heart for good. It shall not fail him now: it shall encompass him with arms of peace: it shall stand between him and the bitter past: it shall lead him on to a worthy and happy future.

There is one thing which he must do: I will strengthen him to do it. Yet, when I tell him all, how will he meet it? No matter; I must do right. I have walked through this cloud of misery—shall my courage fail me now?

He came home, nor knew that I had been away. Something oppressed him: his old grief, perhaps. My beloved! I have a balm even for that, now.

* * * I told him the story, as it were in a parable, not of myself, but of another—a friend I had. His colour came and went—his hands trembled in my hold. I hid nothing: I told of the wife's first horrible fear—of her misery—and the red flush mounted to his very brow. I could have fallen at his feet, and prayed forgiveness; but I dared not yet. At last I spoke of the end, still using the feigned names I had used all along.

He said, hoarsely, "Do you think the wife—a good and pure woman—would forgive all this?"

"Forgive! Oh! Laurence—Laurence!" and I clung to him and wept.

A doubt seemed to strike him. "Adelaide—tell me—"

"I have told. Husband, forgive me! I know all, and still I love you—I love you!"

I did not say, I pardon. I would not let him think that I felt I had need to pardon.

Laurence sank down at my feet, hid his face on my knees, and wept.

* * * The tale of his youth was as I guessed. He told it me the same night, when we sat in the twilight gloom. I was glad of this—that not even his wife's eyes might scan too closely the pang it cost him to reveal these long-past days. But all the while he spoke my head was on his breast, that he might feel I held my place there still, and that no error, no grief, no shame, could change my love for him, nor make me doubt his own, which I had won.

My task is accomplished. I rested not, day or night, until the right was done. Why should he fear the world's sneer, when his wife stands by him—his wife, who most of all might be thought to shrink from this confession that must be made? But I have given him comfort—ay, courage. I have urged him to do his duty, which is one with mine.

My husband has acknowledged his first marriage, and taken home his son. His mother, though shocked and bewildered at first, rejoiced when she saw the beautiful boy—worthy to be the heir of the Sheldermidnes. All are happy in the thought. And I—

I go, but always secretly, to the small daisy-mound. My own lost one! my babe, whose face I never saw! If I have no child on earth, I know there is a little angel waiting me in heaven.

Let no one say I am not happy, as happy as one can be in this world: never was any woman more blessed than I am in my husband and my son—mine. I took him as such: I will fulfil the pledge while I live.

* * * The other day, our little Laurence did something wrong. He rarely does so—he is his father's own child for gentleness and generosity. But here he was in error: he quarrelled with his Aunt Louisa, and refused to be friends. Louisa was not right either: she does not half love the boy.

I took my son on my lap, and tried to show him the holiness and beauty of returning good for evil; of forgetting unkindness, of pardoning sin. He listened, as he always listens to me. After a while, when his heart was softened, I made him kneel down beside me, saying the prayer—"Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us."

Little Laurence stole away, repentant and good. I sat thoughtful: I did not notice that behind me had stood my Laurence—my husband. He came and knelt where his boy had knelt. Like a child, he laid his head on my shoulder, and blessed me, in broken words. The sweetest of all were:—

"My wife! my wife who has saved her husband!"

SHAKESPEARE'S SOUTHWARK, PAST AND PRESENT.

BY F. W. FAIRHOLT, F.S.A.

It has been frequently said that, "Paris is France,"—the saying has become proverbial, and it is true in the main, inasmuch as in that capital we see French character fully develop itself, while its influence gives the tone to every provincial capital in its opinions, its habits, and its fashions. But if we were to say that

"London is England," we should not meet so tacit an acquiescence, inasmuch as our provincial cities have an independent character of their own, and do not look up to the capital for their guidance so entirely; neither are they without the pride of provincialism, and are less inclined to honour the capital at the expense of their own native city or town. Yet London may be taken as a fair epitome of England. Like the English Constitution, it has modified itself to every age, has adapted itself to every and thus preserved its supremacy in the nineteenth century, until the "Modern Babylon" has become the wonder of the world. Increasing in size, as England has increased in power, its warehouses are the receptacles of the industry of the world; its port the centre to which all vessels steer; it shops the mart for every trader of the universe. As England has possessions in every hemisphere, so is its cosmopolitan character shadowed in its streets; the very names which meet the eye show the mixed character of the population; and the still increasing vastness of the enormous city is but a type of the commercial greatness of the Nation. Is not, then, London—England?

It was far otherwise within comparatively recent times. We need not go back to the early or middle ages, when commerce was neglected or crippled by the most absurd of Custom-house regulations, when "Protection," in the fullest sense of the word, was accorded in the blindest manner to all who had a shadow of claim to it, and trade meant business bounded by our own seas. In those days, London was a small, snugly-walled city, with one bridge well fortified, and a Tower strongly formed to repel an enemy. Like England at that period, it was warlike and insecure; throwing around itself restrictive and mural protection. As England has progressed its capital has increased in wealth and importance; but where now are its wall and bastions, its gates and drawbridges—a true type of the nation, it has learned the wisdom of the moral strength of universal trustfulness based on native honour.

Any one who has the opportunity and inclination to look at the old "bird's-eye" view of London, executed in the reign of Elizabeth, will at once be struck with the small space it then occupied. Its walls were entire, and enclosed the ground east and west from the Tower to Blackfriars, reaching from the Thames northwardly to Smithfield, Barbican, and Finsbury; while, from Cripplegate to Bishopsgate, "the maidens of London dried their clothes" on the grass plots immediately under the walls, and the eye had an uninterrupted range over "fresh fields and pastures new," where the young men of London met to practise shooting with the bow, beyond which were the windmills, where many a "lusty miller" drove a brisk trade with the city; and far away the villages of Islington and Hackney, and the hills of Hampstead and Highgate. Within the walls was a dense population in streets of narrow dimensions, the houses overhanging the pathways, on many of which the sun never shone, and which were ill-drained and ill-cleaned; some idea of them may be now formed by a visit to the still existing streets of the cité of Old Paris, or the roynde of Old Edinburgh. The pestilences which once depopulated Old London have departed with the manners which occasioned them.

The inhabitants of the Ancient Town, crowded thus within their walls—literally in "populous city pent"—escaped whenever they were able; those who could leave the alleys congregated in the wider principal thoroughfares, or met to talk and walk in the nave of St. Paul's; or if they could get beyond the walls, walked in Finsbury-fields, where the youths went to practise with pike or bow, and the maidens to dance; while those "on pleasure bent," crossed the Thames, and sought it on the Surrey side.

"Southwark from an early time appears to have been to the Londoners what "the playing ground" was to the Indian—a place adjacent to his home, devoted to his amusement. Here were "garden houses," selling cakes and ale for the old citizens; bear-baiting and plays for the younger ones—and, by natural consequence, here also congregated the infamous of both sexes, who had sought to gain by the stimulus excited. Paris-garden achieved an early notoriety in evil; it frequently occupied the attention of satirists; one Crowley, a poet of the reign of Henry VIII., as quoted by Pennant, declares:—

"At Paris Garden each Sunday a man shall not fail To find two or three hundred, for the bear-ward's vale,
One half-penny a-piece they use for to give."

But it was not the poor and vulgar only who patronized these debasing amusements. Collier, in his "History of the Stage," relates that the Earl of Northumberland went there to see bears baited in 1520; and a gentleman of the suite of the Spanish ambassador in 1544, narrates his visit to the same "fashionable" locality; he describes the bears as "driven into a circus, where they are confined by a long rope, while large and courageous dogs are let loose upon them, and a fight takes place." He narrates that horses were also baited there; and describes a pony thus tormented with a monkey on its back, complacently saying, "that the shrieks of the monkey, when he saw the dogs hanging from the ears and neck of the pony, rendered the scene very laughable."

This place is said to have obtained its name from Robert de Paris, who had a house and grounds there in the reign of Richard II. The manor became royal property afterwards, and comprised the land lying opposite Blackfriars. Paris-garden Stairs, where Londoners debarked, were facing Puddle-dock, and were in existence till the year 1816, when the site was purchased by Mr. Devey, a coal merchant, and converted into a wharf.

Honest John Stow has left the best account of the neighbourhood, at a time when the success of the one bear-garden had caused the erection of another. Speaking of Southwark, he says, "on this bank is the beare-gardens, in number twain; to wit, the old bear-garden and the new, places wherein be kept bears, bulls, and other beasts, to be bayted at stakes for pleasure; also mastives to bait them in severall kennels are there nourished. These bears, bulls, and other beasts, are oft times baited in plots of ground, scaffolded about for the beholders to stand upon safe." Hentzner, the German traveller in England, whose itinerary relates to what he saw here in 1598, gives a still more minute description, when speaking of theatres near London, he says—"There is still another place, built in the form of a theatre, which serves for the baiting of bulls and bears; they are fastened behind, and then worried by great English bull-dogs, but not without great risk to the dogs, from the horns of the one, and the teeth of the other, and it sometimes happens they are killed on the spot; fresh ones are immediately supplied in the place of those that are wounded or tired. To this entertainment there often follows that of whipping a blinded bear, which is performed by five or six men standing circularly with whips, which they exercise upon him without any mercy, as he cannot escape from them because of his chains. He defends himself with all his force and skill, throwing down all who come within his reach, and are not active enough to get out of it, and tearing the whips out of their hands and breaking them." He then dilates on the company who "constantly" smoke tobacco," and adds, "in these theatres, fruits, such as apples, pears and nuts, according to the season, are carried about to be sold, as well as ale and wine." But for the tobacco-smoking, we might think he was describing the Southwark minor theatres of the present day.

In the old map of London, already noticed, these two theatres are clearly shown: they are circular, open at top to the sky, and spectators are represented seated all round, looking at the combats of beasts in the centre. Outside, the curious pry through windows and crannies, and rows of bears and dogs appear chained as a corps de reserve; large square pools of water are also provided, in which the animals were washed, after the fashion described by Brown, in 1656, of those he saw in the bear-garden at Dresden, where, he says, "they have fountains and ponds to wash themselves in, wherein they much delight." The gallery which ran round the old amphitheatre was double, and was calculated to hold a thousand people; and here, on Sundays, congregated masses of the idle and dissolute. Prynne has related the awful accident which happened here on the 13th of January, 1583, which "being the Lord's Day, an infinite number of people, men, women, and children, resorted unto Paris-garden to see beare-fighting, playes, and other pastyme," when, "being altogether mounted aloft upon these scaffolds and galleries, and in the midst of their jollity and pastyme," the building being old and rotten, the scaffolds fell; "five men and two women were slain outright, and above 150 persons were sore wounded and bruised, whereof many died shortly after." With the same taste for high-flown terms to hide "blackguardism" chosen by modern prize-fighters, who term their doings "manly art" and "noble science," the old bear-garden proprietors termed their show "royal pastime!"

The Drama at this time was weak and poor. The blustering of Tamburlaine was incomprehensible to the mass; clever writing, poetic thought, had not yet appeared naturally before them. No wonder, then, that, like Ben Jonson's gossips in the "Staple of News," they valued "no play without a foole and a devil in't!!" to cut capers and make sport with buffoonery of the lowest kind. The attractions of the stage, however, triumphed, and four theatres occupied "the Bankside" in the early part of the seventeenth century, one ultimately becoming world-famous by its connexion with Shakespeare;—not, however, that bear-baiting ceased, for we find in the year 1682 it was still carried on, and "a horse baited to death," which "formerly belonged to the Earl of Rochester."

By the end of the sixteenth century there were eleven theatres opened in the suburbs of London; but the four in Southwark were the Swan, the Hope, the Rose, and the Globe. The least celebrated was the Swan, which stood close to the water's edge, but the exact spot is not easily definable; it was the most westerly of the theatres on the Bankside, and stood near the Phoenix gas-works. In 1618 it was shut up; and we learn from an old pamphlet, published in 1632, that it had then fallen into decay. It was totally demolished, with several others, by order of the Parliament, at the commencement of the civil wars. The Hope, originally used as a bear-garden, was converted into a theatre early in the seventeenth century; but it was again made a bear-garden, and then again a theatre, in 1614, when Ben Jonson's "Bartholomew Fair" was played there, he declaring "that therein the author hath observ'd a special decorum, the place being as dirty as Smithfield, and as stinking every whit." The Rose stood close to this theatre, but nearer the water; it was built before 1598, and Collier considers it "the oldest theatre on the Bankside;" it was deserted in 1613. The Globe nearly faced the Hope; it was erected about 1594, and was burned in June, 1613, when the wadding of a small cannon, shot off in "a play called 'All is True,' representing some principal pieces in the reign of Henry VIII." (and probably Shakespeare's), set fire to the thatched roof, and burned it to the ground in less than two hours. It was rebuilt shortly in an improved fashion, and here Shakespeare's finest works were first given to the world; the players were styled "the King's servants;" and it continued open till 1642, when the puritanical parliament issued an order for the suppression of stage plays. Collier thinks that "after 1647 it was most likely pulled down."

The connexion of our greatest poet with the Globe, and his fortune therewith, are so frequently related as to need no fresh narrative here; we may, therefore, confine ourselves to notes on the Southwark of his time.

The straggling houses that dotted the water's edge from Lambeth-marsh to Paris-garden grew thicker as they approached that place, and formed a line of houses, with gardens and groves of trees behind them, until they reached the three theatres last described, round which they appear to have clustered thickly. Close beside them were "the Stews," and the garden-house known as "Holland's Leaguer," a building with a pleasure-ground and arbours, surrounded by a ditch and approached by a drawbridge, and which was of infamous notoriety. The Stews, as Stow tells us, had signs painted on their fronts towards the river, and their inhabitants are alluded to by Shakespeare as "Winchester geese," the place being under the protection of the Bishop of Winchester, whose palace and gardens stood close beside them, reaching nearly to St. Saviour's wharf, where the houses clustered thickly, until they formed the High-street of Southwark.

Much of this neighbourhood was inhabited by persons who did not altogether approve of these scenes; and we find them complaining of the incessant noise and tumult of the Bear-garden, then the property of Edward Alleyne, the founder of Dulwich College. Among them occurs the name of Shakespeare, proving that in July, 1596, he was a resident in Southwark. At this time, the poet, though still a very young man, had been a successful adventurer in London; was part proprietor of the Globe and Blackfriars Theatres; and early in 1597 purchased one of the best houses in his native town of Stratford (New Place, where he died). The biographical facts connected with the poet are few and far between, but all of them tend to prove he was by no means deficient in worldly wisdom. We find him purchasing houses and land at Stratford, and dealing with the corporation for stone and corn; applied to by friends there for loans of money "on good security," and receiving letters of advice as to the purchase of land. In London, not again to speak of his property in theatres, we find him assessed in 1598 for property in the parish of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate; and the original counterpart of the conveyance to him of a house in Blackfriars is now in the library of the Corporation of London, signed by the poet himself. Some idea of his income may be formed from that portion obtained from his share of the Blackfriars, thus narrated in the document drawn up for the Corporation of London, when they wished to purchase and suppress it:—

"Item. W. Shakespeare asketh for the wardrobe and properties of the same playhouse, 500*li*.; and for his 4 shares the same as his fellows, Burbidge and Fletcher, viz., 933*li*. 6*s*. 8*d*. . . 1433*li*. 6*s*. 8*d*."

Therefore, says Mr. Halliwell, in his admirable life of the poet, "the shares which Shakespeare possessed in the Blackfriars Theatre alone produced him, as it appears from this list, £133 6*s*. 8*d*. a year; and Mr. Collier adds an annual £50 to this for the loan of 'properties;' so that, supposing his income from the Globe were of the same amount, his theatrical property in 1608 was worth £366 13*s*. 4*d*. per annum." In May, 1602, he purchased 107 acres of arable land in Old Stratford; and in July, 1605, he gave £440 for a lease of the tithes of Stratford, Old Stratford, Bishopston, and Welcombe. When we consider the value of such sums in these days, we can form a good idea of the personal wealth of the prudent dramatist. His will gives the fullest account of his possessions at his decease, and enumerates much that is here mentioned. The sums above named may be multiplied by four, to bring them to an equal value with what they would be worth in our own day.

Having thus completed a survey of Southwark in Shakespeare's time, let us now see what remains at the present day to mark the famous localities of two centuries ago.

Passing across Blackfriars-bridge, the first turning to the left—Holland-street—leads directly to Bankside, and a few yards brings you acquainted with names that belong to the Shakesperian era. The Falcon Glass Works, the Falcon Brewery, and the Falcon Coal Wharf, all perpetuate the name (and the latter place the site) of the Falcon Tavern, the traditional resort of Shakespeare and his dramatic companions, and which was pulled down at the commencement of the present century. It was one of those roomy old inns, with large projecting windows, which have ceased to be seen in modern London. There is a very good engraving of it in Wilkinson's "Londina Illustrata." The names of the streets about the place have a suburban sound—Green-walk, for instance—one of the country lanes converted into a dirty street of small houses.

Built into the modern houses, at intervals may be traced the quaint old wooden erections which originally stood in their "garden-plots," jotted over the land like a Dutch village. They are generally about the time of William III, but some may date back to that of Charles II. In Gravel-lane and Guildford-street are several; and the pedestrian who will be at the trouble of passing through a dense neighbourhood, where cat's-meat shops, dealers in old rags and bones, and other unsavoury commodities abound, may again trace old names in "the Hope" Iron Foundry, and its former importance in such as Ely-place, Essex-street, &c. The black dolls hung over the doors; and the barbers' poles with their acorn tops, sloping from them; have interest as the last relics of Old London tradesmen's signs. Indeed, with the exception of the dog and porridge-pot for the brazier, the golden arm and hammer for the goldbeater, and the golden fleece for the mercer, these signs may be said to have ceased to exist.

In this neighbourhood, Pye or Pike-gardens mark the locality of the Pike-ponds, which are so carefully distinguished in the old maps, where many a bear was washed; and passing on to Park-street, we observe, nearly opposite Noah's-ark-alley, a very old public-house, "the Smith's Arms," which has often rung to the uproarious mirth of the "roaring boys" who frequented the Bear-garden opposite. But we are now a little too far south; so, returning to the Falcon, we will keep by the Bankside. It is not an attractive walk now, whatever it may have been in the days of Elizabeth. The ground is covered with coal-dust, and the air with gas-smoke; the wharfs and large mercantile establishments give you an idea of wealth, the wretched courts and densely-crowded alleys of dirty and neglected poverty. The most contradictory names are given to these places, as if in jest of their own misery. A dirty dark alley, nearly closed from the light of day by wood-yards and gas-works, is called Love-lane; and another equally dirty and woe-begone passage, near St. Saviour's, is termed Primrose-alley.

The place is sacred to trade and its dependents, yet old associations remain in old names, and in Cardinal-cap-alley we trace the locality of the Bordellos, or Stews, the licensed property of the Bishop of Winchester. A few steps farther, and "the Globe" Coal Wharf reminds us of the building that gives undying celebrity to this neighbourhood; while the gateway at Shears' factory, bearing the name "Bear-garden" at its side, induces a pause. It was here that Allen's bear-garden stood, the racket of which was complained of in Shakespeare's time. The "Bear-garden Wharf," and the public-house having for sign "the White Bear," are also reminiscences of olden time. "The Rose and Bell" has a low archway beside it, leading into Rose-alley, the site of the theatre of that name; but it is now a singularly contradictory name for the place; the grounds and walls of the houses are covered with coal-dust and smoke, the air is heavy with the same, the dull whirr of the factory-wheels, and the oppressive smell of the open drains and gutters, in which neglected children paddle, to amuse themselves, as they sluggishly creep towards the Thames, past the confined habitations of their parents; is both physically and morally depressive. Bred among such filth, brought up to labour in the bad air of the various "works" in the neighbourhood, we need not wonder to meet middle-aged men decrepid, asthmatic, and haggard; flying to spirits, beer, and tobacco, as solaces for the discomfort with which they are surrounded. "Wealth has its victims—too much takes from too little:" both dwell together on the Bankside.

The site of the Hope Theatre is, as nearly as we can guess, where the Southwark-bridge-road now runs. Shakespeare's theatre, "the Globe," stood a little beyond where now Barclay and Perkins' brewery is built. Before the approaches to Southwark-bridge were formed, the localities could be much better defined, and "Globe-alley" was in existence; but it has been swept away, and with it the most interesting name of the district.

We have now reached the end of the Bankside: the open terrace to the Thames is interrupted by closely-built wharfs. We turn, however, down Clink-street, and soon reach Winchester Wharf, the site of the palatial residence of the Bishops of Winchester, who had a suburban residence here as early as the time of King Stephen, which was progressively enlarged by succeeding prelates, who continued to occupy it till the end of the seventeenth century, when the palace at Southwark was deserted for one at Chelsea. The house and grounds, with its parterres and fountains, have been carefully delineated in Hollar's great view of London. A fire, in August, 1814, destroyed the whole; but a portion of the walls of the Great Hall still remain, and a window, with carved work in the spandrels, may be seen in the open piece of ground opposite the wharf; the party-wall of one of them, by Stoney-street, is formed of the solid walls of the episcopal residence; and a very fine rose window is built in in this way, which the writer of the present notice well remembers, twenty years ago, when the ruins left by the fire were more extensive and untouched. The wonder is, that the ground has been so long unoccupied.

We now reach the little inlet from the Thames, known as St. Saviour's Wharf. The fine old conventual church is beside it; between it and the church a pointed arch and gate led, but a few years since, to Montague-close, where stood the old house of the Lord Mount-eagle, and where tradition affirms he received the famous letter which led to the discovery of the Gunpowder-plot. All is swept away now, and enormous warehouses and wharfs occupy the site. The tower of St. Mary Overy's, or St. Saviour's, looks down now on a very different scene to that which Hollar has so carefully depicted from its summit, where he had frequently and patiently employed himself in delineating the London of his day. Green fields were then in Southwark, and others around the city walls—open country within view: now the close-built, mirky streets are everywhere as far as the eye can reach, and the country beyond them obscured by smoke. The racket of wheels and railway—the dense crowds that throng London-bridge—the busy employment of wharves, warehouses, shops, and market—the anxious and hurried bearing of passers-by, all thinking of the present, and its claims—preclude reflexion here on things of the past; but the thoughtful man, who indulges in retrospection, may find much "food for contemplation" on the Bankside; and the few disjecta membra thrown together in this paper may prove how much can result from an hour's walk in Shakespeare's Southwark.

THE LUCKY PENNY.*

BR MRS. S. C. HALL.

CHAP. II.

THE next morning saw Richard at the bookseller's door, full ten minutes before the appointed time. Around his slender throat was the promised handkerchief; and there was an air of gentility about the lad, though under evident restraint, in his threadbare best clothes. He was neither tall nor large of his age, yet he had outgrown his dress: to look at him when his cloth cap (from which depended a worn tassel, brown with age) was on, you would have thought that his eyes were too large for his small, delicate features; but when that was removed, and the pale, full, well-developed brow, shaded by an abundance of light-brown hair, was displayed, then the schoolmaster's son had an air, despite his ill-fitting clothes, his patched shoes, his sunken cheeks, and the cold, mercilessly blue "handkerchief" round his throat, of the highest and most earnest intelligence. What most rendered him different from other boys however, was his frequent habit of uplooking: there was nothing weak or silly in this manner, nor did his eyes wander away from the things around him, as if he heard them not; his large, quick eyes, bright and grey, wore rapid and observant; but it was as if he carried what he saw below to be judged above; his leisure looks were "uplooking," his slight figure was erect, and he never slouched in his gait, or dragged his feet after him, as many lads are apt to do. As he stood at his new master's door, in the grey fog of a London morning, he longed for the door to open; he longed to begin work; he thought the clocks were all wrong; and, though there was hardly a creature moving in the streets except a stray cat or a slip-shod charwoman, he would have it that the entire London population were a set of slug-a-beds, unworthy of the name of Britons; for he had great veneration for Britons, and when he used to write impromptu copies on the broken slate, his favourite sentence was "Rule Britannia."

At last he heard doors opening beneath the area gratings, and in due time the shop-door was unbarred by a not very clean-faced woman, who inquired—

"Are you the new boy?" Richard said he was. "Well," added the woman, looking him over carefully, "when master had a mind to get a new boy, he might have got something with flesh on its bones, and stout arms. Sorra a much joy I'll have wid a shrimpeen of a child like you in the house. Sorra a helping hand at the knives, or shoes, or messages, I'll go bail!"

"Indeed, I can do everything you want, and bring you all you wish," said Richard, cheerfully.

"Bring me all I wish!" repeated the Irish servant, in a low, desponding tone. "Oh, then, hear to the presumption of youth! May be, you think I'm like yer mother, and that all my wishes end in a half-pint of beer, or a glass of gin?"

Richard felt his susceptible blood rush over his face. "My mother," he said, "never took a glass of gin in her life!"

She looked fixedly at him, and gradually her large mouth expanded into a smile. "Yer a better boy than I thought you, though you can't bring me all I wish; you can't bring me my two fine boys back from the withered churchyard; you can't bring me back my strength, my heart, my youth, my gay, bright youth! All I wish! Och, wirrasthue! if I had all I wish, it's not in slavery I'd be in an ainee all day, with a poor lone man for a master, that thinks the world and its sunshine is made out of musty books—and newspapers—that I can't get the reading of. Can you read?"

"Yes."

"Well, if you'll read me a bit of the news—the raaile newspaper, political news—not your po-leece thrash, but the States of Europe—I'll stand yer friend."

Richard followed her down stairs, wondering what interest such a deplorable looking woman could possibly take in the "States of Europe." She told him what to do, concerning knives and shoes and coat-brushing, and left him to do it; but the "all" was so very little, that, in addition to her directions, he made up the fire and swept the hearth; and his habits of order and quickness gave the small, dismal kitchen an air of neatness approaching to comfort, which perhaps it had never before exhibited during the dynasty of "Matty Hayes." It was this good woman's habit always to speak in a tone of injured innocence. She anticipated that everything must go wrong, and she met the evil half-way with a sort of grim exultation. She delighted in contradiction; and would contradict herself, rather than not contradict at all. There was, however, as is usual with her "people," an under-current of good-nature coursing round her heart, which rendered her speech and action two different and opposite things.

"Master's shoes nor coat aint ready, of course?" she called from the landing. In a moment Richard's light feet flew up the stairs, and he laid them on her bony arms.

"Then I'm sure he's let the fire out, if these are done," she muttered to herself. "There never was a boy that did not undo ten things while he did one!"

When she descended, she looked round, silenced by the change Richard had wrought in the den of a kitchen, and hardly knowing whether she ought to blame or praise.

"I don't mean to pay you for all this fine work," she said; "and there's no breakfast for you—no, nor bit nor sup—it's as much as I can do to manage for us three—master, and I, and Peter."

"I have had my breakfast, thank you; and as I can do nothing here, I will go up stairs, if you will be so good as to tell me what I can do there."

"Tell you what to do," she repeated. "Are you an apprentice, that you want teaching? A pretty boy, indeed, you are for a place, if you can't take down shutters, and sweep and dust a shop, and clean windows—(I daresay you'll break 'em when you do)—and mop the pavement—(always do that in frosty weather, like the doctor's boy next door, to break people's legs, and make a job of their precious limbs)—and sweep the snow over the slides, that the old people may slider about for your amusement."

Richard felt a choking sensation at his throat, and as usual he flushed, but tried not to look angry.

"There!" she exclaimed, "don't give me any impudence: quick lads are always impudent. I thought how it would be when you were so mighty neat."

During this unsavoury dialogue, and in direct opposition to her declared intention, she was cutting a remarkably thick piece of bread and butter; and having done so, she pushed it to the boy, saying, "There, go to your work now, and don't say you are starved by Matthew Whitelock's housekeeper."

Richard was a peace-loving lad: he saw the storm gathering in Matty's face, and notwithstanding his boasted breakfast (he had slipped back one of the pieces of bread his mother had given him) he could, from any other hands have eaten the bread with great gout; but the hands that fed him from infancy were delicately clean and white, and—it might be the darkness and murkiness of a January morning, but everything, and above all things Matty, looked fearfully dirty—a favourite proverb of his mother's took possession of his mind—

"Cleanliness is next to godliness."

But he loved peace, and he thanked "Matthew Whitelock's housekeeper;" simply repeating, that he had breakfasted. Matty was a resolute woman; she had made up her mind he should eat what she had prepared; and, consequently, laying her massive hands upon his shoulders, she forced him suddenly down upon a chair, from which he as suddenly sprang up as from an air cushion, but not before a most unearthly howl intimated that he had pressed too heavily upon "Peter," a rough, grey terrier, who, in these days, when tangled, ragged dogs, are the fashion, would have been called a "beauty."

"And that's your thanks, Peter, my darlin', for not biting him, to have him scrunch down upon you, as if you war a cat," she exclaimed; then, turning suddenly upon poor Richard, she commanded him to eat at once, and be done with it, and not stand there aggravating her, and murdering her dog.

At first Richard eat with a feeling of disgust; but the bread was good, and he was hungry. Peter seated himself before the lad, rising every second moment on his haunches, and making little twitching movements with his fore-paws: Richard gave him a piece of the crumb.

"Look at that, now," said Matty; "ye' just give the poor innocent baste the crumb, because ye' don't like it ye'rself."

Richard presented him with a bit of the crisp brown crust.

"See, now, if that brat of a boy ain't trying already to break every tooth in the crature's head, with his crusts."

Richard finished without offering Peter another morsel.

"Well!" ejaculated his tormentor; "if ever I saw such a selfish boy of yer age, and that's speaking volumes, as master says; not to give the brute the last crumb, for good luck; but some has no nature in 'em; and the poor baste bobbing at you, as if you had never scrooged him into a pancake. There, go along, do; and harkce! if you run the window-bars through the glass, you'll have to pay for every pane you break; and mind the trap that's over the cellar: but sure you war here before, when I was sick. Ah! I dare say you'll go off in consumption, just as the last boy did: it's all along the smell of the old books, and the ile of the papers, to say nothing of the gas. I wonder how master and I live through it; but it won't be for long, I'm certain of that; I'm a poor fading-away crature."

As Richard ran up the dark stairs, he could not avoid turning to look at the "fading-away crature." The cheerful blaze of the fire threw her figure into strong light, and her shadow on the wall grew up into the ceiling. She recalled all Richard had ever heard of "ogres"—so gaunt, and strong, and terrible—tremendous people who trouble the world for ever, and never die.

Richard entered the shop with the feeling of a governor going to take the command of a new province. Could it be absolutely real, that he was the appointed messenger to go in and out, backwards and forwards, amongst such a multitude of books! To him, the store seemed more than ever immense. Surely Mr. Whitelock must have added hundreds to his hundreds since he stood upon that threshold to help the poor dying boy. He recalled the feeling of awe with which he regarded that dingy interior; he thought Mr. Whitelock must be the happiest man in the world, not only to live amongst so many books, but to be their absolute owner; he wondered how he could bear to sell them: he resolved to count them; and thrilled from head to foot at the new-born pleasure—even in anticipation—that perhaps he might be permitted to read them. There was a delight! to read every one of the books that filled these shelves! But then came the thought that, however delicious it would be to get all that knowledge into his head, it would do his mother no real good, unless he could put the knowledge so acquired in practice: yes, put it in practice, to make money and means sufficient to keep his mother—his loving, tender, gentle mother—who seemed threatened with a terrible affliction; to keep her from want—from cold—from every apprehension of distress. Richard never stood idly to muse: no, he thought. His thoughts were active—strong, too, for a boy of his years; and they came abundantly while he occupied himself with his duties; fine, healthy, earnest thoughts they were—sanctified by an unexpressed, yet fervent, prayer to the Almighty, to bless his mother and his own exertions for her happiness.

There is something most holy and beautiful in the attachment between mother and son: it is not always so tender or so enduring as the love between mother and daughter; but when circumstances arise to call forth the affections of a large-hearted, lonely boy towards his mother, there can be no feeling more intense or more devoted.

Again Richard's habits of order increased his usefulness fourfold. He arranged all things in the neatest way, resolving to ask leave to dust the shelves, after the shop was shut; and determined to keep the windows clean; his mother's window was the cleanest in the court, why should not his master's be clean also?

He was finishing his morning's work by mending an old stumpy pen—the last of three belonging to a leaden inkstand—when his master entered.

"So, you can mend pens?"

"Yes, sir, I think I can: would you be so good as to try this one?"

He good-naturedly did so, and, as it suited him, he was really pleased; and then told Richard where to find some things, and where to keep others, until it was time to carry out certain library books, and make sundry calls, to inquire after those that had not been returned.

Richard thought it no harm to peep into the books as he went along. The first novel he opened was all about great lords and ladies, and what they did and said, and how they looked and walked, and spent their time; and Richard, when he had read half a page, came to the conclusion that those grand folk must be different in every respect from any human beings he had ever seen. He had resolved to be very quick in his messages; but as he read, his pace insensibly slackened, and his master (a long, lean man, whose benevolent countenance was somewhat hardened by a firm set mouth) met him at the door.

"You have loitered."

"I just looked into the book, sir; and I am afraid I did not come as fast as I intended."

"I sent you to carry books, not to read them; and this sort of books would not do you any good, but rather harm."

"Please, sir, I thought I had time enough."

"Remember what Poor Richard says, 'that what we call time enough always proves little enough.' Besides, I have a right to your time; it is all you have to give in exchange for my money, and it is as dishonest to squander the one as it would be to squander the other."

"I will never look in a book again, sir, without your leave."

It was perhaps strange that, though the bookseller had seen as much of what is called "the world"—that is, of his own particular "world," with now and then a peep into its higher and lower regions—as most men, and been—as kind-natured men invariably are—frequently deceived, yet he never doubted the integrity of his little messenger's promise, believing he would keep it to the letter; and he turned away without a single additional word of reproof or displeasure; but Richard heard sundry murmurings and grumblings on the stairs—ascending and descending—which convinced him that Matty would not be as easily pacified as her master. The bookseller told him he might go down and have his dinner.

"Your room would be more pleasing than your company," said Matty. Without a word he was returning whence he came.

"Where are you going?" she inquired, vehemently.

"You did not wish me to stay."

"But yer master did; he's no'er content but when he fills up this bit of a kitchen with tagrag and bobtail; but, no matter—there, eat your dinner."

"Am I always to dine here?" he said, in a hesitating voice.

"Just like the rest of them! Yer going to find fault with the blessed food—I knew ye would—I said so to-day. Says I, 'He was too fond of giving his bread to the dogs, to care for his dinner.'"

The woman's contradictions perplexed the boy so much that he could not speak. Moreover, he felt a sort of self-reproach for eating all that meat, when his mother wanted; this made him more than once lay down his knife and fork, and look upwards.

"Mighty fine eyes ye' have, to be sure, and fond of showing them!" said the sarcastic Matty.

"I'm quite done, thank you," he said, after murmuring a grace he truly felt.

"Come back: what's to come of what ye' choose to lave on yer plate? Do you mean that I don't give Peter enough? He wouldn't think it worth his while to ask for all you'd eat in a month. Why ye've left the best cut of the silver side!—the daintiness of some boys! I'll go bail ye've eat yer own weight of pudding or hard-bake while ye' were out; but as master said, 'Give him his dinner,' I've no notion of yer not eating it; so, put it up in paper, and let me see the last of ye' this blessed day."

Richard thanked her so warmly, that she knew, with instinctive feeling, there was some one at home he loved better than himself. Her heart softened—or, rather, her mood changed. But while she paused, Richard thought, and held the piece of meat on the paper she had given him without folding it up.

"I'd rather not take it, thank you," said the boy, gently. "I'd much rather not take it."

"Poor and proud—poor and proud," muttered Matty; "but ye' shall take it. I'm not to be contradicted by the likes of you."

"I will not take it," he said, firmly; "Master ordered me my dinner, but did not say I was to take away anything; and as it is his—not yours—So, thank you—all—"

He dared not finish the sentence: Matty struck down the knuckles of both hands violently on the table, and advanced her strongly-marked face close to his: it was illumined by fierce anger, and her small, piercing, black eyes flashed fire. "Do ye' mean to tell me, ye' waspeen, that I'm a thief?"

"No—no—no, indeed," said Richard, backing out as fast as he could. Still the flaming face and flashing eyes followed him; but something arrested his progress—he could retreat no farther: it was the bookseller, who inquired what was the matter? Matty multiplied and exaggerated: the little "nagur" had as good as called her a thief. After many fruitless exertions to obtain silence, the master at last succeeded in hearing the truth from Richard. "She gavo me a beautiful dinner—a fine dinner, sir—too good—too much—and I could not eat it all; so she desired me to take up what I left, and carry it home. It was so kind of her; but I thought you would not approve of my taking it. It was no longer my dinner, when I had eaten all I could: it did not appear to me quite hers to give."

"To doubt my right!" commenced Matty; but Mr. Whitelock commanded her to listen, in a tone she was little accustomed to.

"The lad is right, Matty, it is the proper sense of justice and honesty. I am glad to see it, Matty, it is not common. You may take what you leave in future, my boy; Matty was right, and you were right. No words, Matty." And the master—who was really, like many peace-lovers, fearful of noise, and consequently gave way more frequently than he ought to do, merely to avoid it—seeing that he had, in this instance, the advantage, and being well pleased with himself, resolved to make a dignified exit, and withdrew, thinking—"An evidence of truth, and an evidence of honesty—both in one day—both in one day; very pleasing, very remarkable."

Matty, however, had been offended, and she determined to show it. She paced up and down the kitchen, talking loudly to herself. "I'm not the sort to squander my master's property on comers or goers: I know what's enough for a boy's dinner; and, whether he eats it or not, there it is, and I have nothing to do with it after; for Peter scorns scraps. There—be off with ye'rsel—there's nothing keeping ye that I know of now, ye got yer answer. Setting up for honesty, indeed! as if there was no one ever honest before ye."

The boy's eyes filled with tears. "I do not know," he said, "why every one should be so kind to me."

"You young villain!" exclaimed Matty, with a flourish of a broddignag poker, which seemed forged by the Cyclops. "Get out of my kitchen this moment! What do ye' mean by saying I'm kind—kind enough! A mighty fine thing ye' are to take away my character! Botheration! is that what I'm come to!"

Richard flew up the stairs, concluded his evening's shop-work to his master's satisfaction, again went out to distribute and gather books, and religiously kept his promise; never paused before a print-shop, nor under a tempting lamp-post, to read a sentence; thought it would not become him to be proud, so nodded to Ned Brady, at his old corner! Ned hopped after him, first on one leg, then on the other, and after a brilliant somerset stood right in his path. "Come and watch for a job," he exclaimed.

"I don't want it, thank you; I've a place."

"A place! Britons never should be slaves! I like odd jobs, and freedom! Lend us a bob."

"I have not got it."

"Well, then, a brownie."

"I have not even that," replied Richard.

Ned eyed him closely. "To think of your turning out like that," he said; and he then walked round and round him. "We did not think we had such a fine gentleman for a friend, when we said he'd got the lucky penny."

"We were never friends," observed Richard, coldly.

"Don't be too up," was the reply, "and cut a poor cove because his toggery is not as fine as your'n. Rather small, though, ain't they? Would just fit me!" He made two or three mocking bows round Richard, and vanished, playing the cart-wheel—turning over and over—along the street.

"He carried many a heavy load for me, though, when I was in my former hard place, and it's a pity he is such a bad boy in some things," thought Richard, as he trudged on. He left the books, offering to do anything else he could, at his master's, and felt all the anticipations of "home" more delightfully than ever, when he saw the candle-light glimmering through the chinks of his mother's shutter. The tiny room seemed to him a paradise. The widow had finished her embroidery, and was netting, so her eyes did not look as strained and weary as usual. There was something simmering and smelling very savoury on the fire; but Richard put back his hand to pull out his piece of beef. It was gone!

Richard had no doubt that his quondam "friend" had picked his pocket, more in fun than malice; and he was confirmed in the idea by seeing a boy's shadow on the wall of the opposite house—Ned, doubtless, waiting to see how he bore his disappointment. His first impulse was to run out and thrash the thief; but the memory of their nodding companionship, and of the loads the unfortunate lad had carried for him twice or thrice—running off with what Richard had staggered under—harmonized by the perfume of the pot au feu, taught him forbearance, and the evening passed, as the widow said, "full of hope." Many such succeeded. Richard well satisfied his master, although he was a reserved, peculiar man, not much known, and less liked; he frequented no public places, and kept little society, spending his evenings in making up his accounts, arranging his books, and reading. Matty had often told her confidential friend, the milk-woman, that "one might as well live in the house with a corpse," adding her belief "that all would be corpses one day, for certain; and the sooner she was one the pleasanter it would be for herself, only that, being a lone woman, she thought while people had the holy breath of life in their bodies they might as well be alive—that was all."

Richard had numbered more than fourteen years when he entered Mr. Whitelock's service. He managed to keep on speaking terms with Matty, for when she would not talk to him she talked at him. He frequently remained half an hour after all was shut up to read to her; and once when Mr. Whitelock called to her to inquire who was below, she answered, in a tone of fierce indignation, that it was only "the stato of Europe, the French at another revulsion, and Spain on the top of the Pyramids."

Richard's life passed very happily: he was gaining knowledge, he was assisting his beloved mother, he was inhaling the atmosphere of all others he most enjoyed. He had permission to take home any book at night, provided he brought it in the morning; at first he greedily devoured all that came in his way, but the reading stock of a third-class library was not likely to feed a mind eager for actual knowledge, and largely comprehensive. Poetry he imbibed fervently; but whenever he could get biography or scientific books, he dispensed with the luxury of sleep, and came with pale cheeks and haggard eyes to his employment in the morning. "Sandford and Merton," with its bright lessons of practical independence, was his favourite relaxation, and frequently, as he told his mother, "he took a plunge" into Franklin's life as a refreshment. Then he wrote copies upon stray slips of paper; worked sums and problems on a rough piece of common slate; read what he most admired to his mother, though he was often grieved that her enthusiasm did not keep pace with his, and that she had little relish for anything that "had not more in it." Then she would insist on his going to rest, when he was all eagerness to finish a book or unravel a mystery—not the transparent mystery of a novel, but the mystery of some mighty worker in the business of life; some giant amongst men, who achieved greatness though born in obscurity; some artist, whose fame towered towards the heavens, like the tree produced by the grain of mustard-seed; some Lancaster, or Washington, or Howard, or Watt, or humble, benevolent Wilderspin, revolutionizing sloth into activity, touching the eyes of multitudes with a magic wand, so that they cried out as one man, Behold, we see!—electrifying nations, calling into existence the dormant powers and sympathies of nature and of art!

Often his eyes refused to slumber or sleep, when, in obedience to the gentle request, which love turned into a command, he lay down, beneath the shadow of his mother's blessing; and his brain would throb, and his heart beat; and when she slept, he would creep from his humble pallet and read by the light of the one lamp which illumined the court, and was (so he thought) fortunately placed opposite their window. Not that the boy understood all he read, but he imbibed its influence, and, clasping his large brow within his palms, he would weigh and consider, and feel, within that narrow room, where poverty still lingered—(though then, with their simple and few wants, rather as a shadow than a substance,) and his heart throbbing as he thought, "What shall I do to be great?" even, it might have been, when the chastened and subdued spirit of his young but almost sightless mother murmured in her half broken sleep, "What shall I do to be saved?" And then, as the spring advanced, and night and morning blended sweetly together, he hastened to his work joyfully—for he loved the labour that gave him food and knowledge—Matty would say his "food went into an ill skin—never did credit to mum or mortal;" while his silent master, absorbed in his occupations, and pretty much abstracted from the every-day goings on of his establishment—having, as he said of himself, an honest curse of a housekeeper and a jewel of a boy—was nevertheless sometimes startled by the singular questions Richard asked, meekly and modestly seeking for information, from him whom his enthusiastic nature believed one of the mild lights of literature.

What will youths who are pampered or wooed into learning say of the circulating boy of a circulating library, performing the menial offices of his station, yet working his mind ardently and steadily onward?

One evening, after he had gone out with his books, his mother entered the shop, timidly and with hesitating step, which those who struggle against blindness unconsciously assume. Matty was there, removing some papers; Peter, the most silent of all dogs, lay upon the mat, and Mrs. Holland stumbled over him; Peter only gave vent to a stifled remonstrance, but that was enough, to set Matty into a passion.

"Couldn't you see the dog!" she exclaimed. "If you war a customer tin times over you had no call to the baste; he's neither pens, ink, wafers, books, nor blotting-paper—no, nor the writer of a book—to be trampled under your feet."

"I did not see him," she said meekly.

"Can't you use your eyes?"

The unconscious roughness cut like a razor.

"I did," she replied, turning her large, sorrowful, and dimmed eyeballs towards Matty—"I did; I used them night and day until it was the will of God to take away their light."

"God look down upon you!" exclaimed the woman, tenderly. "Sure it isn't going blind you are—a young woman like you to go blind!"

"I wanted to see Mr. Whitelock," she said, without heeding Matty's observation. "I wanted to speak a few words to him."

Matty loved a gossip. She never suspected the fair, frail, trembling woman, "going blind," to be Richard's mother. He never mentioned his mother's blindness; he could not speak of it; he hoped it would never be worse than it was. She could still read, and do plain work; and so Matty heard not of it. She had nothing particular to do that evening, and the sight of a stranger did her good, because she expected a gossip.

"Master can't always be interrupted," she replied, "particularly by them he doesn't know; but if you will tell me your name and business, I'll see what can be done for you."

"I am Richard's mother."

"Think of that now! We do our best with him, poor boy!—but he's an unruly member."

"Richard!" exclaimed the poor woman, in a tone of dismay.

"Aye, indeed; that is, he's not so jist at the present time, but he'll become so, like all the rest of them boys, one of these days."

"God forbid!" ejaculated the widow.

"Amin!" said Matty; "but he'll be sure to come to it at last."

"Come to what?" enquired the alarmed mother.

"To all sorts and kinds of contrariness," replied Matty, rapidly; "boys can't help it, you see; it's their nature; they're not patient, bidable, gentle creatures like us—not they! Mischief, and all kinds of murder, and up-setting, and latch-keys, and fidgets, and police courts, and going out at nights, and staying out all day (though that's a good riddance), and boxing, and apple stealing, falling in love, and kicking up shindies."

"I beg your pardon, but I do not understand you," interrupted Mrs. Holland, with more determination than she had exercised for years. She felt as if this strange, abrupt, half-mad woman was stringing together a set of accusations against her child.

"I'm obleeged to you, ma'am, for the compliment," said Matty, dropping a curtsy; "but, as that's neither here nor there, what's your business with the mather?"

"That I can only tell himself," she replied.

"Well," muttered Matty, "that beats —! But the women now have no modesty. Them English is all a silent set — no sociability in them. Tell himself! — as if it wasn't more natural for a half-blind craythur like that to disoorse a woman than a man. Well, well! No wonder my hair's gone gray and my heart hard!"

There was something almost courtly in Mr. Whitelock's manner of addressing women. People in his own class of life, who observed it, thought it ridiculous, and never speculated as to how this politeness became engrafted on his nature. He placed a seat for Mrs. Doland in his little parlour, and, though it was a warm autumn evening, he moved it to keep her out of the air, that blew over a box of yellowish, stunted mignonette, and two sickly wallflowers, which graced the sill of his back window; he also pushed his own chair as far as he could from the widow's, but, like all persons with impaired vision, she moved nearer to him, and turned her restless eyes towards the door.

"It is shut close," said the bookseller.

VIRGINIA DARE.

BY L. H. SIGOURNEY.

[The first-born child of English parents in the Western World was the grand-daughter of Governor White, who planted a short-lived colony at Roanoke, Virginia, in the year 1587.]

'Twas lovely in the deep greenwood
Of old Virginia's glade,
Ere the sharp axe amid its boughs
A fearful chasm had made;
Long spikes of rich cantalpa flowers,
Hung pendent from the tree,
And the maquidia's ample cup
O'erflow'd with fragrance free;

And through the shades the antler'd deer,
Like fairy visions flew,
And mighty vines from tree to tree
Their wealth of clusters threw,
While winged odours from the hills
Reviving welcome bore,
To greet the stranger-bands that came
From Albion's distant shore.

Up rose their roofs in copse and dell,
Out peal'd the labourer's horn,
And graceful through the broken mould
Peer'd forth their tassell'd corn;
While from one rose-encircled bower,
Hid in the nested grove,
Came, blending with the robin's lay,
The lullaby of love.

There sang a mother to her babe —
A mother young and fair —
"No flower like thee adorns the vale,
O sweet Virginia Dare!
Thou art the lily of our love,
The forest's syph-like queen,
The first-born bud from Saxon stem
That this New World hath seen;

"Thy father's axe in thicket rings,
To fell the kingly tree;
Thy grandsire sails o'er ocean-brine —
A gallant man is he!

And when once more, from England's realm,
He comes with bounty rare,
A thousand gifts to thee he'll bring,
Mine own Virginia Dare!"

As sweet that mother's loving tones
Their warbled music shed,
As though in proud baronial hall,
O'er silken cradle-bed;
No more the pomps and gaudes of life
Maintain'd their strong control,
For holy love's new gift had shed
Fresh greenness o'er her soul.

And when the husband from his toil
Return'd at closing day,
How dear to him the lowly home
Where all his treasures lay.
"O Ellinor! 'tis naught to me,
The hardship or the storm,
While thus thy blessed smile I see,
And clasp our infant's form."

No secret sigh o'er pleasures lost
Convuls'd their tranquil breast,
For where the pure affections dwell,
The heart hath perfect rest.
So fled the Summer's balmy prime,
The Autumn's golden wing,
And Winter laid his hoary head
Upon the lap of Spring.

Yet oft, with wily, wary step,
The red-brow'd Indian crept
Close round his pale-faced neighbour's home,
And listen'd while they slept;
But fierce Wingina, lofty chief,
Aloof, their movements eyed,
Nor courteous bow'd his plumed head,
Nor check'd his haughty stride.

John White leap'd from his vessel's prow,
He had braved the boisterous sea,
And boldly rode the mountain-wave,—
A stalwart man was he.
John White leap'd from his vessel's prow,
And joy was in his eye;
For his daughter's smile had lured him on Amid the stormiest sky.

Where were the roofs that fleck'd the green?
The smoke-wreaths curling high!
He calls—he shouts—the cherish'd names,
But Echo makes reply.
"Where art thou, Ellinor! my child!
And sweet Virginia Dare!
O silver cloud, that cleaves the blue Like angel's wing,—say where!"

Hartford, Connecticut, May 10th, 1852.

"Where is the glorious Saxon vine
We set so strong and fair!"
The stern grey rocks in mockery smiled,
And coldly answered "where!"
"Ho! fitting savage! stay thy step,
And tell—" But light as air
He vanish'd, and the falling stream Responsive murmured—"where!"

So, o'er the ruin'd palisade,
The blacken'd threshold-stones,
The funeral of colonial hope,
That old man wept—alone!
And mournful rose his wild lament,
In accents of despair,
For the lost daughter of his love,
And young Virginia Dare.

THE VALE OF TINTERN.

THE banks of the Wye, in Monmouthshire, present to the traveller a continued series of the most beautiful and varied landscapes that the eye can dwell upon; and perhaps the fairest portion, certainly that which contains the greatest combination of picturesque objects, will be found in that known as "The Vale of Tintern." How grandly the hills sweep down on either side to the winding river, sheltering from the wintry blast the magnificent ruins of the ancient Abbey, and forming, in the distance, a noble background to the picture, lessening in intensity of colour till earth and sky are scarcely distinguishable from each other. "The Devil's Pulpit," from which point the artist has taken his view, seems a strange misnomer; it should rather have been designated the "Altar of the Deity,"—if the term might be used without profanity,—whence He manifests His power, and goodness, and glory, in decking the earth with beauty, and giving it to us "richly to enjoy."

Excellent judges of what would administer to the pleasures of sense, as well as of that retirement generally considered conducive to study and meditation, were "the monks of old." Look where one will for the remains of monastic and religious houses, we invariably find them standing among pleasant pastures and beside refreshing waters—meadows yielding their fruits, and streams their finny tribes, for the gratification of those who had fled from the follies and vanities of the world, but who could still find pleasure in its natural beauties, and were by no means insensible to the advantages derived from a well-conducted cuisine. Tintern, Netley, Bolton, Kirkstall, and a score other names that one might readily recall to mind, are left to proclaim the fact, that they considered there was a time for all things, and that it formed no part of their duty to reject the good things the bounty of Providence had spread out before them, or rather, it was more becoming to seek out and apply them to their own purposes, spiritual and corporeal.

Tintern, which looks in the picture scarcely larger than a dove-cot embosomed in trees, stands on the right bank of the Wye, about nine miles below Monmouth. It was founded in 1131, by Walter de Clare, for the Cistercian monks, or Bernardines, a branch of the Benedictines, who were also called White Monks, from the colour of their habit. It has been remarked, that this order, or fraternity of monkhood, almost invariably erected their monasteries in secluded localities, and they were always dedicated to St. Mary. The Cistercians were transplanted from Normandy, in 1128, by Walter Giffard, Bishop of Winchester, who placed them in his newly-founded abbey of Waverley, in Surrey, of which no vestiges now remain. This was the first house of the order established in England, though for a long time precedence was given to the abbey of Furness, in Lancashire. The extent and power of the Cistercians may be gathered from the fact that, when Henry VIII. suppressed all monastic establishments, they possessed thirty-six greater monasteries and thirty-nine of less importance, besides twenty-six nunneries; and their revenues amounted to nearly nineteen thousand pounds—an enormous sum in those days.

The chapel of Tintern Abbey was commenced by Roger de Bigod, Earl of Norfolk; the abbots and monks celebrated their first mass within it in 1268. At the dissolution, the site was granted by Henry VIII. to Henry, second Earl of Worcester; the entire property now belongs to the Duke of Beaufort.

The speed of the "iron horse" has now brought this most attractive spot within an easy day's journey of our vast metropolis; and, indeed, if we remember rightly, during the last great year of sight-seeing, "excursion trains" started from London early in the morning, whirled hundreds down to Bristol, who were there embarked upon steam-boats, carried up the Avon to its junction with the Wye, then past Chepstow, another most beautiful locality, up to Tintern, and, sufficient time being allowed for full inspection of its loveliness, were brought back by the same route, arriving at London on the evening of the same day.

Sailing up the Wye, the traveller cannot but be impressed with the charming scenery that surrounds him on all sides; but his delight receives a fresh and vigorous impulse when he approaches the ruins of the old abbey, which afford the most striking indication of the wealth, magnificence, and taste of the religious brotherhood to whom it belonged. It stands on a gently rising eminence, and was originally built in the form of a cathedral, having a nave, north and south aisles, transept, and choir, with a tower rising from the intersections. The roof and tower have fallen, but the exterior, viewed from a distance, is still eminently beautiful, but excelled by the yet more striking appearance of the interior, as the visitor enters the western doorway. From this point the eye traverses along the range of stately columns, and, passing under the lofty arches that once supported the tower, rests upon the grand eastern window at the termination of the choir. From the length of the nave, the height of the walls, the imposing form of the pointed arches—the style of the edifice is that known as Early English decorated—and the size of the east window, the first impressions one receives are those of grandeur and sublimity; but, on a closer examination, these feelings are combined with those of admiration at the regularity of the plan, the elegance and lightness of the architecture, and the exceeding delicacy of the ornamental work, mingled, and partly covered in some portions, as it is, with a profusion of wild flowers, and masses of ivy and other climbing plants. We are accustomed to exclaim against the barbarisms of past ages, but how much have not these ages taught us of the noble and the beautiful!

BIRDS IN CAPTIVITY.*

THE CANARY.

(Fringilla Canaria; Passerine Order.)

"Thou little, sportive, airy thing,
That trimm'st so oft thy yellow wing,
And cheerful pour'st thy lay,
In sprightly notes, clear, rapid, gay;
As jocund in thy grated dome.
As thou at liberty did'st roam."

THE antecedents of this deservedly popular species are now of little importance, the whole aspect of the race differing from the original stock. Accidental circumstances first caused the introduction of the canary-finch into Europe, about the fourteenth century. Aldrovandus and Gessner are the first naturalists, in the sixteenth, who named it as "a great rarity."

The earliest tame birds in Europe were reared in Italy: the venturon of that country bears more resemblance to the wild stock, that had dark plumage, and but little song, than to our "musician of the chamber." It is, however, worthy of remark, that birds with dark eyes are stronger than those with red: the latter are the pale and yellow colour. The effects of naturalisation, alliances formed, changes of climate, and art, combine to produce more beautiful birds, and better songsters, in the domestic canary.

A description of this bird, sui generis, would be useless, when to the thirty varieties in Buffon's time so many have since been added. The two principal distinctions adopted by the "London societies" for the rearing of the "fancy finch" are technically "jonks, or jonquils (plain), gay or spangled (variegated)." The mealy, or dim white, is the ordinary colour of the German canary; the Dutch birds are of a brighter hue. Richness of colour is the great object sought for in the "fancy finch;" and this state of regularity and perfection has taken generations to perfect. The "properties" requisite for "a show bird" it is here unnecessary to detail—the peculiar mode of rearing them causing great delicacy and deterioration of voice. As a general rule, match your birds with their opposites. A fine jonk cock, paired with a green hen, produces pied birds, rich in colour, hardy, and good songsters. Clear birds are preferred by many amateurs: they are to be obtained by "putting up" a bright jonquil cock with a mealy-coloured hen. The results will be doubtful, unless some knowledge has been obtained of non-adulteration of colour in the progenitors on both sides—that male and female have been bred from clear birds—as canaries "throw back" to the old colour, which, if it had an admixture of black, may be reproduced. These startling particulars are immaterial, unless for the indulgence of pleasing the eye. I should attend more closely to temper, disposition, health, and song. A good bird is straight and taper, he has power over his notes, sings with ease, and beats out, by his insinuating language, "the little fat man."

My experience is so decidedly in favour of the true German canary, that I am only prepared to advocate the system I pursued. I matched my birds, both Germans, (irrespective of colour,) and found that, although at first an expensive arrangement, the production had all the hardy health of the English, with the truest perfection of song: beyond the fact of the parent bird remaining in the same apartment, no particular tuition was afforded. One "family," especially, named par excellence "the Smiths"—most numerous!—kept up a first-rate character; and, after enjoying connubial bliss, in "semi-detached houses," "Mr. and Mrs. S." were turned into my large aviary-cage, which was six feet in length, with a dome sufficiently large to furnish sleeping apartments for forty birds, home and foreign. In one end of the cage the matron established herself, to my regret, in a box appropriated to WAXBILLS, and there she lived and loved. One of her heirs, born in a crowd, is now six years old, and a splendid bird, without an hour's ailment.

It is easy to account for the superiority I state. Our birds are mostly ill-treated in cages; hung out of windows, in an easterly wind or a hot sun; unprotected, even within the house, from draughts of air; left uncovered during moult, and exposed to nightly change of temperature from the same cause: the consequences are, their notes become harsh, (may have been originally so by descent,) both by imitation of the notes of other birds, and from the effects of cold—too much dependence being placed on native strength. There are some—we hope many—exceptions: if the birds selected for breeding can be procured from a good stock, direct from Manchester, York, or Norfolk, or from a London dealer, on whom dependence may be placed as to early associations and pedigree, if possible; but, as these are remote contingencies, I prefer the German stock; the objection on the score of delicacy is removed by the young being acclimatised.

Canaries should not be paired before the end of April. The birds of the latest broods have the sweetest notes: the first are fierce and impatient in song; besides, early nestlings have the chances of a severe spring to contend with. Both for song and for breeding, the male should be two years old: he is then past the age for taking up false notes, and will have dignity in his paternal department of feeding his offspring. It is advanced by experimentalists, that the lady being older causes an increase of male birds.

The breeding-cages should be placed in a room having the morning sun: the effect on the temper and temperament of the parents is great; the aspect has a direct influence on the young, making them more softly beautiful, and more healthily prepared for their earliest trial—the first moult. I recommend a large wire-fronted cage—top, sides, and back of mahogany—with a moveable division; two nests at the ends (which should each have a wire door). I never use nest-bags or boxes: the latter are harsh, the former subject to red mites. My plan is this: I paste a piece of calico over an oil-flask; when dry, cut it across, to remove it from the bottle, and thus two nests are ready. Line them with one fold of flannel, very smooth, cutting away superfluous pieces. The custom of furnishing hair and moss, I think objectionable; the cage, the water, and the food are soiled, and the bird makes and unmakes her nest before incubation, becoming restless and dissatisfied. An experienced matron does not always approve of a deficiency in the "raw material," and will borrow a few feathers from her breast. At the same time, as birds, like men, have their antipathies, let not a good hen be disappointed on rational grounds, I propose the adoption. Some are sufferers from "perspiration," originating, I think, in the excessive heat and small size of box-nests; parasites, that destroy their nestlings, are produced by this ailment. I do not advise any remedies such as I have read of—"salt and water," and warm bathing—either would drive the hen from her duties. Good strengthening food should be given; and if her weakness continues, prevent her from sitting again for the season. Some keep two hens in one cage, and a division between. Polygamy does not answer: ladies are jealous, the progeny ill-tempered. Birds having the range of the room, select their own partners; and unless some choice birds are to be matched, let nature alone.

I close this portion of my subject, by enjoining that cages may be so constructed as not to disturb the parent bird, and at the same time convenient for the supply of food, and for the usual attention to cleanliness; on which latter subject there have been mistaken opinions—I trust, now obsolete—that it is hurtful. The arrangements for an aviary must proceed on a more extended scale. The period of incubation is thirteen days; for fifteen more the parent birds must be provisioned, twice daily, with scalded rape-seed, in one vessel, and the fourth portion of a hard-boiled egg, mixed with roll, squeezed out of water in another; and take care, or your nestlings will perish, that this food is not left to sour. On the fifteenth day, the young feed themselves; then begins the trying time. The food is the same; the males begin to warble; the lady sits again; the father gives his daily lessons, and at a month old the new generation may leave the maternal wing*—find a new home. Then it is the period when succulent food is replaced by seed: then the danger. Let the transition be gradual, or the “wasting fever,” or “surfeit, intervenes. I found but one cure: a handful of groundsel to a pint of water, boiled down to half the quantity; make fresh as required, and give it in the drinking vessel. In all my cages I put a lump of rock salt, and pounded mortar.

The diversity of opinions as to the superiority of the German canaries, being best esteemed for their song, yet objected to on the score of liability to loss of voice, suggests a glance at the causes of the good and the evil. In the Hartzgebürge there is a mining district, called Andresbürg: the occupants of the ranges of the little dwellings are the families of the miners, who rear from 40,000 to 50,000 canaries yearly. At three weeks old their education begins, they hear but the best singing, from nightingales and woodlarks, and are, so far, perfect at three months old. Self-interest on the part of the dealers prevents these very imitative birds from hearing bad singing; for, while their aptitude for learning is in one sense desirable, on the other hand, it is unsafe to allow any canary-finch to be within hearing of bad singing till he is at least two years old: hence the defects of most English birds. I do not say that when imported all are good singers; far from it. A first-rate bird will cost from three to five guineas.

* A friend of mine was very proud of her four nestling canaries; when, one morning, she heard a great squeaking and fluttering in her aviary, and found that it proceeded from the desire the old birds had to peck the feathers off the young birds, to line afresh their nest for the anticipated eggs. The young brood were obliged to seek the shelter of a new cage.—Ed.

The mode of life adopted by the miners causes delicacy. Bred in an atmosphere totally heated by stoves, the transition to a cold and damp climate is in its effects calculated to produce hoarseness—that complaint from which vocalists, the animal bipes implume, of foreign lands suffer. I have had German birds, bought them from the foreign dealers, and I have taken some pains to obtain opinions; and I can safely pronounce that one year's acclimatising, one year's trial of food, will enable the amateur to understand his bird. The first moulting season is dangerous: pass over that, and your little companion is as safe as any. The cruel carelessness of life shown in the ordinary treatment of one of our poor natives is rarely practised on an expensive pet. Keep your “German” warm the first year; cover half his cage at night; during moult, put baize round his cage by day also, except in front; according to his strength, reduce the temperature the second year. All these attentions are imperative, in consequence of stove-rearing: it is not therefore necessary to treat other birds, more hardy, in the same way, but do not therefore slight and ill-treat a British songster. You will find him as social, merry, and attaching as the foreign favourite: he has the same amount of animal feeling, an equal desire to please, as just a claim upon your mercy and kindness.

I have known birds given away in disgust when they became hoarse—their glory had departed!—and those same birds were cured, and live. This serious malady is caused chiefly by cold—sometimes by “over-singing.” For the cure, scald some rape-seed, make it into a paste, with roll-crumbs, or sweet bun, and pour over it almond oil. Give as little seed as will content the patient; allow nothing heating; leave a vessel with new milk in his cage; keep him warm, and in a quiet place; and by persevering steadily, the sufferer will become “the gayest of the gay.”

For the food of all canaries, I prefer equal portions of turnip-seed, millet, canary, and flax seeds. I say “turnip” advisedly, for the “summer rape,” on which the German vendors insist, can only be distinguished by “growers,” and the kind usually sold is so rank and bitter, that birds scatter it about, and will only eat it if unavoidable. I admit that it is better to give the foreign visitor more turnip-seed in proportion to the others named, as they are reared upon it. Hemp should not be allowed, except as a bonne bouche. German paste, groats, bread and milk, and all the etceteras named as the "soft food" of the granivorous class, in addition. A fig, a bit of apple, the pips especially, will be esteemed as delicate morceaux by your companions. Be sparing, during incubation and rearing, of green food, and never give it during frost. The original canaries came from marshy lands: to their descendants baths are second nature; a hardy Briton will immerse himself in snow. Der canarienvogel ought to be supplied with a tepid bath in cold weather; but in neither case refuse the luxury for which their nature yearns. I heard of a merry little fellow allowed to roam about the room, (as all my birds do at proper times,) that, to remind his mistress of his "want," used to go through the evolutions of a wash and a splash in one of the chimney ornaments, its ridiculous flutterings ceasing when water was supplied: like the beggar and the barmaid, it gladly relinquished the empty vessel for the full one.

There is another "supply," upon which I would strenuously insist, its advantages being threefold; I allude to sand—from sea or river matters not. London is fortunately provided with it on sale, and of a kind especially adapted for finches and other small birds. For lozins, I added rough gravel; for it is not generally understood that when any imprisoned bird, including poultry, is seen to carry about a pebble, taking up and laying it down, he is engaged in measuring and weighing its fitness. This mark of intelligence was hinted to me, and I followed up my observations to the closest experiments, with a satisfactory assurance to myself and others, and no worse effect to those experimented upon, than a little loss of temper during the progress of "the sliding scale" principle. As soon as the proper size gravel was left in the cage, the withdrawal of choice was forgiven. It is one thing to keep birds for the amusement of the possessor only; in such case, an inanimate object might equally answer, where life is forgotten in self: it is another, and a better aim, to become an inquirer into Nature.

I was once, and lately, told, that a gentleman who really does love his birds, yet may not have had opportunities for the better understanding of their management, brought to London, en route home from abroad, a collection—say about eighteen fine specimens. He requested, on his arrival, to have some sand provided: the day following found eleven birds dead! The narrator considered that deleterious matter had been accidentally mixed with the gravel. I am of opinion the deaths arose through necessary abstinence from the natural and only aid to digestion provided for these "tenants of land, air, and ocean."

In my walks, I frequently offer advice to the uneducated classes on two subjects relative to their charges—"no sand," "placed in draughts"—and, like all gratuitous offerings, it goes for nothing. I wish I could assert that to the ignorant these cruelties are alone confined.

In confinement, moulting is a disease; for birds on the wing, Nature supplies an abundance of food—a provision needful, when there is an extra demand on the strength. The well-doing of a cage-bird will greatly depend on previous wholesome feeding, and warmth during the malady. For a hardy canary, it will be sufficient to place the cage in a cheerful, warm situation, out of all draughts; for the more delicate German and Dutch birds, I would cover the cage, except in front, with brown paper, pasted on, or with wash-leather, or thin baize; and when this trying process is over, the winter will have set in, and the removal must be gradual—in some cases not done at all. I give less green food at the time—more lettuce and maw seeds. I do not find much advantage in iron-water—none in saffron. I sometimes add liquorice-root to the drinking vessel, or give toast and water. My chief dependence is on egg, roll-crumbs, and German paste, and on a vessel with milk. A partial moult is more remarkable with canaries and the new continent productions than with our own birds; it shows itself prior to the pairing season; the entire change takes place in autumn.

I do not think that canaries are more subject to diseases than other birds deprived of their natural freedom. I never had a bird with parasites, and I chiefly attribute their infesting cages to want of proper attention, or to a careless purchase. I shall be, at a future writing, tempted to give an excellent receipt for cure, if only for the sake of sparing suffering pets from the really cruel prescriptions in vogue. Cramps should be treated by administering a warm bath, and fits by a cold one; but as these arise from two causes quite opposed, the subject will be elsewhere treated of en grand.

The Dutch or Belgian canaries are held in great estimation by most amateurs; their perfection being, that while perching, the beak and tail, in their propinquity, nearly form a circle. They have their merits, also. When German hen-birds are scarce, the Dutch lady is chosen, and she rarely fails in her duties. I think them, however, inferior in figure and song to a good German. Not so their countrymen! At least twelve Dutch and Belgian cities have "societies" in their honour, where premiums are given for "a shapely, well-complexioned, long-bodied bird;" the most influential of which is that of St. Cecilia, where the distinguished bird is entitled to the initials F.S.C. Classical associations connect themselves, also: in all the paintings of Gerard Dow, and Netscher, my subject is to be found; and it is stated by more than one competent authority, that the original cost of the birds therein depicted exceeded the original price of the paintings.

And what are the characteristics of this famed bird? Widely as his name has spread, he deserves his distinctions. With numerous virtues, and but few vices, he has won a corner in many a heart: grateful, loving and social, pert, saucy, and playful, he puts his little pipe in competition with mirth, laughter, and conversation. He will be heard; he has "a voice potential in the senate;" his endearing ways of recognising one beloved presence, of acknowledging "the goods the gods provide him," have a degree of character beyond mere animal instinct? Who has not a story to tell of "the pet of the family?"

The following anecdotes form but a portion of a collection:—A friend of mine had attached his bird by the usual process of "gifts," but he "respected words" still more; pending the toilet, "Dick" was indulged with conversations, and from "early morn to dewy eve" he enjoyed himself as canaries are wont to do in solitude—he ate, drank, and sung—and then the conversazione was renewed with his friend on his return home. One hapless day, some little visitors, intruding on Dick's presence, allowed him to escape; he found the sunshine and the flowers charming; the delinquents were alarmed; on and on in luxurious travelling he went; the household turned out; to coaxing or to trapping he was equally averse; farther and farther still he fled. His master was met by a simultaneous burst of sorrow, explanations, and excuses—Dick was "nowhere!" One moment's withdrawal from the Babel of voices, and his really fond master proceeded to search out and to talk to the wanderer: he was shortly answered; gradually, though yet unseen, the solo became an animated duo; and in a short period the canary had, from tree to tree, traversed a long avenue, and finally voluntarily entered the cage held by his owner. I regret to say, that his death proved the truth of the influence of the kindly and endearing effect of one voice upon his gratitude and affection. His friend left home: the bird was removed from the usual room, hung up out of the way of all petting, but well kept; and he was found dead. Young, and without ailment—in truth, he pined away!

I now relate a family trait—canaries, father and son, the whole actors. The elder gentleman, aged twenty-one, was very infirm; and his strength had departed—his mandibles no longer obeyed his will. With every desire on the part of his kind mistress to smooth the difficulties of his venerable life, this was a case she could not possibly anticipate. Canary, filio, was observed to look earnestly and repeatedly at his papa. An ever-watchful care on the part of the lady induced her to put the two cages side by side, and soon it was observed that the younger bird (aged fifteen years) shelled seed, with which, through the double wires, he fed his parent. This story is not apocryphal; I have it from a friend of the lady to whom the birds belong, and hope to realise the promise made me of an introduction to her and to the modern "pious Eneus."

With reference to the longevity of birds, I have been in company with the possessor of the very Methuselah of canaries—he is, without mistake, twenty-seven or twenty-eight years old. Some doubts having been started as to the fact, and suggestions thrown out as to the possibility of the original bird having died, and being replaced by some attendant to avert blame, the lady, on whose strict veracity there cannot be a second opinion, says the bird had been for a few times (a very few months) out of her sight; yet he was always in the charge of some of the family; and there is no reason to doubt that he is the same individual that has been her pet through this almost incredible number of years; some peculiarities of temper and disposition supplying the proof (if any was needed) that he is himself.

In the year 1839, there was a talking canary in London. The exhibitor was making a rapid fortune; but the greed of gain defeated itself—a few months afterwards, the poor bird died. This victim to an unnatural state of existence was a tame and beautiful bird, and did what few parrots can be induced to do—spoke with very little solicitation, and a few grains of hempseed. The exhibition took place several times daily; the room lighted with gas, even when there was daylight. The words were—"Pretty Dick," "Pretty Queen," "Save the Queen"—and these, with some other phrases, were pronounced as distinctly as they could have been by human organs, but with a sound totally different; the canary's, unlike a parrot's, voice, retained its own chirrup.

I have been told that at Kensington there is a canary ventriloquist. My informant, struck by the double sounds, looked about for a second cage; the lady of the house entering, stated the fact, and assured the astonished hearers that their mistake was one of daily occurrence.

Had I not been eye-witness to a circumstance I am about to relate, I should fear to be its narrator. A pet, par excellence, of that daring, saucy, yet loving, kind, that endears itself to its owner, flew from its cage at the first opportunity, daily, into my hand; it fondled, nestled, fed, and bathed, in close familiarity: nothing seemed to startle the little creature. I had another canary, not tame, and an object of perfect unconcern to his neighbour. He died. I had him on my extended hand, looking as I feel on seeing a dead bird. "Tiny" left his cage, fluttered towards me, retired, and never again could I induce him to renew his love-tokens—to become "mine own familiar friend!" I have not, though years have elapsed, been able to decide whether terror or jealousy affected the bird.

I shall close my subject by one observation: that there is no bird more easily treated, none more inclined to be grateful, than are many canaries; but few good songsters. To keep these imitative birds in the training necessary, let them have no inferior company until after the moult of the second year; and of whatever quality is your captive, treat him with such mercy as all that are endowed with life are entitled to at the hands of their captors.

The limits of my space do not permit of even a glance at Hybrids. The congeners of the present subject will take their own places, when particulars of the difficulties, as also the advantages, of cross-pairing shall be treated of; also aviary management, where "pluralities" may be permitted. And here I must say a word in favour of hen-birds; they are frequently carelessly treated—often discarded after "the season"—when self-interest at least should induce their possessors to give them simply fair treatment; a large store-cage, if numerous, and to be placed in a separate room from the singers.

THE TRIAL BY BATTLE.*

A TALK OF CHIVALRY.

CHAPTER II.—THE CHAMPION.

THE Emperor Henry IV. of Germany, the husband of the falsely accused Empress, was one of the bravest and most unfortunate princes who ever sat upon a throne. He had succeeded his father, Henry the Black, in 1036, at the age of six years, and the diet had given to Agnes of Aquitaine the administration of the affairs of state during his minority. But the princes and barons of Germany feeling themselves humiliated by their subjection to a foreign female, revolted against the empire, and Otho Margrave of Saxony commenced that series of civil wars, in which the Emperor was destined to consume his life. Thus Henry IV. was always engaged in contests, first with his uncles, and then with his son; sometimes an emperor, sometimes a fugitive; to-day a proscriber, to-morrow proscribed; but always a "man of war and woe," even in his greatest triumphs. After having deposed Pope Gregory VII.—after having, in expiation of that sacrilege, crossed the Apennines on foot, his staff in his hand, like a mendicant, in the depth of winter—after having waited three days in the court of the Castle of Canossa without clothes, without fire, without food, till it pleased his highness to admit him into his presence, he kissed his feet, and swore on the cross to submit himself to his authority; for at this price alone would the Pope absolve the imperial penitent of the guilt of sacrilege; but the humiliation of the emperor displeased and disgusted the Lombards, who accused him of cowardice. Threatened by them with deposition, if he did not break the shameful league he had made with the Pope, he purchased peace with the Lombards by renouncing his submission to Gregory. His acceptance of these terms set him at variance with the German barons, who elected Rodolphe of Suabia in his place. Henry who had gone to Italy as a suppliant, returned to Germany a soldier, though under the ban of the church, for his rival Rodolphe had received from Pope Gregory a crown of gold, in token of his investiture by him of temporal dominion, and a bull invoking the malediction of heaven upon his enemy. Henry defeated and slew Rodolphe at the battle of Wolskiew, near Gera, after which he returned victorious and furious into Italy, bringing with him the Bishop Guibert, whom he had made Pope. This time it was for Gregory to tremble, who could not expect more mercy than he had shown to Henry. He shut himself up in Rome, and when the emperor appeared under the walls, sent a legate to make up the quarrel, by the offer of the investiture of the crown, and absolution and reconciliation to the church. Henry's only reply was the capture of the city. The Pope fled to the Castle of St. Angelo, where he was put in a state of blockade by Henry, who placed upon the Papal throne the Anti-Pope Guibert, from whose hand he received the imperial crown. He had scarcely done this before he received the annoying intelligence that the Saxons had elected in his room, Hermann, Count of Luxembourg. Henry repassed the Apennines, beat the Saxons, subdued Thuringia, and took Hermann prisoner, whom he permitted to live and die unknown in an obscure corner of his empire. He once more re-entered Italy, where he caused his son Conrad to be elected King of the Romans. Believing he had settled peace on a firm basis, he came back to Germany, and turned his arms against the Bavarians and Suabians, who still remained in a state of revolt.

His son, whom he had just made King of the Romans, and who aspired to the empire, conspired at that time against his father, raised an army, and got Pope Urban II. to excommunicate him a second time. Henry upon this convoked the diet at Aix-la-Chapelle, laid open before it his paternal grief, and displayed the wounds of a heart wrung by filial ingratitude, and demanded that his second son, Henry, should be acknowledged for King of the Romans, in the place of his brother. In the midst of the sitting, he received a mysterious intimation that his presence was required at Cologne, where, he was told, an important secret would be made known to him. Henry quitted the diet in great haste; and found two of the noblest barons in the empire, Guthram de Falkenbourg and Walter de Than, waiting for him at the gates of his palace. The emperor invited them to enter with him, and led them into his chamber, when perceiving sadness and gloom painted on their faces, he demanded "why they appeared so thoughtful and sorrowful?"

"Because the majesty of the throne is in danger," replied Guthram, with some abruptness.

"Who has endangered the throne?" demanded the emperor.

The Empress Praxida, your wife," said Guthram.

No other tidings would have made Henry of Germany turn pale, for he had only been married to the Empress two years, for whom he felt the tenderness of a parent, and the faithful love of a husband. His union with this angelic young woman had given him the only happy hours he had passed during his stormy and unfortunate life. He had not courage at this miserable moment even to ask what his wife had done, but was gathering the strength of a failing heart to do so, when Guthram broke the ominous silence, by saying, "she has done what we cannot pass by unnoticed, for the honour of the imperial throne, and we should deserve the name of traitors to our sovereign lord, if we should hesitate to make her misconduct known to him."

"What has she done?" again demanded the emperor, growing paler than before.

"In your absence she has encouraged the love of a young knight, and that so openly," replied Guthram, "that if she gives birth to a son, however the people may rejoice in that event, your nobility will mourn; for though any master is good enough for the multitude, none but the noblest in the empire can command the highest nobles in the world, who will render homage to none but the son of an emperor."

Henry supported himself against the chair of state on which he leaned, or he would have fallen to the floor, for he remembered that only a month before, the empress had written to him to announce her maternal hopes, with the pleasure natural to a young woman about to become a mother.

"What has become of the knight?" asked the emperor.

"He quitted Cologne as suddenly as he entered it, without any person knowing from whence he came, or whither he is going. His country and name are secrets with which we are unacquainted, but you had better ask the empress, she perhaps can satisfy your majesty."

"Very well," replied the emperor. "Enter, gentlemen, that cabinet." Then the emperor summoned his chamberlain, and bade him conduct the empress to his chamber. As soon as the emperor was alone, he threw himself into the chair, like a man who had lost his personal strength and mental firmness. He who had endured with unbending fortitude civil and foreign wars, the ban of the church, and the filial revolt, yielded to a doubt. His head, which had borne the weight of a crown for five-and-forty years, without bending beneath the burden, grew feeble under the weight of a suspicion, and hung down as if the hand of a giant was upon it. In a moment the man, who had scarcely passed his full meridian of intellect, forgot everything—empire, ban, malediction, revolt. He remembered nothing but his wife, the only human being who possessed his entire confidence, and who had deceived him more basely than any other creature had yet done. Much as he had experienced, throughout his long regnal life, of disloyalty and guile, tears fell from his eyes, for the rod of misfortune, like that of Moses, had struck the rock so forcibly, that it had drawn these drops from a source hitherto sealed up and barren.

The empress entered unseen, for her light step had not been heard by her unhappy husband. Fair, blooming, and blue-eyed, with a graceful form, of tall and slender proportions, this daughter of a northern clime approached her lord with a sweet smile, and with almost filial reverence united to conjugal affection, imprinted a chaste kiss on the troubled brow of her lord, who shrank and shuddered as if the touch of her rosy lips had been the fangs of a serpent.

"What is the matter, my lord?" asked the empress, in a tone of alarm.

"Woman," replied the emperor, raising his head and showing her his tearful eyes, "you have seen me for four years carrying a heavy cross; you have seen my crown a crown of thorns; you have seen my face bathed in the sweat of toil, my brow in blood; but you never saw my eyelids moistened with tears. Well, behold me now—and see me weep!"

"And why do you weep, my dearly-loved lord?" replied the empress, in a tone of sorrowful inquiry.

"Because, abandoned by my people, denied by my vassals, cursed by the church, and proscribed by my son, I had nothing but you in the world—and you, Praxida, you too have betrayed me."

The empress stood like a statue, only her complexion, varying from red to pale, betrayed her feelings. "My lord," said she, "it is not true. You are my liege lord and my sovereign master; but if any other man than yourself had dared to utter such words, I would answer that he lied through envy or malice."

The emperor turned in the direction of his cabinet, and in a loud voice said, "Come in." The door opened, and Guthram de Falkenbourg and Walter de Than entered the imperial chamber. The empress, at the sight of her enemies, trembled all over. They advanced to the other side of the emperor's chair, and, holding up their hands, prepared to make their unjust accusation good upon the first sign he might give.

He motioned them to speak, and they were not slow to avail themselves of his permission.

"Sire," said they, "what we have told you is true; and we are ready to support the charge, at the peril of our bodies and souls, two against two, against any knights who may dare to dispute the truth of our impeachment of the empress."

"Do you hear what they say, madam?—for it shall be done as they have demanded; and if, in a year and a day, you cannot find any knights to clear your fame by a victorious combat, you will be burned alive in the great square of Cologne, in the face of the people, and by the torch of the common hangman."

"My lord, I invoke the aid of God," replied the empress, "and I hope, by His grace, my truth and innocence will find vindicators, and will be completely established."

"Well, be it so," said the emperor; and he summoned his guards, to whose wardship he consigned his empress. By his command she was conveyed to the lowest apartment in the castle, which differed in nothing from a prison but in name.

She had been imprisoned nearly a twelvemonth, and had given birth to a son, condemned, like herself, to the pile. This babe she nourished at her own bosom, and reared with her own hands, like one of the wives of the people. None of her women paid her any attention or rendered her the smallest service, but Douce, Marchioness of Provence, who, having abandoned her own country, then the theatre of civil war, to seek an asylum at the court of her suzerain, had remained faithful to her mistress in her misfortunes. The empress, who had diligently exerted herself, by letters and promises, to procure champions for her ordeal by battle, had been hitherto completely unsuccessful. The renown of her accusers, their prowess in war and revengeful dispositions, had outweighed all her entreaties and largesses. Only three days of the time allowed by the emperor now remained, and the envoy sent by the fair Marchioness of Provence had not yet returned. She began to despair herself—she who had always soothed the despondency of the injured empress with hope.

As to the poor emperor, no one suffered like him: struck by this blow at once as sovereign, husband, and father, he had vowed publicly to join the Crusades, in the hope of averting the wrath of heaven; and the day he had fixed for the vindication or execution of the empress, would bring to him as severe a trial as to that unfortunate and injured princess. He had at length given the matter into the care of heaven, and, immuring himself in the most private apartments in his palace of Cologne, gave up all business, whether public or private, having no heart to attend to anything whatever. Such was the state of his mind when the dawn of the three hundred and sixty-fifth day found him still miserable, and his accused empress championless.

At noon, he had scarcely quitted his oratory when he was told that a foreign knight, from a distant country, wished to speak to him. The emperor was agitated, for, at the bottom of his heart, he secretly wished that heaven would yet send the unfortunate Praxida a champion; and he received him in the same chamber in which, sitting in the same chair, he had commanded the arrest of the empress. The knight entered, and bent his knee to the ground. The emperor bade him rise, and declare the occasion of his visit to his court.

"My lord," replied the unknown knight, "I am a Spanish count. I was told at matins that the empress, your spouse, was accused by two knights of your court, and that if, within the space of a year and a day, she could not find a champion to defend her by battle, she would be publicly burned. Now, I have heard so much good said of this lady, and she is so renowned for piety throughout the world, that I am come from my own distant land to undertake her quarrel against both her accusers."

"Count, you are welcome," replied the emperor. "Certainly you show great friendship for the accused, or a great desire for renown. You are yet in time to save her, for there still remains one day before the sentence to which the laws of Germany condemn the adulteress can be put in force against her."

"Sire," said the count, "I have a favour to ask you, which I hope you will courteously grant me. I wish to see the empress, for in this interview I should be able to form some opinion of her guilt or innocence; for, if I think her guilty, I will not imperil my body and soul in battle for her, but if she is innocent, I will fight, not only with one of her accusers, but with both, and indeed will undertake her defence against every knight in Germany."

"It is but justice on my part," replied the emperor, "to grant your request, Sir Count."

The unknown bowed, and retreated towards the door, but the emperor recalled him. "My lord count, have you made a vow to keep your visor down, and conceal your face?"

"No, sire," replied the knight.

"Then will you do me the favour to raise your visor, that I may engrave on my memory the features of him who is about to imperil his life to save my honour?"

The knight took off his helmet, and the emperor saw the dark-complexioned, but expressive features, of a young man of eighteen or nineteen years. His forehead and head were finely formed, and indicative of talent and power. The monarch regarded the youthful countenance of the champion with a sigh, and remembered with regret that the accusers of Praxida, his empress, were men not only well skilled in war, but in the prime of manly strength. "May God preserve you, lord count," said he, "for you appear to me full young for success in the difficult enterprise you have undertaken. Reflect, for there is still time to withdraw your promise."

"Do me the honour to let me see the empress," replied the knight, who had no intention of abandoning without cause an unfortunate lady.

The emperor gave him his signet ring. "Go, then, Sir Knight; this seal will open for you the doors of her prison."

The knight kissed, on his knee, the hand which offered him the ring; then rose, saluted the monarch, and departed.

The sight of the emperor's signet opened, as he had said, the guarded apartment of the empress, and in ten minutes the youthful champion found himself in the presence of the accused lady, for whom he was about to risk his life.

The empress was seated on her bed, nursing her infant. Accustomed to the entrance of her jailors, and for a long time abandoned by her women, she never even raised her head when the door was opened, only, by the instinct of modesty, she covered with her mantle her unveiled bosom, still continuing the plaintive hymn by which she lulled her babe to rest, accompanying the air with the movement of a nurse who rocks her babe to sleep.

The knight contemplated for some minutes, in tearful silence, this moving picture of fallen greatness, till, perceiving that the empress seemed unconscious of his vicinity, he accosted her in these words:—"Madam, deign to raise your eyes, and honour with your notice, a man whom the renown of your virtue has led from a distant land, to vindicate your honour, defamed, he trusts, by false accusation; but before I undertake your cause, it is absolutely necessary that I should learn from you whether you are innocent of the charge laid against you. For, madam, I require a clear conscience, as well as a strong arm, since a trial by battle is an appeal to God, the judge of all, to decide the cause by the victory or fall of the champion. In the name of heaven, I entreat you to speak the truth; in which case, if you can prove your innocence to me, I swear by my knighthood that I will defend you to the last drop of my blood; trusting that the Lord will strengthen me to do your battle with such power as will clear your honour, and preserve my own life."

"First, let me thank you, Sir Knight," replied the empress, shedding tears of joy; "but, before I clear up my fame in your hearing, I pray you tell me your name, and permit me to see your face."

"My face, madam, may be seen by everybody," said the count; "but my name is a different thing, since I have sworn to tell it to none but you." He removed his helmet, and displayed to her sight his noble and ingenuous countenance, full of the fire and intelligence of upright youth verging upon manhood.

"Your name and quality, then, be pleased to show me," replied the empress.

"I am a prince of Spain: Raymond Berenger, Count of Barcelona."

At that name, so celebrated from father to son for lofty generosity and heroic deeds, the empress clasped her hands together, while a smile of joy lighted up her beautiful features through her tears, like a sunbeam breaking through a watery cloud.

"My lord, I can never repay you for the consolation you have afforded me this day; but you have demanded the truth from me—the whole truth: I ought to tell it you, and I will not disguise it from your knowledge. It is true that there came, in my husband's absence, to the court of Cologne, a young and handsome knight, who, perhaps, was under some vow, either to his sovereign or the lady of his heart, to conceal his name and rank; for he told them to no one, not even to me. It was supposed, from his magnificence and generosity, that he was the son of a king; but we called him, from the gem he wore on his finger, the Knight of the Emerald. It is true that he sometimes conversed with me; but with so much respect, that I could not distance him without appearing to consider his attention as a matter of more consequence than it really was. Still he made a point of attending me on every public occasion. It happened one day, when we were hawking on the borders of the Rhine, and were got as far as Luedorf, without meeting any game; till at last a heron rose, and I unhooded and cast off my falcon, who immediately soared; and, as he was a fine one, of true Norwegian breed, he soon reached the quarry, and I put my horse to a full gallop, to be in at the death. Carried away by my ardour, I leaped a stream, followed by none of my ladies but Dounce, for they were timid horsewomen. The wicked knights, who have falsely slandered me, could not take the leap on their heavy steeds, but led my ladies to a fordable part of the rivulet. While making to the spot where the game had fallen, we saw a mounted cavalier fly from it like a phantom, and re-enter a wood along the shore. The heron we found fluttering in the agonies of death, for the falcon had pierced his brain; but he still held an emerald ring in his beak, which Dounce, as well as myself, immediately recognised as the one we had often seen on the finger of the unknown knight, whom we rightly supposed to be the cavalier who had galloped into the wood. I was wrong, I will own, to do as I then did; but women are vain and thoughtless. So, instead of throwing the jewel into the stream, as I ought, perhaps, to have done, I put it on my finger, and, displaying it to my suite as they came up, related the adventure, without being aware of my own imprudence. Nobody, however, doubted the truth of my recital but Guthram and Walter, who smiled incredulously, in a manner that seemed to ask explanations which would have compromised my dignity, without allaying their unjust suspicions. I put on my glove, replaced my falcon on my wrist, without meeting with any other extraordinary discovery. At mass, however, I again met the knight of the emerald, and then perceived that he was without his ring, which from that moment I resolved to return to him upon the first suitable opportunity. A week after this adventure, the festival of Cologne was held. You are aware that this feast attracts a concourse of people from all parts of Germany: minstrels, players, and jongleurs of course abound. Among these last, there was a man who showed wild beasts, which he displayed on a theatre built for the occasion, in the grand square, where the spectators could gaze without danger on a lion from Barbary, and a tiger from India. Seated in a gallery raised fifteen feet above them, I was there with my ladies, when, happening to discover the knight of the emerald among the company, I was going to give the ring to Douce, in order to restore it to him, when a spring from the tiger, accompanied by a dreadful roar, so terrified me, that I dropped the jewel from my finger into the cage of the lion, which was immediately below the balcony in which I was placed. Instantly, before I could utter a word, I saw the knight in the theatre, sword in hand. The tiger remained for a moment quiet, apparently astonished at the unparalleled boldness of the action, before he sprang upon the dauntless stranger: then we saw what appeared like a flash of lightning, and the head of the monster rolled upon the sand, upon which his immense body and terrible paws were deeply impressed. The knight took a diamond agraffe from his cap, flung it to the wild beast man, and, thrusting his arm through the bars of the lion's cage, took up the ring I had dropped, and brought it to me, while the air rang with the acclamations of the spectators; but, as I had resolved to return it to him, I put back his hand, and said, 'No, my lord knight; this ring has cost you too dear for me to retain. Keep it in remembrance of me.' These were the last words I ever addressed to him; for, fearing the adventure would make more noise, I dispatched Douce with a message to the knight of the emerald, beseeching him in my name to quit Cologne. He departed the same evening, without informing me of his name or quality, or telling me whence he came, or whither he was going. This, my lord count, is the whole truth. And if I have been imprudent, I have, I think, paid dearly for my fault, by a twelve-month's imprisonment, and a false accusation, that imperils my life."

The count drew his sword, and turning the cross of the handle reverently towards the empress, said, "Swear to me, madam, upon this blade, that what you have just related to me is perfectly true."

"I swear," replied the empress, "that I have told you nothing but the truth."

"Well, by this sword, and the help of God, you shall be delivered from this prison, in which you have been confined a year, and be cleared also from the deadly accusation that clouds your fame."

"May God grant it," said the pious empress.

"Now, madam, will you bestow upon me one of your jewels, in token that you accept me for your knight?"

"My lord count, take this gold chain, the only relic of my former state that I still possess. This pledge will serve as a proof that I have chosen you for my champion."

"Madam, I take it with thanks," replied the Count of Barcelona, returning, as he spoke, his sword to its scabbard, and replacing his helmet on his head. He bowed courteously to the fair prisoner, and rejoined the emperor, who was anxiously expecting his return.

"Sire," said the count, "I have seen her Majesty the empress, and am satisfied with her explanations. Will you, therefore, be pleased to inform her accusers that I am ready to do battle in her cause, with one or both, either together or by single combat."

"My lord count," replied the emperor, "you shall engage them separately; for it shall never be said that a knight who undertook the cause of an accused lady in so noble a manner did not find noble enemies."

ITALY AND HER FOREMOST MEN.*

We left the Romans struggling with the vexations and degradations of the precetti, by virtue of which even the most respectable and honoured among them find themselves every day subjected, whether in the discharge of their lawful occupations, their hours of social intercourse abroad, or in the most sacred enjoyments of home, to the brutal intrusions of a ruffianly police, and the calumnious misrepresentations of hired spies; often their own servants, who are regularly organised, for the purpose of giving information of all that passes within the walls where they eat their daily bread, to some one of the tradesmen who may supply the family; he, again, communicates it to the principal shopkeeper in the quarter, who, in his turn, conveys it to the police. Often these precetti are enforced on such trivial grounds as to make them almost ludicrous, were not the inconveniences they inflict unfortunately serious. A party of friends had been in the habit of meeting at each other's houses, in the evenings, for a social game of cards; when, lo! in the midst of their tre sette, the favourite game with the Romans, in walk a party of sbirri, and sternly prohibit them from ever committing such a misdemeanour again; Signor Puccinelli, the master of the house, and his guests, the Signori Casciani and Seani, and Dr. Feliciani, were moreover informed that they were to consider themselves from that time, under the precetti. This was more particularly hard upon the poor doctor, who did not belong to the card-playing party at all, but had only called to visit Puccinelli's wife, professionally, at her husband's request; yet he could not obtain a reversion of the sentence, although he produced the note in which his attendance had been urgently requested. He is now prohibited from ever being abroad after sunset, which, to a medical man, is equivalent to ruining his practice; a matter of no small importance both to himself and his patients, as he is one of the most skilful practitioners in surgical cases that Rome possesses.

Signor Mazzoni, and another Roman gentleman, both well known for their literary attainments, being invited, along with other guests, by Mr. Freeborn, the British consul, to dine with him, were met by Nardoni, the detestable colonel of the secret police, as they were going into the house, and required to step aside with him, under a doorway, where, at the head of his sbirri, he ransacked their pockets, and found in those of one, some memoranda respecting a picture of Raphael's; in the other, a pocket-book, filled with references to authors whom he wished to consult for a work he was compiling on Roman statistics. These cabalistic characters procured the gentlemen the pleasure of dining with Duke Humphrey, in the prison of Monte Citorio, instead of sharing in the hospitalities of Mr. Freeborn's well-spread board. The admirer of Raphael was released the same night; but his less fortunate friend, found guilty of statistics, was transferred to the horrible dungeons of the Carceri Nuove, where he was placed along with cut-throats and robbers, and not allowed to receive either the food or money sent him by his anxious mother.

General Gemeau's particular fancy was to keep an eye on the cafés and eating-houses. The Falcone, a trattoria famous for the excellence of its cuisine, in particular excited his jealous attention. A party of thirty, supping there together after the theatre, was rudely broken up by the French police, who rigorously searched men, women, and children, a guard of infantry remaining below, to aid in case of resistance; and eight individuals from among them were handcuffed and dragged to prison.

The Abate Coscia was actually banished, for forming one of a "committee of taste," at the same trattoria. He had received some cheeses of a rare quality from Urbino, which he generously produced, pro dono publico, at the table where he usually dined. In return for this act of courtesy, a certain Signor Ridolfi, who had acquired an enviable degree of gastronomic reputation, for his skill in making an omelette aux truffes, proposed to serve one up, at the same table, prepared with his own hands. He accompanied it himself from the kitchen to the dining-room, where the expectant abbé and his friends were waiting to begin the attack. A shout of welcome to the dish, and applause to the concocter of it, burst forth as soon as it came in sight. The ever-listening ears of the sbirri caught the exultant sound, and translated it into an open rejoicing on the outbreak in France; and the unfortunate abbé's digestion was impeded by an order to leave the Eternal City without delay, on the ground of his not having had the advantage and felicity of being born within its holy precincts.

We might fill pages after pages with the ridiculous onslaughts upon wide-awake hats, the cut of beards and mustachios, the shape of canes, and the colour of cravats; how a veritable John Bull had his hat knocked off by a sbirro, and how he returned the compliment by knocking the sbirro's teeth down his throat; how unfortunate Jews and English artists were bearded by the police for being bearded themselves; and how pretty women, for the plain ones were not so much the objects of suspicion, were stopped in the streets in open day, even the wives of officers of rank, and subjected to the inquiring hands of scoundrel informers. But sterner images rise before our eyes, and demand severer notice.

The Papal police, as we have seen, not only asserts the right of making the lives of the citizens slavish and miserable within the walls of Rome, but of transporting them beyond, at its own arbitrary will and pleasure. This most unjust stretch of absolute power is rendered still more odious to its victims, by the exercisers of it continually quoting in their excuse the notification of the French prefect of police, Le Rouxseau, who was appointed to that office on the entry of the French army, and soon after published an ordinance expelling "all ragabonds and foreigners who should be found in Rome, without just right or means of living there."

But, offensive and discourteous as were the words in which this mandate was couched, the present myrmidons of the law not only go beyond the spirit of them, but in defiance of any construction that their most literal interpretation might be made to bear. The number of spies are increased, the records of the police closely scanned, and cafés and restaurants narrowly watched, in search of such as may be found guilty of the crime of not having drawn their first breath within the walls of Rome, and who are accordingly sentenced to leave it, even though that circumstance may have been the result of the fortuitous absence of their parents from the capital, often at a few hours' notice, to the utter ruin, in general, of all their worldly prospects. That they are not "vagabonds," and that they have "just right or means of living there," is of no avail; and scarcely a day passes without some industrious and well-conducted father of a family solely dependent on his exertions, receiving orders from the police to leave the city, where he may have been established from his childhood, and to abandon at once his means of subsistence, and the social ties of years, in order to return to the place of his birth, where he may have neither friends nor relatives left. In many instances, these sentences are paramount to a decree of utter destitution, as in the case of artists, jewellers, and indeed all connected with the more refined productions of luxury; being compelled to return to some small village, or barren mountain district, the inhabitants of which can scarcely find a few extra baiocechi for the annual fiesta of their patron saint; and of medical men, who, the practitioners in the different communes being appointed by the government, can have no chance of establishing themselves in their native place. Thus, Dr. Ottani, after practising medicine more than twenty years in the capital, was expelled, without any charge being alleged against him; and Dr. Vincenzo Cavellini, municipal doctor for the poor, was ordered to return to his native city of Fermo, in the province of La Marca, after a residence of sixteen years in Rome, where he had his wife and family, totally dependent upon the practice which he had in that time established, by his good conduct and professional abilities. This gentleman's case was peculiarly hard, for he was opposed to the extremes of republicanism; had used his utmost efforts, on the 16th of November, 1848, to prevent the adoption of violent measures towards the Pope; actually, being the officer in command of the Campitelli national guard, hindering the 10th battalion from taking part in the demonstration on the Quirinal; and afterwards obtaining, in April, 1849, the liberation of a monk, named Father

Bernardino, from the prison where he was confined, on the charge of plotting against the republican government. On the other side, he had the "damned spot" upon him of having, in 1847, made a glowing harangue to the inhabitants of Terracina, where he was appointed, by Cardinal Gizzi, deputy-enroller of the national guard, in favour of the then liberal princes of Italy, Pio Nono, Charles Albert, and the Grand Duke of Tuscany; concluding with expressions of gratitude to the "great English nation" and its political institutions, and to Lord Palmerston, as so influentially seconding the great work of Italian regeneration. But the real—was holding the situation of verifying doctor, in the lottery department, with a salary of eight scudi per month; moderate enough, perhaps, in the eyes of an English government official, but sufficient to excite the cupidity of Dr. Gaetani, who acted as his substitute, and who, being a relation of Galli, the minister of finance, obtained, on the expulsion of Cavellini, his place of superior.

In the same manner, Natali, one of the most respectable printers and booksellers in Rome, at whose well-stored windows we have often lingered with pleasurable curiosity, and Signor Mattei, whose only fault was that of being brother-in-law to the brave and honourable Calendrelli, with hundreds more, have been exiled and ruined. Many, impoverished already by taxes, confiscations, and imprisonments, had not even the means of defraying the expenses of their removal: these were sent by the correspondenti di polizia—that is to say, a heavy common cart—into which they were thrust, fettered, and mixed up with robbers and felons; in whose company they were slowly jolted on, at the rate of eleven miles per diem, presenting a spectacle of suffering and sorrow so strangely contrasting with the unclouded azure above their heads, and the lovely scenes around them, as might well arrest the attention, and excite the sympathy of more fortunate travellers in quest only of beauty and enjoyment.

The same injustice was carried on in the provinces. We have already mentioned that, in the Roman States, there is a system of having physicians and surgeons paid a yearly sum by the municipalities, in remuneration for their attendance upon all the inhabitants of the place to which they may be appointed. Many of these medical men, after long years of zealous and faithful services, have been arbitrarily driven from their situations by the police, although they were in the enjoyment of the entire confidence of the municipalities they served, and the esteem of the people among whom their lot had been cast. The order for men thus circumstanced to return to their native place is equivalent to the confiscation of the whole of their property; for, in most instances, their localities are either unfit for the exercise of their profession, or are already occupied by other practitioners. We could give hundreds of examples—nay, thousands might be adduced—of persons against whom no accusation was made, thus reduced to beggary and despair; but we will let the few which we have cited suffice.

Unfortunately, these acts of tyranny, however odious and detestable in themselves, are, to a certain degree, verbally legal, in the Roman states, because they are in conformity with the laws, or at least pretend to be so; but innumerable other iniquities are daily perpetrated by the police, which cannot be justified even by the shadow of legal excuse: and we may easily imagine the excesses they go to, when we bear in mind that most of the police directors are men who were discharged, during the liberal movement, on account of their unfitness or delinquencies; and who, consequently, on their replacement by the ecclesiastical government, are far more liable to be swayed by motives of servile deference to the party that has restored them, and vindictive feelings against those by whom they were removed, than by any considerations of truth and justice. Indeed, in the present state of affairs at Rome, the exercise of police functions is so detestable, and at the same time so dangerous, that none but men lost to every honourable and humane feeling can be found to undertake it; so that, in fact, the peace, safety, and liberty of the citizens are at the mercy of the most abandoned characters, to whom is entrusted the exercise of almost unbounded power, by a despotic clerical legislation. It may, indeed, appear incredible to Englishmen, that the very men at this time appointed by the restored government to the most important and responsible offices, are the identical individuals who were previously removed and punished for their crimes by the very same ecclesiastical authorities. Nardoni, the colonel of the police, was in 1847, condemned to the galleys, as a robber, by Pio Nono, and branded and exposed in the pillory at Ancona for the same crime. Albi, who fled from the vengeance of the laws, for the crimes he had committed even against his own father, was made commissary extraordinary to his Holiness, during the Austrian intervention in 1849, and is now chief superintendent in the Custom-house; where also is to be found Biancana, well known for his dishonesty; and Vigna, equally noted for his speculations in the corps of carbiniers, has been honoured with the dignity of cavaliere and director of the police at Ancona. Talarini, a man of notoriously bad character, and looked upon as such in the office of the Secretary of State, has nevertheless been appointed principal secretary of the province of Macerata, with unlimited power. Freddi, notorious for his immorality, oppression, and ferocity, although publicly disgraced by Pio Nono, is now restored to the favour of his Holiness, and entrusted with great power. The rapacious Bianconi is placed in the police in Romagna, where many of the police directors and other employés have been lately arrested, and condemned, as accomplices of the brigands who have long devastated the provinces. Farina, who was dismissed in 1846 or 1847, for dishonesty in the military department, is now minister of war; and Galli, formerly renowned for his ingenuity in smuggling pigs into the city, without giving himself the trouble to pay the duty on them, has been, with equal propriety, made minister of finance; in which capacity he is said to have already bettered himself, to the amount of a million of scudi!—this, too, in the present exhausted and crippled state of the Roman Exchequer.

The extent, indeed, of this minister's speculations in landed purchases, transfer of rentes, and other little privileges secured to him by rescripts from his Holiness, at length began to excite surmises not very creditable to his honesty; and Signor Baldasseroni, the Tuscan minister, when he came to Rome on account of the projected railways, the state of the customs, and other public affairs, made such revelations concerning him, as not even his protector and sharer in the fruits of his ingenious schemes (Cardinal Antonelli) could affect to treat with indifference. His excellency, accordingly, assured the Pope that he would look into the matter himself; which he did with such marvellous precision that he was enabled to declare, he could find nothing amiss in the minister's administration. Unluckily, Baldasseroni had ample proofs to the contrary in his possession, and the cardinal sent to his house to take forcible possession of them. Baldasseroni, however, had wisely transferred the original documents into the keeping of another cardinal, somewhat more honest, and whose name he refused to reveal; only copies, therefore, were to be found, which copies were instantly condemned to an auto da fe, and Baldasseroni himself was given to understand that he would be required to retract his assertions, and sign a written declaration to the purport of acknowledging that he had been guilty of slander and defamation, or submit to the incarceration due to the alleged crime. The Pope was at first considerably disgusted with the injustice of these proceedings; but, being assured that Galli was just then labouring under pious visitings, and intended to become a priest—a measure wise enough, as far as securing to himself the unmolested possession of his gains—Pio Nono, with the versatility that marks his character in every action of his life, suffered the whole affair to pass over without further inquiry.

Giraud, coldly looked upon at the club on the Piazza Sciarra, on account of his light-fingeredness among the card money, has been appointed president of the Campo Marzo, probably in compliment to Madame Spaur, whose brother he is, out of gratitude for that lady's adventurously taking charge of his Holiness, in his hasty flight from the chair of St. Peter. But we are getting into high company: we must take care how we tread on tender ground; therefore we will not inquire how it happened that Monsignor Matteucci, who is now president of the supreme Consulta tribunal, and superintendent of the prisons, was disgraced by Gregory XVI. towards the end of his reign; nor will we seek too curiously into the peculiar merits that may have led to the promotion of Monsignor Savelli to the office of minister of the interior, seeing that that reverend dignitary stands conspicuous, in Farini's History, as having defrauded the widow of a decapitated criminal of fifty scudi, probably the only fifty she possessed—an act perfectly in keeping with his conduct when created governor of La Marca, in modestly absorbing the salaries of seven governors in his own person, and ordering that all government employés should be paid in paper money, then bearing a great loss, with the prospect of being subjected to a still greater; whilst he directed the cashier, Bandini, to pay him all his seven salaries in gold, or at any rate in good silver; but basta! as the Italians say—enough! and more than enough. We should blush to have dwelt so long upon this “Scandalous Chronicle,” as it may appear to some of our readers, did we not feel acquitted to ourselves, for thus affording a glance into its revolting pages, from the motives that have induced us to unfold them. We have already shown the unjust and evil principles on which the Roman laws are based; we felt ourselves called upon, also, to expose the characters of the parties by whom those laws are at this time administered, and we think we shall not have to proceed much further, ere we establish the fact that the Romans themselves, at this present moment, actually labour under greater hardships, injustice, and oppression, than any other people, not only in Europe, but in any part of the civilised globe.

In considering the state of the criminal legislation in Rome, we shall be more and more convinced of the fatal consequences of the canon laws under a clerical government. If equality of persons in the eye of the law is not admitted as a principle of the civil, still less is it acknowledged in the criminal legislation. The persons of priests are sacred, intangible, and therefore exempt from the proceedings of ordinary tribunals. Whatever crime a priest may have committed, he can only be tried for it by an ecclesiastical tribunal; nor can he be summoned as a witness, before a lay tribunal, without the authorisation of the bishop, and the presence and protection of another ecclesiastic; the implied necessity of which, as a precautionary measure, we may be allowed to observe, is no great compliment to the reverence in which, it ought to be believed, these same priestly persons are held by the laity. But to such a revolting excess are the privileges of these “chosen vessels” carried in the Roman states, that, instead of being held more strictly responsible for their moral actions, they enjoy, by a bull expressly framed for their benefit, a diminution of the penalty which would be awarded to a layman for the same offence they may have committed; and before being condemned to death, they must have perpetrated twice over the crimes usually found deserving of capital punishment. Another consequence of the precedence of canon over civil law is, that crimes, instead of being considered, in the usual way, as injuries to society, are regarded in a theological light, as offences against the church. Hence there are laws upon blasphemy, sacrilege, and abuse, directed against a priest, quite different from those upon the same offences directed against a layman.

But even for ordinary offences, the Roman law is neither clear nor fixed. The penal regulations of Gregory XVI. leave still in existence, with some few exceptions, the famous bandi generali, or general proclamations, forming a real Lex horrendi carminis, which punishes a bias with ten years of the galleys; swearing with perforation of the tongue; and which, in the enumeration of the penalties, always concludes with the expression "and more also, at the good pleasure of his excellency."

In many countries, the wholesome institution of juries has remedied the defects of legislative codes, whilst, in others they are modified, by trials being conducted in public; by the open cross-examination of witnesses; the freedom allowed to defence, and the wording of sentences. But none of the ameliorations, which form the fundamental principles of European legislation, are to be found in Rome. There, trials are carried on in the inquisitorial fashion. The accusation is secretly drawn up by a functionary called giudice processante, who is paid little more than a common servant, except in cases of extraordinary political prosecution, when he receives something additional; consequently, on all exciting occasions, it is his interest to add fuel to the flame, and prolong and mystify the matter as much as may come within his power. Witnesses are examined solely by this processante, who dictates their evidence according to his own view of the matter, or the motive he may have for giving it any particular colour. In ordinary cases, such as robbery or theft, the evidence is seldom falsified by the processante, except the delinquent happen to be rich enough to purchase his good opinion; but in political trials, the falsification of statements perpetually occurs; more especially in the present posture of affairs, when nine times out of ten the processante himself would be suspected, should the person submitted to his examination not be condemned; whilst, on the other hand, honour and promotion await him, if he succeeds in making any one appear guilty who is looked upon with an evil eye by the government. As to the trials, they are conducted with the greatest secrecy, especially political ones. Witnesses are not confronted with the prisoner, and, in political cases, their names are never revealed. It may easily be imagined how many sources of enmity, hatred and revenge are thus opened against the unfortunate prisoner, generally to his ruin, even supposing the processante to be uninfluenced, in his report, by any motive of animosity towards him, or any view towards his own interest. But there is yet another, and a still greater abuse, in the Roman criminal tribunals; after an accusation is compiled by the processante, the same functionary is intrusted to make an abstract of it, for the convenience of the judges, whose opinion and sentence are based upon this document. To what arbitrary decisions, and even involuntary errors, must such a system give rise! How can the exact weight be given to the evidence of a witness without hearing his words! The processante naturally forms his own opinion, before hand, as to the guilt of the prisoner, and, in his examination of him, and of the witnesses, this pre-conceived opinion constantly shows itself; influencing the whole compilation, and the still more important abstract, from which the judges derive their knowledge of the case; and this opinion is, of course, somewhat biased by the processante's interior conviction, that the more crime he demonstrates in his victims, the more he ensures the interest of his own future career.

We appeal to any sincere practical person, to say, if a just or equitable result can be expected from such a course? But as if this course was not in itself sufficiently subversive of justice, the Roman government, moreover, deprives prisoners of the power of demonstrating the fallacies of the charges against them; the freedom of making an independent defence is one of a man's most important rights, but in the Roman States, in political trials, no prisoner is allowed actually to choose his own advocate. He can only select one from among a certain number appointed to the office by the government, and, consequently, to disgrace and dismissal by the same power, whenever the views he may take happen to oppose its wishes. Thus the advocate Pantoli, of Forlì, where he was held in universal estimation, who died lately, was disgraced by government, although previously in favour with it, because he conscientiously defended some persons accused of political offences; and in the same manner, Dr. Barbien became an object of suspicion, in consequence of the courageous honesty he displayed in defending some prisoners at Ravenna. With such examples before their eyes, how can the advocates appointed to defend political prisoners be expected to do their duty, and to turn all their energy and abilities towards procuring the acquittal of their client, when they know their own interests will be so much more effectually served by working out his condemnation?

In the case of our countryman, Edward Murray, still pending, after between three and four years suspense, between life and death, to the lengthened misery of his wife and mother, the Papal government, roused by the murmurs of the British Lion, predictive of his ancient roar in cases of tyranny or injustice, has condescended to put forth a vindication of its penal code, which it describes as "the fruit of long study by men of great learning, well acquainted with all other codes that have ever been brought to light," adding, in an admirable spirit of self-satisfaction, "this code is such as to make us certainly never wish for the regulations of other countries." This assertion we fully believe, as far as the administrators of the code are concerned, but we may be permitted to remain somewhat sceptical, as to the coincidence in it of those who are submitted to the "certain methods, not variable according to the pleasure of the judge," which, this same veracious statement assures us, "lead to the discovery of truth, and, shutting the doors to fraud on every side, afford the prisoner a certain way of exculpating himself, and proving his innocence" (P). The document, curious enough in itself, as a picture of legal prevarication, then goes on to say that Murray had the privilege of choosing his own advocate; subject, be it understood, to the approval of the head of the Supreme Tribunal; a clause taken no notice of in the dwelling upon the privilege, and that he accordingly chose the advocate Olimpiade Dionisi, "a most learned professor of the Roman University, and a most acute and eloquent orator;" to which we may add, as the "vindication" does not, a salaried functionary of the government, and, moreover, one of the judges of the Commission of Censure, a political, secret, and exceptional tribunal, formed for the express purpose of depriving of their offices all government and municipal employés, whose conduct, during the revolution, was not strictly satisfactory to the restored régime. Even the judges themselves are liable to be removed at the pleasure of the government, and as they are chiefly young prelates, anxious for advancement, they are entirely devoted to the ruling powers.

Besides the Rota Tribunal, and the Sacra Consulta, there are two other tribunals, equally, or even more arbitrary, in the Roman States. The first of these is the Inquisition, or, as it is mis-called, the Holy Office, of which little remains to be told in the present day, with which the English public is not already acquainted: it is but justice, however, to state, that its persecutions have been for some time limited and exceptional, and its zeal directed much more actively towards political than religious offenders. Still, it opens a wide field for anonymous accusations and groundless calumnies, and even the secrets of the confessional are too often betrayed within its walls to serve party purposes. But the other tribunal to which we have alluded, that of the Cardinal Vicar, in Rome, and of the bishops in the provinces, has the power to carry on oppression and injustice on a much more extended scale. Exercising, as it claims to do, the censorship over the habits and morals of the inhabitants, the honour and tranquillity of whole families are placed at the mercy of jealous intolerance, or vindictive malignancy. Marriage being considered, in the Roman States, by the Canon law, as a sacrament, all domestic life comes under the scrutiny and jurisdiction of this most insolent and arbitrary tribunal, the flagrant abuses of which we cannot sully our pages by recording. Let it suffice to say, that Farina, whom we have already mentioned, as noted for his want of honour, and Ferrini, a common jailor, dismissed from his situation by Gregory XVI., for mal-practices, were among the members of a tribunal which claims the privilege of entering private houses at any hour, night or day, and tearing wives from the arms of their husbands, or husbands from their wives, on the pretended accusation of some immorality committed, it may be, years before, and of which the charge is generally a mere instrument of extortion. To the tribunals we have already mentioned, another was, however, added, after the restoration, termed the Council of Censure, the object of which is to pry into the conduct of all government employés, magistrates, military men, provincial and municipal officers, administrators of pious congregations, hospitals, &c., with the faculty of suspending them from their functions, degrading them from their rank, or dismissing them altogether. This has been effected, by an inquisitorial system, without communicating any accusation, without properly examining or confronting witnesses, and consequently without allowing a chance of vindication! The exorbitant excesses of this tribunal have surpassed any that have hitherto existed; even the Septembrists of atrocious memory, in a kind of tribunal of their own organizing, required an accusation to be regularly made out, and allowed the proper means of defence; but this Roman Council of Censure, by a single stroke of the pen, subjected sixty thousand persons, chiefly of the middle classes, to a secret persecution, not limited to the partisans of the republic, but comprising many who refused service under the revolutionary authorities.

It is not to be supposed that the employments thus disposed of depended upon the pleasure of the government—all government employments in the Roman States, are generally supposed to be conferred for life, and are, therefore, eagerly sought after, though the salaries are in general so moderate as barely to afford the means of decent subsistence; moreover, of these salaries a certain proportion is retained by the Roman government, which acts in the parental light of an Assurance Company, towards its officials, in order to provide a fund for them, from which they draw their half-pay on retiring from office, and from which, in case of their death, their widows and children are pensioned. Thus to deprive these officials, on every slight pretext, of their employments, is to do away with the right which they have lawfully purchased by regular payments; it is, in fact, to confiscate the property which they have confided to the honour of government. Another hardship on the part of these poor officials is, that on being thus suddenly turned out of employments they may have held for many years, involving the prime and vigour of their lives, they cannot immediately turn to other occupations; and if even they were able and willing so to do, where are they to find persons courageous enough to give shelter and occupation to victims of political persecution! Alas, for Rome! what in London would form friends for the oppressed, there only feeds the vengeance of the oppressor. O, happy England! cherish your rights and privileges—defend them to the last drop of your free-born blood! but let not your own blessings harden your hearts to the miseries of others; let not your own glorious security from oppression or wrong, lap you in selfish, nay, sinful indifference, to the hardships, the injustice, which would crush every spark of manhood out of millions of your fellow creatures, most gifted by nature, in themselves, and in the possessions nature has granted them. We could trace pictures of the misery and despair which,—through the arbitrary despotism of the Council of Censure, during the two short years of its existence, instigated almost always, by injustice, error, or private feeling of enmity and vindictiveness—have seized families whom we have seen in the enjoyment of simple competence and social cheerfulness, that would call forth sighs of pity from many kind English firesides rich in the same blessings.

We need only add, in proof of the errors and iniquities of this abominable tribunal, that Pio Nono himself had the firmness to dissolve it, avowing, as excuse for his daring in this instance, to think and act for himself, that complaints of its cruelties and wickedness had reached him on every side: happy had it been for him, and for his country, had he always acted thus; but for thousands of his poor suffering, ill-used subjects, the mischief was done, and he, “vicar of God,” and “king of kings,” as he claims to be, had no means of repairing it. In the simple phraseology of the old ballad of “Chevy Chase,” we may say—

“The child may rue that was unborn,
The mischiefs of that day.”

From the consideration of criminal jurisdiction, we are easily led on to the prisons, the galleys, the system of popular education in Rome, and other subjects, belonging to Italy, yet, in effect, connected with the welfare of the whole human race; but these must be reserved for a future period, and we, for the present, conclude, with the hope that the more clearly we show the griefs of other countries, the more gratitude we shall inspire in the hearts of our readers for the blessings secured to us in our own.

THE GARDEN SWING.

THERE is a class of art to which it is not very easy to affix a true and definite name, and still more difficult to determine what sentiment it is intended to convey, or to what feeling of the mind it appeals. Pictures of such a character call forth no emotion by their grandeur or sublimity, they elicit neither reverence nor admiration, tell no tale of history or fiction, exhibit neither pathos nor humour, and scarcely reveal to us the wonders and the beauty of created nature; and yet there is a certain charm in these works, which is a sure passport to public favour, with a large number who seek to be pleased rather than instructed, who are satisfied with the elegancies of art, and desire in it no other qualities.

An American writer upon artist-life, Mr. Tuckerman, says, with much truth—“In the world of art there exists a kind of table-land, equally distant from mountain grandeur and flowery vales, where a cheerful tone and quiet harmony refresh the senses, and gratify without disturbing the heart. In an age like the present, those who thus minister to the more tranquil pleasures of imagination, exercise a benign vocation. They may not thrill, but they often charm. Their labours create no epochs of inward life, yet they often cheer and solace. The lessons conveyed may be calm, but it is not the less refreshing; and the associations enkindled, like a bland atmosphere, yield a pastime not the less desirable, because it is unmarked either by tears or laughter, and is indicated only through an unconscious smile or placid reverie."

While admitting that artists not unfrequently address themselves to very singular themes, or treat ordinary subjects in a very unfamiliar manner, for the purpose of attracting notice to their works, it is equally incontrovertible that they add but little to their reputation. The world, in general, has no sympathy with experimentalists in art; it is slow in recognising any deviation from paths in which others have walked, and in the appreciation of what may possibly be truth, but what it cannot see to be such. The late Turner is an instance of this rejection by the multitude, because his nature was not theirs, and his vision saw things hidden from them. Those who have an eye only for the picturesque, or whose notion of painting is confined to the graphic reflection of external creation, will find, comparatively, but little satisfaction in the fruits of such a pencil as his, which appeals as much to thought and meditation to ascertain its truth, as to imagination.

But whatever the subject may be, and however treated, "there is a pleasure in painting which none but painters know;" whether sitting under the canopy of heaven to copy nature in her various moods and aspects, or solitarily in the studio, with no other companion than one's own thoughts and fancies, the costumed lay-figure, and the heaps of incongruous and motley materials which constitute the chief furniture of the painting-room, the artist has a world of treasures within himself in which he luxuriates, and which none can take away. Thus, says Hazlitt, "the hours pass away untold, without chagrin and without weariness; nor would he ever wish to pass them otherwise. Innocence is joined with industry, pleasure with business; and the mind is satisfied, though it is not engaged in thinking, or in saying any mischief."

But it is not the painter alone who derives gratification from his art, it cannot ever be a matter of indifference to the most illiterate, though tastes will differ, as to that quality of art in which the pleasure is found. It must never be regarded only as a luxury to be possessed by the few and wealthy; but rather as a powerful engine for enlightening and instructing the masses—as a gentle and unreprouching friend, whose voice is in alliance with goodness and virtue, and which, when once understood, is able both "to sooth misfortune and to reclaim from folly." It is the duty of an artist to see that he does not misapply his talents, by employing them to any less worthy purpose.

These remarks seem naturally to suggest themselves from the contemplation of such a picture as "The Garden Swing," a pleasing and graceful composition, though it makes no appeal to our sensibilities: it has in it none of those qualities which called forth the poet's lines—

"Whate'er Lorraine light touch'd with soft'ning hue, Or savage Rosa dash'd, or learned Poussin drew;"

but it is a subject one is contented to look at, because it speaks of human joys, and whatever does this can scarcely be unwelcome. The reader of Boccaccio will be reminded by it of some of the scenes described by that elegant, but not very moral, writer; and the admirers of Watteau's pictures will find in it a resemblance, in style, to many of his most esteemed productions. Indeed, to Watteau may be attributed the merit of originating this style of art, which, for the sake of a better title, we would call "aristocratic pastoral," or, as Walpole aptly describes it, as representing an "impossible rural life, led by those opposites of rural simplicity—people of fashion and rank." Such a style could only have emanated from a Frenchman, living at a period when folly was allied with pleasure, and frivolity had taken the place of sober reason. In our day, to see men and women amusing themselves with a "garden swing," would certainly afford merriment, but scarcely any feeling beyond this. Watteau's success led to many imitators among his countrymen, but few of our school have followed his example. Stothard and Smirke are almost the only names that have been popularly associated with this style; more, however, as designers for book-prints, than as painters of important pictures, similar to those which the French artist produced.

THE PROGRESS OF THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON

FROM WESTMINSTER TO TWICKENHAM.

We could wish that every foreigner, who visits the shores of our beloved country, might receive an invitation to meet the "Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress, the sheriffs, aldermen," and several of the good citizens of London, at the steps of Westminster-bridge, thence to accompany them (as we had the good fortune to do, on the 17th of July), in the City's gorgeous barge, to Kew; then and there to board, with loving and pacific intent, the Maria Wood; and so on to Twickenham, where a very important ceremony takes place; inasmuch as the Maria Wood has accommodation in her spacious cabin to seat 140 persons at her hospitable board, who, when safely anchored in the Twickenham Deep, discuss the various good things provided for their entertainment by the most hospitable of all cities of the world. Again, we wish that foreigners could enjoy such a treat; because we desire them sometimes to remember us by other tokens than "Waterloo," "Trafalgar," and such-like indications of our power. We wish them to know our citizens—to behold our Thames—and especially to see our Palace of Westminster, from where it only can be seen as it ought to be—from our proud and beautiful river—and to view the banks of that river crowded with glorious memories of the past, and happy realities of the present. We do not seek to represent ourselves as an humble-minded people, or a people at all inclined to meekness; we have no propensity to "succumb;" we know our own value, though we are not sufficiently eloquent to talk of it—at all events continually—imitating our very polished neighbours the French, and our "go-a-head" brethren across the Atlantic; the world's history records our power, and having visited other lands, we have learned to estimate the beauty of our own; therefore it is, that, reposing on our dignity, we would show our neighbours what, taking the past and present into account and blending them into "one great whole," they can see in no other country of the globe.*

* We missed a rare opportunity of showing the foreigner our Thames last summer, when our City "was bearded like the pard," and English sounded as an unknown tongue amid the Babylonish confusion. Then should the citizens have decked and drawn out their barges, and prepared one as a

It was like a masque of the olden time—descending the steps, and being handed by the oarsmen, in their bright red liveries and black velvet-badged caps; to be received so cordially by the good Lord Mayor, ribboned and starred and gold-chained as he was; to be conducted along a richly-carpeted saloon, shaded from the hot rays of the sun by silken curtains, to where a graceful young lady, the daughter of the Lord Mayor, (the Lady Mayoress of the day, in the absence of her mother, from illness,) half-shrouded in white muslin and lace, reclined between two golden dolphins. It was, as "they say," "quite a picture," and a very pretty one; the rich red velvet draping a table in front of the dolphin chair, was an admirable foreground to the "enchanted lady;" and when the barge cleared from her moorings, and the music of the band, which floated in its own separate and particular boat around us, mingled with the salute of cannon—the sounds being repeated by one of the most perfect echoes we ever heard, from the "Houses of Parliament"—the effect was perfect; we had gone back at least 150 years, when the Thames was the great London "highway" for our rulers and their people, who "took boat" as we "take carriage," and enjoyed pure air and sunshine without dust or hindrance. We have some faint remembrance that the superb red velvet covering was afterwards removed from the table, which was then heaped with ice and fruit of delicious fragrance; and that while the ladies looked, as all ladies are said to do, most charming in the becoming robes of morning, the gentlemen talked politics, as vehemently as they had done, or were going to do, at the hustings. But while we were so entranced by the magnitude and beauty of what may be called our GREAT WATER PALACE—the new Houses of Parliament—as to forget for a time where we were, and to people it with those whose voices can never be heard within the magnificent walls of the new "St. Stephen's," we felt an additional triumph, for that our past is a security for our future.

FLOATING THRONE, for our island Queen, upon which she could have passed, with thousands of her people, over those brilliant waters! What a pageant it might have been! amid the thunder of artillery—then the minstrelsy of peace.

Not even the regal towers of WINDSOR can excite more patriotic feelings, sanctified as they are by our beloved Queen, than the precincts of OLD PALACE-YARD! The memories of Pym, of Hampden, of Cranmer, Strafford, Laud, Camden, Sir Thomas More, Cromwell, Chatham, Pitt, Fox, Grattan, Canning, crowd upon us, without distinction of time or space. There, beneath the shadow of those peerless towers, went on, for century after century, until the object was achieved, the struggle for our rights and liberties—not the soulless liberty which is craved by the wild socialist, but the thrice hallowed liberty of a Christian people. There, beneath the influence of Burke, and the perseverance of Wilberforce, perished the slave trade. There, within our own time, the statesman Peel, uniting the wisdom of age with the vigour of manhood, threw himself into the tide, to direct where he could not control. Great ones are there still; and believing that—may we not believe that ample for the danger will be the power of resistance?

The rovers bent on their oars, and the stately barge pressed onward over the waters of our glorious river—still the “highway” of our commerce and our wealth, bringing up to the gates of our Royal Mint the gold which distant lands are pouring into the lap of England. We recalled the well-known dialogue between James I. and a certain lord mayor, from whom the King had to borrow money. The “first magistrate of the first city in the world” declined to entertain the proposal, upon which the King threatened to ruin the City, to make a desert of Westminster, by removing the Court to York or to Oxford. The Lord Mayor was faithful—he knew the value of his position. “Please your Majesty,” he answered, “there will be this consolation for the poor merchants of your city of London, your Majesty cannot take the Thames along with you!” Then, what sacred memories came upon us from the Abbey of Westminster! while, to the left of the river, stands the mournful-looking Palace of Lambeth, flanked by the tower where the Lollards lingered through fearful imprisonments, and sundry kinds of death, scaling their sincerity with their blood; where the unwomanly Elizabeth imprisoned the Earl of Essex, before she committed him to the Tower; where Archbishop Laud, a brief time before his execution, was attacked by the riotous London apprentices, who seem, in their day, to have been pretty much what our artisans of the great cotton and iron cities are now.

What hosts of recollections!—overflowing even as the waters of the brimming Thames, big from the last nights’ rain!—the shadow of the Lollards’ Tower, grey and grim with age, seemed to forbid all approach of joy—a monument of suffering, and of the solemn triumph which unites time with eternity.

We would rather, as we have often done, gaze upon that tower when night spreads its pall over the city, and

It has no sympathy with the bright things of day, the invigorating sound of drum and trumpet, or the light cheerful laughter of young, bounding life; and we were glad to speed past a gloom of another kind, the Milbank Penitentiary, looming above the Pontine marsh of London, and to pass also the tinsel of Vauxhall, which, despite its fête memories, is as painful to look upon by day as an old beauty, who seeks to obliterate the ravages of insulted time by pearl powder and paint. We were still within the range of our monstrous city—the dense population of Lambeth crowded at one side, and the indescribable débris of “London out of town” at the other—so that it was a great pleasure when the lawns and trees of Chelsea Hospital hove in sight, and we could talk of the veteran’s shelter—where he bivouacks until his tent is struck for the last time, and sinks, covered with age and honour, into a soldier’s grave, beneath the shadow of those spreading trees. The citizens affectionate Greenwich more than they do Chelsea; they are both noble establishments, worthy a great nation—Greenwich having the advantage of a better position, and being more commanding, more palace-like in its appearance; but the locality of Greenwich cannot boast such a host of associations as Chelsea; the very legend (if it be no more) that Nell Gwyn prevailed upon the heartless Charles to establish this institution, is in itself a pleasure. It is one of the greatest delights in the world to find the silver side of a character, or if there be nothing so substantial as a “silver side” to come upon, a bright spot on a dark surface, even a tiny spot, so bright, that it lightens darkness! It is beneficial to ourselves to think well of our fellow beings—it is so healthy, as well as happy, to take kindly to our species—and to light the candle, as did the woman in holy writ, to find a missing coin—that this legend of “Nell’s” goodness gives us more contentment than a long epitaph to a great rich man, all carved in marble, and designed by a fair sculptor. “Poor Nelly!” We have passed the Hospital, or "College," as the old soldiers like to hear it called, and there, where those irregular but tall houses, so grave and self-possessed, as though they said, "we each have a history," stretch along the water with grim perpendicular railings, more than half concealed by the trees that flank the river—is Cheyne-walk—dear old Cheyne-walk!—where Sir Thomas More so frequently "took boat" at the bottom of his garden; where Holbein wandered, and Pym thought, and St. Evremont resided, and Sir Robert Walpole—more celebrated than respected—made a great deal out of a little; where Addison loitered—dear, sober, grey-toned Cheyne-walk!—fit emblem of the sweet old village of Chelsea, as even we remember it, before it lost all self-respect in a wilderness of modern houses, pressing upon some quaint old nooks, where still great men shelter from the tumult of the town-loving world, in an unseemly fashion. Martin still paints near Beaufort-row; and that great, grand author—who thunders at the world, but cannot comprehend an opera, who is himself to thousands, the hero of his "Hero worship," a living myth, of whom we think more than we could write, and to whose shrine, when he passes from among us, the thinkers of the old, as well as of the new world, will do pilgrimage—CARLYLE lives beyond those trees, in a place so still, that the echo of the knocker on his door might thrice steal round the street without risk of being noticed. We longed to point out each well-known tree, and house, and chain, and bit of railing, and the spot where the ducking stool for scolding wives once stood, and the Don Saltero's coffin-house, talked of in the Tattler—and the grey old church containing the ashes of the body of Sir Thomas More. We longed to talk about it, but though many of our companions spoke of the fine square grim tower, and seemed rather fearful that our gay flagstaff might catch in the wood-work of Chelsea-bridge as we passed beneath it, yet they were too happy in the present, to travel back to the past; and so, rejoicing with them in the sunshine, and the joyous pouring forth of the music, we bade adieu to the scene of so many long-ago rambles, and felt it was better to keep our memories to ourselves, than expose them to those who would not perhaps give us their sympathy. One thing especially delighted us, the courtesy and good nature of the company one to the other. In half an hour we had ceased to feel that we were among strangers; even the political cross-firing was conducted with infinite good humour and good breeding.

It is so much the custom at the "west end," to attack the citizens of London concerning their lack of knowledge of the etiquette of the "well bred," that when, some years ago, we first had an opportunity of observing "citizens," in "citizen society," we were prepared for every species of absurdity; but, even then, before the party dispersed, we grew heartily ashamed of our credulity. Men immersed in business have seldom time to think of small forms or ceremonies, but if Lord Chatham's definition of POLITENESS be correct, and it is simply

"Benevolence in trifles,"

The citizens of London must be the most "polite" people in the world, for they are truly "benevolent" in small things—as surely and as well as they are in great ones. We cannot forget the cordial attentions, the omissions of self, the overflowing hospitalities we have witnessed in citizen assemblies; it seems almost impertinent to say this, when prejudice has quitted so many of her strongholds, and the band of commercial brotherhood draws the inhabitants of England together much more closely than in the olden time; but as long as prejudices linger it is well to assist in their overthrow. Differences of particular kinds must always exist in the various classes of society; but they are not of the nature which empty-headed foppery would stamp upon the upright and honourable citizens of London.

We were attracted by the bright appearance of the crowd on Putney-bridge; the sun shone upon them, and brought out the colours of the gay bonnets and parasols to perfection. Putney is famous in all history as the head-quarters of Cromwell's army, and as the birth-place of Cromwell, the renowned Earl of Essex, whose father was a blacksmith in that village. We are a strange people! with the descendants of blacksmiths and butchers, tailors and drapers, and, worse than all, of women "spotted as the pard" among our peers, we talk of a "pure aristocracy," and do not desire to withdraw from its influence! At Putney, Cardinal Wolsey, after his disgrace, descended from his mule, and, delighted at the message sent him by his master, bestowed a gold chain on the messenger, "Master Norris;" and, not content with that, dispatched his poor attached fool as a present to the King. The fool deserved a better fate, for he did not want to go, and it took, according to good old Stowe, "six of the tallest yeomen to convey him to court." Alas! poor fool!

Putney has other memories. Pitt died on Putney-heath; and Gibbon, our historian, was born there. It is said that Richardson wrote Sir Charles Grandison in a small house near the bridge; and, on the Fulham side of the river, we know that the witty Theodore Hook penned those works which, after their particular genre, remain unrivalled in our literature. Beside his house stands the more stately Pryor's-bank, where, five or six years ago, two well-known and hospitable friends assembled all the art and literature of the Metropolis—acting plays, and getting up masques, such as can never be forgotten.

As we floated towards the beautiful bridge of Hammersmith—which spans the water as if an enchanter had thrown it there in sport—we passed Barn-Elms, where the Earl of Essex dwelt, and Cowley lived, before he went to Chertsey; and where Jacob Tonson, the noted bookseller, resided, and formed the gallery of the Kit-cat Club. And, as the shadows of the trees come further on the water, and the wild flowers mingle with the branches of some of the old willows, which are greatly bowed into the stream since we knew them first, we approach that part of the Thames which teems with reminiscences of our truest and purest poets; hardly a spot which is not consecrated by some association with Pope, Gay, Collins, Denham, Cowley, and even the witty, disagreeable Dean Swift. We pass the site of Brandenburg House, where one of the most unfortunate of Queens received the congregated thousands who assured her of a sympathy which followed her to her rapidly-found grave. We hope our citizen friends remembered that the noble and worthy knight of the City of London, Sir Nicholas Crisp—the LOYAL par excellence—had a residence there, and that his great heart is literally buried in Old Hammersmith Church.

FETES à fresco are what we English but little understand; yet, as we rowed beneath the bridge, several of the company recalled the delightful fêtes they had enjoyed at Mr. Lumley's villa, when his beautiful grounds were thrown open to his friends, and his taste and hospitality assembled guests to whom so much interest was attached that the entrance-gates were crowded to see them as they passed. And, in passing Chiswick, the seat of Devonshire's good Duke, we thought of two great men—George Canning and Charles James Fox—who died there, and of the grave-stones that surround the ancient village church; of Hogarth, who lies buried there—of Loutherbourn, the artist and magnetizer—of Cromwell's gentle daughter Mary—and of the proud Duchess of Cleveland—all, however separated by time and circumstance, united by death in that crowded churchyard, we had become quite oblivious of the scene, for we passed Mortlake without bestowing a thought on Dr. Dee, the astrologer, and found ourselves at Kew, beneath the bows of the Maria Wood, without having noted our approach; and leaving the gorgeous little palace which had floated us thus far, we entered upon a more extensive domain, our passenger-boats bounding backwards and forwards, to convey on board the company who joined us there. The guns fired, and the band took up its position round the mast of our stately barge; and, shaded by an awning which covered the whole of the deck, the guests commenced dancing with considerable spirit; while, below in the saloon, preparations for the dinner were continued with unabated activity.

Everybody knew everything about Kew, and everybody seemed to admire Sion-house, whose chief interest to us arose from the memory that it stands nearly on the site of a nunnery which gave shelter to Elizabeth Barton, the holy maid of Kent: a circumstance that provoked the special ire of Henry VIII.; and the nunnery, founded by Henry V., "in honour of the Holy Trinity, the glorious Virgin Mary, the apostles and disciples of God, and all saints, especially St. Bridget," was one of the first establishments which Henry thought fit to suppress, "for the honour of God," and the increase of his own revenue! When the kingly state added dignity and power to the virtues of Edward VI., he bestowed the domain on the Duke of Northumberland; and the sweet eyes of Lady Jane Grey looked out from thence, upon the waters of the Thames, when she accepted the crown which crushed her into an early grave. And then, poor misguided Mary, re-gave the nunnery to "all the saints, but particularly St. Bridget," who enjoyed it but a little while; for Elizabeth, with a stroke of her sceptre, swept them all away, and re-gifted the nunnery to the Earl of Northumberland, in whose family it remains until this day.

ISLEWORTH, whose church is built on the margin of the river, quiet and sleepy and harmless as it looked from our floating palace, was once the head-quarters of firm, determined men, as ever wielded "bill" or drew "bow" in defence of rights and liberties. There, during the long and disturbed reign of Henry III., the insurgent barons, under Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, assembled and camped. Those grim, grand, old barons were, in truth, troublesome to deal with! But, as we draw nearer to RICHMOND, our senses become bewildered, and were lost in the mazes of fact and fiction; we were beside Jeannie Deans and the Duke of Argyle, and we saw cows that would have excited the enthusiasm of the said Jeannie. And snatches of Thompson's poetry tingled in our ears, and we kept repeating (all gently to ourselves, while the dance continued)—we kept, we say, repeating to ourselves the ode of Collins:

"In yonder grave a druid lies,
While slowly wind the stealing waves,
The year's best sweets shall duteous rise,
To deck their poet's sylvan grave.

"Remembrance oft shall haunt the shore,
When Thames in summer wreath is drest,
And oft suspend the dashing oar,
To bid thy gentle spirit rest."

Thompson's spirit may well be supposed to haunt the Thames, to watch its banks, to inhale its perfumes, to mingle with its gales; theauteous river seemed necessary to his very existence; he lived beside it, died beside it, in Rosedale-house, and he is buried in one of its most sacred resting-places—in the churchyard of Richmond. Our thoughts were so filled by the sweet poet of the "Seasons" that we hardly remembered our long-ago wanderings on Richmond-green, where we called up the shadows of the kings who passed beneath the crumbling gateway, the only remains of the ancient palace where Edward III. died—deserted by his base mistress, Lady Alice Pierce, who stripped the jewels from the fingers of her dying king, and fled! And there ELIZABETH, great in all things save the attributes of woman, also died; her stormy nature and fiery passions quenched at last! There is a sudden pause in the dance, and the band, according to custom, strikes up—

"Sweet lass of Richmond-hill!"

We pause beneath the shadow of the beautiful bridge—and now have patience with our description. Imagine the waters of the Thames—a fresh, bright, heavenly blue, as blue as unstained ether—overflowing their banks—rippling on the green sward. Take yon arch as the frame of your picture, and look through it. Behold those pensile trees sweeping into the water, while others stretch loftily away into a magnificent background—the banks, gorgeous with all the brilliant flowers of the season. Note how the villas peep through the trees, breaking up the foliage into lights. Did you ever see such delicious masses of colour? But there—a little in advance of us—in the centre of our landscape, like a bright ruby set round with sapphires, rides our city barge, the crimson, black-capped rowers resting on their oars; there is just enough breeze to prevent the flags clinging round their staffs, and keep them floating; the silken curtains of the windows heave, so as to give the idea of motion, faint as that which lifts a rose-leaf; the carving and gilding of the barge shows with gorgeous but not gaudy effect; and the bluff steersman looks like a portion of the barge itself, standing out against the sky, which is of a paler blue than the water. About it are numerous skiffs and boats, and a flotilla of swans, making out the picture, but not in the least injuring the effect of the glowing barge, round which the sun's rays play, as if sporting with its beauty; but we cannot describe the effect of that exquisite, though accidental, grouping. The barge remained stationary, as long as we have taken to write of this spot, and then crossed to the Twickenham side of the river.

On we go, in mid-stream! How busy our memory will be, and no wonder; how many days, weeks, months, of our girlish life were passed upon the banks of the Thames, so that we seem to know every spot, and tree; and we used to know the children and dogs; and there is an abundance of both, shouting and baying at our pageant—we can fancy them the same!—but that, indeed, is fancy.

We never saw the dwelling of the "bold Buccleuch" look so lovely as on that afternoon; it was in complete shadow, the turf had the shimmering effect of green velvet, and it looked a very bower of beauty; we paused to gaze, and then, as we moved on at a stately pace, consistent with the dignity of the City of London, Richmond-hill swelled out from the verdant and richly wooded valley of the Thames. We most earnestly beg that whoever has not seen the view of the river from the hill, will not be content with the view of the hill from the river. "The Star and Garter," so deservedly famous as one of the best and most beautifully situated hotels in England, looks merely an "hotel" from the water, and the landscape would be better without it; but our acquaintance with many of the "fine view points" of Europe, has increased our appreciation of the view from Richmond-hill. One American, after gazing upon it for a time, said, it "wanted clearing," while another declared, that "he would not look at it again; it made him sorry to leave England!" A little beyond, where Gay's summer house stood (we know not if it be still there) stands Ham-house, concealed by almost a forest of noble trees, from the water. We once made pilgrimage there—a pilgrimage of curiosity—to see the rooms where the infamous Cabal was held, when the house was the residence of the Duke of Lauderdale, where he and those lords met whose initials composed the word C A B A L ! This visit was soon after the death of that old Lady Dysart, whose little carriage we used to watch rushing about Ham and Petersham, when her ladyship was nearly blind. We delighted to speculate as to where Charles II. concealed himself in Ham-house; and there is a tradition that the great gates of the said Ham-house have not been moved since they closed on his departure; at all events, those fine wrought iron gates have not been opened within the memory of “The oldest inhabitant.”

“Eel-pie” Island we found more embowered than ever, and we hardly like to repent what we heard upon “unquestionable authority”—for it was told us by one of the city magnates, that the pies made at Eel-pie Island are no longer made of Thames eels, but absolutely of Dutch eels!

Edmund Kean was fond of this island, and there is a monument to his memory erected in Richmond church, by the piety of his high-principled son; but we are nearing “Pope’s Villa,” where the all-important ceremony of dinner is to be gone through—and we are quite ready for it. The barge draws in to the shore, the inhabitants crowd to their windows, and into their gardens. The poet’s grounds are cut up into strips, where houses are strung nearly together, with a beading of garden wall between; they may almost be called town houses, but for the river, which flows before them, and the freshness and exquisite finish of their little parterres. Certainly, in these small garden arrangements, England is unrivalled; but while we admire the grace and finish imparted to a tiny plot of ground, we deplore the taste which has crammed a mongrel Swiss house close to “Pope’s sacred grotto.” The fantasie of this building might be tolerated in a park, relieved by an abundance of well-grown timber, but where it is—slashed and “cross gartered,” a very Malvolio of architecture—it is an insult to the

“Egerian grot,”

“Nobly pensive, St. John sat and thought,
Where British sighs, from dying Wyndham stole,
And the bright flame was shot through Marchmont’s soul.”

The willow had long ago been uprooted; the reason assigned for this sacrilege seemed to us strange—relic-hunters so destroyed the tree that, to avoid the nuisance, it was cut down, and the root is preserved in the grotto; so the destruction was accomplished by a coup of the hatchet at once, instead of by the penknives of a century of relic hunters. We would not point out this crushed-up grotto of our great English Poet to our foreign visitors—for the first time we were glad there were none there—such sacrilege would not have been tolerated in any other European country.

When will our government understand the national value of enshrining the memories of our literary and artistic heroes, within the sanctuary where they lived and thought; even our slow neighbours of Holland point out to their sons the birth-places and dwelling-places of their great men. But a jour de fête is no day for melancholy—we were summoned to descend to the saloon; we did so, remembering we numbered one hundred and twenty absolutely hungry individuals, and wondering how we could manage to get any dinner: but we had only to do as we were desired. The ladies went first, and, directed by a most courteous gentleman, who acted as master of the ceremonies, found their names in their plates, on the inside row, abundant space reserved for each, and no possibility of dresses being crushed or deranged by the passing and repassing of servants. The gentlemen sat at the opposite sides of the narrow tables, and the dishes were placed in rotation, relieved by an abundance of flowers. In a few minutes, so admirable were the arrangements, that all were seated without the least confusion, and, after the bugle sounded from the steps of the ante-room, “silence for grace” proclaimed, and the grace said, the city turtle soup went round, and round, and round;—the ladies being served, as at any other stately dinner, first. It was a cheerful pleasant dinner, free alike from insufficiency and the vulgarity of overabundance, while the various “plats” would have satisfied the eye and the palate of a Parisian epicure. But, in due course, the whole was removed, “the wine butler”—a very important person at the Mansion House—placed the golden loving-cups upon the tables—two on each table—the trumpet sounded, and the toast-master proclaimed the names of all the aldermen present, adding, that “the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress gave to them and to the ladies and gentlemen, their other guests, a hearty welcome, and greeted them with a loving-cup,” which loving-cup was passed round after ancient fashion; and then the trumpet and toast-master craved attention for the Lord Mayor, who said a few words with earnestness and fervour, proposing the health of our beloved Queen. This was applauded to the echo, round after round; and before all was again still the band on deck burst forth into the National Anthem; coming from above us, it had a most singular and beautiful effect, as though descending from the heavens. True it is that, no matter how often heard, that sacred strain thrills every Englishman's heart while he stands erect in his loyalty, as in a suit of armour, nerved to do battle unto death for throne and sovereign. We forgot all about Popo's Villa then, and longed for the foreigner to see how we loved our Queen!

We love her, first of all from instinct; next, because she has ranged every womanly virtue around her throne, and her example is as a beacon, set upon a hill, to show all those of her own sex, who are wandering after the ill-favoured, and unnatural phantom, called the "rights of woman," with how much loving nature the first lady in the realm combines the perpetual duties of her state with the duties of wife and mother, and submits to the restraint of laws which bind her as closely as they do the poorest woman in her kingdom. We all do love her! heartily, honestly, devotedly! and we bless God that the purity of our court is the brightest jewel in the crown of Queen Victoria.

When the anthem had received its round of applause, and the company calmed down, the bugle and toast-master came again and again, and toast and speech, toast and speech and song succeeded each other—speeches as good as after-dinner speeches generally are—when gentlemen praise each other, and season their compliments with much good-nature, a little banter, and a modicum of wit. Flocks of swans crowded round the barge, and received what was spared from our well-spread board; and fair ladies did not hesitate to row so close to our windows that we had the "benefit" of their observations.

Our barge cleared its moorings, and the band gave notice, by a cheerful polka, that all above was again ready for the merry dance. The ladies left their seats, followed almost immediately by the gentlemen; and, by the time we arrived at Richmond-bridge, where many of the party disembarked, nearly all the gentlemen were mingling in the dance—all with as cool heads, and clear, intelligent eyes, as though not a toast had been drank, or a bottle of the favourite "hot wines" of England poured out in loyal or friendly libation.

"And what for the obsolete calumny, that London citizens have their chief joy when they cut and drink?" Such was a not unnatural remark as we drove homewards; for we had heard and read, in old novels and old plays, that city relaxation inferred nothing less nor more! The charge may have had foundation, as well as currency, once: it is gone with many even grosser things of a grosser age—coeval with that which made intoxication a sort of duty from guest to host, when people assembled for enjoyment—not only in the city, but in the palace, in the mansion, and in the cottage. For ourselves, we bear witness that in no society in Europe could affairs have been conducted with greater propriety, with less coarseness, or with courtesy more nearly approaching the chivalric, than they were on board the barge in which the Lord Mayor of London progressed from Westminster to Twickenham!

A. M. HALL.

THE FEMALE INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS OF CORK.

WITHIN a few years, Ireland has undergone a continuance of suffering almost unparalleled in the annals of the world: her utter destitution may, indeed, be traced to a variety of causes, which barely to touch on would occupy a space much greater than our limits permit. Famine and pestilence wasted the land, leaving everywhere the impress of devastation and ruin: vast tracts of country remained untilld, "a weary waste, expanding to the skies;" and such scenes took place, through the length and breadth of the land, as were, perhaps, never before witnessed in any civilised part of the globe—scenes which baffle all powers of description. But a merciful Providence has so ordained, that good often arises out of evil; and, while mourning the misery of those disastrous times, it is consolatory to turn to the recollection of the sympathy and benevolence which did all that was possible to mitigate the evil that was beyond cure. Perhaps, among the best efforts were those to promote and encourage industry—efforts which are evidently increasing, and from which we may anticipate a success that is destined yet to raise unhappy, poverty-stricken Ireland, to the elevated position for which her capabilities and resources undoubtedly fit her.

No part of Ireland suffered more from famine and sickness than Cork; the most appalling spectacles were seen, not only in remote districts and by the unfrequented roadside, but in the very heart of the city; the sick and the dying might have been beheld lying on a truss of straw, in the public thoroughfares, while the mother tottered along the streets, nearly fainting beneath the light weight of the wasted child, who was dead, or dying, in her arms. A wild shout was often heard to issue from the abode of the poor, where Death was busy with its inmates. In this dreadful emergency, it occurred to some benevolent ladies, that, by the employment of young females, some families might be assisted. Struck by the advantages which needlework might afford, they opened an embroidery school, in June, 1846—a year never to be forgotten in Ireland. Into this school young females of the city, of every religious denomination, were admitted; a proper recommendation being all that was required. One great object in forming it was to give employment to young females, after leaving educational schools, and thus to prepare them, by habits of industry, for stations where they could earn their bread. A committee of ladies was formed, by which the school was to be conducted for four months. After it opened, the hundred and twenty girls who had been admitted, were every day supplied with a breakfast of bread and milk—a seasonable relief, at a time when multitudes were perishing from hunger. The means for affording this were furnished by a grant of £100 from the relief committee, who also placed another £100 at the disposal of the committee of the embroidery school, for other purposes. The annual expenses of the establishment are defrayed from the profits arising from the sale of the work, as it receives no aid from any public fund, and its list of subscribers is very limited; this is much to be regretted, as the committee would gladly extend its benefits, which would “tell” in the improvement of the morals and habits of the poorer classes. One hundred and twenty-seven girls are now employed in the school; they receive no payment till there is some return for their work, which is seldom sufficiently well done to be productive for about six months after entrance. When perfectly instructed, they are allowed to take the work home; and they come once a week for payment, which is proportioned to the quality of the work, varying from 4d. to 5s.

The great relief afforded by the employment of young females has, indeed, proved a signal blessing, and kept many a family from the poor-house. During the famine, and the fatal disease emphatically called the famine fever, and the cholera which raged in the year 1849, the earnings of these poor children saved many a life, and they are still the chief dependence of their families. A hundred families, it is stated, are thus relieved. A certain proportion of the earnings is kept in hand, for a little store, in case of some pressing occasion, and for the purchase of such articles of clothing as they most need. So destitute are many of those poor children of that prime necessary, and so anxious for work, that rather than stay from the school, they would come wrapped in a cloak or shawl, which they borrowed, to hide their deficient and miserable garments. “Why do you wear that great warm cloak?” was said, as she untied it, to a little girl who was muffled up in a cloak, one hot day in August. As it fell from her, her scanty clothing, at once explained its use. The sum in hand has sometimes been drawn to pay for a passage to America—that land of promise to the poor Irish! One of the girls, who had formed an attachment to a young man who was on the eve of sailing for America, applied for her savings, which amounted to £20. This enabled her to marry, to pay for her passage out with her husband, to procure clothes, and to take £8 out with her. “Please, ma’am,” said she to Mrs. S., who proposed transmitting it to Boston, “I should rather have it about me, and in gold, so that I could always feel it.” It was accordingly sewed in her stays, and her promise was taken that it should not be ripped out till she arrived at her destination. She is now doing well in the States, where her skill in embroidery has turned to good account. Many of the girls who have married have availed themselves of the embroidery school when in distress, and returned to seek employment, for the support of themselves and their husbands. A thousand pleasing anecdotes of the anxiety of the poor children for work can be recounted by those who watch over the school.

It is truly gratifying, on entering the school-room, to see a light, airy apartment, affording for some hours in the day a healthy atmosphere, and in the winter months a genial heat from a comfortable fire, to those whose homes are dark, and cold, and comfortless. It is truly pleasant to see the young creatures busy with their needles, and to look at the beautiful specimens of work, wrought by the hands which would, but for this employment, have been utterly idle. The most delicate and elaborate patterns, finished with a skill which might compete with that of any country, are there produced. The interest which the children take in the work is expressed in the earnestness of their countenances; but there is one who sits in the window, by the teacher, who seems still more deeply absorbed in what she is about than the rest. The poor child has been a cripple from infancy: her mother carries her in every day on her back, from beyond Blarney, a distance of more than four miles. To the poor cripple, the occupation of the school has been everything; before she was admitted, she was a burthen to herself and others; her days passed on in gloomy monotony, without the power of being useful to others, and incapacitated from joining in the sports of other children. Now, she is no longer a burthen, but a help; and work to her is not merely the means of independence, but a source of enjoyment. Nothing, indeed, can be more gratifying than the interest which the young people take in the work. It was affectingly exemplified in the case of a girl, who had been one of the best workers in the school. She fell into a decline, and was soon too ill to attend. She sent to ask for work: the ladies, willing to indulge what they considered the mere fancy of a sick person, sent her what could be most easily done, that she might not fatigue herself. She was hurt at not having been sent that which was most difficult. Her wish was gratified; and the work in which she excelled beguiled some of the tedious hours of illness. She died soon after. Cases of great distress have been unintentionally disclosed by the children themselves. Many of them are the daughters of tradesmen, thrown out of employment by the reduced circumstances of their former customers, and without the means of furnishing themselves with the materials necessary for pursuing their business. One of the little girls asked for a small sum from her savings to get shoes. "Shoes, my dear!" said the lady, "that will never purchase a pair of shoes." "Ma'am," replied the child, "my father will make them for me—for he was a shoemaker—if I get the leather; for he can't." "I am afraid that poor child works too hard," said Mrs. S., as she observed a little girl who looked as if she was almost dying, as she plied her needle with indefatigable zeal, "she looks wretchedly." "Her father was buried this morning," replied the teacher; "he was a poor tradesman—there was great want—this child is fretting—her brother is out of employment—there was sickness at home—she only is in the way of earning anything—so, as long as she is able to hold the needle, she will work for them." The cares of life had fallen early on this child; she was but eleven years old. These are but a few of the affecting anecdotes connected with this establishment, many more could be given, did space permit; but the sad and solemn circumstances under which it was founded give it a peculiar and almost sacred interest, which can scarcely fail to excite sympathy. A debt of gratitude is indeed, due by the inhabitants of Cork, to those through whose exertions it is owing that at least a hundred families are relieved by the industry of their children; that a hundred and twenty children, who never earned a penny before in their lives, are now able to help those who are nearest and dearest to them. By their attendance in the school they were saved from the ravages of the cholera, which carried off numbers of their families, while not one among the children took the fatal complaint—a fact worthy of medical observance, which can best determine whether this exemption may be attributed to the cleanliness enjoined by the rules of the school, the pure air enjoyed for part of the day, or the attention of the mind to the work in hand. In advertent to the beneficial results from the establishment of the school of embroidery, it would be a strange omission if the name of Mrs. Sainthill were not mentioned. Bound by none of the associations or claims of a common birth-place with those whose cause she espoused, this English lady devoted all the energies of an active mind, gave her precious time and thoughts, and made considerable advances from her purse, to promote the desirable object. Her labours in the cause of industry have been unremitting; she has attended to the progress of the work with the most patient perseverance, watched over the interests of the children with a care almost parental, the charms of her own private correspondence have been relinquished for the multiplicity of communications into which she has entered with those in France, and various parts of England, who can serve the cause of humanity by forwarding the sale of the work, and by furnishing new designs and patterns. Did we not feel it a duty, we should scarcely venture to pay this tribute, where an ample recompense is felt in the perfection to which the beautiful branch of needlework has been brought, and in the constant exercise of Christian motives and benevolent feelings. The secretaryship to the school is shared with Mrs. Sainthill, by a lady whose care for the welfare of the children, unremitting attention to their progress, and active humanity, prove her to be a meet associate in the good work. The name of Mrs. M'Swincy is worthy of all honour.

The good effects of the Industrial Female Schools cannot be too highly estimated; they tell in the more ready observance of order and cleanliness—those docencies of life so apt to be neglected in the extreme of poverty; hence the young female, as the dispenser of relief, takes an elevated position in the home where she had been hitherto a burden, or at best a drudge; the spirit of independence inspires the self-respect, which is one of the surest safeguards against the temptations and the evil examples by which the young and the unwary are beset; the kindly affections are fostered as hands are busy for those who are loved. Cheerfulness waits on industry, and the thoughts of the young can take happy wings, when not weighed down by premature cares, and, as the poor girl plies her needle, fancy brings the moment when she returns home with her week's earnings.

While deeply impressed with the paramount importance of educational schools, of which there are a number admirably regulated and attended in Cork, we see in the Industrial Schools a great want supplied—the occupation of the time that necessarily elapses after the girls leave the educational schools, before anything eligible offers. This is a blessing which cannot be too highly estimated; the importance of occupation is known to all, even those on whom fortune has smiled feel its necessity so much, that, though totally independent of self-exertion, they make out employment for themselves; if, then, those surrounded by the refinements of life, find that the mind would languish if totally left without occupation, how doubly necessary must it be for those who have no such resources. As industry has been designated the handmaid of virtue, idleness may be called the handmaid of vice; what numbers have been led by it to frequent the ale-house and the gaming-table—how many malefactors have ascribed their evil courses and unhappy cases, with their latest breath, to idleness.

We have great pleasure in stating that an industrial school, in connexion with the Established Church, opened on the 1st of January, 1851, when three girls from each of the seven parishes were admitted; the committee soon after enlarged their plan, to any number recommended by the parochial clergy, on the payment of £1 for each girl, the object being to afford employment to young females of good character, between leaving the parochial school and entering into service or business, “a period in which,” as justly remarked in the annual report, “they are especially exposed to temptation,” and one, it might be added, in which evil example has its greatest influence.

The receipts for work during the last year amounted to nearly £100, and already do the families of the girls find the benefit of their children's industry—it is a great help to all—and to some it is all to which they have to look. Out of the sixty girls who have been admitted, eight have obtained services in respectable families, seven have gone to business, two have emigrated, and six have left the school from various causes. Thirty-seven now remain in the school; the habits of industry and order which its rules induce are of the greatest importance, particularly to those intended for service or business. They are strictly enforced, and make a valuable part of education. The school opens at ten, and any girl who is not punctual to the moment is sent away without work—such a lesson in punctuality is not likely to be forgotten. In the school-room, when the girls are busily at work, a look suffices to tell who have been longest in attendance; the gradations are sufficiently marked to be at once observed—those who were first admitted being more cleanly and better clad—the latest comers are invariably the most squalid and neglected in appearance. A portion of Scripture is read each day in the school-room, and the children are instructed, one day in the week, by one of the city clergy; the progress of the children, and the interests of the school, are carefully attended to by the governesses and visiting ladies of the institution, “many of whom,” we find from the report, “have, with untiring energy, devoted their time to the instruction of the girls.”

Early in the spring of 1851, the Sisters of Mercy opened an industrial school on the South Terrace, Cork, which gives instruction to a hundred and forty girls, in plain and a variety of fancy works; their progress in knitting, netting, crochet, and various branches of needlework, under the teaching of these benevolent ladies, may be appreciated, when it is mentioned that already these children are not only able to contribute to the support of their families, but that in some cases that duty devolves entirely on them. Two children, of about seven and eight, attend the school regularly, and take home work to their sister, who is too sick to accompany them; these three girls support their family on their earnings, which amount to 7s. a week. The anxiety to obtain work is so great, that poor sick children, unable to go out, send to entreat that some may be sent to them; there are many cases of girls who have left the workhouse to seek for employment for their support in this school—should they fail in obtaining it, they must go back to the workhouse. The work is done according to orders, with which the materials are sent; the demand for nets for the hair is so great that a vast deal of that work is going on. Cotton is the material with which they begin, as silk would be too costly, till they can finish the work nicely. Very large orders have just been received from the great establishments of Fitzgibbon and of Arnott, for nets intended for England—the orders are so large that the help of three other schools is necessary—so that two hundred dozen may be completed in the week, and in every week, while the demand lasts. The shops requiring these nets supply the silk; to guard against defalcation or waste, the nuns weigh the silk before the net is begun, and the net after it is finished—the slightest deficiency is thus detected and deducted from the girl's pay—this has induced greater carefulness. The school is supported by the work; the outlay for instruction by the week is about £1, the weekly payments to the workers average—for knitting about 1s. 6d.; for fine crochet, 2s. 6d.; for crochet nets, 5s.; for netted hats, 7s.; the embroidery of gentlemen's vests has been just introduced, which it is hoped may be productive. The interesting cases of relief which this school affords, must be a delightful recompence to the charitable founders of the institution for their unceasing attention to its welfare.

About six months since, the Sisters of Mercy opened another large school on the same plan, in the North Parish, where a hundred and fifty are making rapid progress in various branches of needle-work, which they are already turning to profit. The school being as yet in an infant state, its merits cannot be fairly discussed; but, recent as its establishment has been, it is a great help to the poor. Cases of deep interest have occurred. Among them, it is but justice to the benevolent founders of the establishment to mention, that there are at present in the school eight orphans who support themselves entirely by work; all of these poor girls were found in great distress, some of them in the most utter destitution, with scarcely any covering—no home, no friends, no relatives to look after them. Thus were they found by those humane ladies, who not only put them in the way of earning their bread, but have put up beds for them, and given them a home in the school. Some of these young creatures, just growing up, were thus timely snatched from the dangers incident to their unprotected and miserable situation.

Very fine specimens of crochet-work have been finished in the school in connexion with the Ursuline Convent, at the Black Rock, near Cork, where sixty of the girls belonging to that large school have been instructed; and they earn from 4s. to a pound in the week. The comfort which this must be to their families may be conceived.

The establishment of crochet-work, now brought to great perfection, in the neighbourhood of Dundanion Castle, the residence of Sir Thomas Deane, originated with his lady, the late lamented Lady Deane. Ever watchful over the interests of the poor, their applications in the year 1846 excited her deep commiseration, and her thoughts were constantly haunted by the desire of affording relief in some manner likely to prove a permanent benefit. It had always appeared to her that assistance should flow, when possible, through the channel of industry. Providence suggested to her the means of being eminently useful; it occurred to her that if employment could be found for the young girls in the neighbourhood, they might be able to contribute to the support of their destitute families. Crochet-work, she thought, would not be very difficult; she knew that the demand for it was increasing, and that even the earliest executed would bring in some remuneration. She instantly set about learning the stitch and designing patterns for the work, and in less than a fortnight she had her workers employed. The relief afforded by the introduction of this work has exceeded all expectation, and has kept many families from the poor-house. A hundred and fifty girls are employed, and, though not brought within the strict rules of a school-room, they are amenable to regulations which must tell on their habits: they must bring in their work on a certain day, care having been taken to keep it as free from soil as possible; they then receive payment, and are supplied with thread for more work. It is expected that they appear clean on these occasions, and as decently clad as their circumstances will admit. From the beginning of 1847 to the present time, the work has sold for nearly five thousand pounds! The cost of the materials is about ten per cent., that of postage three, and stationery two per cent. The earnings of the workers average from four to twelve shillings in the week, they sometimes reach fifteen shillings, a portion of this is laid by in the saving-bank. We have seen specimens of the work, in berthes, flouncs, sleeves, collars, caps, edgings, and insertions, which are extremely beautiful. Some of the flouncs have sold for as much as two guineas a yard. Largo sales of the various articles take place—nine-tenths of which are effected in England; America purchases largely, and there is a demand for the edgings in Germany, which is very advantageous, as that is the article in which the young beginners are employed. Children not more than six years old contribute by this work to the support of their families, and thus early are taught to feel the inestimable value of industry. There are many interesting cases among these poor young workers, which could not fail to excite sympathy. There is a bed-ridden child who actually earns five shillings a week in her bed; and we have been informed by Sir Thomas Deane, that "there is a paralytic child, who grasps the needle in one hand while she works with the other." From the great success of the undertaking, it would be impossible not to be deeply impressed by the fact, that all this good has been accomplished by the unaided exertions of a single individual. She received no assistance from any fund—she sought for no subscriptions or donations; the outlay at its commencement was all from the private resources of this excellent lady. She often supplied the workers with light and firing through the long winter evenings. By the peasantry, who are ever deeply touched by kindness, she was loved and venerated. Gratitude is one of the virtues of the poor: its cultivation rests upon those whom fortune has placed above them. A thousand marks of grateful attachment cheered her through her good work. On occasions of her return from absences from home, the poor people would gather round her gate, where they had hung their garlands, and cheer her, as she passed along, with a loud, joyous welcome, which came from their very hearts and reached hers. About twelve months ago, when her return from a short absence was expected, the melancholy news of her death was received. Her funeral arrived: her last resting-place was among the people she had loved and served to the latest moment of her life. At the close of the affecting rite, the poor girls, who had been her especial care, could no longer restrain their burst of agony—indeed, the tears of all, old and young, fell fast. It will be a satisfaction to our readers to learn that the youthful daughters of their truly Christian mother, as yet scarcely past their childhood, devote themselves to the establishment which she founded; they carry on the extensive correspondence necessary for the promotion of its interests; they keep all the accounts, make the payments, and all the work passes through their hands. The labour is sanctified to them by knowing that they thus fulfil the wishes of their departed mother, and that, through their instrumentality, many a heart is lightened.

The demand for the work done in this establishment and in the Industrial Schools is so great, that it cannot be supplied fast enough. Every day large consignments are sent to England, and are extending to France, Germany, and America. We trust that such success may stimulate to new exertions, and that similar schools may be established in various directions. It is evident that a great industrial movement has commenced in Ireland: happy are they who urge it on!

The idleness of the peasantry of Ireland, whatever habits it may have engendered, is not a willing idleness; there is sufficient evidence of an eagerness for work. The teachers at the schools, of which we have taken this brief notice, can tell how the poor children flock to entreat for work: they, indeed, best can tell, who have the pain of sending away many, for the lack of means of employing more. Those who conduct public works can tell what crowds of labourers press for the labour which cannot afford employment to the hundredth part of those who apply for it; they, indeed, best can tell the eagerness for work, on whom the painful task devolves of disappointing expectation. But there are still more affecting proofs of that eagerness for work in the deserted home—so passionately loved, though poor and scant; in the sad farewells of kindred and of friends, never again to meet on this side of the grave; in the crowded ships which bear their tens of thousands of poor emigrants across the Atlantic, that, in another land, they "May beg a brother of the earth

To give them leave to toil."

BOOKS AND THEIR AUTHORS.

The Rev. ROBERT WALSH, LL.D., rector of Finglas, near Dublin, died there on the 30th of June, full of years and honours. To many of our younger readers, his name, as connected with literature, will be an unfamiliar sound; while numbers of our own standing in the world will recal the time when his History of Brazil, and Residence in Constantinople, afforded those glimpses of foreign lands, which, even twenty or five and twenty years ago, were "few and far between." Doctor Robert Walsh's literary career commenced in the year 1818, with that of his brother, Doctor Edward Walsh, who was physician to the forces, at the time of the useless Walcheren expedition. The brothers, as eminent for their ability as for their spirit of investigation, completed the History of Dublin, which Mr. Whitelaw's death left in an unfinished and confused state, and presented the proceeds of their labours to the widow of the originator. There is a melancholy pleasure in writing of friends "called home," when the grave closes over them in the fullness of time, and—

"The tears that we shed,
Though in secret they roll,
Shall long keep their memory
Green in our soul."

The memory of these brothers is, indeed, pleasant. Our families had been friends before our birth; and in childhood we looked up to them with a reverence which, though time and knowledge softened it into affection, was never impaired. They knew so much of everything. Doctor Edward had been on Lake Ontario with the poet Moore, when he wrote the Canadian Boat Song; and delighted our childhood, not only with anecdotes of the poet, but with tales of bears, and Canadian adventures, which made us long for the moosin and hunting spear. And Doctor Robert united so much love for his country to such a knowledge of its resources, and an acquaintance with every historical point and stone in the good city of Dublin, that he was a history of the past and present in himself. He also had known Moore in his youth, and Moore's friends, the Emmetts; and the unfortunate Lord Robert Fitzgerald. His mind, beside, had store of classic knowledge; and, when to all these advantages were added the riches of foreign travel, a charming suavity of manner, a desire to impart knowledge, a strong affection for young people, a warm sympathy in their pursuits, combined with a watchfulness over their eternal interests, so that a flower, a leaf, an anecdote, was certain to bear a holy fruit—it is no wonder that he was welcomed in every house as a valued guest, and cherished as a dear friend. His contributions to the Dublin University Magazine, and various periodicals of his day, were numerous as valuable; and he was as pleasant and graphic on paper as in society. In November, 1820, he left England for Constantinople, with Lord Strangford, on his first visit there. He was there during the Greek Revolution. He returned in 1823, and published the first edition of his overland journey. In 1825, he went to St. Petersburg with Lord Strangford; he was there during the attempt at revolution in December, 1825, which followed the death of the Emperor Alexander. In August, 1828, he left England again with Lord Strangford, for Brazil, from whence he returned in the summer of 1829, and soon after published his Notions of Brazil. In 1830 he again visited Constantinople, with Sir Robert Gordon, the then ambassador. He returned in the autumn of 1832, and soon afterwards published his Residence at Constantinople. In 1838, he was appointed to the vicarage of Finglas. In early life he had been curate of the same parish. It was, indeed, the second curacy he held in the Church, his first having been to the celebrated Dean Kirwen. While curate of Finglas, he had two compliments, in the shape of pieces of plate, presented to him, one from his parishioners for his zealous exertions among the poor, during that terrible epidemic the typhus fever, and the other from the members of the Irish Harp Society, to which he was secretary. The qualities we have so feebly eulogized gained "the Doctor" "troops of friends." As years advanced, his desire to reside in his native country returned, and he was welcomed back to Ireland with the "welcome" which, of all people in the world, the Irish know best how to give. His career, as we have said, began by his being appointed to the curacy of Finglas; and there, as its rector, his career terminated.

THE POET MOORE.—A lady who had the good fortune to be present at a party in Dublin, the evening of the day when the first volume of Moore's Melodies was given to the world, was recalling the circumstance in so graphic a manner that we think her story may interest others as much as it did us. At that time, our now aged friend must have been of remarkable beauty—an enthusiastic girl, brought up in deep seclusion; married in her seventeenth year to an officer, with whom she was about to leave her native land. Of Little's poems, the avant-courier of Moore's fame, she had never heard; and, though the "melodies" of her country were familiar to her ear and lip, she did not think that they were known except by those who had learned them from the peasantry. "The pretty bride" was so new to the world, that her husband almost tutored her, as our grandame tutored us—"Now, my dear, hold up your head, hold your tongue, and remember your curtsy." He begged of her, whatever occurred, "to ask no questions." It was that great event in a country lady's life, "her first town party," and she was of course perpetually charmed, confused, and blushing. Presently she heard various whispers in the room—"Is he come?" "Will he come?" "Is he certain to come?" Vague ideas of the Lord-Lieutenant, that cynosure of Irish eyes—of the commander of the garrison—floated before her: then the lady of the house asked her daughter if the book was placed open on the piano, "where he could see it at once?" And a dozen sweet faces pressed forward to inquire if "he" was "certain sure to come?" and the reply called forth all the little bewitching "Oh dears!" and "Oh mys!" and "Oh thens!" which render the "brogue" the true accent of Cupid. The obedient wife—a very Griselda—would ask no questions; but she tried to reach the piano, and ascertain what "the book" was. However, one page of music is too like another to have yielded much information. As the evening melted away, the anxiety of the hostess and her friends increased to fever heat. At last, a double knock, and the hero of that and many other evenings entered. "I saw," continued our friend, "a very, very little man, without star or ribbon—not the lord-lieutenant! I was so disappointed; I even thought him ugly. I looked at all the radiant officers and wondered who the little man was. Then came fine speeches from the hostess; and there gathered round him all the old and young. I was provoked; all this fuss for a little tiny man in black, who was neither the lord-lieutenant nor an officer. I sat down sulkily at the end of the grand piano, and resolved not even to look at him. Presently, the hostess manoeuvred him to the piano, and then, showing him the first number of his own melodies, asked him to sing. He said something—I did not hear exactly what—about not being prepared, but sat down, and with his small, delicate hands precluded a moment, and then sang 'RICH AND RARE.' Before he had got to the

"—— bright gold ring."

I was spell-bound. The head slightly upturned; the white, full, high brow, over which his silken hair lay in rich folds; the brightest, tenderest, most loving eyes were eloquent of expression; the smiling mouth gave forth the most bird-like, gushing music; every word was heard, and not only heard, but felt; and every eye fixed upon the 'poet of all circles.' When he finished, the burst of enthusiasm was electric; and his thanking smile, as he glanced round, emboldened his audience to exclaim, as with one voice, 'Another! another!' He sat down; and the brilliancy of his expression faded; the sparkling light of love in his eyes deepened into the intense fire of patriotism; his form dilated; and he gave the line—

"Go where glory waits thee!"

as if it was a command from heaven. I had been but a short time married; my husband expected every day to be ordered off to the war; my hopes for him were so mingled with terrors, that I felt a shudder when I heard the words of the song. They were succeeded by others,

"But when fame elates thee, Oh, then remember me!"

in tones so plaintive, so tender, so overwhelming, that, ashamed of my emotion, I covered my face with my hands, and pressed it on the piano. I tried to endure it; but every line, winged by such bewildering melody, entered into my heart. I had said words with the same meaning to my husband twenty times. And as the poet finished, I was completely overpowered; the burst of tears would come, and my husband carried his foolish, child-wife out of the room. I afterwards heard that the poet had said 'those tears were the most eloquent thanks he could ever receive.'

Mr. DE LA PRYME, of Brighton, has been engaged for some time in getting out a little volume of poems, by a youth, the son of a constable in the Sussex constabulary. The name of the young poet is RICHARD ROLFE. We have, in a long literary life, seen so much misery arise from the sanguine hopes of well-intentioned friends, who, in their desire to serve, overrate the talent they believe in, and which, in nine cases out of ten, is more a love for, and an admiration of, poetry, than poetic power—that when a "young poet" is introduced to the world, forced into print before his time, or without due consideration of "what hereafter will this give him!" we tremble, lost instead of a hero, we perceive a victim. Mr. De la Pryme is so zealously anxious for the success of his protégé, that he draws, we think, an unfortunate parallel between him and the greatest of our youths of genius—Chatterton, saying, that "Chatterton's genius was a failure, because it never had fair play." He forgets, however, the absence of principle in "the marvellous boy." Poetry, to be triumphant, must be of the very highest class; versification is only the chariot by which to draw it forward. We have looked carefully through the pages of this pretty volume for—

"Words that breathe,
And thoughts that burn."

But, if we have looked in vain for even the indications of what Mr. De la Pryme believes we shall find, we have found what we prize more highly; we find feelings of pure and unaffected piety; we find graceful communings with nature; we find a desire for earnest and hopeful work, as in the application of the old adage—

"Strike while the iron is hot."

And in a little poem, called I'll Try, the first verse should be sung in every infant school in the kingdom, for its home-comingness and cheerful strength:—

"I'LL TRY—I'll try," said a little boy,
As he sat on his bench at school;
'I'll try my best to remember my task,
That I wear not the cap of the fool.'
So his lesson he learn'd, and a prize he earn'd,
And brightly beam'd his eye.
As loudly he cried, in his childish pride,
'I can do whatever I try.'"

We perceive no indication of languid circulation, no feverish pulse, no morbid sensibility; the feelings are fresh and free; the thoughts, those of a brave, working spirit, that wishes to be up and doing, not down and dreaming; and to such we would give help—but how! Publishing a book by subscription seems to us only a sort of beggary; but there are, we know, two opinions on the subject; and we are most willing to give Richard Rolfe the benefit of the doubt. The poems are published; the life of the youth, written in the spirit of truth and kindness, up to his eighteenth year, by Mr. De la Pryme, is before the public. If the subscribers and the interest excited be sufficient, enough may be realized, perhaps, to procure him some advantages, such as he needs; 'laying, if well managed, the foundation of the future career, not of a great poet, but of a useful, it might be a great, man; and surely this is worth and worthy of the assistance of the great and good. Of course, as his mind strengthens and improves, his muse will strengthen also; but to look to even second-rate poetry now-a-days as the sustenance of "an able-bodied man," is sheer insanity. Our young friend must not expect that the muses, however sweetly wooed, will be moved to support their lovers. We would entreat the friends of Richard Rolfe to strengthen the desire poured forth in his verses for the real. From the account given of his parents, and his early habits of industry and simple study, he has nothing to unlearn; and, surely, now that his position and his feelings have been made known, there are plenty of free-hearted men and women who would say—"I will help this boy, and place him in the path to independence."

Scottish Criminal Trials. Two highly interesting and very instructive volumes have been published by CHAPMAN and HALL, consisting of the most remarkable trials that have taken place in Scotland—commencing with the “crimes” of the renowned Clan Gregor, and closing with the trials incident to “rebellions” of Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, and Episcopalians. The work is full of matter, exhibiting much pains-taking research, and being of considerable value to the future historian. The anecdotes related, and the customs illustrated, have far more the character of romance than of actual facts. It is impossible to read these records of the past, without being thankful that it is our lot to live in a more enlightened age; that although superstitions are rife enough in the middle of the nineteenth century, and freedom sometimes hangs by a thread, which ignorance may in a moment break, we are very rarely at the mercy either of despotism on the one hand, or of lawlessness on the other—while the throne is, in deed and in truth, the protector of the people. These “Scottish Criminal Trials” are singular evidences of the terrible prejudices and practices of our ancestors, whose wisdom was by no means so unquestionable as some reasoners would lead us to believe. We may regret that the collection of “Trials” was not more extensive, but as far as they go, they cannot fail to interest and inform.

The English Flower Garden is a monthly magazine of hardy and half-hardy plants, by Mr. W. THOMPSON; from the very complete manner in which the subject is treated, the beauty and correctness of the four coloured figures from nature, which adorn each number, and the lowness of price, it cannot fail to enlist a considerable number of subscribers. The object which the author of this magazine has in view, is to communicate, from month to month, all the really useful and curious information about such plants as may be cultivated in any garden, and general descriptions of all the more recent introductions to this country. The present number, for example, contains, well written descriptions of the linear-leaved sollya, from Australia; the gaunletted fucsia, a native of the tropical mountains, in many respects resembling the passion flower; the North American (Darwin's) barberry; and the toothed ceanothus, from California. In addition to this kind of matter, each number contains an essay upon some subject of importance to the gardener—that in the present month being on hybridizing. To all who love the cultivation of flowers, and who does not, seeing that “God made the flowers to beautify

The earth, and cheer man's careful mood,” we strongly recommend the English Flower Garden, as peculiarly suited to their wants.

The Blythdale Romance.—Another of the very remarkable works of NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE has just been published in London, by Messrs. CHAPMAN and HALL, under the act—or rather the interpretation of the act—which secures to American publishers a copyright in England. There can be no doubt that the power thus accorded to the States must lead to a proper adjustment of international copyright, for it is utterly impossible that so great a nation as the United States can consent to take that for which they give nothing. Mr. Hawthorne, or to write more correctly, Mr. Hawthorne's publishers, in New York, have been among the earliest to profit by the discovery, and few authors can be introduced in this country with more advantage to readers of works of fiction. The Blythdale Romance may not be so extensively popular as either The Scarlet Letter, or the House of the Seven Gables; it is more quiet, less searching, and by no means so powerful to excite interest; but it is a charming production, full of touching pathos. We may not, however, dismiss this admirable writer with merely a few passages of comment: his works must, at no distant period, be treated largely, and with the respect and consideration to which they are eminently entitled. For the present we content ourselves with observing that this book—which the author calls a romance, because it is obviously less a romance than any of his previous works—will amply sustain his reputation.

Memoirs of the Right Hon. Henry, Lord Langdale by THOMAS DUFFUS HARDY. We have here the memoirs of a laborious, upright, and prosperous lawyer, rendered interesting, and made valuable, not by startling incidents or exciting details, but by a simple record of facts, illustrating the life of a great and good public servant, who, as Lord High Chancellor of England, faithfully discharged his duty to the crown and to the people. The career of such a man affords but slender materials for his biographer: with them, however, Mr. Hardy has wisely and skillfully dealt, doing full justice to his theme, but abstaining from all actual or seeming exaggeration, and writing in a remarkably easy and pleasant style. The book should be read largely; it is fertile of lessons—to the young especially, who are upon the march onwards; for Lord Langdale, although born a gentleman, had to achieve fortune; and his prosperity, while it will stimulate to labour, cannot fail to encourage that hope which is rarely disappointed in those who toil honourably for success.

EDGAR POE.—It is understood that Mr. HANNAY has now an edition of the Life of Edgar Poe in the press, with a prefatory essay on the genius of the author, in which some curious facts will be developed, and several interesting statements laid before the public. We shall look with some anxiety for such a work. The unhappy author has been far too harshly dealt with by his late biographer—his executor and his “friend!” Save us from such friends! Mr. Griswold may take credit to himself for honesty; but there are two ways of telling a truth—the one may give a sore, the other supply a plaister. Among the most hapless of the sons of genius, whose miseries are mainly of their own creating, Poe must always hold a conspicuous place; but we cannot believe that his principles were so entirely evil, and his conduct so exclusively gross, as his “friend and biographer” would make him out; and have little doubt that Mr. Hannay, instead of magnifying his faults, until they become will tell us of much that may create charity, if it do not induce love, towards the memory of one of the most gifted of modern writers.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS OF ITALY continue to issue their Tracts, and to disseminate their opinions with a perseverance which accords with M. MAZZINI's well-known zeal and determination. It is impossible not to feel a deep interest in the sufferings endured by the descendants of the people who once ruled the world; and the more dearly we prize our own long-cherished freedom, the more should we desire to see it perfected in other lands; we should not estimate freedom by a sliding scale of geography, loving it in England, but unwilling to risk a line or a penny to secure it to Hungary or Italy. We have no more intrinsic right to liberty than other men, and our charter won by many conquests would be exposed to a struggle of fearful danger, if despotism spread its nets over the continent.

THE AMERICANS seem to us to live upon books; the immense quantity of paper consumed by their publications is beyond all calculation; and edition after edition floats from the press; and we have hardly taken up a book from across the Atlantic during last month that has not "tenth" or "twelfth" edition on its title page. The Wide Wide World, by ELIZABETH WETHERELL, has just entered into its sixth grade of popularity, and comes from the "store" of Mr. PUTNAM, of Broadway, New York. How can we criticise a book that has gone through six editions?

Mr. BOWN, to whom all classes of readers are so deeply indebted, has published the second volume of The Bridgewater Treatises, which has the advantage of notes from the pen of THOMAS HARRIS JONES, Esq., F.R.S., professor of comparative anatomy of King's College. A more valuable present could not be made to the young than these charming volumes.

The second volume of that most interesting book, The Conquerors of the New World and their Bondsmen, has just been published by Mr. PICKERING, and is particularly interesting at this period, when all eyes and hearts are especially directed towards the New World, and when a narrative of the principal events which led to negro slavery in the West Indies and America, now leads to the consideration of what slavery is at the present time. We pray for the time when slavery will be one of the traditions of the past.

We noticed last month the publication of a most interesting life of Handel, by Mr. TOWNSEND, of Dublin, and we have since witnessed much sensitiveness in some of our contemporaries, who are very indignant at the charge of their country having ever rejected the "Messiah." It reminds us somewhat of the man in Pope's witty satire, who with huge indignation rejected the charge of having been tossed in a blanket, inasmuch as "verily it was not in a blanket—but in a rug." So with the fashionable world of London a hundred years ago, they did not reject the "Messiah," but they did reject "Saul," and "Israel in Egypt!"

Periodical Savings applied to Provident Purposes, is the title given to a small and unpretending book by its author, Mr. ALEXANDER ROBERTSON, whose name is, we believe, well known in connexion with insurance offices. The book is full of practical knowledge and good counsel; it should be read and studied by all persons who consider "periodical savings" as solemn duties. It points out on the one hand, the dangers to be avoided, and on the other, the channels most available for those who aim to make a "little more." It is matter of no slight moment, when a man of experience undertakes to deal with such a subject, for it is notorious that numerous robberies are perpetrated daily under the pretence of "benefits;" and to put the unwary upon their guard is a duty of mercy as well as wisdom. We cordially agree in the sentiments expressed by the following—a passage from the preface—and are doing service in giving it publicity:—"The great increase in the industrious or producing classes of society, since the beginning of this century, has been accompanied by at least a corresponding accession of wealth and independence of feeling, spread over and infusing large masses of the population. Hence has arisen the necessity for enlarging the boundaries of education so as to satisfy the natural cravings for information, by that kind of knowledge that will elevate the moral character; and the almost equally important demand for some salutary contrivance whereby prudence, forethought, and economy may be fostered, and pecuniary savings, as they occur, be applied most effectually in warding off the evils of penury, and the debasing effects of pauperism. It is by such means that a manly independence and love of social order, and the proper feelings and duties of kindred will be best cultivated."

A very valuable voltaic battery has lately been creating some sensation; it is the invention of Mr. MARTY ROBERTS. The tin which is employed as one of the plates of this battery is converted into oxide of tin, for which there is a large demand amongst dyers; and nitrate of ammonia is also largely formed, and this salt is also of commercial value,—thus the electricity is generated at scarcely any cost. This is a most important advance towards still further applying electricity as an agent of utility; we may fairly reason, now, on the probability of employing electricity as a motive power, and as the means of illumination.

Mr. FRICSON, the American engineer, has been exceedingly successful in applying heated air, instead of steam, as an agent for moving machinery. A very large vessel, called after this ingenious mechanician, is now building, to be propelled by heated air instead of steam; she is intended for the Atlantic voyage.

JAHN, the well-known Leipzig professor, is engaged in writing the life of Beethoven.

We learn from America, that the design of LAUNITZ, for a monument to PULASKI, at SAVANNAH, has been accepted. The same sculptor is occupied with the execution of a monument to the memory of RICHARD M. JOHNSON, ordered by the state of Kentucky. In the States they are marching onward in the right path.

ANNIE ORME.

HOW ANNIE ORME WAS SETTLED IN LIFE, AND WHAT WE DID TO HELP IT ON.
BY HER AUNT, MISS RACHIE SINCLAIR, MANTUA-MAKER, LASSWADE.

(Communicated by the Author of "Margaret Maitland," &c. &c.)

CHAPTER I.

WHERE we live is about six miles out of Edinburgh. In the summer time, the place is full of folk, seeking country air, and health, and change. Some come because they are delicate, some because other folk come; but, whatever the reason is, there are aye strangers at Lasswade, and a good house is a kind of heritage, by reason of the high rents that the visitors are content to give.

I have heard folk call it dull, and some say that they do not like the place, but I never heard a word from one meaning, even in a far-off way, that Lasswade was not bonnie. Behind us we have woods, before us we have the Esk, which, for its size, is as fine a river as you will see in any place. I would not undertake to say it was just like the Clyde, or the Thames, or the St. Lawrence, though I never saw them, and may-be they are not so grand as young Nicol Mouter says; but when the sun shines on our water, and the light comes down, green and cool, through the lime-trees, and you look along the hollow, and see the steep braes and the links of the water glimmering away into the sky, with a house here and there, sitting quiet on its side, the way the bairns sit in the warm days laving their feet, you would like the Esk, and come back in your thoughts to look at it again. No doubt it is finer to young folk when it wears in among the woods, and whiles you can just hear it, as if it were stepping cannily upon broken branches and over stepping-stones; but to me, that am older than I once was, it is pleasantest to see the houses climbing up the braes, and at night to look across the bridge at the lights shining in the dark water. I mind seeing them many a night, when my sister Alexina and me were coming home from the school in winter. My mother used to set the door open—we lived in a white house on the brae, as you go to Mavis-wood—and little Annie, that was the youngest of us, sat on the outer-step with our dog, Warlock, and cried our names in the darkening, long before we came in sight. I think sometimes I hear her yet, when the winter afternoon has worn past, and the lights begin to be lighted in the town. The air has just the same hum it used to have when she cried down through the dark, "Lexie! Rechie! come home!" And there is aye a bark now and then, to stand for the little short bark that Warlock threw in whenever Annie cried. Annie Orme, my dear! it is your mother I am thinking about—but you need not cry.

We were six of us in a family, and we were brought up with a fight, like most poor men's bairns. Robert, the oldest son, was a merchant in the town, and had a good shop of his own for a while, and looked like a prosperous person; but he failed, poor man, and went away to America, in the year 'eighteen, which was the year that Annie Orme was born. George was a clerk in an office in Edinburgh: he was a kindly lad as ever was, but never throve;—it might be his own blame—it might be other folks'—it is not my part to say. John died when he was young: he was the flower of them all, and we laid him in the churchyard, at Pennyquick. These were all my brothers.

My sister Lexie is the oldest of the family. She never was well-favoured, honest woman, any more than myself; but she had a head as different from mine as the Esk water is from the sea. There never was such a good judgment and sensible mind in our family as Lexie's, and so everybody said;—she thought so herself besides, which was her only fault.

My father was a tall, thin man; my mother, a fat body, round and merry. Lexie is like the one—she is as tall as the precentor—and I am like the other;—so that I see strangers give looks at us on the road to the church, and laugh to themselves, and ask who the little body is, trotting away after the lang lady? But I never heed; for when the folk say it is Miss Rechie Sinclair, they commonly put in a kindly word, which I like to hear.

But my sister Annie was like none of us—like none of us—poor sorrowful, heart-broken lassie. She married a young man that was not what he should have been; and as soon as she found it out, it went to her very soul, and she wasted away, and never looked up again. Yes, Annie Orme, my dear, your mother broke her heart; and a heart-break is a strange trouble. It took the light out of her eyes first, then the colour from the lips—and I never saw gentle or simple, except one high lady, that was at Mrs. Lyons', last July, have lips or eyes like Annie Sinclair—and then, without a word, the gold bowl broke, and she departed. The lad died himself soon after; but you need not be downcast, Annie Orme—for you're come of creditable folk on one side, if there's nothing to boast of on the other.

So, as I was saying, we were left—after my father died, and Robert went to America—with my mother, a frail old woman, and Annie's infant, an orphan, in a strange woman's arms, and George in Edinburgh, in anything but a thriving way. Lexie and me had learned the mantua-making, and set up in a house near the toll, on the Dalkeith-road, six months before my father's death; so here we were, with the infant and the aged woman dependent on us, and George, poor man, taking a heavy lean, and us nothing but our needles and our thread in this wide world.

I could tell many a story of that time. We were sore enough pressed whiles; and folk that call my sister Lexie a hard woman, and laugh at her for being prim and stiff, would may-be have their own thoughts, if they knew how Lexie was trusted, when she was only young, and (no to speak of the sense that never forsook her) little wiser in appearance than other folk; but, any way, we got through. What with hard work of us both, and Lexie's thought and care and judgment, we paid our rent, and kepted upsides with the world. My old mother got comfort and quiet the time she was here, and was laid in the grave with respect and honour when she went away; and we aye did what we could for George, poor man, besides bringing up Annie Orme, Annie Sinclair's infant, in a creditable way, and keeping her at the school to get grammar and counting and all the higher branches, besides making her a perfect woman at white-seam, and as good a mantua-maker as any in the land.

She never had a dress yet—from her christening gown, that I worked myself at odd hours, for a whole year, to that white one she is sitting there at the window making for her wedding—but we have earned with the labour of our hands. I am not to say proud of this—be it far from me—but I think its anything but right of Lexie to scorn the work we've lived by, as she does. No doubt we're come of folk that were far above letting their daughters work common work like this; but, still we need it, and we have done it, not without credit; and I think there is very little gratitude to the Giver in thinking shame of the means that He gave us to get our bread by. It does not aye please Him to send the young ravens—whiles it is an honest handicraft instead of the birds—but well I wot, for my own part, I would rather get the bread in my quiet way, than in Elijah's; and one is just as great a bounty out of the full hand of Providence as ever the other could be.

Mr. Braird, of Windlestrae, is our third cousin. He comes in to see us sometimes, and sends us a fowl or two, and some apples in the season. It is very kind, and I am always glad to see him; for I will not say that I think little of good connexions any more than my neighbours. But Lexie, she's very proud, and likes to hold her head higher than common folk, and she is certainly too much taken up with being a friend of the family at Windlestrae.

We have been so long in business now, that we are thought by far the highest mantua-makers in Lasswade, or near hand; and many a one comes to us that would go to Edinburgh, if we were not here. Annie Orme—for we have brought her up to the business, whatever she may need, poor thing—is as neat-handed as can be, and Lexie is so thrifty in the cutting, that we get as grand silks sometimes as the queen's mantua-maker could have; so that we have laid by something in the bank, and got some new furnishings, and are in a prosperous way.

My niece, Annie Orme, is one-and-twenty past. I will not say that she just looks like her mother. Annie Sinclair had a look that minded me always of one of the sorrowful songs; she had a sigh in her heart, even in her first youth, like a bode of what was to come. Now, I am glad to say there is nothing like that about Annie Orme. She has a fine, bright, wholesome colour—not too much of it—and as white and soft a skin as could be desired. Then her hair has a kind of natural twist, not like positive curls, but just a wave over her brow; and though she is as neat and hands as could be, she's not to call slender. But, to do her justice, Annie has so sensible and blythe and cheery a face, that everybody is pleased with it; and, though it may be true in a measure what Lexie says, that she is more given to fun and visible light-heartedness than staid folk like us may think desirable, I always mind that I was once young myself, and that the like of that is the most natural thing in the world. For Annie is not very much taken up with company; only, poor thing, having no sisters nor brothers, and nobody indeed but us, that have been spending all our thoughts on her all her life, she scarcely knew what trouble or vexation was, till a year past, and even that was but for a time.

It may be now eighteen months bygone since Lexie and me were sitting by the fire, in an autumn night, just before the candle was lighted. There was a silk gown—a very grand flowered one, white and blue—that we were making for Mrs. Colonel Cranstoun, at Mavis-wood, spread out upon the black sofa, opposite the fire, and clippings of it were upon the table. It was just as near dark as it could be, not to be positive black night, and I mind the glimmering of the light silk in the darkness, and me looking at it, till I could almost fancy there was a lady lying there, and that the folds sometimes moved and altered. The fire was not very bright, but just burning quietly; and Lexie was sitting with her back to the window, and her feet on a little stool, having her hands clasped in her lap, as is her most common attitude when she is not working, looking just before her, and not thinking of anything, as I supposed. I was thinking myself about the things that were in the house, and how I would just slip away down to Mr. Mouter's for some tea, seeing Annie Orme would doubtless forget to bring it in with her, when suddenly my heart leaped to my mouth, and I nearly fell off my chair in astonishment, for—"Rechie," said my sister Lexie to me in a moment, "it's my desire that Annie Orme should be married."

"Dear me, Lexie," said I, when I had recovered my breath, "what has the poor thing done?"

It was a minute or two before Lexie spoke, and then she did not just answer me.

"I am fifty year old, Rechie," said my sister, "and ye're seven-and-forty. Both of us have pingled at our seams for forty year good. No doubt it's been our appointed lot, and Providence knew best, and it's not our part to complain; but mantua-making is a wearisome life, Rechie, and undoubtedly it takes away the credit of a family when the women of it have to work for their bread. You need not contradict me: I ken very well—none better. Moreover, though our manner of life, being single gentlewomen, is the most honourable of any, yet the canaille jeer at us—aye, Rechie Sinclair, joer at me—and it's my wish that Annie Orme should have another like lot from ours."

"Weel, Lexie," said I, "no doubt you ken best; but I think our lot has just been as guid as other folk's. We've aye had enough ourselves, and we've brought up Annie Orme as well as she could have been in her father's house. I cannot see, Lexie, what we have to complain of."

Lexie nodded her head, and shut her lips firm.

"We've aye had enough! Rechie, Rechie, will nothing give ye a higher way of thinking? I tell ye it's no creditable to womenfolk to have to work for their bread, and Annie Orme must have a house of her ain—I have made up my mind."

Now, it certainly did come into my head, that Annie Orme would just be as happy living like us—aye, and may-be happier—as going away into a house of her own, to battle all her days with a strange man, and aye to be in trouble about the spending, though she had no share in making the siller. However, as it is not my habit to cross Lexie, I just let this be, and cast about in my own mind who was the most feasible person to make a good man to Annie Orme.

"There's Mr. Manson, at the distillery," said I to myself; "he is a big, red Highlander, no more like our Annie than he's like me, but I'll no say that he'll have less than a hundred a-year, and that would surely please Lexie. Then, there's Mr. Smith, the English excise-man; but he's a fat body—I would not have him if he had five hundred, let alone one. Then, there's Dr. Jamieson, the young doctor; but he's in little practice yet, and would be looking higher than our Annie. And, then—aye, there's young Mr. Mouter, at the grocery shop."

Now, young Mr. Mouter was a very decent young man, and a briek, well-looking lad besides, and one that took care of himself. Besides that, his shop was an old-established shop, left to him by his father, and doing a good business, seeing he supplied Mavis-wood and many of the gentlemen's houses round about, besides having the trade of the town.

"Lexie," said I, "it was just last Whitsunday that young Mr. Mouter shifted his seat in the kirk, out of the gallery, to the one he's in now, which is just close by ours, on the other side of the passage; and I have noticed his brother Nicol and him, that they have a great trick of looking to our side—which I am of opinion, Lexie, is neither for you nor me."

"Young Mr. Mouter!" said Lexie, in a sharp tone, "young Tammas Mouter, said Sandy Mouter's son. Rechie Sinclair, ye vulgar-minded person! do you think I would let our Annie serve behind a counter! No; if I should slave for her all my days."

"Well, I'm sure, Lexie," said I—and I was a little angered, for young Mr. Mouter was a fine lad, and I had a liking for him—"I do not ken what you would be at. He could keep her in a creditable way, and aye have plenty. I would not wonder, with thrift and good management, if they made a fortune."

"I never thought you were mercenary before, Rechie," said my sister, disdainfully. "Do you think I care for the dirty siller? Its a faah, no doubt, when folk have not enough, and often makes sair hearts; but to think I would give away my niece, Annie Orme, brought up under my ain eye, and fit for better things, on such a consideration as siller! No, Rechie, its nothing but your ignorance; so I may tell you who I have my eye on. Young Peter Braird comes and goes to Edinburgh every Saturday night and Monday morning. He is only Windlestrae's second son, it's true, but then the oldest is married already. Peter Braird, as you ken, is in a writer's office, learning the business, and is a very decent-like lad. He could not do better, as I think, than take up with Annie Orme."

"Preserve me, Lexie," said I; "Peter Braird?"

"Whatfor no?" said my sister.

I was so astonished, that I needed a rest before I could speak.

"Peter Braird! a lang, ill-grown lad, with a head that's so red you might see it on the tap of the Pentlands like a beacon. Peter Braird! that ye should even him to our bonnie Annie! And, Lexie, the lad, as you say, is only in a writer's office: he'll may-be never get to be a writer himself—nothing but a clerk, most likely, all his days—and if Annie would not be better sewing and working for herself than the like of that—"

Just at this moment a rap at the outer-door showed us that Annie was coming in; so I stopped in haste, and Lexie said quick, "Not a word to Annie;" and we were both sitting quiet in the dark when Annie Orme came in at the door.

CHAPTER II.

"Annie, my dear," said I, when I had stirred the fire, and got some light, "did you bring the tea?"

But, as I never expected she had brought it, I put over my hand, and lifted the lid of the big box, where we kept millinery; for it happened, that when I came home in the afternoon I had put my bonnet there.

"Yes, aunt," said Annie, "its here;" and she laughed a low mischievous kind of laugh, as if she had been doing some trick to somebody.

So I put down the lid of the millinery-box, and lighted the candle. Lexie was sitting stiff up in her chair, with her feet on the footstool, and a face of thought;—many a thought has gone through Lexie's head in her day, and it would be ill my part to set up for as good a judgment as hers. But in the matter of Peter Braird, when I looked at Annie, my heart rebelled; I could not but stand up against Lexie here, though I do not mind when I did it all my life before.

Annie was still laughing—not a loud laugh, but one that ran into all the corners of her face, and made dimples wherever it touched.

"You've been playing some trick, you monkey," said I; "but it was a wonder you minded the tea, after all."

"Phemie Mouter is to be a great friend of mine," said Annie; "she was at the door, and that minded me to go in. Phemie says we're to be very chief ever after this."

"And a very right thing, Annie," said I.

Annie laughed again. "Young Mr. Mouter had an errand up the Dalkeith-road; he came with me to the door—and Nicol wanted to come too, to take care of his brother. There, Aunt Rechie, that's the tea."

And Annie threw the parcel on the table, and ran away laughing. It might be she was pleased; but the mischief was so strong in her, and she herself was so innocent, that what might may-be make a quarrel between the two brothers, and give a sore heart to one of them, was nothing but fun to her.

But, to my astonishment, Lexie took a grip of my arm, as I gathered up the clippings on the table, to be ready for the tea.

"Rechie, mind what you're doing," said my sister, with an angered voice; "I'll never give my consent to that lad or the like of him, mind; and if you encourage him, its on your ain head."

Mc! I drew myself away out of Lexie's hand, with a black mark above my elbow from her fingers, and feeling as if I had done some evil; when the truth is I had not done one single thing, and had never even thought—to call thinking—about young Mr. Mouter, or anybody like him, till she put it into my head.

We had our tea when Annie Orme came ben again, and there was little more said about it—though Annie herself was very ready to laugh the whole night, and was speaking something about Phemie Mouter and Nicol and Thomas whenever she could get an opportunity; but Lexie put in a sharp word about his father—Lexie has an extraordinary recollection of folk's fathers—which stopped Annie, though it made her laugh again.

Now, young Mr. Mouter had the principal shop in Lasswade—just as we were the principal mantua-makers. He might be about five-and-twenty at that time, and had served his time in Edinburgh, and was a well-educated lad. He was very particular in his dress, when he got off the white apron, and came from behind the counter; and, as he was a well-looking young man, and had, as I say, been brought up in Edinburgh, he was much thought of in our little place;—so that I think it was a very natural thing of me to be pleased when I saw him seeking after Annie Orme.

Nicol, his brother, was at the sea—a fine lad, too, though a thought coarse, like most seafaring folk—but a very cheerful, happy-spirited young man he was, and all the bairns in the town were out of their wits about Nicol Mouter;—but, for all that, I felt at once that Nicol was not half so suitable as Thomas for Annie Orme.

Now, there was not much choice in Lasswade, as I think I have before said, even if all the lads in the town had been seeking Annie, which, indeed, they were not, nor anything like it;—so that I was in every way proud in secret—the like of me to be proud!—at having made up my mind for young Mr. Mouter, and not being content, as Lexie was, with a red-headed lad like Peter Braird.

The next night, which was Saturday, Peter went past in the afternoon, and, after his manner, stopped to say a word at the door. On common days, it was just “Good-day,” and the lad went on; but this time Lexie behoved to have him in, and began a discourse, calling him “Mr. Peter” at every word. Poor lad, he was very bashful, and did not know what to do with his long legs, and the great red hands, which he commonly carries in his pockets. I am sure he was very glad to get away, and so was I when he went.

Just as he left the door, the milk-cart from Butterbraes drove past, going home from Edinburgh. The man that was driving it was a very uncommon looking young man, who had been in service with Mr. Lait all the summer. On the Sabbath days, when he was at the kirk, we were constantly taking him for some strange gentleman, and often have I thought and said, that that lad was something above the common; but he just went about his work at the Butterbraes farm, and drove in the cart every Saturday to Edinburgh, like any other man. Well, as I say, Robbie drove past in his cart, just as Peter Braird went away from our door, and I could not help but let my eye fall, first on the one and then on the other. “Well,” said I, and I was not aware I was speaking it out loud, so as Lexie and Annie could hear me; “its no doubt a grand thing to be come of a good family—but there’s Robbie at the Butterbraes is a different looking man from Peter Braird.”

“Rechie!” cried my sister; and the start she gave me with that fierce voice made me lose, I am sure, as much as a quarter of a yard of Mrs. Cranstoun’s beautiful rich silk. But that was not the worst; lifting up my eyes—I was shaking a little with the thought of having angered Lexie—what should I see but a blush on the face of Annie Orme, as red as blush could be. I never had a greater start in my life—to think that she, a young creature choosing for herself, should have that thought for Peter Braird!

CHAPTER III.

On the Monday morning, a quiet Sabbath-day having come between, I was a little surprised to see Peter Braird rapping at the door. We were just at our breakfast ourselves; and, seeing I did not know what business he had at our house so soon again, I never moved to open the door.

“Let Mr. Peter in, Annie Orme,” said Lexie. “Poor lad, he never likes to pass the house.”

And Annie started up in a moment, in a way that it made me angry to see; but, however, our little maid, Beenie, was beforehand with her, and in a minute we heard a heavy foot in the passage, and Peter Braird put in his shoulder at the door, and gave a shy glance over it, like an awkward colt of a lad as he was.

“Come in, Mr. Peter,” said Lexie. “Are they all well at Windlestrae this morning? You should call oftener, for its aye a pleasure to see you. Come in, and take a seat and a rest; its a long walk to Edinburgh.”

So he came in, and sat down on the edge of the wooden chair—there is only one wooden chair in the parlour. He had a fine rose in his hand, in a pot—a monthly rose, but a very fine one of its kind.

“Are you going to carry it all the way to Edinburgh? How fresh it is, and bonnie,” said Annie Orme.

“Na, its for you,” said Peter; and he looked at me—not at Annie Orme.

“You’ve brought it in a present to Annie? Well, now, that is very considerate,” said my sister; “for she has little in her power; Mr. Peter, seeing she will work to help us; though I am sure she need not unless she liked.”

Now, this was very true; for my sister Lexie had that great a pride in Annie Orme, that she would rather have worked double herself, to keep Annie like a lady.

"I was not meaning Miss Annie," said Peter, scraping about the floor with his foot, and holding the pot firm in his hand. "Miss Rechie, it's for you."

And saying that, he shoved it down upon the table beside me, with a very red face, and made me that I spilled my tea upon the clean table-cloth with the shake he gave my arm.

I thanked him the best way I could, and thought it was very kind; but all the time I was watching Annie Orme, to see if she looked disappointed—which she did not, so far as I could perceive.

And away went Peter with his red head. He was a good-natured callant, and I am sure it was very mindful of him; but, for all that, he need not have left the mark of the pot and his own big thumb upon my clean table-cloth.

Next day, Mrs. Cranstoun, of Mavis-wood, called about another gown. When we saw the little carriage she drives stop at the door, my first thought was to make the room right, and get some of the clippings out of the way; but Lexie aye has such a pride.

"Annie Orme," said my sister, "take your seam up the stair till this lady's away."

"I think you should let me stay, aunt," said Annie; for, now that I am a woman, I should work for you, and not you for me."

"Do what I bid you," said Lexie, in a peremptory manner; "it is not my purpose you should be a mantua-maker all your days, like Rechie and me. Go up the stair—I have other views for you, Annie Orme."

So, Annie having gone up stairs, Mrs. Cranstoun came in, and we got our business with her done. Afterwards, Lexie went out to Miss Trotter's, to see if she could get some trimmings; though I always said she would have to go in to Edinburgh for them.

"Aunt, what views has my Aunt Lexie for me?" said Annie Orme, when she came down. "What am I to be, if I'm no to be a mantua-maker? Surely—surely, she does not want me to be a lady's maid, Aunt Rechie?"

"Na, Annie Orme, no such thing," said I. "Lexie would never stoop to that; she says you're to have a house of your own."

Annie looked at me for a moment, in an uncertain way, and asked, "What do you say, auntie?" But before I could get time to answer, she put up her hands to her face, and threw down her seam, and burst into a laugh. I cannot just tell how long this laugh lasted; but that whole forenoon, till Lexie came home, it returned about every ten minutes, till she had to wipe her eyes, and laugh at herself again for laughing. But, along with this, there was a bit little blush going and coming, as if the same idea might have entered her own head before. No doubt it had; for these young creatures, you see, are so rash, and never consider what they are undertaking with, until the thing is past remedied, and, ill or well, they must go on.

"Your Aunt Lexie says you're to have a house of your own—the which has never happened to either her or me," said I; "and, more than that, Annie, my dear, she has her eye on the lad, too."

When Annie could speak for laughing, which was not for a while, she came and put her arms about my neck, and begged me to tell her who it was. Now, I'll not deny it was a great temptation; but I was honourable to Lexie—I would not tell her—for my heart smote me when I looked at the little rose-tree, and I could not speak an ill word of Peter Braird, though he had a red head.

"But I'll tell you a most sensible young lad, that would make a good man to you, Annie Orme, or else I'm much mistaken," said I. "He's in good business, and has plenty to maintain you in a creditable way; and he's a very wise-like young man. I see you have but to look kindly at him, and he'll do whatever you like."

"Who is that, Aunt Rechie?" said Annie; and what surprised me was, that her lips opened a little, by reason of the breath coming fast and short, and that she looked up for the moment without laughing, as if this was more earnest than joke.

"I've had my eye upon him this while," said I, "and a fine lad he is, I can answer for him, though your Aunt Lexie thinks he's far below your degree, and will not hear of him; but, for all that, he's a likely lad, Annie Orme."

Annie did not look up at me this time: she looked down close at her work, and her needle flew through her fingers like lightning, and her face turned so red, that I saw the cheeks must just be throbbing and beating with heat.

"Hold up your head, Annie, my dear," said I; "you'll get yourself a head-ache, if you stoop down that way;—and you need not think any shame, for young Mr. Mouter is a lad anybody might be pleased with; so there's no need for thinking shame."

But, before I had done speaking, Annie was standing on the floor, laughing like to bring down the house. I thought it was maybe only her agitation, poor thing; for I have seen folk cover a thing that moved them by laughing at it. But, however that might be, she laughed even on, I cannot tell how long, so that I could hardly stop her; till, as I was standing at the window, I saw Lexie coming up the road, which had some effect upon the mirthfulness of Annie Orme. Just at that time, too, the milk-cart from Butterbraes drove away up on the road to Edinburgh, and Robbie, whom I have before mentioned, being in it, and seeing me at the window, took off his hat with an air that bewildered me, and gave me a bow. I never saw a man in Lasswade make such a grand bow, except the minister.

"Preserve, me, Annie," said I; "I wonder who that Robbie is—he surely must have come of better folk, and got a better up-bringing than the hinds here away; for, some way, I aye feel myself treating him as if he was a gentleman, and him only a farm servant. It is very strange to me."

To this which I said, Annie answered not a word, but sat down to her seam in a moment, and worked as busy at it as if it was for her life.

CHAPTER IV.

That night I went out myself to Robert White, the baker's, and in passing looked in at Mr. Mouter's shop, just to see what he was saying to it. He was in the shop himself, serving, and Phemie—I am sorry to think she is rather glaukit, having no mother over her, poor thing—was standing at the door of the parlour, behind the shop, swinging it back and forward in her hand, and laughing loud at something a young man had said that was standing at the counter. Mr. Mouter himself looked very pleased to see me; and the first thing that Phemie said, when I crossed the door, was, "Eh, Miss Rechie! how's Annie Orme?"

"Step in, Miss Rechie; the night's cold for the season, and there's a fire on in the parlour," said Mr. Mouter. "I think we're to have a hard winter this year. 'Mony haws, mony snaws,' the proverb says; and when I was up the other day at the Hewan, the bushes were just scarlet with them. You'll feel the cast wind in yon house of yours, Miss Rechie?"

"Yes, Mr. Mouter," said I, "it is exposed, no doubt; but then there's such a pleasant view, that we put up with the wind."

"Then I hope there's no weak chests among you, Miss Rechie; Miss Annie Orme looks delicate a little," said the young man.

"No such thing, Mr. Mouter," said I; "she's just been particular stout and well all her life, and the spirit that's in her keeps away all the little troubles. Na, Annie Orme, I'm thankful to say, has uncommon health. She's a good lassie: I'm sure if any mortal ever deserved it, it's my niece Annie."

"Aye, I would think that," said Mr. Mouter. "She's a sensible, well-conducted young woman."

Well-conducted! That anybody should speak so of my niece, Annie Orme! But it was just the young man's manner of speech; and, besides, he was busy putting up some sugar for little Katie Hislop, a very small bairn, who could not get up to the counter.

"If Annie Orme's delicate, you should see and take her to a safe house, Tammas," said Phemie; "you that have so much interest in her."

It happened just at that moment that I was lifting up little Katie Hislop to put down her coppers on the counter, and to get the sugar; but whenever I set the bairn down again, I said—

"If there was any need of a safer house, my sister Lexie and me would fit in a moment; for, though we've been twenty year and more where we are, I would rather leave the finest house that ever was than risk scathe to Annie Orme."

"Annie Orme's weel off," said Phemie. "The wivcs say she would make a guid wife, and the lads say she's bonnie, and at hame she's petted like as she was a princess: it's a grand thing to be Annie Orme."

"Hold your peace, Phemie," said Mr. Mouter; "be thankful you have not to work for your bread; and see to the house, and dinna speak so much. Yes, I've no doubt Miss Annie would make a grand manager in a house, after all your good training, Miss Rechie; but a plentiful house, you see, with men in it, is different from a scrimpit, genteel family, that has only women—though, to be sure, a good principle is the thing. And, you see, to be a country place, Lasswade is a very dear place: it's all with the strangers, Miss Rechie."

"But you have a very good shop, Mr. Mouter," said I; "if the like of you complain about things being dear, what should the poor folk do?"

"Well, the business is not to complain of," said the young man; "but, you see, it's not like a secure, settled income, and it takes thrift and management. I'm a careful man myself, Miss Rechie. I aye think the chief quality of a good wife is thrift; but step in bye, and take a rest."

So, as Phemie had gone in to the parlour, and was waving on me with her hand, I went in at last, and by-and-bye Mr. Mouter came himself, leaving only the little boy in the shop, and we had a crack. Phemie is a fine girl, I believe, but she is ill-mannered; and all the time I was in, she was teasing Thomas about Annie in a way that made me think shame. Besides this, Phemie speaks too much about the lads—far too much.

"If I was the lads," said Phemie, "I'll tell you who I would be jealous of. Oh, I would be jealous of him, Miss Rechie, if I was them! There's no one like him in all Lasswade."

"Phemie, I wish you would learn some sense," said Mr. Mouter.

"And who is this bonnie lad, my dear?" said I.

"It's Robbie, at the Butterbraes. They say the folk remark him in Edinburgh—to see the like of him driving a cart; but it's no that he's bonnie, Miss Rechie—it's—I canna tell what it is—ask Annie Orme."

"Annie Orme!" said I, "what should Annie know about a lad that's only a servant-man to Mr. Lait?"

"Oh, may-be she doesna ken, Miss Rechie; but she looks up when he goes by, as well as other folk," said Phemie Mouter; "and it's no that he's bonnie—I've seen folk bonnier—but he just has a look like no other person. Eh, what would a' body think if Robbie turned out a lord, or some grand gentleman in disguise!"

"Dear me," said I; "if there is any chance of that, somebody should speak to Mr. Lait—it should not be allowed."

"Nonsense—nonsense—stuff; would you believe what the like of her takes into her head," said Mr. Mouter, looking angrier than he had any occasion to be. "For my part—"

But what Mr. Mouter thought, for his part, I never heard, seeing somebody came into the shop, and he had to go away.

So I gave him an invitation to call up and see us, and went upon my way likewise. On the road, I turned it over in my own mind with much consideration. This lad, Mr. Mouter, was may-be fully as prudent as it was pleasant to see a young man; and was seeking a wife to take care of himself and his goods and his gear, in a most calculating way, which I did not very well like. Then I fell into a thought about Annie Orme, why we should wish to set her away out of our house, and her the desire of our eyes. We would miss her every hour, not to say every day, and Lexie just as much as me; we would miss the very fash and trouble she sometimes gave us, when she would not be careful about changing her feet on wet days, or consorting with common folk. I am sure the very thought that I would not have her white gown to iron for her in summer, nor her bits of collars and things to keep in order all the year round, was grievous to me. No doubt it was Lexie's doing this present project, and not mine; but still I'll not deny my own weakness. In spite of all the grief we would have missing her, I yet felt that I would like to see her in her own house, and to call her, my niece, Mrs. Mouter. When folk begin to look at their own minds, it is remarkable how they constantly find a contradiction—and so there was with me. My heart sank at the thought of her going, and yet I was both proud and pleased to think that she would go, and be head over a house of her own.

CHAPTER V.

A week or two passed after that, and we went on just in our ordinary way. Young Mr. Mouter sometimes came up, and sat half an hour, at night; but his discourse was mostly to me, for Lexie was always prim and grave when he came in, and he seldom addressed himself to Annie Orme. Neither was Annie, as I could perceive, the least caring about his company, but just treated him as she did old Mr. Wood, the secession elder, who was our landlord, or any other neighbour not being a young man; for, to tell the truth, Thomas Mouter is not like most young men—there is a sedateness and steadiness about the lad, that might have done much good to Annie; but, no doubt, things are best as they are appointed.

Peter Braird, too, called every now and then; but, indeed, I never could see that the lad heeded about Annie at all, but rather, if he had a notion of anybody, it was me, my own self, seeing I had been kind to him, as he thought, in various little ways. He was just about one-and-twenty, and had never once thought of being married, I believe; while all the time Lexie made out that he was just uncommonly taken up about Annie Orme.

So, two or three weeks went past, and it came to the end of October. The weather was rather cold, but as beautiful and clear as it could be; and the harvest was all well in, and the folk busy in the potato-fields. I like myself to see the gathering of the potatoes—no to say that they are the staff of life to many a one, and that a good year of them is a good year for the poor—there is something cheery, besides, in seeing the women about the fields, and the gallant horses ploughing them up, and the lads whistling behind. Then, I like the fragrance of the earth itself, and to see the shaw lying half buried in the furrow, with a cluster at the root of it like a cluster of grapes—and much more useful to man and blessed, well I wot. But, not to waste time telling what I like, and what I do not like—it was about this season. The nights were chilling into the winter, and Lexie and me were fain to sit near the fire, being older than we once were.

She was sitting in her own chair, doing white seam—a thing not common with Lexie; for with so much work as we had, it was little profit to us to labour at the plain things, that anybody could do. This, however, was a garment for Annie Orme, which Lexie was making just out of her own head, in a new pattern—and the neatest thing I ever saw. She was sitting, as I say, in her ordinary position, with her back to the window, and her feet on the footstool. My sister Lexie is tall and thin, and has been hard-favoured all her days, like me; but you have just to look at her to see she is not a common person; only she wears high caps, of not a pleasant fashion, and they give a peaked, sharp look to all her face, especially as I saw it in the shadow, now and then giving a bit nod upon the wall.

I was sitting, myself, on the other side of the fire, putting down in my little book some things I had been buying. A low chair suffices me, and I need no footstool; for, as I have before said, I am a little person by nature, and was a slender, too, till I began to turn stout, about fifteen years ago—so that I am not to call in ill-condition now. The candle was standing between us two, and there was a good fire in the grate. Lexie's thread and her scissors were on the table, and over the back of the wooden chair was her shawl, and she had put her bonnet in the big millinery-box; for Lexie had been up at Windlestrae, seeing the family, that afternoon. It was not quite tea-time, but very near it, and I was wondering to myself what could keep Annie Orme, who had gone out with a message in the gloaming, and how it was that I did not hear Beenie setting the cups in the kitchen, when suddenly the door was thrown back to the very wall, with a thud which made Lexie (being nervous) jump, and Beenie came fleeing in, crying out to me, "Miss Rechie! Oh, Miss Rechie! here's Miss Annie walking down by the water-side with a grand gentleman!"

You may think how my heart started, and began to beat! But when Beenie saw my sister, I thought she would have fainted; for Beenie was rather feared for my sister, and had come in to tell me this, thinking I was sitting my lane.

So Lexie and I looked each other in the face, without saying a word, and Lexie gripped the linen she had in her hand in a fierce manner, as if she thought it was young Mr. Mouther's hair, and was giving him an awful shake. For I had no doubt it was young Mr. Mouther, Annie having no other joes.

"Dear me, Beenie," said I, "where did you get such a like story—I'll go with you and see; but my niece Annie Orme kens better than to wander about at night with a strange man."

"Sit still where you are, Rechie Sinclair," cried Lexie to me, in a great passion; "and you, Beenie, you born haverel, how dare you tell me such a thing? My niece Annie Orme! Do ye think I'm to believe that she's keeping trystes on the water-side, like any common person's bairn?"

"If ye please, Miss Lexie, its no my blame; I couldna help seeing them," said Beenie, beginning to cry.

"Annie Orme! Oh, Annie Orme! that I should hear such a story of you!" said my sister; "but Mrs. Braird, at Windlestrae, was not just very stout when I was up this afternoon. It may-be was my niece Annie's cousin, Mr. Peter Braird, that was with her, Beenie, and there would be no ill in that."

"Na—they're a' such red heads," said Beenie, quickly; "I could not have missed kenning wha it was, if I had looked through the bushes at Mr. Peter."

Lexie got up the linen in her hand, as if she could have thrown it at Beenie, in her anger; but, instead of that, she rose, took her shawl from the wooden chair, and her bonnet out of the millinery-box, and put them on, looking with a fierce eye all the time upon me.

"I'll go myself, and see who is with this unfortunate lassie," said Lexie. "If its any friend of yours that you've given encouragement to, out of my knowledge, Rechie, and sacrificed the poor thing, like her mother!—But I'll no permit it—nothing shall make me permit it. She shall be delivered, whatever I have to do. Beenie, follow me. I must be at the bottom of this before another hour."

Fear'd out of her very senses, Beenie went creeping after my sister, and Lexie turned round as she went out, with a kind of defiance to me, and bade me "keep the house till she came home."

For awhile I sat still, and tried to add up my book—but I was all shaking with having angered Lexie, and with thoughts of what she would say to the poor bairn, and to the decent lad also, whom no doubt it was true I had encouraged—in a way. I have no very great skill at any time in adding up figures, but now, even though I took great pains, and counted them on my fingers, I could not get on; so at last I thought it was best to shut the book.

After that I sat for awhile just looking into the fire and pondering. There was not a sound in the house—nobody being in—but the clock in the passage ticking steady and slow, like a thing of wood and iron as it was, heeding not a pin that folk were distressed. But bye and bye, as I sat and listened to it in the quiet house, I thought it said "Annie Orme, Annie Orme, Annie Orme," in a voice like a ghost; and in spite of my own sense, and all I could say to myself, I could not help being feared.

Annie Orme—Annie Orme! oh, if the like of me had brought scathe upon the bairn!

So I went away at last, and opened the door very cannily; for though I knew that Lexie was a good distance away, I had still a dread of her hearing me. It was a most beautiful night; just on the other side of the road was a great park, looking dark in the moonlight, and in the hollow below that, was the Esk glimmering out in a bend, and all the angles and corners of the paper-mill rounded with silver. The moon in the skies was like a ship travelling upon the sea. Now and then she sailed away behind a cloud, and you lost wit of her; but then the edging of the cloud would brighten and brighten, and all the mist round it would gleam like fairy lace woven out of silver, and out she came herself, looking you full in the face, as if she had been hiding in play, and was young enough yet to be whiles a bairn, for all her dignity and state. All the time, just before her, as if it were guiding her track, went a little quiet star; it had a solitary, forlorn look about it, as if it knew well that the grand traveller behind would leave no kindly looks for a small light like what it seemed; and so as I stood out in the night, my heart grew wistful and solitary too, and sighs came out from it, or ever I knew—but it was true I had great cause to be anxious about Annie Orme.

I was looking down the road, expecting to see Lexie, and Annie, and young Mr. Mouter, all coming back together—for I could not think my sister would stand out about any pride of her own, if it was to hinder what Annie had set her heart upon—when I saw a dark figure coming up by the hedge, and a little one, crying like to break her heart, following after as fast as she could. "Dear me," said I, "here is Lexie and Beenie back again," and I opened the door wide to let them in, and consoled myself with a thought that Beenie had been mistaken after all, and that whoever was walking by the waterside, it was not Annie Orme.

But my heart misgave me when I saw the moon for a moment shine on Lexie's face, and she passed me on the door-step without a word of what had happened. Beenie came into the house just behind my sister, and you could have heard her at the bridge she grut so loud, "Oh! Miss Rechie, its a' me," said Beenie, and there was a sob at every word—"its a' my wyte for telling upon Miss Annie."

I hurried into the room after my sister, being now really feared; Lexie was putting her bonnet away into the millinery box, and had off her shawl, but she never spoke a word, though she might easy see me standing shaking there, wondering what was the matter. Lexie's lips were closed firm, and she was holding her head up so stiff, that now and then it gave a little nod—I could not bear this any longer.

"Lexie," said I, "say anything you like to me—miscal me as much as you are disposed—but speak to me, Lexie, and be pitiful to the bairn."

"The bairn! the vulgar-minded, low-spirited, unthankful girl! Oh Rechie Sinclair, to think we should have wared our best days upon her, and her following in her mother's steps at last!"

"Lexie, woman! the lad is a very decent lad," said I, "he's no very grand, but he'll be always creditable, and he can keep her well. What way should ye make such a work about it?"

"Rechie, you are a deceived woman," said Lexie, turning full round on me, and looking fierce in my face. "I tell ye, Peter Braird is too good for her—^afar too good for the notions she has—I kent that—and not only so, but even your man, Thomas Mouter, who keeps a grocery shop, and is auld Sandy Mouter's son—he's too good for her, Rechie Sinclair. She's chosen for herself—she's made her ain selection, and wocs me that I should see this day."

Saying that, Lexie sat down upon her chair, and turned her face to the wall, and was silent for a time. I saw she was much moved, and that her frame shook, but she would not let wit to me. I laid my hand on her shoulder, and said, "Lexie, woman, dinna vex yourself," but she shook my hand off with wrath, and would not turn round her head—for Lexie is very proud—it is just her one fault.

When she was done, she drew her chair into its usual place, and looked me in the face once more.

"Well, what were you asking me," said Lexie, sharply.

"I was asking nothing, Lexie; but I would very fain hear indeed," said I, "what it is that has angered ye at Annie—who was with her?—ye might tell me."

"Aye, I may tell you, and I'll tell herself before it be long," said my sister, "who was it? Oh Rechie Sinclair! I'm one auld fool, and you're another. We were thinking her a truthful bairn and an obedient, that liked us, and had respect to our opinions—while she's been holding trystes all this time with Robbie at the Butterbraes!"

I was struck silent and dismayed—I could not make answer a single word.

A LADY'S NARRATIVE OF CAPTIVITY AMONG ALGERINE PIRATES.*

BUT now we had again to face the fearful mob, and once more to endure the same indignities and insults that I have already described. We were almost supported along through the throng of negroes and camels, horses and mules, to the consular dwelling. Entering this by the low door in front, we gained access to an inner court, and were thence conducted to a large room that opened into it. I at once appropriated a sort of couch at one end of the room, and sank upon it, weary and exhausted.

Soon after, the wife of the consul entered; she nodded at me, and passed on to the further end of the apartment. There she threw herself upon a low sofa, made up of mats and rolls of carpeting. Many other ottomans of similar material were scattered around, so that the place had altogether somewhat the aspect of an English carpet warehouse. By the side of the lady's sofa stood the consul's own bed, it also was composed of alternate layers of the same kind of stuff, but it rose to the height of four or five feet from the floor.

The lady herself was to me an object of great curiosity, as she listlessly reclined at the further end of the room. Her person was fat and bulky, and bedizened with gold and silver lace; her countenance hard-favoured and dark, without any vestige of hair about it; and her legs and feet brown and bare, and manacled with heavy anklets of gold. As we were so far asunder, our intercourse for that evening began and ended with the preliminary nod. I did not, however, want amusement, for as soon as I had a little recovered from fatigue, my attention was rivetted to another part of the room. My husband and his host had seated themselves upon an ottoman, before a small writing-table; a feeble lamp illuminated their features sufficiently to show that they were earnestly whispering together in Italian. My husband's sun-burnt face was disturbed and anxious;

the Jew's was calm, but full of keen attention. I soon saw enough to tell me that an intrigue was in progress, and as one of the parties appeared to make proposition after proposition cautiously and hesitatingly, I knew that British sovereigns were gradually coming in as auxiliaries to the argument. By slow degrees the countenance of the Jew became complacent, relaxed into a smile, and, at last, nodded in assent. The golden reasons had proved unanswerable—a bribe had been offered and received. My husband had agreed to write the letter to the emperor in accordance with the governor's order, but he had coupled his agreement with the condition that he should write a second letter also, addressing it to the consul general at Tangier, and that the Jew should forward both at the same time, by special couriers, and should have a reward of fifty sovereigns for the service.

By the time that this important business was decided, and the despatches were prepared, it was midnight. Our lady hostess had been all this while asleep upon her rugs and carpets, entirely unconscious of the proceeding that had attracted my attention so painfully, as one that was probably fraught with life or death to us. Now that the affair was concluded, I became sensible that I was in a state of languor and prostration that was almost insupportable. I had fasted for twelve hours, and this, too, after a long period of sea-sickness. I therefore hailed, with unfeigned delight, signs which seemed to indicate that some kind of meal was in the course of preparation. The anticipated refreshment soon appeared; it consisted of pieces of cold black mutton, swimming in oil and garlic, with rue-tea and glasses of half putrid water. All these delicacies were served without bread of any kind. As our stomachs were not yet tamed down to this kind of fare, we immediately asked permission to retire to our mattress. The younger Jew of the blue coat came forward to act as our chamberlain, and he led us to a small dirty apartment on the other side the court, where we found our mattress spread upon the top of an old wooden chest. I was now greatly astonished and delighted to hear our really handsome conductor say, in a rich, full-toned voice, "Samuel Bendenhen speak English for you. Two years him in Gibraltar, learn it very well; you wish something him can give you? Him very glad to get you some pleasure." Rejoiced to have such a friend at court, I immediately begged of him to procure us some clean water for use in the morning. He disappeared with alacrity, and soon returned with a damsel, bearing a large brass stew-pan full of water, some soft soap in a vine leaf, and the sleeve of an old cotton shirt in the place of a towel. This last was evidently a part of the plunder of some European's wardrobe. Bidding us good night, the courteous fellow added, "me see you more days."

The survey of our chamber, which we made when we were left alone, did not afford us any promise of comfort. The walls were black and rough, and above were lofty rafters heavily draped by the industry of many full-grown spiders. The floor was strewn with unwashed wool, that smelt most offensively, and a part of the room was rudely boarded off from the rest, to serve as a sort of granary. Earnestly thanking God that our lot was not a worse one, we extinguished the lamp we had no means of re-illuminating, and laid ourselves down, in the hope that we might find a little refreshment and forgetfulness in sleep. This hope was however, indeed, a vain one, for as soon as the light was out, a chorus of noises began below, and a chorus of noises above. The screaming, screeching, and racing on the ground we at once knew could only proceed from an army of rats, resentful at our intrusion into their domains. But what the flying, fluttering, and squeaking over head might indicate, was more than our imagination could fathom. Our attention was soon, however, taken off from these disagreeable sounds, by sensations that were more imperative—our mattress was already shared with us by thousands upon thousands of virulent and hungry fleas.

Finding our night even more wretched and wearying than our day had been, we were glad enough to escape from it by rising early. Very soon after we were up, our young friend Bendenhen arrived. When we spoke of the nocturnal noises over head, he pointed out to us that the upper part of the chamber was inhabited by numerous small birds, which he told us bore the name of "birds of Jerusalem." The houses of Salee are all filled with them, and they are great favourites with the inhabitants, who never molest them; they build at their own pleasure, wherever they like, and seem to be upon the best possible terms with their landlords. Bendenhen caught one of them in his hand, to show me how pretty and tame it was. It was a small black and white bird, with delicate head and pointed beak; it did not seem to have the slightest fear of its captor.

The young Hebrew's manner was as kind as it was pleasing. He told us this morning that he had a house in Jow Town, "half-an-hour away," with "von little wife, and von little child," and then explained that no other Jow besides the consul was allowed to dwell in Salee. He had himself remained in the town, during the last night, under the governor's special order, to aid the consul, who was his father-in-law, in the matter of the imperial despatch. I asked him where his own father was? He answered, "very dead." The elder Bendenhen had been possessed of considerable wealth, but as the emperor had constituted himself heir-at-law to all the Jews in his dominions, his property was confiscated at his decease to the imperial use, excepting only a small amount that had been turned over as the portion of the widow and her child. This, however, had prospered marvellously, and the Bendenhens were already rich again.

As soon as Samuel Bendenhen took leave of us, our waiting-maid of the last night came in. She wanted the brass stewpan, as the cooking could not be done without it; but she was manifestly very glad to avail herself of this culinary necessity, as an excuse for gratifying her curiosity, for she walked wonderingly round me, and examined different parts of my dress, particularly the cap, which seemed most to excite her admiration. While she made her survey of my person, I returned the compliment by doing as much for her, and she had little cause to shrink from the inspection. She was a young Jewess, probably of about eighteen years of age, with a bright brown skin, and beautiful innocent-looking countenance, set off by the finest display of long waving black hair I have ever seen; her features were full of expression, and beamed with gentle and kindly sympathy. Irresistibly attracted by her look, I extended my hand, she took it, coaxed it, and then dropped upon the floor, and laid her beautiful head upon my feet. For the first time since our capture tears rushed into my eyes; I was glad to find my interesting acquaintance answered to the pretty name of Una.

As soon as Una had carried off her stewpan, a man and a boy entered our apartment; they were the remaining members of the consul's establishment, and had come to take their turn in gazing at the strangers. The man opened the door, which I may remark, admitted the light as well as himself, and stalked in towards us. When tolerably near us he extended one arm, and, in a deep sepulchral tone pronounced, in English, "good night." This phrase, it afterwards appeared, was the measure of his proficiency as a linguist. He had managed to pick it up somewhere, and was so proud of his attainment that he took good care to lose no opportunity for its display. From morning, through noon, to night, this phrase was ringing in our ears in the death-bell tone of Abram. The monotonous repetition at last made me so nervous, that I reckoned escape from it as not the least among my joys when I turned my back upon Salee. The man was very tall and thin, almost a black, but with hollow features that were devoid of any trace of negro physiognomy. The expression of his countenance was disagreeably acute, and of so ambiguous a nature that I could not have said whether his age was nearer to twenty or to seventy. He was wrapped in the customary flannel garments, and I think might have made a little fortune, without a single alteration in his outfit, had he appeared as stage ghost at one of the minor theatres of London.

When this ghost and his little satellite had gazed their fill, they made way for the next arrival. This proved to be our hostess herself. She had come for me to return with her to the room we had occupied on the previous evening. I expressed to her, as well as I could, my willingness to be her companion, and she led me across the inner court of the house. This I was now able to observe; it was open to the sky, of a quadrangular form, and surrounded by galleries; into these galleries the doors of the several apartments led, but none of the rooms had windows of any kind.

When we reached the apartment of state, I found a large party of ladies already assembled, although it was yet only seven o'clock. I had good cause to rejoice in my ready acquiescence in my hostess's invitation, for the company were partaking of coffee and biscuits, and I gladly joined them in their occupation, and made a refreshing meal. When coffee drinking was ended, Una brought in a flask of white spirit, smelling strongly of aniseed, and most of the ladies took their three and four glasses of the cordial—I fear I suffered a little in their esteem in consequence of my inability to do the same. During the repast, my companions were seated on carpets on the floor; I was placed conspicuously on a lofty ottoman. In one sense, this arrangement was a very satisfactory one, I was too high to come in for any share of the frequent embracings and kissings which turned out to be important features in the ceremonial, and which, I suppose, I should not have dared to refuse had they been tendered to me.

As soon as the coffee and aniseed had been discussed, the general attention was turned upon me. I had made such slight improvement in my personal appearance as the contents of my carpet bag allowed, and I suppose my hostess received this as a compliment addressed to herself, for she was much more familiar with me than on the occasion of our first interview. The ladies all came round me, and made signs that they wished me to stand up. I complied, and they then commenced a minute and careful scrutiny of my dress, examining all parts of it, the inner as well as the outer. While they were thus occupied, I took the opportunity to make my own observations. Excepting in the particular of stature, I could see very little difference in the persons of my examiners; some might be a little older, and some a little younger—some a little dirtier, and some a little cleaner; but all were alike ugly and disagreeable, with dusky complexions, and with frightfully full figures. They were mostly short as well as stout, with large coarse inexpressive features, by no means improved by the effect of a circle of black paint surrounding each eye. The palms of their hands were dyed of a deep saffron colour, and their finger and toe-nails stained of a rosy red.

Their dress consisted of a chemise of coarse calico, fashioned something like a gentleman's shirt, but without collar or wristbands. Its seams and edges were trimmed with black and silver cord, and the bosom and shoulders embroidered with gold and silver thread. The chemise closed in front by means of gold buttons, and its large loose sleeves were sometimes worn low over the wrists, and at other times were tucked up above the elbows, according to the caprice of the moment. Over the calico chemise was drawn a striped jacket, of pink and white cotton, with short sleeves, and open in front; this also was devoid of collar, and trimmed out with gold lace. A straight piece of dark green cloth was wrapped tight round the body, by way of a skirt, and this was ornamented at the bottom and along the outer edge by a broad binding of scarlet satin damask, finished with golden cord. A scarlet sash encircled the waist, and concealed the union of the jacket with the skirt. No hair was visible about the head—a skein of black worsted was bound tightly round, where the commencement of the hair should have been seen. Immediately above this circlet, a series of yellow and red silk handkerchiefs were pinned, and their ends were allowed to fall over behind, in a sort of drapery, and were there festooned up into the sash. A short tuft of black feathers took the place of hair on each side of the face, and low down upon the forehead, almost touching the eyebrows, a band of red cloth was placed, as the recipient for a row of large and very beautiful pearls. In each ear were two pairs of ear-rings, the upper of the two suspended from the top rim of the organ, so as to conceal its orifice. Large embossed bracelets and anklets of silver and gold adorned the arms and legs. Some of the anklets must have weighed at least ten or twelve ounces, and many of them had a very antique look. Those in particular that were worn by the wife of the Jew, possessed this attribute in so marked a degree that I could not help fancying they might be some of the very ornaments which her husband's ancestors had borrowed of the Egyptians, when they made their exodus from the land of bondage. The skirt of the dress was so short, that it exposed the bare legs almost up to the knees. The feet also were quite uncovered; the loose slippers of red and gilt leather being left at the threshold of the apartment, and only assumed with the flannel wrappers, upon the rare occasion of their mistresses having cause to venture abroad.

The details of this description apply more particularly to the habiliments of my hostess, but all the rest of the company were arrayed in a similar costume; this lady herself proved to be far more accomplished than I had anticipated. She had the reputation for being able to converse fluently in the several languages of the Spanish, Italian, Hebrew, and Arabic, but I could not put her abilities to the test. While we were mutually engaged in improving our acquaintance, Samuel Bendenhen came to the door of the apartment, and I asked him to express for me my regret that I was not able to talk with my entertainers. He told me I need not mind this, for they were very well pleased with me as I was. They said they found me as fresh as a flower, and as gentle as a dove. I felt this to be a very pretty compliment, but I was totally unable to return it, for I thought them as unlike to flowers or doves as it was possible for living things to be. They all took snuff profusely, and they had but one handkerchief among the party, which did duty for the whole. Now it was engaged in one place, in relieving some dusky skin of superfluous moisture, next it was applied to the nose or mouth of some other borrower, and then it was used to dust the feet and anklets of its owner, before it was restored to its proper resting-place in her girdle, as a preparation for a fresh start. By the time I had noted all these particulars, my companions seemed to have satiated their curiosities, for they commissioned Bendenhen to tell me they were very sorry I could not talk freely with them, as they would have liked to hear all about my country. They then took an extra pinch of snuff, jerked up their several girdles, and giving me familiar nods as they passed me, they took themselves off to a vapour bath, that had been steamed up in some recess of the inner court, and I was left alone.

There was one particular in this singular interview that puzzled me not a little at the time. Each lady, after she had made an end of her inspection of my person and dress, gave me her wrist to feel, and looked in my face with an air of anxious inquiry. I afterwards found that my old friend, the giant Abdallah, had established me in a reputation that many a veteran professor of the healing art might have envied. He was himself one of the grandees of Salce, and as these ladies all belonged to the same distinguished grade of society, they were at once put in possession of the gossip about my remedial skill. My fame was not, however, long confined to the elite of society, for before I had been two days in Salce, crowds of patients flocked to me; every woman and child who could get near enough, thrust a wrist into my hand: I must have counted some hundreds of Moorish pulses before I left the town. I soon learned that there was some little excuse for the extravagant estimation in which my assumed medicinal powers were held, for Bendenhen assured me that there was not a single practitioner of medicine in the dominions of Morocco, to dispute my reputation with me. No one could be found to undertake the treatment of disease in a land where the loss of a patient's life was very likely to involve the unpleasant consequence of the removal of the doctor's head.

When all my companions were gone, I had to exert some little courage to retrace the galleries, and regain our sleeping place, for the court below was now crowded with a levee of Moors and negroes. My husband was not in our room, but he soon rejoined me there, with an account of his morning's proceedings. He had found up the consul, and by dint of cautious questioning, had made out that the captain of the Austrian brig was in an unfurnished neighbouring house, under a guard of soldiers, in company with his entire crew, and the four men belonging to our own ship who had been taken on shore with us. Having ascertained this fact, my husband had persuaded him to send for the poor captain to breakfast with us, and was now expecting his immediate arrival. Shortly before noon our visitor came, accompanied by a soldier with a loaded musket, who stood guard over him, so long as he remained with us. He had been much worse treated than ourselves. He was captured by the same cruiser that had laid hold upon us, but his detention was without even the shadow of an excuse, for he had a Mediterranean pass in his possession. His determined refusal to leave the ship upon its arrival at Salce, had led to his being severely beaten, and afterwards bound; he was not allowed to take even a change of linen on shore with him. A valuable gold watch had been removed from his person, and forwarded as a present to the emperor; a silver one of less worth found its way into the possession of the old white-bearded governor. As he had no money with him, his keepers had brought him to the verge of starvation; he partook of the fare that we were able to set before him with an eagerness that painfully testified to the state in which he was. Our Jew host had furnished us with biscuits and coffee, and we had induced Abram to purchase for us, in addition, at an enormous price, some very good bread and fresh eggs; upon this simple fare our half-famished companion in misfortune regulated himself to our heart's content. He was a tall, white-headed, venerable looking man, of at least sixty years of age, and with gentlemanly bearing. He told us he had a wife and daughter at Triceste, who would be broken-hearted about him; and he seemed almost on the verge of despair. Our expressions of warm sympathy appeared to cheer him a little, and we found an opportunity during a momentary absence of the consul from the table, to hint to him that we had ground for anticipating a change in the aspect of affairs, and to assure him that under no circumstances should he be forgotten when good fortune happened to ourselves.

The poor Austrian was not allowed to remain long with us. As soon as he was gone, Una beckoned to me to go with her; she took me to see the ladies of the family in their morning employments. The mistress of the household was dressing wheaten corn for the family use; she was seated on the floor in all her finery, and held a large basket sieve between her extended mahogany limbs, Una supplied the grain from an open sack close by. Not far off, an older person, also an Algerine Jewess, was engaged in pounding spice and garlic in a marble mortar placed between her knees. Portions of these ingredients were added, from time to time, to a mess that was simmering over a pan of burning charcoal in my hand basin. The old lady who was superintending the cooking department, I now ascertained to be the mother of my hostess, and one of the usual residents in the house; I learned from her that her daughter's name was Miriam.

Playing about in this cooking apartment was a very pretty boy, of tender years, who answered to the name of Judah. I was delighted at the anticipation of having some one near me, in the human form, who might prove too young and inexperienced in the ways of the Moorish world to have yet imbibed the prejudices and dislikes of caste; I therefore did all I could to induce him to be on friendly terms with me. At first, he screamed violently if I only looked at him, but, by degrees, he abandoned this noisy demonstration, and seemed to overcome his fears; eventually, I made him sufficiently familiar to spit at me, and pelt me with whatever missiles his little hands could reach. My ire was somewhat raised at this issue of my well-meant coaxings, and I subsequently talked with Samuel Bendenhen about the child. From him I had this dainty piece of puerile biography: Judah was an orphan nephew of the consul's, and had been adopted by him. A few weeks before our arrival at Salce, the child had been refused, by his uncle, some trifle that he wished for, and had resented the affront by stabbing him in the face with a knife; upon this, the consul struck the little fellow a slight blow, but the recipient had, in consequence, sulked resolutely for two days afterwards, refusing either to eat, drink, or sleep. This was taken as an indication of high promise, and the fiat had been issued that the determined spirit of the child was not to be crossed on any account again. When I had heard this tale, I no longer wondered that Salce was so eminent as a nursery of pirates.

During this afternoon, my husband had attempted to get a look at the town. The consul had given him permission to do so, and had furnished him with a guard of honour for his protection; his walk proved a very short one, however, for he was stoned and struck at with sticks, until he was again housed. During his absence the consul came to me and requested that I would go with him to the top of the house, to show myself to the crowd who were waiting in the court-yard to catch a glimpse of me. I obeyed, and exhibited myself from the parapet. The square below was filled with a heterogeneous crowd, mostly consisting of Moors, some of these extended their arms towards me, and pronounced the word "bona;" others attempted to spit at me, others kissed their hands and bowed their heads; one ugly-looking fellow pretended to form a crown about his head, and then drew the edge of a sabre across his throat. The interpretation of this pantomimic language was, that the king was coming, and my head was going. The consul was at this time standing by my husband's side, upon the lower gallery, and manifested marked displeasure at the proceeding, whereupon the prophet took to his heels and disappeared, and I seized upon the excuse his conduct afforded to follow the example he had set.

Soon after we had returned to our apartment, Abram came to us with his mournful "good night;" this time the greeting meant that dinner was ready. We rose at the summons, and followed our guide to the apartment that had been appropriated to the meal; our party consisted of the consul, Samuel Bendenhen, the hopeful Judah, and our two selves. We were accommodated each with a ship's chair, but our companions squatted cross legged upon the floor. The table consisted of an old stool, scarcely a foot high, and was covered with the body of the old shirt, whose sleeve I possessed for a towel. My recovery from sea sickness had now left me with a keen appetite, I therefore endeavoured to overlook the disagreeable way in which the repast was served, and to confine my attention to the necessity of appropriating some portion of it. I declined the soup, for I could not altogether forget the stew-pan, but I took a plate containing pieces of beef, which the consul fished out for me, and quietly consumed them. The meat was neither delicate nor pleasant in flavour, but hunger had been so effectual a teacher that I screwed up my courage to the point of asking for more, and looked towards the consul with the purpose on my mind; he had just then discovered something in his own share of the dish that was not to his palate, and forthwith returned the offending morsel into his plate, and then emptied its entire contents back again into the bowl. This was enough for me, my determination and courage were dissipated by the act. When the soup had been discussed, a second course appeared, which was composed of a dish containing melons, herbs, and spices, mashed together with rancid oil; this I could not touch, but I was soon after made glad by the arrival of some deliciously fine grapes; by means of these, and by eking out their palatable juice with some black bread, I was enabled, at last, to accomplish a tolerable meal.

During our dinner, the lady consul sat upon a mat at the door, serving as a sort of telegraph between the dining-room and kitchen. She repeated aloud any order that fell from the mouth of her lord, regarding the service of the meal. As soon as we left the table, she came to it, and a second party then sat down; this comprised herself, Abram, Mehemed the boy, and Una. They all simultaneously attacked the contents of the bowl, some using spoons, and others fingers; none of them had plates. Poor, pretty Una! how I pitied her.

During the whole of this long day, the court yard continued to be crowded with visitors—as soon as one party left, another occupied the place. I hoped this was merely the influence of novelty, and that in a day or two we should be relieved of the annoyance, but I was mistaken; so long as I remained in Salee the show continued. The commoner herd were confined to the court-yard, but the fashionables came up at once into the room where we chanced to be. Day after day the exhibition went on, now from the house-top, now from one of the galleries, now in the dining-room, or even in our very chamber we were not free from the intrusion, even when taking our meals; but from the smaller number of our visitors at those times, I always suspected that our host, like the masters of travelling menageries, charged something extra for showing us at feeding time. I do not doubt that our knife and fork performance, as we sat perched on our wooden chairs, was always deemed a highly amusing exhibition.

There was one piece of persecution that irritated me excessively, but which was nevertheless continued until we left Salee. A fat young man, whom I at once perceived to be a personage of high importance, in consequence of the fineness and whiteness of his flannel robe, the delicacy of his hands, and the sparkling beauty of his diamond armlets, took the fancy into his head to pay us a visit every morning; if we were not visible elsewhere, he bounced into our room, and sat himself down on the edge of the mattress, and there he remained for a full hour staring at us with a stupid gaze. I asked our host whether he could not relieve us from this impertinence, but he said he dared not even attempt to do so, and cautioned us to be particularly careful how we behaved ourselves towards the gentleman, as he was powerful, and well known to be neither scrupulous nor placable, when once offended. I told the consul I was very much surprised that a race of men, who guarded their own women so jealously from extraneous eyes, should make a stranger woman submit to such constant and continued exhibition of herself to the public gaze. He told me he was very sorry for the necessity, but that he could not help it, and that we must be patient and resigned under it; for if he interfered in any way, neither his orders nor his house would be respected, and possibly we might be taken from it by force, and ill treated, before any effective protection could be obtained for us.

Near sunset, one evening, a few days after our arrival, a mighty tumult suddenly arose in the streets. The inhabitants were rushing like swarming bees towards the rocks; some new cause of excitement had evidently occurred. We were soon informed that another English prize had been brought in. In a short time, a company of soldiers came for my husband; the governor required his presence at the custom-house once again. In about two hours he returned, amidst a shower of stones, that were bestowed more liberally than usual, under the stimulus of the fresh excitement. He related to me that he had seen the new captive, a poor Irishman, who had been picked up by his highness the rover admiral, as he was stealing homewards from some place in Portugal, with a small vessel laden with cork, and with a crew of only three men besides himself. This had been his first foreign voyage, and he could not exchange a single word with his captors; he was, therefore, totally unable to comprehend his situation. He knew nothing about either pirates or piracy, and could not for the life of him conceive why his little bark had been fired at, and crammed with a party of outlandish-looking people, and taken off to some place that he had never before even heard of. The governor had sent for my husband to examine this new arrival, with a view to ascertaining what the nature of the booty was. When he found that there was nothing better than cork to be had, the prisoner was ordered to betake himself also to the Jew consul's until the emperor's pleasure was known concerning him. He had accordingly returned with my husband, and here he was, crying like a child; it was quite impossible to comfort the poor fellow, his Irish spirit was entirely gone. He would neither eat, drink, nor sleep; for days he consumed his time in weeping and bemoaning his wretchedness. We were truly grieved for him; but we dared not trust him with the slightest hint regarding our own hopes, from the fear that, inadvertently, and in the simplicity of his heart, he would have done something to betray us. We were, therefore, constrained to keep our own counsel, and confine the expression of our commiseration to such little acts of kindness as we could show in a general way.

Three or four days after the Irishman's arrival, a band of soldiers again came for my husband. This time they were accompanied by an officer of the governor's household—a sort of marshal-man—who was never sent out excepting when it was intended to show honour to somebody. Upon this occasion, the honour took the form of a polite invitation to breakfast. I did not altogether like this distinction, and I was truly miserable until I saw the guest back again, with his head safe upon his shoulders; for I knew his fearlessness and habitual boldness of speech, and had no doubt that he would drop some severe remark, if he found the opportunity, upon the treachery that made an old treaty an excuse for carrying on a systematic course of piracy and plunder. Since the advent of the Irish prisoner, he had been constantly on the point of explosion. He returned to me in four hours, and safe; his reception had been a distinguished and a courteous one. He had breakfasted from a service of English china, that had no doubt been borrowed from some unfortunate ship. The fare was white bread, rich preserves, and excellent coffee. The host had hospitably tasted of the contents of every dish and every plate before they were offered to his guest. After breakfast, the cause of all this considerate attention came out: the old governor wanted something. He was building a large galley, which had been already two years on the stocks, and was anxious that her construction should be as perfect as possible. He had, therefore, ventured to ask the favour that the English captain would go with him to see the work, and oblige him with any hints or advice that might occur.

The English captain did not of course refuse to go, so governor, marshal-man, and Englishman again traversed the streets; but this time they needed no escort—the venerable pilgrim was more than a host in his own person; and my husband was not only protected by his presence upon this occasion, but he derived an ulterior advantage from it. By sunset, it was known throughout Salee that the husband of the Christian woman had eaten and drunk and had walked with the man of green turban sanctity—that he had been treated as a brother by the descendant of kings, and from that time forward no insult was ever offered to him. On the following day, he traversed the streets of the town alone, and almost without notice. He had abundant cause to be glad that he had not refused the invitation, or declined to render the service that was required of him.

Soon after the day that was marked by this honour conferred upon my husband, Samuel Bendenhen came to tell us that the town would be full of gaiety now, for a courier had brought the news that the King of Fez was on his way to Salee, to hold a sort of assize; he always came for this purpose three times in the year. There were now seventy prisoners awaiting his nod. Bendenhen did not think his visit would concern us in any way, as the fate of European prisoners was always referred to the Emperor of Morocco himself. I took the opportunity this conversation afforded me to glean some little information concerning the Jews of Algiers. Bendenhen told me that this oppressed race is forced to perform the most degrading work; they are also compelled to execute judgment upon criminals, sometimes by torturing and maiming them, sometimes by taking their lives. When the punishment of death is to be inflicted, the execution follows immediately upon condemnation. The convicts are hurried away to the summits of the rocks, and there Jews are made to strike off their heads with scimitars; the headless trunks are hurled into the foaming surge beneath, and the heads themselves are salted, and set up at the corners of streets. Too often Jews are culprits as well as executioners, for, as their property comes to the state upon their decease, it is an easy thing for an Israelite to commit the crime of being too rich. The visit of the King of Fez to Salee is always a time of sadness and mourning in Jew-town.

There are, however, two sides to the picture as regards the Jews of Algiers. It chances that they are in the minority; but I suspect, if it were otherwise, they would be as ready to oppress as they now are to suffer degradation and injury. A dignified young man, a rabbi from Jew-town, came in one evening expressly to visit us. He seemed to have more than a small share of cultivation and intelligence. I was introduced to him by Miriam, and he looked at me thoughtfully for some time. He then turned to the wall, and traced with his fingers the figure of the crucifix; looked at me again and smiled, and then spat at the figure he had drawn. Next, he made the figure of the cross in his right hand, and spat at that. He then turned on his heel, and stalked away. I felt at the time that he had struck deeper and more maliciously than the Mahometans: they had used sticks and stones, but he had selected a weapon that he knew would inflict keener suffering. And the sacerdotal garb and air of elevated intelligence which he wore, told too plainly that he had not the same ground for excuse with the barbarians when he perpetrated this refined and deliberate insult upon a woman's feelings.

One of my solitary pleasures in Salee consisted in walking on the flat house-top, after the gates of the court-yard were closed at sunset. From this elevation I was able to see our deserted ship riding at anchor, and to indulge uninterruptedly in the hope that some day news would come from Tangier to restore us to her, for the fresh sea-breeze and Una were the only visitants I had upon these occasions. The lady consul did not take to the house-tops, and men were forbidden to appear there. The Jew once incurred a heavy fine, in consequence of the wilful Judah having been caught peeping over into the street. Una was my frequent companion, and used to chant short Hebrew verses to me, in rich, full tones, while I walked. One evening, while she was thus engaged, I was startled by hearing a sharp, discordant voice asking a question, as if in surprise. Una stopped her music, and answered, in a tone of evident displeasure. I turned, and saw a strange figure that had approached us unobserved from a neighbouring house-top. A tall, robust female was before me, with naked copper-coloured limbs, cast in so unfeminine a mould, that if I had not been aware of the fact that the summits of the houses are set apart for female use, I should have imagined it to be some powerful gladiator, who was thus unceremoniously intruding himself upon us. The swarthy figure had no other covering than a small fold of linen wrapped round the loins; three stripes of deep blue colour stained into the skin descended from the lower lip along the throat and chest, and indicated that she belonged to the caste of the Mamelukes. Shells, small bones, and pieces of tin were suspended round the neck, and from the nose and ears, by way of ornament. This singular apparition came close to me, gazing earnestly upon me, and then walked round and round me. I tried to think the lady must be as harmless as I was myself, but there was something in her wild gaze I could not brook. I felt convinced if I stayed much longer I should be hurled from the house-top to the court below. Preferring a voluntary to a forced descent, I therefore made the best of my way to the stairs, nodding and smiling conciliatorily to the blue stripes as I went. Whenever, henceforth, I sought the refreshment of the evening air, I was sure to find this unwelcome visitant, with her threatening eyes, at the end of the second turn of my limited march. I was, therefore, obliged to give up the pleasure, and a heavy privation it was for me. I tried to find out what the Mameluke had said to make Una angry, at her first appearance; but Una always steadfastly refused to let this transpire. I was thus effectually confined to the rooms of the dirty, hot, unventilated house.

The consul's wife never went abroad. During the six years of her wedded life, she had not passed the outer gate. Most of the Salce women visit the burial-grounds on Fridays, and spend their time in weeding the graves, planting flowers, gossiping, and dram-drinking, but Miriam did not participate in these amusements; her only exercise consisted in occasionally calling her household together, and sitting down to a boisterous romping game, something resembling "hunt the slipper." She was engaged in this recreation when the rabbi came from Jew-town to visit us. The Fridays were, however, always busy days in the consular establishment; great preparations were then made for the observances of the Sabbath. The standing dishes of oily soup, garlic, and vegetables had to be prepared beforehand, that they might be eaten cold. We were allowed to have hot coffee, but had always to kindle the fire and prepare it for ourselves. There seemed so much of conscientious scruple in the demeanour of our host in other things, that I could not but feel deeply grateful to him for this act of toleration. The day of the Sabbath was passed in listless indolence, without any religious exercise or external form of worship until after sunset. When the first star of evening appeared, the master of the house read aloud some of the Psalms of David in Hebrew; he and his wife then anointed their foreheads and the palms of their hands with oil, and so the affair was ended.*

A DAY IN A FRENCH CRIMINAL COURT.

BY MISS PARDOE.

As I chanced, in the autumn of last year, to be residing in a town in the north of France during the assizes, I became a regular reader of the Gazette des Tribunaux, in the hope of comprehending, thanks to this professional study, the daily and hourly reports which were made to me of the proceedings of the melancholy tribunal which had, by the influx of visitors that it occasioned, rendered the ordinarily quiet streets of our grey old city a scene of movement and bustle wholly foreign to their usual aspect. My purpose, however, singularly failed. With my thoroughly English notions of a court of justice, and the solemnity of a trial on whose result frequently hinged the whole future welfare, and even the life, of a fellow-creature, I was unable to recognise as feasible the piquant anecdotes and startling discrepancies which afforded subject of conversation at our tea-table; while the broad and bold columns of the official journal afforded me no efficient assistance; for, even these—although in point of fact I found the crime, the accusation, the defence, and the sentence, all duly recorded—to the more unprofessional reader formed by no means the most salient or engrossing portions of the report, wherein the compiler—like certain reviewers, who, in order to manufacture a "taking" article for their own pages, are accustomed to pass over unnoticed the more important and solid portions of a work, and to fasten upon its entertaining passages, in order to lighten at once their own labours and those of their subscribers—the compiler (as I was about to say, when I indulged in the above interminable parenthesis) had apparently occupied himself rather in weaving a species of legal romance, than in simply stating the broad facts composing the framework of the moral tragedy upon which he was engaged. To me it appeared strange, even with all the love of dramatic effect natural to our Gallian neighbours, that they should be enabled to deduce a social novel from every trial of any importance which came before their courts; and so greatly did this wonder increase upon me, that, after considerable hesitation, I resolved to judge for myself in how far these extraordinary reports were worthy of credence. To do this effectually, it was of course necessary to witness the passage of some great criminal through the awful ordeal of human justice—to brace my nerves, and to resolve to watch, with all the philosophy I could command, the fearful wrestling of foul guilt or outraged innocence with the stupendous power of legal talent and of legal ingenuity. No petty crime could enable me to do this; for in France, as I was well aware, trials for minor offences are conducted with a haste and brevity proportioned to their insignificance; and I accordingly awaited with considerable trepidation the announcement of one of those more fearful accusations which involve the penalty of death. Unhappily, this was not long in coming; and I was, ere the close of the session, informed that a young peasant woman, from an adjoining hamlet, was about to take her trial for the two-fold crime of murder and arson; and at the same time assured that no doubt whatever, from the evidence of the procès-verbal, (or preliminary examination,) existed of her guilt; while, at the same time, it was a great relief to me to ascertain that her intended victim still survived.

The approaches of the Palais de Justice were almost choked by the anxious multitude who were struggling to effect an entrance, as, led by a professional friend, I made my way by a private staircase to the seat which had been reserved for me. The aspect of the court was solemn and imposing. Immediately before me was a dais, raised two steps above the floor of hall, in the centre of which, behind a long table covered with black serge, stood the chairs of the President (or judge) and his two assistants, over whose heads extended, from the lofty roof to the summit of their seats, a colossal painting of our Saviour upon the cross. On the left hand, an enclosed space was appropriated to the Procureur-Général de la République (or attorney-general), beyond which stretched, to the extremity of the platform, the jury-box. On the right hand, a second enclosure (or loge) formed the place allotted for the greffier (or registrar), while a tier of seats, corresponding with those occupied by the jury were destined to accommodate the counsel for the defence; and, in cases of political delinquency, the accused themselves, and their friends. These seats bear the name of Benches of the Accused; but behind them rises a third, beside which opens a small door, and which is distinguished by the frightful appellation of the Bench of Infamy. In minor trials, this elevated seat is occupied only by two gendarmes, who, after having escorted their prisoners to the entrance of the court, and delivered them into the keeping of the proper officers, afterwards introduce themselves by the small door already alluded to; but, in all cases involving life or the galleys, they seat themselves on either side the culprit, over whose every movement they keep a scrupulous watch.

To complete the picture, it is only necessary to add, that in the centre of the platform, facing the president, and consequently with its back to the audience, was placed a large arm-chair, raised one step from the floor, and appropriated to the witnesses; while four ranges of enclosed benches formed the reserved seats, and shut in the dais, being themselves separated from the main body of the court by a stout wooden partition, breast-high, behind which all ingress is free, and is accomplished through a separate door.

At the appointed hour, a bell rang, and the officers of the court entered and took their seats. The President wore a black cloak, lined and edged with scarlet, and a high cap of black cloth, with a scarlet sash about his waist. The Procureur de la République was also robed in black, edged with white fur, with a blue sash, and two rows of broad silver lace upon his cap; while the counsel for the prisoner—a young and eloquent man, who had volunteered to undertake her defence—wore a gown of black silk, and differed little in his appearance from a student at one of our own universities.

After some examination of papers, and an exhibition of that by-play among the officials which appears to be the usual preliminary of all legal investigations, a second bell rang out. The twenty individuals composing the jury were called and sworn; and they had no sooner entered the box, than the President adjusted his spectacles, and fell back in his seat. The small door—that which has been the door of doom to so many trembling and justice-fearing criminals, and which is doubtless still fated to afford ingress to scores of others—opened as noiselessly as though it feared to drown the heart-throb of the wretched woman who stood upon its threshold, and, behind a stalwart gendarme, entered a female peasant with her head bowed upon her bosom, followed in her turn by a second armed guardian.

It is not my purpose to excite a false sympathy, by describing the prisoner as one of those fair beings whose personal beauty is adapted to disarm justice by captivating the pity of its ministers; but I may, nevertheless, be permitted to remark that her appearance was singularly prepossessing, and that it was easy to decide at the first glance, that, under other circumstances, she could not have failed to attract notice. She was young; and, although her features were now swollen from incessant weeping, and her complexion almost purple from emotion, the luxuriance of her pale brown hair, the long lashes by which her eyes were shaded, the extreme neatness of her dress, and the remarkable, although somewhat redundant, symmetry of her figure, could not be passed over without remark. As she dropped upon the bench, in obedience to the gesture of one of her guardians, her head fell heavily upon her bosom, and she covered her face with her handkerchief, which was already steeped with her tears.

There was a momentary hush throughout the crowded court, interrupted only by the rustling of papers, or the occasional heavy sob of the prisoner; and then the voice of the President broke coldly and harshly upon the silence.

"Accused, stand up."

He was obeyed; but still the burning cheeks were hidden by the friendly handkerchief.

"Remove your hand from your face—hold up your head—and answer me."

The hand was withdrawn—the head raised, but only for a moment—and then the interrogatory was resumed.

"What is your name?"

"Rosalie Marie ——"

"Your age?"

"Twenty-four years."

"Your calling?"

"Wife of Baptiste ——, a farmer; I assisted him in his farm."

"An able assistant!" remarked the Procureur sarcastically to the President, who replied by a quiet smile.

"Are you aware of the crime of which you are accused?"

The answer was a violent passion of tears.

"Sit down!"—said the cold voice. "Greffier, read the accusation."

This formidable document, based on the procès-verbal drawn up on the spot by the mayor of the village, amid the dying embers of the fire, set forth that Rosalie, having been hired as a general servant by the proprietors of a small farm, the joint property of an aged man and his sister, had engaged the affections of her master's son, who, finding that he could not induce her to return his passion upon easier terms, had ultimately married her, to the extreme annoyance of his family, and especially of his maiden aunt, whose pride was wounded by what she considered as a degrading union. At the period of the fire, Rosalie was the mother of a child of four years old, and was looking forward to the birth of a second; but discomfort and dissension had already supervened between the young couple. The father of Baptiste, indeed, had become reconciled to his daughter-in-law; but such was far from being the case with his sister, who lost no opportunity of exciting the anger of her nephew against his wife, whenever the latter failed to obey her behests; while, as it was proved by several witnesses, Rosalie became at length so much irritated by the ceaseless severity of which she was the object, and so indignant at the taunts uttered against her previous poverty, that she had been more than once heard to declare that she wished the farm burnt to the ground, and her husband reduced to the rank of a common labourer; and that she would gladly fire it herself, in order to be delivered from the life of wretchedness to which she was then condemned. More than one witness, stated the accusation, would swear to this fact, which at once pointed suspicion towards the prisoner; when, several months previous to the present trial, on a calm evening, between seven and eight o'clock, long after the farm-servants had quitted the premises, a fire broke out in a barn adjacent to the dwelling-house occupied by the family, which, after consuming the out-buildings and several stacks of unthrashed grain and beans, had been with difficulty extinguished by the energetic labour of the villagers.

Among other evidence tendered to the mayor during this examination was that of the maiden aunt, who, to her unqualified accusation of the prisoner as the sole author of the catastrophe, superadded the information that Rosalie had, only a week or two previously, attempted to murder her husband, by mixing a quantity of white powder in some soup, which had been kept warm for his supper upon the ashes of the hearth, and which had produced violent vomitings, after he had partaken of it about half an hour.

As the monotonous accents of the greffier fell upon her ear, the unhappy woman sat with her hands forcibly clasped together, and her flushed face and eager eyes turned steadily towards him; but he no sooner ceased reading, than she started convulsively from her seat, and, leaning forward eagerly towards the bench, exclaimed, "I am innocent, M. le President; I am innocent!"

"Peace!" thundered out the frowning official; and then, as the wretched prisoner sank back between her guards, and once more endeavoured to conceal herself, he extended his arm towards her, and, with outstretched finger, directed the attention of the court to the quailing form of the accused amid a silence so deep that it could almost be heard, and which he ultimately terminated by these extraordinary words:—"You see that woman, gentlemen of the jury, who has just so vehemently declared her innocence; and now I, in my turn, tell you that I entertain no doubt of her guilt; and that I, moreover, believe her to be capable of anything."

Be it remembered that this declaration on the part of the presiding officer of the court—of the man who sat beneath the awful effigy of a crucified Saviour—and to whom had been delegated the supreme duty of administering even-handed justice alike to the accused and to society, did not even await the evidence of the witnesses whose revelations were to decide a question of life and death—but that he volunteered this frightful assertion before any distinct proof of the guilt of the prisoner had been adduced; nor should the fact be overlooked that the jury, which was composed of small farmers and petty tradesmen, regarded with awe and reverence the solemn and stately personage who had arrived from the capital expressly to preside over the tribunal of their remote province, and that they were consequently prepared to consider his opinion as infallible.

I watched the countenances of those who were nearest to me, and I at once perceived that the cruel words of the President had not failed in their effect; nor was it, indeed, possible that such a declaration, pronounced, moreover, with an emphasis which appeared to insure the perfect conviction of the speaker, could do otherwise than impress every one who heard it; and it was amid the sensation produced by this startling incident that the first witness was called and sworn.

This witness was the aunt; and, if my preconceived notions of a criminal trial had already been shaken, I became still more bewildered and surprised as the proceedings progressed. Instead, as is the case in our own courts of law, of rejecting all merely hearsay evidence, the old woman was urged, alternately by the President and the Procureur, to detail all the reports consequent upon the fire; and to repeat what Jean-Mario So-and-so had said relatively to the prisoner to Dominique, or Joseph, or Jules; while the bitter volubility of the vindictive witness, whose occasional glances of hatred towards the accused sufficiently testified to the feeling by which she was actuated, ably seconded their efforts; and throughout a whole half-hour she poured forth, in the most guttural patois, a tide of village gossip and scandal, all of which tended to cast suspicion upon the prisoner. Two leading facts were, however, elicited from her evidence, which threw considerable doubt upon her statements. The farm at which the fire had occurred was the joint property of her brother and herself; and she had been careful to insure her own portion of the estate against the very calamity which had taken place; nor had she failed, within twenty-four hours of the event, to claim the amount due to her, after having solemnly sworn that she believed the fire to have been purely accidental. She, moreover, admitted, that she had not accused the prisoner of the crime of arson until the money had been paid over to her; while the cross-questioning of the prisoner's counsel soon enabled him to prove that, subsequently to her having done so, on being informed that should her step-niece be found guilty of arson, she would be called upon to refund the insurance money, she had endeavoured to recal her accusation, and to persuade her neighbours that they had misunderstood her meaning. It was, however, too late; her extreme loquacity had rung an alarm throughout the village—the ignorant are always greedy of the marvellous—and her disclaimers were universally disregarded. All the inhabitants of the hamlet at once decided that Rosalie was the incendiary; and, with a pertinacity which almost drove the aunt to desperation, quoted her own declarations as evidence of the fact. Thus taken in her own toils, the heartless old woman, instead of acknowledging that she had no authority for the rumours which she had spread, but had been instigated to this act of cruel injustice by her hatred and jealousy of her step-niece, vehemently declared that, since such was the case, if she were compelled to refund the money, she would at least have the life of the prisoner as some compensation for the loss.

When accused by the counsel of having made use of this threat, her denial was faint and sullen, and finally terminated by the fiendish remark, that, if she had ever said so, she was prepared to abide by it; that she maintained the guilt of the prisoner; and that they should do better, even if they lost the money, so that they were rid of her nephew's wife along with it.

As these malignant words passed her lips a low murmur filled the court, and the President ordered her to stand down. Half-a-dozen other witnesses were then successively called on the same side, and in every case were asked whether they were relatives, friends, or lovers of the prisoner? to which question two sturdy young peasants answered bitterly, "No, thank God!" and in both instances it was elicited by her counsel that they were discarded suitors, who had, since her marriage, caused frequent misunderstandings between herself and her husband.

Still, hour after hour, the tide of words flowed on, and no one proof of guilt had been brought against the prisoner. At intervals, some leading question, well calculated to cause her to criminate herself, was abruptly put by the President, and at each denial she was desired to remember that she had confessed as much during her previous examination; but, agitated as she was, she still retained sufficient self-possession to refute the assertion, declaring that she never could have accused herself of a crime of which she was innocent.

As the next name was called, and one of the ushers of the court was about to introduce a new witness, a faint scream burst from the lips of the prisoner, which was succeeded by a violent fit of weeping; and I grew sick at heart, lest she was at last to find herself in contact with an accuser whose charge she could not refute. A slight confusion at the extremity of the hall, a low murmur, and the dragging of heavy steps along the floor, at that moment diverted my attention from the wretched woman; and I saw, slowly approaching the witness chair, an infirm and aged man, supported by two of the subordinate officers of the court. As he was led forward, he looked helplessly from side to side, as if bewildered by the novelty of the scene about him; and, after having been assisted up the steps of the dais, he dropped into the chair to which he was conducted, nor did he attempt to rise when told by the President to stand up while he took the customary oath.

"Stand up," repeated the usher; but the old man continued motionless.

"He can't hear," shouted the harsh voice of his sister from the extremity of the court; "he's been deaf this many a year; you must shout into his ear." The usher acted upon this suggestion; but the poor old man only shook his grey head, and laughed.

"Does he know why he is here?" asked the President impatiently.

"Not he," replied the same voluntary spokeswoman; "we didn't tell him, or he wouldn't have come."

"Can he be made to understand the nature of an oath?"

"May-be yes, may-be no; he's childish like; but you can try him."

"This is trifling with the court!" exclaimed the President angrily; "and cruel to this poor old man. Who is he?"

"Her husband's father, my brother; the father-in-law that she tried to burn out," responded the woman.

"Silence!" shouted the President. "Usher, remove this man from the court, and see that he is taken care of until he can be conveyed to his home."

He was obeyed; the old man was with difficulty induced to leave his seat, and many a tear followed him as he disappeared. It was a most painful spectacle, nor was it the only one which we were destined to witness; for, before the examination was resumed, an individual approached the bench, and whispered a few words to the President, who, with an irritated gesture, impatiently replied, "Well, if it must be so; but we are losing time."

The messenger made a sign, and he had no sooner done so than a woman appeared at a side door, carrying an infant in her arms, with which she approached the prisoner, who eagerly leant forward to receive it. The child sprang, with a joyful cry of recognition, into the embrace of its wretched mother, who for a moment strained it convulsively to her bosom; but when she endeavoured to give it the nourishment which it required, the infant flung itself violently back, terrified by the feverish contact, and could not be induced again to approach her. Never shall I forget the agony depicted upon the countenance of the unhappy prisoner: her tears seemed to have been suddenly dried up; and, rising from her seat, she gave back the struggling infant into the arms of its nurse, without a word. Had she been the veriest criminal on earth, she was an object of intense pity at that moment!

The proceedings were once more resumed. Other witnesses for the prosecution followed, but the evidence was still vague and inconclusive; and at length the Procureur rose to address the court. His speech was eloquent and emphatic; but, although he cleverly availed himself of every opportunity of bringing the guilt of both charges home to the prisoner, he was rather startling than convincing in his arguments. He repeatedly called upon her to deny the truth of his conclusions, but he gave her no opportunity of doing so; he hurled at her the most bitter invectives, applied to her the most opprobrious epithets, and defied her to summon a single witness to prove her innocence, or to save her from an ignominious death; and, finally, he reproached her with her ingratitude to a family by whose generosity she had been raised from poverty to comfort; reminded her of the disgrace which she had brought, not only upon the wretched old man of eighty-six years of age, who had been made through her means a public spectacle, but also upon the helpless children to whom she had given birth, and especially upon the innocent and ill-fated infant who had first seen the light through the iron bars of a prison.

It was a frightful piece of elocution; never for an instant did he appear to remember that the wretched prisoner might yet, despite appearances, have been wrongfully accused, and have been a victim rather than a criminal. There was no leaning to the side of mercy, no relenting, no gleam of light thrown upon the darkness of the picture; and it was evident that the miserable woman felt she was lost long before his terrible words ceased to vibrate in her ears. For a time she had sat motionless, gazing upon him with a wild stare of affrighted wonder; but as he rapidly heaped circumstance upon circumstance, recapitulated the gossip of the villagers, and deduced from the most apparently unimportant facts the most condemnatory conclusions, she gradually sank lower and lower upon her seat, until she appeared no longer able to sustain herself; and, when a deep and thrilling silence succeeded to the speech of the public accuser, her choking sobs were distinctly audible.

The Procureur was right: the witnesses for the defence were unable to prove her innocence of the crime imputed to her; but they one and all bore evidence to the irreproachability of her character; to her piety, her industry, her neighbourly helpfulness, and her charity, both of word and deed. They showed, moreover, that she had borne with patience and submission the tyranny of her husband's aunt, the violence of that husband himself, and that she had been to her father-in-law a devoted and affectionate daughter.

"But," said the Procureur to one of her panegyrists, "if the accused were indeed the admirable person whom you describe, how do you account for her having made so many enemies, and for the general belief in her guilt prevalent throughout the village?"

"Ha, monsieur!" replied the brave young peasant, as he turned a hasty and sympathizing glance towards the prisoner; "hate grows faster than love, and lasts longer. Before the neighbours dreamt of Rosalie's good luck—or, rather, bad luck, as it has since turned out, poor woman!—there was many a lad in the village that hoped to make her his wife; but she listened to none of them, and they can't forgive her for having married above them."

"And you, not having been of the number, can afford to say a good word for her. Is that what we are to understand?" asked the Procureur, sarcastically.

"No, monsieur," was the sturdy reply; "but I loved her too well to bear malice."

A gleam of light at last! But, alas! too faint to penetrate the gloom of her prison cell.

"Stand down," said the President; and the heroic young man obeyed. And this was heroism; for he had boldly avowed his affection for one who had appeared to be abandoned by every other human being—her adopted father had abandoned her in the unconsciousness of second childhood—her infant, in the terror of helplessness—her friends, from the dread of shame—she stood alone, until that humble but upright man braved the world's withering scorn, and dared the contemptuous laughter of his fellows to silence one throb of her bursting heart.

The last witness had been heard, and the counsel rose for the defence. No doubt felt that he had undertaken not only a difficult, but an onerous task, for at the commencement of his speech he was visibly agitated: he perpetually repeated himself; and, instead of plunging boldly into the heart of his subject, and at once grappling with the charges brought against his client, he dwelt upon her youth, on the agony of mind and body which she had undergone for so many months, and on the misery which she must have endured when she gave birth to her last infant in disgrace and tears. Suddenly, however, he rallied; and declared, with an energy as startling as it was unexpected, that, although the sufferings which he had enumerated were of themselves almost a sufficient punishment for the crimes of which she was accused, he had no intention of asking an acquittal upon such grounds.

"No, gentlemen of the jury," he exclaimed, vehemently, "we seek no such subterfuge—we desire no impunity which does not restore our honour. We have already endured enough, more than enough; we care not to remain a mark for the finger of scorn and of suspicion; we must leave this court not only free, but justified. I maintain, gentlemen of the jury, that we have a right to demand this; and I have no fear but that you will feel as I do. What has been proved against the accused? I will tell you in a few words. It has been proved that she was pretty and good—so pretty and so good, that half the young peasants of the village sought to win her affections; that she was industrious, obliging, and modest; and that so pre-eminently, that, although poor and humble, the daughter of a daily labourer, and a menial in the family of a richer neighbour, she was chosen by the son of her master for a wife. I will even recal to your minds the fact that he would have won her more lightly, and that it was only when he became convinced of the uselessness of his illicit addresses, that he came forward loyally and generously to offer her his hand—for this circumstance tends to prove her worth—aye, and that hand was given despite the reproaches and opposition of his relatives, who, in their ignorance of the just value of qualities like hers, believed their kinsman, the heir of a few acres of land and a few thousands of hoarded francs, to be degrading himself by such an alliance. You have heard that the marriage was an unhappy one, and it has been inferred that my client was the cause of this unhappiness; but I will merely ask you to reflect upon what you have seen and heard this day, ere you credit the assertion. The prisoner is accused of having attempted the life of her husband by poison. Where was the husband—the intended victim—when his would-be murderess was arraigned for the offence? Where was he? I will tell you, gentlemen: so securely hidden away, that even the emissaries of his vindictive aunt could not trace him out, and drag him hither to appear against a traduced and injured wife. What was the poison? You must allow me to fall back upon the evidence, and to add to it a most material fact. The accusation sets forth that Rosalie, assisted by her aunt, prepared a pan of cabbage-soup for the dinner and supper of the family, and that of this soup they all partook at noon; it was then set aside till evening, when it was once more placed upon the fire; and at five o'clock, Baptiste being still absent at the wine-shop, the prisoner and her female relative again ate of the soup; and, the embers of the fire being still warm, the pan was carefully surrounded by hot ashes, to await his return. More than once the lid of the pan was raised to stir the contents, lest they should adhere to the bottom of the vessel; and this precaution was taken by the aunt herself, who never moved from the chimney-corner from the termination of her own supper to the return of her nephew, who, according to his usual habit, was far from sober, and who, after partaking of the soup, was attacked by violent sickness. On the following morning, the aunt—you have seen and heard her, gentlemen, and can consequently appreciate her character—showed the dregs of the soup, upon which there floated a species of white flaky film, with infinite mystery, to half-a-dozen chosen friends; after which, she herself flung out the residue of the soup beside the door of the house, where pigs and poultry could alike devour it, and where it doubtlessly was devoured, without any detriment to either from the ashes, which, in the action of stirring the contents, she had herself, beyond all doubt, introduced into the mixture. Why, if she indeed suspected poison, did she cleanse the vessel with her own hands? Why did she, whose god was mammon, incur the risk of poisoning the animals who might partake of it? Great stress was laid upon the fact of the vomiting by which her nephew was attacked after having eaten of this soup; but we have shown that he was a man of intemperate habits, who was subject to this malady; and our wonder should rather be excited by the fact, that he could, while full of wine, have swallowed a mess of this description, than that it should have produced, under the circumstances, the effect ascribed to it.

"Gentlemen of the jury, before God and society, is Rosalie — guilty of having attempted, in that soup, to poison her husband? We calmly await your decision. We now come to the second charge. On a certain evening the firm of Baptiste's father and aunt is fired; the two women are seated in the common room, or house, as the witnesses have universally described it, meaning thereby the single apartment not used as a sleeping-chamber; this room looks upon the farm-yard; the prisoner is near the window, occupied in repairing her husband's linen; the aunt, according to her habit, is dozing near the fire. Rosalie leaves the room for a few minutes, and shortly after her return remarks that she hears an extraordinary noise upon the premises; upon which she is told that she is a fool, and always full of absurd fancies; but, notwithstanding this rebuff, she again exclaims that she is sure something must be wrong, and that she smells an odour of burnt straw. The words are scarcely uttered, when a body of flame bursts from an adjacent barn; upon which the accused, uttering a loud scream, rushes to the bedside of her sleeping child, hurriedly wraps it in a blanket, and leaves the house at all speed.

"Was this extraordinary? Was this unnatural? Was this a proof of guilt? M. le Procureur has decided in the affirmative; but I boldly demur to his conclusion. The first impulse of the mother was to save her infant; and in this instance it must have been doubly powerful, since, disappointed in all her other affections, the child of her bosom was all in all to her. You have been told that she lent no assistance in extinguishing the fire; and, personally, I admit that she did not do so. It has been asserted, upon oath, that no one knew where she was hidden until the flames were extinguished; and yet it has been proved that, on leaving her home, she made her way, with her precious burden, to the cottage of her aged and widowed father, who hurried, at her entreaty, to the farm, while she remained alone in his hovel to watch over her infant. We would have produced that father to swear to the fact, gentlemen of the jury, but he has been summoned to a higher tribunal than ours; he was poor, but he was not too poor to feel—humble, but not too humble to be beyond the reach of shame;—and the birth of his last grandchild in a prison—I cannot, I dare not dwell upon this subject, gentlemen of the jury—I am warned by the suffocating sobs behind me that my zeal is degenerating into cruelty; suffice it, then, that the unhappy old man is dead, and that thus one important witness has been lost to us.

"M. le Procureur expatiated largely also upon the expressions of bitter hopelessness, which were from time to time forced from the wrung heart of my unhappy client. She 'wished that the farm were burnt to the ground, and her husband reduced to the rank of a common labourer;' and even declared, while smarting under the tyranny of her near relatives, that 'she would gladly fire it herself, to be relieved from the life of wretchedness to which she was condemned.' I am not about to justify these expressions; I am ready to admit that they were alike unguarded and unseemly; but, gentlemen of the jury, remember the provocation! Is there one of us who has never rashly uttered a word that he would gladly recal? Do we, men of education, of station, and eager for the applause of the world, do we always measure our sentences, and weigh our phrases in a moment of passion? Do not let us lie to our own souls.

"Gentlemen of the jury, I have done. What the prosecution could not prove we cannot disprove; but we can appeal to our God—we can appeal to the judgment of all honest men—and we can appeal to your decision. This we do boldly; this we do fearlessly; we are in your hands, and we are safe. You will restore a wife to her husband—a mother to her children—an outcast to her home. You will do this, for you have sworn to defend the right; and that right can only be maintained by our acquittal."

A low murmur of applause, which was, however, instantly checked, was heard throughout the court; and silence was no sooner restored, than the Procureur once more rose. He dissected with great forensic eloquence the address of the counsel, and alluded with keen and even indelicate sarcasm to the youth and good-looks of the prisoner, which had, as he asserted, stood her in stead of innocence. He commented upon the want of experience of her advocate, who had, as he declared, sacrificed his judgment to his enthusiasm; and where he should have convinced, had only dazzled his hearers. He even appealed to the prisoner herself whether, had an acquittal been possible, she could have desired it, when, as she must be well aware, it could but entail upon her an existence of obloquy and suspicion; and, finally, he called upon the jury to deliver society from a woman, whose after career, should she leave that court absolved, might be readily prophesied from its antecedents.

I confess that as I eagerly watched the countenances of the jury, I entertained little hope for the wretched woman, who sat with clasped hands and bent head utterly motionless, as though she also were counting the brief moments of her forfeited existence; until, as the jury were preparing to retire, one of her guards laid his hand upon her shoulder, and whispered a few words in her ear, upon which she passively rose, and disappeared with the two gendarmes through the narrow door by which she had entered. Thence, as I was informed, she was conducted to a cell, where alone and in darkness, all prisoners await the verdict about to be pronounced upon them; a fearful ordeal to those upon whose guilt or innocence the arbiters of their fate were tardy in deciding.

And while she was thus abandoned to all the agonies of suspense, the court itself became a scene of bustle and excitement. The President, the Procureur, and half a dozen of their friends, had retired to the apartments of the former to partake of refreshments; and they had no sooner withdrawn, than a group of some twenty or thirty privileged individuals gathered together on the platform, some of whom were busied in devouring bon-bons, and exchanging jokes which elicited hearty, although suppressed laughter; while others drew the daily papers from their pockets, and were soon absorbed in politics, totally forgetful of the wretched woman whose fate was even then under discussion in the jury-room.

To myself this appeared the most painful feature of the trial; the careless mirth and heartless indifference to the agonies of a fellow-creature, so recklessly exhibited at such a moment, revolted me; but, happily, the suffering was brief. Ten minutes only had elapsed when the bell once more sounded, every one resumed his seat, and the officials returned to their places, closely followed by the jury. When order had been restored, the President, in a tone of more solemnity than he had hitherto used, asked the supreme question:

"Gentlemen of the jury, is the prisoner guilty, or not guilty?"

The jury rose, and the foreman steadily replied,

"NOT GUILTY, M. le Président."

The effect of the verdict was electrical. It appeared as though, like myself, nine-tenths of the auditory had believed that there existed no hope for the accused; and while a joyous whisper arose on all sides, I remarked that the Procureur, who had so earnestly striven to secure the condemnation of the prisoner, turned a congratulatory smile upon her advocate, whose anxiety had rendered him as pale as marble; but this circumstance was soon forgotten in what followed.

"Gentlemen of the jury," said the President, "it is my duty to compliment you upon your verdict; you have ably and honourably fulfilled the trust reposed in you. There can be no doubt, in any honest mind, that you have come to a true and just decision. At the commencement of my legal career, when I was yet a mere youth, the interests of my employer compelled me to reside, during several weeks, in the hamlet of which the accused was a native. I have never forgotten—I never shall forget—what I witnessed in that obscure village. It is enough for me to assure you that throughout the whole of my after-experience, I was never forced into contact with so utterly worthless a set of individuals; jealousy, slander, and falsehood were the elements upon which they appeared to exist; and it was more than sufficient that the accused, whose reputation you have restored by a most righteous verdict, was pure and modest; and that by the united charms of her person and her character, she had raised herself from a low station to one of comparative affluence, for every mouth to be opened against her. Gentlemen of the jury, once more I say, that I congratulate you; and that I believe the accused to be as innocent of the crimes imputed to her as either you or I."

I could scarcely trust my senses as I listened, and remembered that this very man, only a few hours previously, had branded the prisoner as a wretch so sunk in vice as to be "capable of anything;" but I could detect no similar surprise on any countenance about me. It did not appear to strike his listeners that he had, at the commencement of the trial, cruelly exceeded his privilege, and even forsworn his own conscience. There was no murmur of indignation, no evidence of disgust; but, on the contrary, an approving smile beamed on him from every side, as if in recompense of his tardy frankness.

I was still lost in wonder, when his voice again sounded through the hall—

"Bring in the prisoner."

In another moment she once more occupied her frightful station; and then the greffier announced to her, in the same monotonous tone as that in which he had read her accusation, the verdict by which she stood acquitted.

In an instant the purple flush faded from her cheeks, and she became as white as a corpse. She swept her hands across her forehead, gave one long stare about her, and then, with a shriek which rang through the court rather like the cry of a wild animal than the utterance of human lips, she made a spring towards the door, nearly oversetting the gendarmes by whom it was guarded, and disappeared.

All was over. The officials collected their papers; the counsel threw off their gowns; the crowd dispersed; and I regained my home, fervently thanking God that it was not thus that justice was administered in my own happy country.

THE PLANT AND THE ANIMAL.

BY PROFESSOR R. HUNT.

THE beauty—the infinite variety—of the vegetable world has ever been a theme for the poet's song. To man, even in his present advanced state of intelligence, a plant is surrounded with many mysteries; and the contemplative mind sees a shadow of Divinity in the strange vitality of each green leaf. How much more mysterious must these wondrous organisms have appeared, when the lights of science burned dimly on the earth, or were obscured by the thick veil of superstitious ignorance.

The psychological influences of plants and flowers are continually figured forth in writings sacred and profane: the earliest poetry, as the latest song, bears evidence of the effects produced by them upon the human mind. The olive-branch of the Noachian dove has ever been the emblem of peace; and since Job wrote "he cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down," the transitory beauties of vegetable life have been regarded as emblems of the instability of human existence. To pass over those oriental philosophies, which invested all nature with a pantheistic spirit, and the lotus worship of the Egyptian priests, we find, in the poetic mythology of the Greeks, abundant evidence of the holy dreams kindled by the contemplation of the vegetable world. The sacred wreath of myrtle spoke to the human spirit of mortality; and the immortality of the soul was typified by the corn sown in the earth, by its revival in the green blade, and by its full ripeness in the golden harvest.

By the Greek, every tree was invested with a divinity—a spirit held possession of every grove; thus giving poetical expression to their dim consciousness of that vitality which a modern philosophy—with somewhat too much haste—refers to certain physical forces or powers. Again, in the wilder mythologies of the Scandinavian races, the creation of more northern and less luxuriant climes, we have a similar expression of the human dream, in the sylph which nestled amid the petals of the rose, or our own fairy, sporting in the shadows of the lovely fern.

Men, then, have ever felt the "sweet influences" of—

"Whatever earth, all-bearing mother, yields,
In India East or West, or middle shore,
In Pontus, or the Punic coast, or where Alcinoos reign'd."

And even now, when a material philosophy invades the realms of poetry, there linger around the vegetable creation unknown agencies—mysteries of life—which appear to radiate, like the painted glories of the holy saints; lights, redolent of that sanctity and love, which still linger over the earth as a type of the joys of the lost Eden.

A certain class of experimentalists—we were about to call them philosophers, which would have been a very incorrect appellation—have been lately endeavouring to refer the grander phenomena of animal life to electrical agency. They have, for example, constituted the brain a voltaic battery, and the nerves conducting wires; and according to the amount of certain chemical changes, is, they say, the quantity of electricity in action—which is true—and the quantity of vitality, vis vita, or life exerted, of which we know no more than did Hamlet the Dane. These savans rush to the conclusion that life and electricity are but modified forms of one physical force; because, during the operations of vitality, electrical phenomena are manifested. Applying their rule of materiality to the highest phenomena of life, they refer the vitality of plants as well as animals to electricity. Even the human senses are explained by certain rude analogies between their operations and those electro-chemical agencies which are developed in the voltaic battery. It would be out of place to explain all the sources of error; it is sufficient to say, that a false logic, based upon imperfect analogies, (reasoning by analogy being always dangerous,) has led to the substitution of the effect for the cause. Man, the monarch of the world, is charged, as a duty, with its subjugation; every created materiality he may examine; and even the physical agencies by which the constitution of the organic and the inorganic kingdoms is regulated he may employ as his ministering spirits. There is, however, a line drawn, beyond which he is forbidden to pass; and if, in his temerity, he oversteps the boundary, he is speedily involved in lamentable confusion and wreck.

Life is a condition of spirituality; and, although we discover heat, electricity, and chemical action manifested during its operations, depend upon it, neither of these physical powers are capable of conversion into any form of vitality. The Creator "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." Life, therefore, an emanation from the Eternal, is far removed beyond the most subtle materialities, and is infinitely superior in action and influences to any of those physical agencies which we can detect by the aids of our philosophy.

Having thus explained that, in our consideration of the phenomena of living organisms, we deal only with those agencies which may, in distinction to the spiritual agency, LIFE, be termed material, we turn first to the conditions of animal existence.

The animal fabric is made up of a certain amount of earthy matter which constitutes the solidifying portion of the bones, of muscle, blood, and fat, all of which are compounds, in varying proportions, of gases, familiar to us by the names oxygen, hydrogen, and nitrogen, with carbon—which is, be it remembered, only charcoal in a state of purity. If we take a portion of any animal body and expose it to heat, we, in the first place, dissipate a large quantity of water; and of course the weight of the mass is very considerably reduced. If the temperature is now increased, we shall find that every portion undergoes decomposition; and if the escaping gases are collected, they will be found to weigh exactly the amount lost in the process. Eventually, the temperature being sufficiently high, and supposing the experiment to have been made in a closed vessel, a mass of animal charcoal alone will be left behind, mixed with some earthy matter. Let us convert this into carbonic acid, by burning it in contact with air, and a little white ash will be the only residue. "A pinch of dust," says the poet, "alone remains of Cheops." The noblest human being subjected to this chemical analysis will be resolved into those few gaseous elements, and a few grains of earthy matter, consisting mainly of flint and of lime.

Careful examination proves that the animal draws his supply directly from the vegetable world; that, indeed, the vegetable and animal kingdoms are in mutual dependence on each other. Animal life is supported by carbonaceous and nitrogenous foods, which are prepared in the vast laboratory of the vegetable kingdom. The herbivora derive all their muscle and fat from the grass of the field upon which they feed; and on these the carnivora prey, requiring for the conditions of their existence that they receive the muscle and fat already formed. Was the vegetable world to perish, the vegetable-eating tribes must die; and, these ceasing to be, the flesh-eaters must inevitably perish. Nor is this all. Let us suppose the world to be possessed by animals only, and examine the conditions of such a state of creation. All the animal races are, during every moment of their lives, pouring forth into the atmosphere the products of that combustion to which the maintenance of animal heat is due. As from the fires of our furnaces and of our domestic hearths carbonic acid is constantly formed, and delivered to the air, from the charcoal combining with the oxygen it contains; so, in the processes of life, with every exhalation, each animal would add to the store of atmospheric carbon, which, in its combination with oxygen, forming carbonic acid, is of a deadly character. Thus, the earth's atmosphere would become so far deteriorated, that animal life would cease under the very influences it had created.

Animals and man, and all the processes by which man, with the subtle agency of fire, reduces nature to his bidding, constantly give rise to carbonic acid. On the lowest computation, the population of London alone must add to the atmosphere daily at least four million pounds of this gas. Consider, therefore, the enormous quantity of carbonic acid which all the inhabitants of this planet are hourly producing. The destructive nature of this air is shown by the almost immediate death of those who incautiously descend into deep wells or brewers' vats, in which accumulations of this compound of carbon and oxygen are commonly found. Therefore, were this allowed to accumulate in the air, it would render our atmosphere destructive to all animal life; we should die by a poison of our own production, as heaps of miserable slaves have died in the holds of the slave-ships, and as prisoners have perished when forced in numbers into close cells. It is certain, therefore, that some means must have been devised by nature for the purpose of removing, as readily as it is formed, this deleterious product of animal life. In a former article, it has been shown, that, by a provision, remarkable for its harmony and efficiency, this carbonic acid is rendered the necessary food for the vegetable kingdom; and that, under the influence of light, it is taken to supply that woody matter which we find in such enormous masses in the great forests of the tropics, and in large, though yet smaller proportions, in the trees and plants of the temperate and arctic regions. The entire subject is of such exceeding interest, that it appears necessary to guide our contemplations: some brief digression should be made to familiarise the mind with the conditions.

The animal and the vegetable kingdoms, it has been said, are mutually dependent upon each other; the former could not exist, if the latter were removed; and if the animal races were by some dire cataclysm swept away, the vegetable kingdom would speedily perish; one cannot exist without the other in some of the forms in which living organisms are developed. It has been thought by some, that, during the great geological epoch to which the formation of our coal deposits belongs, enormous forests of tree-ferns and similar plants waved in a tropical luxuriance over the areas now occupied with fossil fuel, there being an entire absence of animal life. It was the hypothesis of an eminent geologist, that these quick-growing plants were employed to remove carbonic acid from the air, and fit the earth's surface for the existence of animals. Unfortunately for the hypothesis, geological research has proved the existence of air-breathing animals during the carboniferous epoch; and the probability is, that, much further back in the scale of time, the world teemed with moving organisms. This bit of scientific romance has, however, been seized by the public mind, and some of our most popular writers have employed it to add to the interest of their compositions. We have now, however, the most satisfactory evidence, to prove the existence of animal life during every epoch when vegetation covered the face of the land.

The maintenance of animal heat, which is an essential element for the support of animal life, is due, almost entirely, to chemical action, and to chemical action exerted on the food taken into the stomach, to supply the waste of the system. As the temperature of the different zones of the earth's surface varies, so we discover some very remarkable changes in the habits of the inhabitants. Those races who inhabit the inter-tropical climes are largely fruit-eaters, the quantity of animal food made use of by them being exceedingly small. As we advance towards the temperate regions of the earth, we find the inhabitants eating more flesh; but still it is mainly the muscular or nitrogenous parts which are consumed. Let us advance to the colder regions of "the ice-bound north," and there we shall find man eating enormous quantities of fat as food, and using animal oil as a common drink. Most startling statements are in print of the gluttonous meals made by the Esquimaux and the Indians along the frozen shores of Northern Asia. Strange as these narrations appear to us, they are the natural consequences of the situation in which these men have been placed. Animal heat must be maintained; and where the atmosphere, from its extremely low temperature, is rapidly robbing the body of the heat it develops, the supply of highly-carbonized food—which stands in the relation of fuel—must of necessity suffer a corresponding increase. The food of man is regulated by a law from which he dare not deviate without suffering.

Man, and the lower animals, are constantly consuming azotized and carbonaceous matter; and water, a compound of hydrogen and oxygen, is their constant pabulum. The nitrogen of the former combines with the hydrogen of the water, to form ammonia; and the carbon of the latter, with its oxygen and that of the air, to form carbonic acid. These pass into the atmosphere, and are the most important principles upon which the vegetable world depends.

Man walks the earth, its monarch; all things material he may, by the power of his mighty mind, subdue to do him service. And yet we find him a mere dependency upon the vegetable world; and in return for the support of life, by the supply of the elements of nutrition which it gives him, man, the mighty, is made the machine for furnishing food for the tender leaves, which tremble to every passing breeze.

All natural phenomena progress in a circle, and each division of nature is dependent upon one another. We have not yet discovered all the links of the chain; but, depend upon it, no one in the band by which the creation is bounded is wanting.

The cedars of Lebanon, which waved above the head of Solomon, have grown, and added to their bulk, by absorbing the carbonic acid formed by the men who aided that mighty king to build his temple to the Lord, and those who, generation after generation, have mouldered to dust, even to those now living and breathing, in performance of the destined ends. The palms of the tropics—the glorious flowers of far southern lands—the fruits of Asia and America—the humbler, but no less beautiful, European trees and flowers—the herb of the valley, and the weed upon the wall—are all of them the result of animal life. They have fixed, for a season, the elements produced in the animal economy, at the same time as they aid in supplying all that is demanded by the waste which the necessities of life compels.

The plant is stationary, and is chemically nature's laboratory for producing gluten, starch, sugar, gum, resin, and all the elements for the formation of flesh and fat.

The animal is locomotive, and may be regarded as an apparatus for combustion. All the compounds formed by the plant are taken into its furnace, and returned in a gaseous condition, reduced to the more simple elements, back to the air.

The plant, under the excitation of light, again absorbs these principles, combines them anew, and gives them back to the animal races once more.

Thus are the changes for ever occurring. Nature knows no rest; but, like the o'erlaboured Psyche, toils on for ever. Matter now existing in one form of organization will soon become a disorganized mass; but the spirit of change is working in it, and its chaos gradually assumes new conditions of organization, and puts on new forms of beauty. We may constantly witness the renewal of the great work of creation. The world was without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep: the mighty word, "let there be light," was spoken, the light was; and chaos became, beneath its mysterious touch, converted into a world teeming with every form of life, and glowing with the beautiful.

The round of organic change—the conversion of inorganic matter into an organized form—exhibits to us that constant renewal of creation, which must, to every thinking mind, carry home the conviction that the presiding care of a Creator is over all things now, as it was in the beginning. Things are mutable to us—we may read the story of the earth's mutations on the tablets of her mountains—but these changes are but the pulsations of time, marking the progression of order and life around the circle of eternity.

A LITTLE BIT OF ENGLISH HISTORY.

SELECTED FROM SOME UNPUBLISHED DOCUMENTS AT ROCHESTER.

AN immense time ago, when people used their swords to settle a dispute, instead of giving each other to the lawyers to be sucked gradually to death—when might and right were identical—and when people put off their consciences till their death-bed, and then gave them to their confessors to clear up and brighten—a certain baron, by some means or other, got possession of the keep of a certain castle, which, for obvious reasons, shall be nameless.

This baron was not exactly the sort of character you would have selected as a companion for your son at college, as a husband for your last and youngest daughter, or as chief executor, supposing your affairs were rather in disorder. In fact, viewed by the prejudiced and artificial standard of modern times, we much doubt whether he might not have made one in a public procession, terminating in a suffocating sensation about the regions of the larynx, or have gone to discover new countries at the expense of government. But in these days, when we have utterly lost that fine chivalrous taste which alone can make murder and rapine the virtues they are, we must not hope to arrive at a just estimate of characters like that of the knight Sir Cœur Shaverre.

Sir Cœur Shaverre was one of those amiable gentlemen who combine a taste for the property of other people with great profusion in the use of their own. Had ruining tradesmen then been the fashion, there is no doubt that he would have had a column erected, with his own statue at the top, by an admiring and grateful posterity. But, alas! in his days, plate glass windows and long credit were unknown. With the best will to become an accomplished swindler, he lacked the opportunity; for a swindler without tradesmen, is like a vampire in a family where there are no daughters.

Sir Cœur Shaverre, however, made up for the deficiency; in fact, he rather over-acted his part at times. What with pillaging smaller gentlemen, laying farmers under tribute, and bearing about as good a reputation as Don Giovanni in his private life, he contrived to render himself as fine a mediæval hero as ever died penitent, or slept in effigy, with a dog for his pillow, and a lion to keep his feet warm.

But our knight was not content with the vices of this world. Although his time was too much taken up to allow of his devoting it to the seven liberal arts, and although he hated reading as much as he did the Bible itself, still he was like a good many other rascals, tolerably superstitious, and had some indefinite ideas about the other world, which troubled him sorely when he was sober. Fortunately, however, for his peace of mind, such intervals were of rare occurrence.

It must not be supposed that our knight felt anxious about his soul, or its condition hereafter. On the contrary, he left all that to his confessor, and his confessor never alarmed him with troublesome suggestions. But Sir Cœur Shaverre, with that genuine love of wickedness for its own sake, which distinguishes the higher class of sinners, must needs take to the study of the occult sciences, and to wholesale invocations of the —

Scientific investigations of this kind were very dangerous in those days. People reasonably objected to raising what they might be at a loss to get rid of when once raised; and burning alive, anathematizing, strangling, and other gentle punishments of a similar character too frequently rewarded the learned in their inquiries after the supernatural. Mysterious lights were seen to twinkle from a turret in our knight's castle, and, although he was merely supposed to be going to bed—the unaccountable disappearance of two children, and the popular superstitions about their use in raising persons whom other persons had no wish to see, proved the means of bringing Sir Cœur Shaverre into serious trouble.

Whatever may have been the nature of our knight's connexion with the —, it is certain that it cost him his life. Scandal says, that the extent of his property had a terrible effect upon the mind of his judges, and that the charge of sorcery was only an excuse for getting at his estates. Be that as it may, poor Sir Cœur Shaverre terminated his life in an upright position, and with such a degree of feverish heat as might arise from being placed in the centre of lighted faggots, smeared with pitch and sulphur. His property went either to the king or the church; and, strange to say, although two-thirds of it had been pillaged from other people, neither king nor church ever thought of giving any of it back to the original owners.

Long, very long after, when the stake had become unfashionable as a mode of punishment, and when the Bible was more read, and the priests less superstitiously revered, the castle in which the iniquities of Sir Cœur Shaverre were said to have been perpetrated, was in ruins, and might be seen, at particular hours of the day, for a shilling a head. The neighbouring cathedral, built out of the knight's confiscated property, was a noble place, and the chapter were as rich as people who have next to nothing to do, and who are obliged to live in good society, ought to be. No one ever complained that they did not keep their carriages, give dinner parties, and do other things like gentlemen. No one ever said the bishop's town house was shabby, or that his sons were ill provided for; and no one ever hinted at a canon living upon his canonry without other preferment.

Everything was in a comfortable condition! The cathedral lands brought excellent revenues, and every now and then a good fine would drop in, or a lease would require renewal, and this gave the dean and canons a good lift for the time-being, and they looked more sleek and agreeable than ever. But there are troublesome spirits in all ages, who will not rest quiet with things as they are. In former times, the knight Cœur Shaverre had been burnt for meddling with the dead; in the present, a less distinguished personage would doubtless have met with the same fate for interfering on behalf of the living—only burning is out of fashion.

Most cathedrals have some kind of school attached to them; and some of these schools are treated very much as if they were left for the amusement of the chapter, rather than for the education of the scholars. Such was the case with the present establishment. Whether from a taste for the picturesque, or from negligence, the old school-house had been suffered to become a heap of ruins; and the boys' educational accommodation was confined to a miserable dilapidated house in another part of the town. All was dullness and mismanagement, and there seemed to be no funds for anything. The boys, so far from being boarded and lodged gratis, as in the old times, when the school was founded, paid more to the school than they received from it, were few in number, and had no scholarships or exhibitions to assist them on leaving school.

But an unquiet spirit was at work. The Reverend Speakout Shameall, head-master of the school, was given to reading canon's books, especially those about the history of cathedrals and schools. It was a great pity he employed his time so unprofitably, for he would have gained much more by attending to arithmetic and the interests of the chapter—not that he was at all ignorant of arithmetic—but, somehow or other, he could never make the sums worked by the dean and chapter "come right."

The fact was, Mr. Shameall had for some time been comparing the incomes received by the chapter with those accruing to the school, and the result of his calculations was, that while the incomes of the dean and canons had increased, like the offshoots of a Banyan tree, those belonging to the school had either melted into oblivion, or remained in a state of stunted unproductiveness. This was an awkward state of things; and Mr. Shameall felt himself called upon to call upon the dean and chapter for an explanation.

Whether these excellent gentlemen had really forgotten the arithmetic they had learned at school, or that they thought fit to keep their knowledge to themselves, is not known; but certain it is, that they evinced no more desire to assist Mr. Shameall in his researches than was shown by turning him out of his situation. Fortunately, Mr. Shameall had some property, and so eager were his exertions in the pursuit of knowledge, that he appealed to some other gentlemen, connected with the legal profession, for a solution of the difficulty.

Although, unlike the sorcerer of the old castle, the dean and chapter could not burn the reverend Speakout Shameall, they did their best to show their sense of the impropriety of a schoolmaster studying any arithmetic but that of his employers. They called him an atheist, they prosecuted and persecuted him in every way possible; but they forgot both the character of the man and the times they lived in. Mr. Shameall was a good and a learned man, and people who heard atheism talked of, thought that those who used bad words must best understand their meaning; and the newspapers did all in their power to show that the schoolmaster's arithmetic was the best; and that he had been tried, like the sheep in the fable, with the wolf for his judge, and the fox for his accuser and witness; and men began to ask what right those who were of no use had to meddle with useful people, and what right people had to be punished for giving information respecting stolen goods or misappropriated property. And the dean and chapter grieved much because they could not make a martyr of Mr. Shameall; but public opinion said, that if anybody deserved that honour, it was the party of respectable gentlemen who had robbed poor boys, and then sought to stifle information by persecuting the only man who dared to speak on their behalf.

THE COUNTESS.

PEOPLE who visit a picture gallery for no other purpose than to wile away an hour or two of time that they know not how else to employ, will, generally, find little amusement in the contemplation of walls hung round with a series of portraits only; half-lengths, three-quarters, or whole-lengths, are equally incapable of giving to the more idler the transient enjoyment of a few bright and cheerful thoughts. The painted canvas, which transmits to us, it may be, all we can learn of the forms and lineaments of past greatness and goodness is altogether inadequate to rouse with its "mute eloquence," or to charm with its smiles. Nor is it alone the person represented gazing upon us, perhaps, in silence and solitude, from his quaint and richly-gilded frame, that seems to address the spectator; we see, or ought to see, the artist through his work; for, says Mrs. Jameson, "almost every picture (which is the production of mind) has an individual character reflecting the predominant temperament—nay, sometimes, the occasional mood—of the artist, its creator. Even portrait painters, renowned for their exact adherence to nature, will be found to have stamped upon their portraits a general and distinguishing character. There is, beside the physiognomy of the individual represented, the physiognomy, if I may so express myself, of the picture; selected at once by the mere connoisseur as a distinction of manner, style, execution, but of which the reflecting and philosophical observer might discover the key in the mind or life of the individual painter."

Then, after all, what a "palace of thought" is a portrait gallery—what memories may it not stir within us—what feelings re-awaken—what substance will not fancy give to those enchanting deceptions, which, by the painter's art,

"Bring the long-buried dead to life again."

Inferior as portraiture usually ranks in comparison with other branches of art, viewed historically it is superior to all. But an educated mind is required to appreciate its value in this sense, and to understand the records of which the painted figure remains as the symbol or type.

Now, just to apply these observations, suppose I introduce the reader into an apartment devoted entirely to portraits: we will enter, for example, the Van Dyck room, as it is generally called, in Windsor Castle. A rare painter was Van Dyck at all times, but especially so ere multiplicity of business made him somewhat careless, and compelled him to call in the assistance of those who were far inferior to himself. Well, as we walk round the apartment, the eye and the thoughts are naturally most engrossed by the portraits of Charles I. and his family, both grouped and singly, and the mind becomes absorbed in the long and melancholy story of the "royal martyr." There is a "half-length" of his queen, Henrietta Maria, a true daughter of "Henri Quatre," a "lively, elegant, wilful French woman," who could rush through a storm of bullets to save a favourite poodle, and command the captain of the ship to blow the vessel up, with all on board, rather than strike his colours to the "Roundhead" fleet that pursued her. Van Dyck has dressed her in white satin, and has beautifully represented those bright eyes and graceful airs which so fascinated her husband, and influenced his fortunes. What a noble composition is that of Lady Digby, wife of Sir Kenelm Digby, with all its allegorical allusions to some real or fictitious action of her life, whose mysteries have never yet been revealed to us; a picture of which, Hazlitt says, "it would be next to impossible to perform an unbecoming action while it hung in the room." There, too, stand two young boys together, brothers—George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, who fell by the dagger of Felton, in the streets of Portsmouth; and Lord Francis Villiers, remarkable for his accomplishments and extraordinary beauty of person, who was slain during the civil wars, at the early age of nineteen. "He stood," says Clarendon, "under an oak-tree, with his back against it, defending himself, scornful to ask quarter, and his enemies barbarously refusing to give it, till, with nine wounds in his beautiful face and body, he was slain." Then, again, in one picture, we find two individuals attached to the court of the first Charles—Killigrew, one of the monarch's pages, and Carew, a gentleman of the privy chamber; the former, afterwards the licensed jester of the profligate court of the second Charles; the latter, a lyric poet, of exquisite taste and feeling, and a lively but decorous wit. And nearly opposite these, if our memory serves us, is Lucy Percy, Countess of Carlisle, whom Waller panegyricises, in some elegant verses, albeit her intrigues are said to have greatly perplexed the king's affairs, and vexed him.

This, then, is one of the uses to be made of portraiture; each individual example constitutes a page of history, when the person represented has established a claim to become a portion of it. If this be not the case, still something may be learned from the attributes with which the painter will invest his subject; for as Mrs. Jameson remarks, "Could Sir Joshua Reynolds have painted a vixen without giving her a touch of sentiment? Would not Sir Thomas Lawrence have given refinement to a cook-maid?" The picture indicates the artist's mind.

Which of the ornaments of our modern female aristocracy was the model of Mr. Parris's "Countess" we have not been able to ascertain; and it is most probable that, did we know, there might be no remarkable history to relate concerning her. All that can be said of the work is, that it represents, in very elegant style, a lady belonging to the class which, in our own day, more than in times past, find their chief happiness in other matters than political strife and turmoil. The pencil of this artist is always graceful in female portraiture, but his exhibited pictures are few in number.

THE BONNIE, BONNIE BIRD.

A SCOTTISH SONG.

O! where snared ye that bonnie, bonnie bird!
O! where wiled ye that winsome fairy?
I fear it was where nae car heard,
And far frae the shrine o' guid Saint Mary.

I didna snare this bonnie, bonnie bird,
Nor try ony wiles wi' this winsome fairy;
But won her heart where the angels heard,
In the shadowy glen o' guid Saint Mary.

O! what want ye wi' sic a bonnie bird?
I fear me its plume ye will ruffle sairly,
Or bring it low to the lone kirk-yard,
Where the flowers o' grace are planted early.

1852.

As life I love my bonnie, bonnie bird,
Its plume shall never be ruffled sairly;
Till the day o' doom will I keep my word,
An' cherish my bonnie bird late an' early.

O! whence rings out that merry, merry peal?
An' O! but the song is chorus'd rarely!
It is, it is the bonnie, bonnie bird,
An' three suns' voices piping early.

For, he didna snare the bonnie, bonnie bird,
Nor work ony guile wi' the winsome fairy;
But made her his ain, where the angels heard,
At the holy shrine o' bless'd Saint Mary.

FRANCIS BENNOCH.

NELLY NOWLAN'S EXPERIENCE; IN SERVITUDE IN ENGLAND.

IN LETTERS TO HER AUNT.

(Communicated by Mrs. S. C. Hall.)

DEAR AUNT,—My good mistress has had an invitation to a place—they call it by the name of CRANLEY HURST: that is, the invitation did not come from her cousin, but from her cousin's brother's wife, who was gone to keep house for her cousin during what she called "her LITTLE ELECTION." My mistress said, she had never been at "Cranley Hurst" since she was a girl, and she had heard that her cousin, the Hon. Francis Cranley (who, for some cause or another, had shut himself up, when a fine young gentleman, all as one as a hermit), had been routed like a hare out of its form, by his little sister-in-law, who pounced down upon him, now and again, like a hawk, scarving and tearing and domineering wherever she went. My poor mistress was a long time what they call temporizing, whether she would go or not, when—I am sure it was to her surprise—she got a letter from the Honourable Francis himself. "He says," says she, "that it's the first invitation he has given to any living creature to pass the threshold of Cranley Hurst for five-and-twenty years; and he hopes I will give his sister-in-law, Mrs. James Cranley, the pleasure to receive me, and that he himself would be happy to see me in the old place once more."

"Poor fellow!" sighed my mistress. Aunt, dear, could you tell me why my mistress sighed "poor fellow," folded up the letter, and laid a rose I had just brought her from Covent-garden upon it?—where, darling aunt (only think how it raised my spirits), I saw as good as thirty Irishwomen, sitting on what we would call pratee baskets, shelling peas for the quality, and working away at the real Munster Irish, as if they had never left the quays of Cork. She put the rose on the letter as if, in her thoughts, one had something to do with the other, and, resting her elbow on the table, shaded her face with her hand; after a time, a very long time, I came back into the room, and she was sitting the same way. "Wouldn't you like a turn in the park, ma'am," I said; "for a wonder, it's neither an east wind nor a pour of rain?" So she gazed up in my face, with that kind of mazed look which people have when you talk to them, and their thoughts are in deep sea or land graves—or, may-be, in the ETERNITY, to which they go before the spirit's time. And what do you think she said? Why, "poor fellow!" again. To be sure, thoughts are thoughts, and we had as good, may-be, forget the thought of many a thought we do think. That same evening she stood opposite the glass: "Ellen," she says, "I look very old." "There's a power of amiability in your face, ma'am," I answers, "and you've a fine head-piece." It's true for me, and I thought I had got over the age beautifully; but I had not; she turned to at it again—"I look very old, Ellen."

"God bless you, ma'am, ago is a beauty to many."

"Not to me."

"There's twenty opinions about the one thing."

"But I am old."

"More of that to you, ma'am, dear."

"Do you wish me to be old?"

"I wish you, with all my heart and soul, to grow old," I says, and from my heart I spoke, and she felt it; but, seeing she was melancholy, I thought to rouse her a bit. "Indeed, ma'am, I never saw you better in my life (that was true); you're as heavy again as you were when I first had the blessing of looking in yer sweet face, and sure your eyes are as bright as diamonds (that was a bit of a stretch), and there's thousands of dimples in your cheeks this minute" (that was another).

"There, there," she says, smiling a calm smile, "you will not have me old."

"Oh, the Holies forbid!" I said again, "it's I that will have you old—but not yet."

She took up wonderful after that. Sure we all like a taste of the fluttery; some wish it addressed to their head—some to their heart—some to their great families, taking their pride out of blood, so thick, you could cut it with a knife—some (musheroons, I call them) to their wealth—more to their beauty, which, though dead and buried to the world, is alive to them. Aunt, dear, all like it: somehow, the thing to know is, when and how to give it. Well, my mistress bought a new bonnet, and such elegant caps, and altogether took a turn for the best. She was amused, too, at the notion of a little election, which I wondered at; seeing she was so timid in general."

"I'll engage Cranley Hurst is a fine, strong house, ma'am," I made bold to say.

"Oh, no; it's a long, rambling, wandering sort of place, Ellen; all odd windows and odd gables—all odd and old." So I said that I'd go bail his honour her cousin's faction (his people, I meant) would keep off the other party, at election times, when they break in, and knock everything to bits; and I told her how my father remembered when the Kilconnel boys broke into Kilmurray-house, and the master canvassing—destroying, right and left—burning and murdering every one that was not of their way of thinking, and shouting over their ashes for liberty and freedom of election. That was the time, when knowing that more of the Kilconnel boys were forced to come over the Crag-road—where no road was ever made, only all bog—the Kilmurray men laid wait for them, and snared them into a gamekeeper's lodge, making believe it was a whiskey-still—just a place where they had plenty of the mountain dew—which (bad luck to it) is a wonderful strengthener of sin, and kept them there drinking and dancing until the election was over; and, then, leaving the Kilconnel boys sleeping, the Kilmurray men disappeared in the night. When the poor fellows staggered out in the rising sun, and found how it was, they grew very savage, and just fair and easy burnt the lodge. And may-be murderings and destructions did not grow out of that; and lawsuits—and persecutions—that made men of two attorneys, who never had cross or coin to bless themselves with before the burning of Crag-road-lodge!

My mistress says, they manage things more quietly here. I can't say whether or not I'm glad of it; for I like a bit of a spree now and then, to keep the life in me—for the English are wonderful quiet; you might as well travel with a lot of dummies, as with them; and the suspicious looks they cast on you, if you only speak civil to them, or look twice their way; the ladies rowling themselves up in shawls, in the corners of the railway carriage, and keeping their eyes fixed, as if it was a sin to be civil. I travel with my mistress, FIRST CLASS—(aunt, dear, let all the people know that, coming from mass, Sunday morning)—so I see their ways; and the gentlemen bury their noses in a mighty perplexing sort of paper-covered, book called "Bradshaw," or in a newspaper, which they read to themselves, and keep to themselves, never offering to lend the "news" to any one, only shifting it into their pockets, as if they could get more out of it there. They scramble in and out of the carriages, without ever moving their hats, or offering to help the ladies out or in. The truth is, they're a good people, but uncommon surly, or uncommon shy. And as to that book,

"Bradshaw," I thought it must be diverting; people bought it so fast at the railway stations; and you see it sticking out of the pockets of the little scuffy coats, that are all the fashion, and out of the bags the ladies nurse like babbies on their laps, and which they spend months of their time on, to make them look as if made of odds and ends of carpet—which, indeed, they do. I asked my mistress if she would not like to have "Bradshaw;" it must be such pleasant reading. So, with the same quiet smile with which she does everything, she bought it, and gave it to me, saying—"There it is, Ellen; I hope you may understand it." I was a little hurt, and made answer—"Thank you kindly, ma'am; nothing puzzles me upon the print but foreign languages, or may-be, Latin." And as we were going down to Cranley Hurst, I fixed my mistress in the first class, and myself opposite her, with a rale carpet-bag on my lap, and my "Bradshaw" in my hand.

"You may read if you like, Ellen," said my mistress—the smile twinkling in her eyes (I'm sure her eyes were mighty soft and sly when she was young). "Thank you ma'am," I answered, "one of my mother's second cousins married a 'Bradshaw,' and may-be I'd find something about his family here." A gentleman stared at me over his Bradshaw—and a mighty pert little old lady, who was reading her "Bradshaw," let down her glass, and asked me when I left Ireland. [Aunt, dear, how did she know I was Irish?] I looked and looked at one page—and then at another—leaf after leaf—it was about trains, and going and coming—and figures in, and figures out—all marked and crossed and starred—up trains, down trains; and Sunday trains—without a bit of sense.

"When will our train arrive at Cranley Station?" asked my lady, after I had been going across, and along, and about, and over, "Bradshaw" for an hour or two—I was so bothered, I could not tell which.

"It was written as a penance for poor travelling sinners," I answered, in a whisper, for I did not want to let on I couldn't understand it; she did not hear me, and asked the question again.

"I can read both running hand and print, ma'am," I said; "but none of my family had a turn for figures, and this looks mighty like what my brother got a prize for—they called it by the name of all-gib-raa."

My mistress sometimes looks very provoking—and that's the truth—I can hardly think her the same at one time that she is at another.

The little pert lady thrust her "Bradshaw" into her bag, and snapt the clasp—then turning round to the gentleman, she snapt him—"Do you understand Bradshaw, sir?" "Noa," he drawled out, "not exactly—I heard of a gentleman once who did, but im-mo-diate-ly after he became insane!"

I shut the book—oh aunt, I would not be that, you know, for all the books that ever were shut and opened. What should I do without my senses?

Of all the ancient places you ever heard tell of, Cranley Hurst is the quarest I ever saw. When you think you are at the far end of the building, it begins again—rooms upon rooms—shut up for ages—and passages leading to nothing, and nothing leading to passages—and a broad terrace looking over such a beautiful bog, and a pathway under the terrace to Cranley-marsh (that's English for bog). I often go that path, thinking of the waste lands of my own poor country. Oh, aunt, to see the great innocent frogs, the very mora! of the Irish ones, and lizards, turning and wriggling among the bullrushes; and between the floating islands of green, plashy weeds, that veil the deep pools, you see fish floating round the great grey stones, which, my mistress says, the Romans flung into Cranley-marsh to make a bridge. You should hear my mistress talk of it—she has such fine English.

"Although it's a flat," she says, "I like it better than any mountain I ever saw. Such a combination of rich colour—such orchis—such shades and masses of iris—such floats of rush-cotton—such banks of forget-me-nots—such ferns—and, in the spring, such piles of golden blossoming furze: the peat, so dark and intense, forms a rich contrast to the vegetation; and the 'Roman stones,' piled here and there into low pyramids, have a grey, solemn effect, and afford shelter to numerous migratory birds, who feed abundantly upon the insects that hover, like metallic vapours, over the deepest pools." Them were her very words.

The reception, I must tell you, we got at Cranley Hurst, seemed to me mighty cool—I felt my mistress tremble as she leaned on me; but there was neither master nor mistress at the door to welcome her. The servants were there, to be sure, to carry the things to her rooms; but she paused in the long, low hall, that was furnished like a parlour, to look at one picture, then at another; and while she stood before one of a very dark, sorrowful lady—a little pale, wizen'd woman stole out of a room in the distance, and shading her eyes with one hand, while she leaned with the other on a cross-headed stick, she crept, rather than walked, towards my mistress. Her arms were only little bones, wrapt in shrivelled skin, and deep ruffles fell from her elbows. She was more of a shadow than a substance—so very small—so over and above little—that if I had seen her at the Well of Sweet Waters on Midsummer-eve, I would have crossed myself, knowing she was one of the good people. She would have been a fair go-by-the-ground, but for her high-heeled shoes; and, daylight as it was, I did not like the looks of her. The nearer she came, the more wild and bright her eyes glistened; and the lace borders of her cap flew back from her small sallow features. Though I could not help watching the withered woman, I tried to go close to my mistress; but when I made the least motion, she waved her stick, and her eyes flashed so, that I was rooted to the floor at once. She stole over the floor, and the silence was increased by her presence. Aunt, dear, you know I hate silence; and this hung like a weight on my heart, and gathered over us like clouds—suffocating. At last she came close to me; the border of her cap flapped against my hand, but, to save my life, I could not move. Her eyes were on me; they were everywhere at once. She crept round to my mistress, rested her hands on the cross of her stick, and stared at her; her eyes flashing, not like soft summer lightning, but like what we once watched darting into the very heart of the fine old tower of Castle Connel.

When my lady looked down from the picture, she saw the withered woman.

"Old Maud!" she cried. And, Oh! what sorrow there was in them two words!

"The soul outlives the body," said the woman, in a crackling voice—not loud—but sharp and dry, "and the voice outlives the beauty. They said the fair Cicely Cranley was coming, and I laughed at them. No; they said Mistress Bingham was coming—that was it—and I said it must be Miss Cicely; for Mistress Bingham had never entered the door of Cranley Hurst since she broke faith with her cousin."

"Hush, Maud!" said my poor mistress, turning from the witch, who faced round, and would look at her; "there—keep back. Ellen, keep her back—her mind is gone."

"But not her memory," screamed the hag, striking her stick upon the floor. "I mind the open window—and the ropy ladder—and my young master's misery when the hawk

'tied away the dove that was to be his bride—his own first cousin."

"It was too near, Maud."

"No; the Cranleys married in and out—in and out—and what brings you now? withered and shrivelled like myself, with only the voice!—nothing but the voice! More worn—and old—and grey—than himself—a lean old man! You called me "Ugly Maud" once; what are you, now? Augh!"

She threw down her stick, and began waving her bony arms, and sailing round my poor mistress, in a sort of a mock dance. I stepped in between them, to keep her eyes off my lady; but she dodged between us, mocking, and saying cruel words, and looking, just as a curso would look, if it had a body. All of a sudden, a hard, firm step came up the hall: I knew it was the master of Cranley Hurst. The little hag paused, pointed to me to pick up her stick, which, like a fool, I did. Stepping back, she curtsied reverently to my lady, her little pinched face changing into something human; then, going to meet the master, "I came to give the fair Miss Cicely welcome," she said, "but I could not find her: that old lady stole her voice! She Miss Cicely!"

The master struck something which hung in the hall; they call it a gong: the air and house shook again at the deep, loud noise, and from half a dozen doors servants rushed in.

"Can none of you take care of Maud?" he said. "She is insane, now—quite. Keep her away from this end of the house."

"I only came to look for Miss Cicely: I found a voice—she stole a voice!" said the old creature; and she continued talking and screaming, until the doors were shut, the echo of the alarm being like the whisperings of spirits around the walls. I wished myself anywhere away, and I did not know where to go; the house was all strange to me; the cousins seemed afraid to look at each other. My mistress drew down her veil, and extended her hand; hard as it is—thin and worn—the master kissed it, as fondly as if it had been the hand of a fresh fair girl of eighteen. Aunt, dear, it was as strange a meeting as ever was put in a book—those two aged people—one who had loved, the other who had taken her own will; and small blame to her, aunt. Sure it was better for her to run off at the last moment, than take a false oath at God's altar.

I shall never forget the look of downright, upright love that shone in the master's face as they stood like two monuments *foreinint each other. I don't know when they'd have left off or moved, if the sister-in-law, Mrs. James Cranley, had not flung into the hall, followed by her maid, with a clothes-basket full of printed papers and sealed letters, and a footman running on with a big tea-tray covered with the same sort of combustibles. She came in speaking, and one word was so hot foot after the other, that it was out of the question to know what she meant.

She was a tight-made little lady—nor young, nor old—without a cap—(though it would be only manners to ask after it)—mighty tight, and terrible active—spinning round like a top, and darting off like a swallow: her head looked like a pretty tiger's—fierce and keen: she seemed ready to pounce on anything, living or dead: no creature could be easy, or quiet, or comfortable, or contented, in the same room with her. I saw that in a minute, and thought she'd be the death of my poor lady.

As soon as she saw her and the master stauding the way I told you of, sure enough she sprang on her: you would have thought they had lain in the same cradle, to see the delight of her: she pulled up her veil, and kissed her on both cheeks. "You dear creature!" she exclaimed. "Now, I know I shall have your sympathy—your help—your experience. Now, don't interrupt me, cousin Francis—(the poor gentleman was looking dull and stupid)—don't interrupt me—don't tell me of difficulty," she said. "I should think no one in the county has forgotten how triumphantly I carried the question of the green pinifores in the very teeth of the rector and the churchwardens; the children wear them to this very day! I'll organise an opposition such as no power can withstand. I'll neither givo nor take rest" (I believed that); "and if Lady Lockington's candidate should be returned, in violation of every constitutional right, I'll petition the house." She waved her hand round like the sails of a windmill. I never saw a prettier little hand, nor one that had a more resolute way with it.

"Gently, my good sister, gently," said the master; but Mrs. James did not hear him. She pressed my lady into a chair, commanded her maid, with a fine French name, to lay down the basket, and said that she longed for sympathy quite as much as for assistance. "Active as I have been, and am," she said, "it would delight me to turn over a few of my duties to your care. In town, it is worse—absolutely worse! Remember my committees—seven of a morning! Remember the public meetings—the bazaars, which could not go on without me—the Shanghai Commission—the petitions of the women of England—the concerts—the Attie Improvement Society!—duties of such public importance, that I have not spent an hour in my own house for weeks together; never seen your master's face except beneath the shadow of a night-cap.”—[Aunt, dear! I thought she was a widdy woman until that blessed minute, never hearing toll of her husband.]—“Then the college committees for the education of young females, prevent my having time to inquire how my own daughter's education progresses; and the “Pap and Cradle Institute” occupied so much of my attention, that my charming Edward will never get over the effects of that horrid small-pox, all through the carelessness of his nurse—dreadful creature! No, no; there is no repose for me sweet cousin.” All this time she was tossing over the letters, like one mad, and my mistress shrinking away farther and farther from her. “Is it possible,” she exclaimed at last, “you take no interest in these things?”

The master said that his cousin was fatigued.

“Well, well!” it is just possible,” said the lady; “but positively, before she goes to her room, I must interest her in my LITTLE ELECTION.”

At night, when I went up to attend upon my mistress, I told her I did not see any sign of what I should call an election, either in the house, or out of the house, though every living creature was teuring and working away for the dear life, at they could hardly tell what, and not a bit of dinner until half-past eight at night, when Christmas ought to be half-way in their beds. Now, my poor lady always had her dinner at two, and yet what did you think she said to me? why—“eight is the fashionable hour!” But she was not herself, for she never troubled about what she'd put on next morning, only sat there like a statue; and when at last I coaxed her to go to bed, she laid awake, keeping down the sobs that rose from her very heart. Sure the quality has quare ways, and quare thoughts! And just as she fell into that sweet sleep which is as soft as swan's-down, and as refreshing as the flowers in May, before the young birds call for food, or the sun looks upon the earth—that little whirligig of a lady came spinning into the room, as alive and as brisk as if no mortal ever needed sleep. “Whisht!” I says, stopping her frisking. “Whisht! if you plaze, whisht!” The start she took! and asked me what language “Whisht” was; and, seeing it diverted her, I drew back to the door, and out on the landing, saying all the “Avourneens” and “Gra-ma-chrees” and real Irish words I could think of, to take her off my mistress. So she called me a “dear creature,” and declared I would be quite attractive at her little election, if she might dress me up as a wild Irishwoman, and if I really would make myself useful. I was glad to get her out of my lady's room, so that she might rest, but I had no notion of making a fool of myself for all the elections upon the face of the earth—I know my place better than that—I leave that to my superiors. Well, if the house was in a state of disturbance that day, what was it the next? Nothing but making cockades of blue glazed calico and of ribband, and turning her blue silk dresses into flags; and open house—all trying to waste and destroy the most they could; and such sending off despatches, here, there, and everywhere; and such baskets-full of letters. Oh! then, surely the post-office should pray for an election as hard as ever it prayed for Valentine's-day. I lost sight of my poor dear mistress that day, for as good as five hours, for the Honourable Mrs. James Cranley locked me and three others into a loft, making them cockades; and to be sure I did work. And I told one of the girls, when we were fairly come to the end, that I would not have worked as I did, and out of the sight of my poor lady, only for the honour of working for a member of parliament; and to hear the laugh was raised against me. “Why,” said Mrs. James's English maid, “it's not a parliament election at all, but an election for the master and mistress of a sort of a charity, called Cranley Hurst College, where children of some particular class are fed, and all that; and I believe some of the country gentry say they ought to nominate the master and mistress; but the Honourable Mrs. James has persuaded the Honourable Mr. Francis that the Cranleys should do it; and the people in the little town said it was neither the gentry, nor the Cranley family, but that every householder had a vote! and that one man's vote was as good as another's! and had that printed in the county paper. And then the lawyers smelt it out, and gathered like crows in a corn-field, trying to strike war between neighbours—which is their custom—and, indeed, poor things, their bread, which must be very uncomfortable food for them, if they have any consciences—which I never heard tell they had; and there seemed but little doubt, if the Cranleys stood to their rights, there would be a lawsuit, and no election till that was over. This drove the Honourable Mrs. James mad: she said if once it got into law, none of them could ever expect to live to see an election at all; and, as I understood, settled it so that each named a candidate, and canvassed for votes. The Honourable Mrs. James wanted to get in one Mr. and Mrs. Bradshaw (I wonder had they any call to the book); and they were decent people—bred, born, and reared in the Cranley family—and to be sure, Mrs. James beat Bannagher at canvassing! She was hand and glove with every one that had the least call in life to a vote; she kissed every child in the village; she promised everything that everybody wanted; she promised Mr. Skeggs his cysight, and an ould Mrs. Bland the use of her limbs; she danced in a hay-field, and sang Italian songs to those who never heard a word of the language before. Dear! Oh, dear! I could not help thinking how she was wasting her vitals—doing no real good for man or beast! Oh! if my poor mistress had but half her strength, what a woman she would be! And it was sore to see the downright black lies and falsities they all told of each other. There was some grand point of dispute about the weight of a loaf: at one time, one party had held with a mistress of the Cranley charity, that so much bread was enough for each child; and the other set said, "No; so much." This was a grand quarrel. But those who would have voted for the small bread gave in, and owned they were wrong, and agreed to the large weight; but this made no differ, the others cried against them all the same, and paraded the country with a lump of bread pinched in, to make it look less, and decked it out on the top of its pole with black ribbands, and called it "The Cranley Hurst Starvation Loaf for Poor Children." Well, I was fairly bothered amongst them; and every time the Honourable Mrs. James came across me—full or fasting, in public or in private—she would make me go over my Irish, and smile, and say—turning to ladies or gentlemen, no matter which, until I was shamed out of my very life—"Now, is not she delicious? Will she not make a sensation? She will carry all before her!"

I'd have given the world for a clear head, just to think about my mistress, and the Honourable Mr. Francis, and that horrid old Maud, who ought to be burnt for a witch, as she is. My mistress was obliged to get her own bonnet and shawl; and, indeed, when she went out, she had not strength to come in, only that the Honourable Mr. Francis helped her. At last the day came: I had been up stairs to my lady, and found she had gone down stairs to breakfast!—there was a wonder!—and returning through the back hall, I saw two such pretty little children, all in rags, not real natural rags, such as we see (I am sure I ought to know what rags are), but nice, pretty, clean, pink gingham frocks, with pieces cut out of them on purpose—torn down here, and looped up there—and their clean pretty white legs and feet quite bare, and their dear little, sweet, fat, fubsy hands filled with artificial flowers, poppies, and ears of corn. Well, aunt, you know how I doat on children; so I just stooped down to kiss them, as I used poor Tom's, and it seemed so natural to say to the youngest, who was hardly bigger than a Clonmel turf—"O! lanna machree was you, every bit of you"—when I heard a scream of delight from the Honourable Mrs. James: it was like the skirle of a paycheck.

"You dear creature!" she shouted, "to get up such a delicious rehearsal; the very thing I wanted. Your dress is quite ready; Clotilde shall dress you. You must talk Irish unceasingly, it will prove the extensive charity we propose—that we mean to take in even the Irish. It is a bold stroke, but this is the period for bold strokes." And so she talked and hustled me into a room, and the children with me; and before I could turn round (I had not had a bit of breakfast that day, and was starving alive with the hunger) she had my cap off, and my hair down about my shoulders, and my gown off, and a bran new bright scarlet petticoat, that (savouring your presence) was half a mile too short, cut into a scollop here, and a scollop there, and a bright blue patch tacked on it here, and a green one there; and the body of a gown that did not half fit, in the same style, with folds of white muslin for shift-sleeves; and a bran new blue cloak, with such a beautiful pink bow in the back of the hood, and—the wickedness of her—to tare two or three slits in that. I was so bothered entirely, that I could not speak; and then the maid tossed about my neck in a minute; and every now and then the Honourable Mrs. James would stop and clap her hands, and talk that outlandish gibberish to her maid.

"And what is it all for, my lady?" I asked, when the breath returned to my body, and the courage to my heart. "Now that you are done with me, I'd like to go back to myself, if you please, for I never did join the mummers in my own country, and I don't like it, my lady."

"But you must like it!" she exclaimed,

"you must like it—you are to be an Irish beggar-woman."

"None of my breed was ever that ma'am," I said, feeling as if a bolt of ice had run through my heart; but she never heeded me.

"And those are to be your children!"

"My children!" I repeated, "my children—oh, holy Father!—to even the like of that to me," and I came all over like a flash of fire. So with that she called me a fool, and repeated, it was all for the good of the country—to show the boundless nature of the "Cranley Hurst Charity"—that it took in even the Irish. Oh, how my blood boiled; and I up and told her, that it was true the English now and again did a great deal for Ireland, and very good it was of them, for no doubt the Irish were a mighty troublesome people; and, indeed, it was hard to think how any people could sit down quiet and cheerful that had only potatoes to eat, and rags to cover them. But if the English were good to them, they were always telling them of it, and they never gave their gratitude time to grow; and as for me, I had seen too much real misery in rags ever to make a play of it;" and then the tears would come and choke me almost, and I hid my face in the child's lap; I was so ashamed of them tears. Now, would you believe, that instead of being angry, she got out her pencil, and wrote it every word down—and clapt her hands in delight, and said it was as fine as Mrs. Keeley's humour and pathos—and begged of me to say it again, that I might be sure to say it right—in public—and when she found I would not make a mummer of myself, in what she called a tabloo, she said she would pay me to do it. And I made answer, that what I could not do for love, I would never do for money, which surprised her. The English think they can get everything done through their money. And, aunt, she got into such a state, poor lady, she cried, she wrung her hands, she declared she was ruined, she upbraided me, she said I had promised to do it—and all this time the blue flags were flying, and the band playing on the lawn, and a great flat open carriage of a thing, waiting to take me and the children for a show—for a show through the place! think of that! and while she was debating with me, some one came in, and told her she was guilty of bribery—and while the band played, "See the Conquering Hero comes," she went off into little hysterics—upbraiding me all the time. And in the thick of it my mistress entered, leaning on Mr. Francis' arm. "Oh, cousin, cousin!" she screamed, "that horrid Irish woman will lose me my little election!"

The Hon. Mr. Francis seemed not much to mind her, but I heard him whisper my lady—
"But I have gained mine."

YOUTH.

BY THEODORE SEDGWICK.

[At the Semi-Centennial Anniversary of the Philo-loxian Society of New York, the anniversary oration was delivered by Theodore Sedgwick, who discharged that duty at a very short notice, in consequence of the absence of the Hon. Hamilton Fish, from whom the oration was in due course expected. The address is at once nervous and graceful, powerfully eloquent, strongly impressive, and highly effective in the illustrations the orator has introduced. We find the following abstract of it published in the Literary World, and avail ourselves of the power to reprint it in our pages.]

ON the semi-centennial anniversary of our society, the first half-hundred years of whose existence is coeval with the first half of our own nineteenth century, it might seem not inappropriate to cast a rapid glance over the track of time through which our institution has passed, and to recal to mind the extraordinary events by which our age has been made so conspicuous in the annals of the world.

But I dare not venture on the task. It is at once too vast and too painful. If we look at the other hemisphere the state of things is of the most anxious uncertainty—too many bright hopes have been blasted, too many brilliant anticipations dashed, to make the retrospect on the whole other than one of deep disappointment.

Even were I to attempt to recount or commemorate the rising glories of our own happier land, I know not but my voice would in spite of myself assume a mournful tone. No perceptible obstacle yet checks our progress, no visible cloud yet obscures our horizon, our eager gaze detects no coming danger. But he, whose glance takes in as well the past as the future, cannot without apprehension and anxiety cast even the horoscope of our destinies. The very vastness of our material triumphs awakens memories well calculated to temper our enthusiastic anticipations. All that we have done has been done before, much of it better done, and all done in vain. The dust of Assyria and the sands of Egypt cover monuments to which our costliest structures are frail and perishable erections, and from the rubbish of fifteen centuries accumulated in Rome, works of art are exhumed which, discoloured, mutilated, defaced, still baffle the utmost efforts of our self-complacent energy.

I turn, then, from the "unrelenting Past:"

"Far in her realm withdrawn,
Old Empires set in sullenness and gloom,
And glorious ages gone,
Lie deep within the shadow of her womb!"

But the memories of departed greatness are not all of so sad a hue. There are those which, instead of depressing human confidence and chilling human hope, awaken man to a fuller consciousness of his capacities, and arouse him to a truer sense of his energies.

It is an interesting and a cheerful consideration, that over the intellectual, the mental, the moral world Time holds no sway. The frailst construction of the mind outlives the most massive monument of material power. The Temple of the Capitoline Jove lies in ruins; not even the foundations of the Palace of the Cæsars can be accurately traced,—but Cicero and Tacitus, and Horace and Sallust, enjoy a reputation vastly wider, and reach a public immeasurably more extended than in the very zenith of their life-times. The workmen in the Roman forum are still painfully exploring the traces of the pavement of the Basilica Julia, beneath the lofty roof of which the magistrates declared her law,—but the refined reasoning and enlightened equity of that body of jurisprudence, commands now a wider empire than when it was first proclaimed by a despotic sovereign to what was then the world. The mouldering column, the broken arch, the foundation hidden by the accumulated wrecks of ages, awake none but painful or at the best but sombre emotions. The memories associated with departed genius, energy, and virtue, on the contrary, tend but to sooth, to arouse, to stimulate the mind.

And these memories can be adequately awakened in but two ways, either by corporeal representation of the immortal dead, or by a faithful and vivid representation of their labours, their achievements, and their sufferings. There is a room in the Capitol at Rome which, I think, yields to none in its extreme interest. It is that which contains the simple unadorned busts of some of the greatest men of antiquity. Others are scattered through the wonderful halls of the Vatican; and it is impossible to gaze at these images of departed greatness, without having a livelier sense of the reality of their genius and their deeds. Two, especially, transport you most forcibly back to the greatest days of Rome. Among the treasures of a bygone world, the eye is rivetted upon the head of a boy of twelve or thirteen years of age, beautiful in its roundness, freshness, and intelligence, and yet stern, self-collected, cold, impassioned—all that youth is, and all that it ought not to be. I mean the bust of the young Augustus. And that other colossal head, so vast in its intellectual developments, and on which as you gaze you are told it is the face of the immortal orator, lawyer, and philosopher who received the reward which his cold and cruel age conferred on genius and virtue, and offered his neck at Dyrrachium to the assassins of the Triumvirate—the bust of Cicero. There is no head that I know either in antiquity or modern times to be compared with it, except that of one, the massive structure of whose mind is so well represented by his breadth of brow—our own Webster.

Among such speaking, life-breathing images of departed greatness, it is well to walk. It is well to do all in our power to lift ourselves above the comfort-devising materialism of our age, and to escape from the pultry cares of daily life. And when we cannot call to our aid the hand of the sculptor or the painter, we can unroll the mass of history, gaze at her canvas, and contemplate her monuments. They are often as life-like, very often far more enduring than memorials of apparently less perishable material. Thucydides is not a meaner artist than Apelles, and Tacitus has outlived Phidias.

Let us then, in the few moments allowed, re-enter the long-drawn aisles of history, and people them with some of the august forms of the departed great. But in our gallery of heroic personages a selection must be had, and I shall make it from among those who have adorned their youth by great deeds, and on the other hand, whose great deeds have been adorned and graced by youth. The peculiar attribute of our country is its vigorous infancy, its energetic youth. Let us, then, from among the great names of our race, select some of them who, while young, have done things which the world does not willingly let die. "There be some," says Bacon, "who have an over-early ripeness in their years, which fadeth by times—these are such as have brittle wits, the edge whereof is soon turned." To these I do not allude. I do not allude to juvenile prodigies of acquisition, or infant phenomena; I speak of those who have shown from their earliest age that capacity of application—that power of concentration—that singleness of purpose which are the secrets of success and the master-key of fortune.

Of all those into whose lives great actions have been most compressed, who have most shown how much can be effected by unflinching energy and persevering purpose—and his name is so familiar that I should not mention it here, but that I may not seem intentionally to overlook it—is Buonaparte. At twenty-five he wore the uniform of general, earned through successive grades of service; between that and the age of thirty he swept the Austrians out of Italy, and laid the foundations of his power. At thirty-five he was the emperor of France, the first soldier of the world, and the arbiter of the destinies of Europe.

But while the name of Buonaparte can never be mentioned, without producing that thrill of pleasure which the manifestation of the highest intellectual capacities of our nature excites, so it should never be recalled without the expression of the just judgment which history will record against him. The greatest intellect for all purposes of action which the world has seen—great as a soldier—great as a lawgiver—great as an administrator of his vast empire, was informed and purified by no equal moral sense. No moderation restrained his ambition—no regard for the rights of others checked his desire of aggrandizement—no family affliction withheld him from sacrificing the interests of those nearest to him—he perished the outlaw of the world. As Brennus flung his sword into the Roman scales, so the modern Gaul crushed justice, humanity, and all the dearest attributes of civil society under his military system. He perfected and consolidated that formidable centralization which still holds France in bonds and forbids her to be free. Yet such is the force of genius that his name still lives the wonder of mankind, and from his grave he now dictates the destinies of his country.

The name of another youthful soldier occurs to me, and I select him from a glittering crowd—though far distant from Napoleon in point of time. On the skirts of the Roman Forum athwart the Via Sacra, that Broadway of the imperial city, where the antique pavement still shows itself, the very stones, perchance, once trod by Horæ—

there stands an ancient monument which has defied the ravages of time, and of barbarians more ruthless than time itself. The alant moonbeam which silvers the wild grass growing on the topmost stone of the Coliseum, falls beneath its archway. On its sides, amid defaced bas-reliefs, the eye detects the image of the mystic candlestick of the Jews. The original, it is said, lies in the bed of the yellow Tiber. Beneath that arch countless processions have passed—it was erected nearly two thousand years ago to commemorate the capture of Jerusalem, by a soldier of thirty years of age, who had already lived a long life of military service. But this exploit is among the least of his achievements. It is the true glory of Titus that his early frailties were controlled and his appetites subdued; that he exercised supreme power with rectitude, benevolence, and magnanimity, and that he stands out from the base crowd of the Cæsars a model of virtue and self-command. Over his head is a tablet on which is inscribed the title more full of true praise than that borne by any other absolute sovereign in the annals of the world, “TITUS, the Delight of Mankind.”

I turn to those who have been renowned in the arts of peace, and I pause before the haughty figure of an English statesman, who, at the age of twenty-four, bore the burden of prime minister of that vast empire. It was at that age that PITT became premier of England, and till his death, at the age of forty-seven, his policy controlled the destinies of his country. I am not here to discuss the wisdom of that policy. Viewed in the light of our later experience, its sagacity with regard to the permanent interest of England may well be questioned. Its aim at home was to consolidate and perpetuate the power of a great landed aristocracy, and for that purpose no sacrifice of life or treasure was considered extravagant; while its direct result abroad was to cause a series of wars the most dreadful that humanity has ever witnessed. But the genius, the courage, the skill of Pitt cannot well be extravagantly lauded. He was the embodiment of the old English system, of which we now see the dying struggle—a system which has produced great men, and which long commanded the affections of the nation whose destinies it ruled. It will be well for mankind when the English people shall insist on a policy more enlarged, more humane, more liberal—when the energy and intelligence of that great nation shall be as steadily directed to advance the cause of peace and freedom, as they were during the days of Pitt to promote the interests of the despotic power.

We pass from the damps and fogs of the once mistress of the seas to return to a more genial clime. We seek again a sun as bright as our own; a sky as brilliant, but of tenderer hues. We seek that country which, in its ruins, is still the delight and wonder of the world; the art of which is as unrivalled as its nature is unapproached; which of all countries is that which has most a personal and individual character; which makes itself, as it were, a friend—which seizes on the affections and takes possession of the memory—and has a reality like a being of our own race.

In the history of Italy—of Italian valour—of Italian art—of Italian genius—perhaps the most attractive figure is that of Raphael. His intelligent and beautiful face still speaks to us from the canvas, and if we had no such record of his features, perhaps the grace and beauty and soul which breathe from all his works would have suggested some such countenance to the mind. Raphael was a painter at seventeen; at twenty-seven he was called to Rome (such was then his reputation) to compete with Michael Angelo in the execution of the works designed to adorn the Capitol; and at thirty-seven he was snatched from an admiring world, leaving, however, behind him, works which will render his name immortal, long after time and ignorance and neglect have destroyed the last shred of canvas on which his fingers rested. It is amazing, as we pass through the halls where he has left the enduring impress of his genius, to consider how the young years of the great artist must have been devoted to labour. Some of his productions have been defaced by damp and mould—some destroyed by the ignorance of those who have attempted to restore them—but a long life would seem inadequate even for those which still remain. In looking at his mild and placid face, it is difficult to believe that he united, with his rare perception of the beautiful, such patience, industry, and laborious perseverance. At the age of thirty-seven, as I have said, he fell a victim to his devotion to his art. His latest work, "the Transfiguration," was suspended by the side of his dying bed. His last glance was fixed on that personification of our Saviour which he had just completed. He sleeps in the Pantheon, the only one still entire of all the ancient temples of Rome—fitting shrine for his spirit.

I have spoken of deeds of war—of the acts of peace—of the arts that beautify and adorn life—I now turn to higher and holier themes. Luther is an eminent instance of greatness in youth. At the age of twenty-five, he was appointed professor at Wittenburg; at that of thirty-four, in his attack on the system of Indulgences, he laid the foundation of religious freedom. I have not, of course, the least intention of even alluding to subjects of ecclesiastical dogma or discipline. I am speaking now merely of the right of private judgment in religious affairs, uncontrolled by any human power, clerical or secular. This constitutes in my eyes the real greatness of the struggle into which Luther threw himself. This is its great result. That contest is the strongest illustration of the terrible truth of our Saviour's words that he came "not to bring peace, but a sword." The first martyrs in the conflict fell in the time of Luther himself. A long array of others followed. The fires of Smithfield were lighted, the Low Countries devastated by the remorseless fanaticism of Spain, and France consumed by her religious wars. In the next century, for thirty years Germany was given up to sack and slaughter, and France again convulsed by the folly and superstition of Louis XIV. But the end appears to have been in great part gained. The doctrines of religious toleration have grown out of a struggle, the fruits of which, frightful as it was, are worth all that they have cost. The principle of religious liberty has been in the greater part of the civilized world established—a principle denied and derided, from the days of Diocletian to those of the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Civil society has, in the Old World at least, made but small progress. Despotic and centralized governments still cover or overshadow almost the whole of Christendom; but it cannot be denied that statesmen have learned wisdom, and that sectarians show increased moderation in the humanity with which they now tolerate difference of religious belief. That this acquisition has been made, is due in great part, under God, to the great German, who declared that he feared neither despot nor devil.

Another prodigy of youth is Pascal. I do not speak of the marvellous mathematical labours of his childhood—of his almost intuitive discovery of one of the most important of Euclid's problems, at the age of twelve—his calculations on the weight of the air, nor those of the cycloid curve; but of those long, laborious, early years—those years of research, of study, of reflection, which were requisite to produce the Provincial Letters, at the age of thirty-three. Those letters have remained the most conspicuous work of the age to which they belong, and they are still regarded as one of the master-pieces of that French literature, so abundant in genius, in reasoning, and in wit. But these letters are not only wonderful, as showing to what heights of philosophy a youthful mind may attain, they are still more precious as proving to what a degree a firm mind, a resolute spirit, and a high purpose can triumph over the infirmities of the body. We have other instances of this; they are among the greatest glories of our too feeble nature.

"Cyriack, this three years' day these eyes, though clear

To outward view of blemish or of spot,
Bereft of life their seeing have forget,
Nor to their idle orbs doth sight appear,
Of sun, or moon, or star throughout the year,
Or man or woman. Yet I argue not Against Heaven's hand or will, nor bate a jot
Of heart or hope, but still bear up and steer Right onward! What supports me, dost thou ask?

The conscience, Friend, to have lost them overplied,

In liberty's defence, my noble task,
Of which all Europe rings from side to side.

This thought might lead me thro' the world's vain masques;

Content, though blind, had I no better guide."

Such are the unflinching words in which Milton speaks of one of the greatest calamities that can afflict humanity. Nor are other cases wanting. The philosophic Thierry is a paralytic, and the works of our own Prescott have been the result of a long struggle with bodily infirmity. But Pascal's was a still stronger instance—he was a miserable valetudinarian, a feeble hypochondriac, whose whole existence seemed one of the intellect alone.

The Catholic church, of which Pascal is so great an ornament, might afford us many other striking illustrations of the capacity of youth for sacrifices and exertions; but I pause before two of the most venerable forms of that priesthood, so renowned for talent, energy, and devotion to their faith. Fenelon, than whom the history of the world gives us the record of no purer or better man; and Bossuet, of far less simplicity of character, but of fervid zeal, of generous and lofty ambition, of great capacity, and, as a writer, one of the ablest controversialists in all polemical literature; both preached in public at the age of fifteen.

Other illustrious names crowd upon me in all departments of human genius and human virtue. More, the great chancellor, was a member of parliament at twenty-one. Mozart composed at six, and Pope "lisped in numbers, for the numbers came." But I cannot proceed further in what my time would only permit me to make a mere enumeration of names, and most of them familiar to us as household words. But one I must not omit.

Our revolution broke out more than three quarters of a century since. There was then in the college of which we are alumni, a West Indian boy, who seemed to have brought from his tropical clime the fervid temperament of a southern sun. But it soon appeared that, to ardent enthusiasm, he joined the clear sagacity and steady energy of his Scotch ancestry. This boy, then an undergraduate, threw himself heart and soul into the contest, and, in a pamphlet published in 1775, used this language:—"Tell me not of British commons, lords, ministry, ministerial tools, placemen, pensioners, parasites; I scorn to let my life and property depend upon the pleasure of any of them! Give me the steady, uniform security of constitutional freedom. Give me the right of trial by a jury of my own neighbours, and to be taxed by my own representatives only. What will become of the law and courts of justice without this? The shadow may remain, but the substance will be gone. I would die to preserve the law upon a solid foundation; but take away liberty, and the foundation is destroyed." These are the stirring tones of a lad of eighteen years of age. Two years later, the boy held a commission in the army, and was attached to Washington's staff. The promise of great deeds was not belied. His was not a hot-bed growth. He united in all the prominent events of the revolutionary contest. As a soldier, he assisted to win our independence—as a statesman, to consolidate our liberties, by erecting the great framework of the constitution—as an administrative officer, by organizing the government of the Union in its practical details. His name still lives among us. It is a hereditary privilege, which not even our jealous equality forbids, to bear the appellation of an illustrious ancestor; not even the rigour of our statutes against primogeniture and entail, has prohibited his descendants from wearing and transmitting with just pride the name of Hamilton.

I have thus attempted to commemorate the great deeds of a few, and but a few, of those who have consecrated their earliest years to labour; who, disregarding the blandishments of pleasure, have given their youth to that painful toil and persevering effort by which alone great things are accomplished. I am far from insensible that, on a fitting occasion, a list equally illustrious might easily be presented of those who have spent long lives of energetic activity, gradually culminating to their fullest strength and grandest proportions, who have wrestled with time and years, and whose latest days have been full of usefulness and honour. One of these now presents to me his venerable form—one connected with our own institution, and who belonged to the profession of which I hold it an honour to be a member—who, after long wearing the judicial ermine without spot or blemish, gave his declining life to the embodiment of American law, and whose latest years were marked by the most active and efficient industry. The memory of my hearers will suggest to each one of them the name of Kent.

But my space grows short, and I revert to my original theme. It is not without design that I have selected for my topic to-night the greatness of youth. It is in youth that our vigour is least impaired: "Orator metuo," says Cicero, "ne languescat senectute. Est enim munus ejus non ingenii solum sed laterum etiam et virium;" which may be freely rendered: "I fear the orator languishes in old age, for his duties draw heavily not only on the mind, but on the strength and the wind. And this is equally true of all phases of active existence. But this is the least advantage of youth. It is then that the affections are the purest, and enthusiasm the most ardent. In the language of Bacon, "imagination stream into their minds better and more divinely," and the pale phantoms of fear and distrust as yet stand aloof. The innocence, the very ignorance, of youth gives them their power. It is by a youthful angel that Milton's Satan is overawed:—

"So spake the cherub; and his grave rebuke,
Sovereign in youthful beauty, added grace
Invincible: abashed the devil stood."

It is most desirable to impress on youth what they can do, and this in the most effective way, by showing them what has been done. It is thus that they may be weaned from pleasure—thus that they may be charmed from dissipation; for, to the ardent and ambitious mind, the first exercise of its powers brings with it a keenness of enjoyment that no gratification of appetite, no pleasure of sense can rival. It is thus that the freshness and first vigour of their lives will be given to usefulness; it is thus, above all, that they will transmit to old age, not an effete body, faded affections, and worn-out sympathies, but a frame still vigorous, a mind unimpaired, and a heart yet warm.

Nor are the young alone to profit by frequent teaching of this kind; for us who have taken, or are soon to take, a long farewell of the golden age of our existence, to bid adieu to the unbroken health, the bright eye, the light step, the flowing locks of youth, it is especially desirable to draw close the cords which bind us to those who are still protected by the hours, who still rejoice in the early sunshine of life.

"Adolescentibus bona indole præditis sapientes senes delectantur; leviorque fit eorum senectus qui a juventute coluntur et diliguntur." "Wise old men," does Cicero make Lælius say, "delight in the society of the youth, and age is rendered more tolerable to those who are beloved and courted by youth." It was a beautiful attribute of the ancient goddess, Juventas, that she could renew the existence of those in whom she delighted. And it is most true, that nowhere, save in the affections and sympathies of the young, can those of more advanced years find any solace or compensation for what they have lost. Those of us who are more or less advanced in the path of life—who have tried its dangers and endured its conflicts—may boast of experience acquired, of the sagacity and knowledge of affairs which experience alone can give; but who, among the worn and scarred veterans, would not eagerly exchange his accumulated knowledge, his practical wisdom, for the unhesitating energy, the undoubted ardour, the kindling enthusiasm of youth? Compared with these, what is our boasted experience?

Nor is the teaching to be learned from the lives of the great personages whose figures we have contemplated, without its worth in another, and that the most important respect. If the lesson of their lives is rightly read, the great fundamental truths of our religion will be deeply impressed on the young mind. Their triumphs and their defeats, their achievements and their failures, all teach us that youth is in the end powerless, unless it take wisdom for a helpmeet. That strength of years, ardour, energy, equally fail of attaining the great results of life, unless allied to religion and virtue. I know not whether it was by design that the temple of the Capitoline Jove, the head of the Roman mythology, the guardian god of the city, was erected on the very spot where had before stood the shrine of the Deity of Youth, as if that wonderful people intended to plant their religion and their love of country impressably on the foundations of the young mind.

THE TRIAL BY BATTLE.*

A TALE OF CHIVALRY.

CHAPTER III.—THE JUDGMENT OF HEAVEN.

UPON the appointed day, the Count of Barcelona, who had passed the preceding eve in masses and prayers, presented himself at the gate of the camp, mounted on a horse from Seville—a steed whose slender legs and light step made him rather resemble a courser for a fête-day than a battle-charger.

The champion of the empress was clad in a coat of mail of polished steel, inlaid with gold, the work of the Moors of Cordova, in the midst of which shone a sun of diamonds, which threw rays like pointed flames; round his neck he wore the chain given him by the empress, for whose life and fame he was about to do battle. He struck the barrier three times, and thrice he was asked by a herald who he was, to which he always gave this reply—"I am the Champion of God." At the third response, the gate was opened, and the Count of Barcelona entered the lists, which were arranged in an oval form, like the ancient classic circus, and bordered with seats, raised one above each other in tiers, filled at this time with the nobility of the Rhine, who had hurried to see the imposing and interesting spectacle.

At one end of the arena, the Emperor Henry was seen, in his imperial robes, seated on his throne; on the other, in a wooden lodge, sitting on a common stool, was discovered the empress, dressed in black, holding her infant son in her arms. Directly opposite the hut in which she was immured, stood the pile destined to consume her and her babe, if her champion were defeated; and near it was placed the common hangman, in a red frock, his arms and legs bare, holding in one hand a chafing-dish, and in the other a torch. In the middle of the curve that formed the lists was an altar, whereon lay the holy evangelists, upon which a crucifix was placed. Opposite the altar stood an uncovered bier.

The Count of Barcelona entered the lists, which he rode round, while a flourish of trumpets proclaimed to the accusers of the empress that the Champion of God was at his post; for by this sacred appellation the defender of him or her who appealed to the ordeal of battle was always styled in the ages of chivalry. The count stopped before the emperor, whom he saluted by lowering the point of his lance to his feet; backing his steed, whose head he kept towards the sovereign, till, having reached the middle, he made him spring on all his feet, executing this demi-rotte in so able a manner, that everybody acknowledged him for a most gallant cavalier. Then he advanced slowly towards the lodge of the empress, curbing the ardour of the mettled charger, till he reached the spot where she was seated, when he dismounted, the noble animal standing as still in the lists as if he had been made of marble. Ascending the steps that conducted him to her side, as if to prove to all present his conviction of her innocence, he knelt on one knee, and asked her if she were still minded to accept of him for her champion.

The empress, overpowered by her feelings, could only extend her hand to him, in token of her acceptance of his services. The count took off his helmet, and kissed the offered hand of the empress with deep respect; then, rising with sparkling eyes, fastened his helmet to the saddle-bow, replacing himself in the saddle with a single bound, and with no more assistance from the stirrups than if he had been clad in a silken vest. Opposite the altar, on the other side of the lists, he recognised the jongleur, who had been the cause of his coming there, seated at the feet of a beautiful young lady, whom he rightly supposed to be the heiress of Provence. He advanced towards her, in the midst of the enthusiastic applause of the spectators, upon whom his youth, heroic beauty, and chivalrous bearing had made a lively impression, and whose vows and prayers for his success were the more ardent because he appeared too young and slight to risk his life in single combat against two such formidable knights.

When the count reached the gallery where the fair Provençale was seated, he bowed to the very neck of his charger, till his dark ringlets veiled his face; and, then, raising his head, shook back their scattered luxuriance, while, in the language d'Océ,* he addressed the marchioness thus:—"Noble lady, a thousand thanks for the good enterprise you have considered me worthy to undertake; for, but for your message, I should have now been in my own land, without the opportunity of showing my devotion for the ladies, and my trust in God." He smiled as he uttered these courteous words, and looked into the fine eyes of the fair damsel, who blushed, and cast hers on the ground.

"Noble knight," replied the young lady, in the same tongue; "It is me who ought to express the debt of gratitude I owe you, since my invitation, sent by no higher messenger than a poor jongleur, has led you to cross seas, rivers, and mountains. You are come. Indeed, I cannot think how I have merited such great courtesy."

"There is no journey so long, no enterprise so dangerous, that I would not cheerfully undertake, in Christian land, or pagan clime, that a smile from your lips and a glance from your eyes would not repay. Therefore, fair damsel, should I grow weak in this combat, deign to regard me with a smile, and my strength and courage will return to me again."

At these passionate words, the count bowed, and the lady blushed; but the flourish of the trumpets, that proclaimed his foes were in the field, summoned the champion from the side of the Marchioness of Provence to his duty. He put on his helmet, and, with three bounds of his fine horse, was seen in the space between the pile and the empress; for the Champion of God, according to the rule of the trial by battle, ought to be near the accused, that her prayers and looks might encourage him during the combat.

Guthram de Falkenberg entered in his turn, arrayed in dark armour, and mounted on one of those heavy German horses who resemble those described by Homer; an esquire before him, with his lance, battle-axe, and sword. At the gate of the lists he alighted, and advanced to the altar. When he reached its steps, he raised his visor, and laying his hand upon the crucifix, on his baptismal faith, his life, his soul, and his honour, vowed that he believed his quarrel to be just and good; adding to this vow his oath that neither he, nor his horse, nor his arms, were defended by herbs, charms, prayers, conjurations, leagues with the evil one, or any enchantments whatever, by which he might hope to overcome his opponent. Then, having made the sign of the cross, he knelt at the head of the bier, and there made his prayer.

The Count of Barcelona alighted also, and in like manner advanced to the altar, where he made the same vows, and recited the same oath; and, after making the sign of the cross, knelt down to pray at the foot of the bier. In an instant, the Libera was heard chanted by invisible voices, as if sung by a choir of unseen angels. The assistant-priests, on their knees, repeated in low tones the prayers for the dying. Nobody remained standing at that solemn moment but the hangman, who was not allowed to join his ominous voice to those of the assembly, because his prayers were not likely, it was considered, to reach the eternal throne, or, if they did, to do those he prayed for the slightest good.

As the last note of the Libera died away, the trumpets sounded, the assistant-priests took their places, the two combatants returned to their chargers, and replaced themselves in their saddles, remaining immovable, with their lances in rest, and their bucklers on their arms, guarding their breasts, like two equestrian statues, till the flourish of trumpets ceased; and the emperor, rising from his throne, and stretching forth his sceptre, pronounced, in a loud voice, the words "Laissez aller."

The two combatants careered against each other with the same courage, but very different fortune; for scarcely had the heavy battle-steed of Guthram de Falkenberg run a third part of the course, when, clearing double the space with three bounds of his charger, the Count of Barcelona was upon him. For an instant nothing was seen but a dreadful shock, a lance shivered in a thousand splinters, and a confused vision of men and horses; another moment, the horse of Guthram rose without his rider, while the corpse of his master, pierced through with his adversary's lance, lay bleeding on the sand. The Count of Barcelona ran to the horse of his fallen adversary, seized him by the reins, and, backing the reluctant animal, forced him to touch with the croupe the barriers of the field; this manœuvre, according to the known laws of chivalry, being a sign of mercy given by the victor to the conquered knight, whereby he gave his foe permission to rise, who was, indeed, conquered; but the generosity of the brave champion was of no avail to him, Guthram de Falkenberg would rise no more, till the sound of the last trumpet summoned his perjured soul to judgment.

A cry of joy broke from the vast multitude, whose wishes and prayers had been all along for the gallant and beautiful young knight. The emperor rose, and cried, "Well struck;" Douce waved her scarf; the empress fell on her knees, and gave thanks to God for her deliverance. Then the hangman descended slowly from his stand, unbound the helmet from the recreant knight, which he flung on the ground; after which, he dragged the corpse by the hair of the head to the bier, and, returning to the end of the lists, remounted the pile.

* "You may go." This was the signal, at trials by battle, passes of arms, and tournaments, for the combatants to engage.

The count went to salute the emperor, the empress, and the fair Marchioness of Provence; then, returning to his post as champion, he once more addressed the monarch:—"Saving, Sir Emperor, your pleasure," cried he, in a loud voice, "will you please to cause Walter de Than to be summoned into the lists."

"Let Walter de Than be introduced," replied the emperor.

The barrier unclosed a second time, and Walter de Than entered the lists, armed cap-à-pied, and mounted as ready to make his false accusation good; but when he saw near him Guthram de Falkenberg, stretched on the bier, and remarked that a single thrust from the lance of the Champion of God had sent him to his dread account, instead of advancing to the altar, to take his lying oath, he rode up to the emperor, and, alighting from his horse, said:—"Sir Emperor, I cannot obey your summons to the field; for nothing shall induce me to maintain the cause I have taken, for it is a false and accursed one, as, indeed, God, by his judgment on my sinful companion, has decided it to be. I, therefore, throw myself upon your mercy, that of the innocent empress, and the unknown knight—and a noble one he is—while I proclaim before the court and this assembly, that the whole charge brought by Guthram de Falkenberg and myself against my lady empress is false throughout; and that we were induced and suborned to calumniate her by Prince Henry, your second son, who, fearing lest you should finally prefer to him the babe of which your imperial spouse was then pregnant, devised this conspiracy against the life and honour of his stepmother, and the child she would bear. His gifts and promises corrupted us from our fidelity as true knights and loyal subjects. In virtue of this frank confession, I, therefore, implore your grace and mercy."

"You deserve no more mercy than the empress would have found, if she had not obtained from God a champion," replied the emperor. "Go, then, to her, and at her feet implore for pardon, for she alone can restore your life and honour."

VOL. I. N. 8.

Walter de Than crossed the lists amidst the hisses, groans, and yells of the spectators, and knelt down before the rescued empress, who was tenderly caressing her infant son, whom she regarded with the expression of a Madonna.

"Madam," said the recreant knight, "I come, by the command of my lord the emperor, to entreat your clemency; for, since I plead guilty to the wrong of preferring a false and calumnious charge against your honour and the legitimacy of my lord prince, you can do what you please with the criminal.

"Friend," replied the young empress, "you may depart in health and safety for me. I will take no vengeance upon you; God will deal with you according to his own pleasure and justice. Go, then; but never let me behold you in Germany again."

Walter de Than rose and departed, and from that day was seen in the imperial realms no more.

Then the emperor ordered the gate to be opened for the conqueror, who entered the lists once more; but this time looked round in vain for an enemy.

"Lord Knight," said the emperor to the Count of Barcelona, "Walter de Than will not fight with you. He has confessed his guilt to me, and demanded mercy; and I sent him to the empress, who has granted him his life, on the condition of his leaving my dominions for ever. She was too joyful and too full of gratitude for the deliverance God had granted her by your arm to be severe to him.

"Since it is so with him, I am satisfied," replied the Count of Barcelona; "and I ask no more."

Then the emperor descended from his throne, and, leading the charger of the victor by the bridle, in this manner conducted the count to the empress. "Madam," said he, "behold the knight who has so valiantly defended your righteous cause. You must give one hand to him, and the other to me, that we may conduct him to my throne, where we must all three remain, while justice be done to the corpse of Guthram de Falkenberg; after which, we shall in like manner lead you to the palace, where we will both endeavour to render him all the honour we can, in order to retain him as our welcome guest as long as we can prevail with him to remain at our court."

The empress quitted her station of doubt and shame, to kneel before the emperor, who raised and embraced her before the vast assembly, as a proof to them that she had recovered his confidence and love. Then he took one of her hands, and the Count of Barcelona the other, and in this manner she was conducted to the throne, upon which the emperor took his seat, placing her on his right hand, and the Champion of God on his left. As soon as they were seated, the hangman came into the lists a second time, and, approaching the corpse of Guthram de Falkenberg, cut with a knife the links of his armour, which he divided piece by piece, throwing them about the lists, with these contemptuous words:—"This is the helmet of a coward; this is the cuirass of a coward; this is the buckler of a coward." When the hangman had stripped the body in this manner, his two assistants entered with a horse dragging a hurdle, to which they attached the corpse, which was then dragged through every street in Cologne to the public gibbet, where it was hanged by the heels, in order that everybody might come and see the dreadful wound through which the sinful soul of the recreant knight, Sir Guthram de Falkenberg, had issued forth to its dread account. And all who looked upon the guilty dead declared that only the just judgment of God could have enabled such a young and gentle cavalier to overcome such a great and renowned warrior in the trial by battle.

The emperor and empress brought the Champion of God to their palace, where they made him a great feast; and, in order to do him honour, placed him at dinner at their own table, and by their side, and declared that they never intended to part with him. Now, the count wanted to return to his own good city of Barcelona, which he had left two months before with more chivalry than prudence. So, mindful of his duty as a sovereign, after he had done his devoir as a knight errant, he stole out of the palace by night; and, having ordered hay and corn to be given his good steed at the hostelrie, and commanded his squire to groom him, he departed with great secrecy from Cologne, which he left that same night for his own dominions.

The next day, the emperor, missing the count from his table, sent a messenger to the hostel, where he supposed his summons to breakfast would find him. He was soon informed of the departure of his guest, who was supposed to be at least a dozen miles from Cologne by that time. The messenger soon returned to the emperor, to whom he said:—"Sire, the knight who fought for my lady the empress is gone, no one knows whither."

At this unexpected news, Henry turned to the empress, and, in a voice which betrayed his displeasure, said:—"Madam, you have heard what this person has told me. I find your champion quitted Cologne last night, without leaving any trace by which he can be discovered and brought back."

"Oh, my dear lord!" exclaimed the empress, "you will be still more grieved when you learn the quality of this knight, with which, at present, I think you are unacquainted."

"No," replied the emperor; "he has told me nothing more than that he was a Spanish count."

"Sire, the knight who did battle for me is the noble Count of Barcelona, whose renown is already so great that it exceeds even his lofty rank."

"How!" cried the emperor, "is this unknown knight no other than Raymond de Berenger. God, indeed, sent him to my aid, madam; for the imperial crown has never been so highly honoured before. He, however, makes me pay him very dearly by the disgrace and shame his sudden departure has cast upon me. I declare, madam, that I will not receive you into my love and favour till you find and bring him back to my court. Go away yourself for your journey as quickly as you can; for I will either see you with him, or see you no more."

"It shall be so, since you command it, sire," replied the empress, who was too well accustomed to the hasty manner and arbitrary disposition of her consort to contest his will, however unreasonable that will might appear to her. She had noticed the marked attention the handsome count had paid to her beautiful maid of honour, Douce, Marchioness of Provence, and, therefore, determined to include her in her train, which consisted of a hundred noble matrons, a hundred young damsels of quality, and a hundred knights; for Praxida resolved to travel in a style suitable to her lofty rank; and she used such expedition, that in two months from the time of her departure she found herself in the noble city of Barcelona. The astonishing report that the Empress of Germany, with a splendid retinue, had arrived at the principal hostelrie, quickly reached the noble count, who knew not how to credit it; till, mounting his horse, he rode thither, and recognised at the first glance the fair lady for whom he had lately fought. The delivered and deliverer met with equal joy, and, after the first salutation, the lord count, kneeling at the feet of the empress, asked "to what fortunate chance he owed the pleasure of seeing her in his own dominions."

"Lord count," replied the empress, "the emperor, my spouse, will not permit me to return to his court without you, for your presence at Cologne can alone restore to me his love and favour. Indeed, ever since he has known the honour the noble Count of Barcelona did the imperial crown by becoming my champion, he has resolved to share in no festivities till that happy day when he can welcome you to his court, and thank you for that act of courtesy in a manner befitting your high degree. Therefore, if you wish me to be once more recognised as Empress of Germany, you must hearken to my humble prayer, and accompany me to Cologne."

Upon hearing these words, the count once more knelt down, and presenting both his hands, in the manner of a prisoner awaiting his fetters, saying, "Madam, it is for you to command, and me to obey; do with me as with a prisoner."

The empress immediately took a golden chain, whose links encompassed her throat eight times, unwound it, and clasped one end round the right wrist of the Count of Barcelona, while she gave the other to the fair Marchioness of Provence, in whose gentle keeping she willed the captive to remain during the homeward journey. The prisoner, on his part, declared that he was too well satisfied with his guardian to wish to break her chains, unless she were pleased to permit him to relinquish them for a time.

Three days after this interview, the Empress of Germany quitted Barcelona, with her retinue of three hundred noble knights and ladies, bringing with her its chivalrous sovereign, in a chain of gold, held by her fair maid of honour; and in this manner traversed Roussillon, Languedoc, Dauphiny, Switzerland, and Luxembourg; the lord count, according to his vow, neither breaking his chain, nor showing any inclination to do so.

The cortège of the empress was met, five leagues from Cologne, by the emperor, who, being apprised of the coming of the Count of Barcelona, came to welcome him. As soon as he saw the brave cavalier who had saved the honour of his dearly-beloved wife, Henry IV. alighted; Raymond Berenger did the same, though still held in the chain of gold by the Marchioness of Provence. The emperor then warmly embraced and thanked him for the honourable service he had done him, by waging the battle of the Empress Praxida, and besought him to name his reward.

"My lord emperor," replied the count, "will you be pleased to command the Marchioness of Provence never to let me go, for, since I cannot depart from her wardship without her good pleasure, I think she ought not to quit mine; that thus, being fast linked together for the rest of our lives, we may never be divided from each other in this world, nor in that which is to come."

Douce of Provence blushed, and even thought proper to make some maidenly opposition to an arrangement so pleasing to herself. The emperor, however, intimated to her, that, being her suzerain, whatever he chose to command she must obey. He therefore fixed the marriage for that day week; and Douce of Provence was so submissive a vassal, that she never even thought of requesting her lord paramount for the delay of a single day. It was in this manner that Raymond Berenger, Count of Barcelona, won the fair heiress, and became possessed of the marquise and lands of Provence.*

* Henry the Fourth of Germany was subject to fits of jealousy, for which failing he once received personal chastisement, at the fair hands of the empress and her ladies, on a certain occasion on which he had concealed himself in his wife's apartment, disguised as a foreign knight, when his intrusion was resented and punished by severe buffetings from the incensed female court, who either did not recognize the emperor, or pretended to mistake him for a robber. Empresses of Germany appear to have been often the mark for false and murderous accusations; since, nearly a century before this period, the Empress Cunegonda was delivered from the pile by the Grand Master of the Teutonic Knights, who entered the lists as the Champion of God, and successfully defended her honour.—Trans.

ON A KINGFISHER.

BY CUTHBERT BEDE.

A LIVING flash of bluest light,
The Kingfisher flew o'er the pool;
I track'd it in its glitt'ring flight,
Where willows made a shadow cool.
The burning sun was in the sky,
But no ray pierc'd that shelter'd spot;
Yet, like a flash, the bird flew by,
Bluer than blue Forget-me-not.

And thus, I thought, in life we see
In ev'ry dim and darken'd scene,
Some glitt'ring ray of Hope thro' all be,
Where all in sorrow's shade hath been.
And, radiant as that bird of blue,
'Twill lighten up each darkest spot;
But brighter in its heav'nly hue,
Than bird or blue Forget-me-not.

THE LUCKY PENNY.*

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

CHAP. III.

THERE are some women who never lose the habit of blushing; it is lovely in the young, and indicates extreme sensitiveness in the old. Richard inherited his mother's blushes before they had faded from her own cheeks. The transparency of Mrs. Dolland's complexion was noticed by Mr. Whitelock; it contrasted well with the dust-covered pages of his books; yet he wondered why her colour came and went, and why her lips trembled.

"Nothing wrong with Richard, I hope?" he said.

"I hope not, sir; and that is what I wanted to speak with you about, if you will be so good as to have a little patience with me. I am a simple woman, I know, sir; my husband (ah! you would have understood him) always said I was; but the simple are sometimes wise unto salvation. You live, sir, like a Christian—you never keep open after six on Saturdays—so that my boy gets home early, and not too much worn with fatigue to enjoy the rest and perform the duties of the Sabbath; and on Sundays it does him good (he says) to see you in church before the bell has done ringing. I am sure, sir, you are a Christian."

"I hope so; I am a believer; but many a believer does not live as becomes a follower of Christ," replied Mr. Whitelock.

"My husband, sir, was one of those who suffered long, and was kind, and thought no evil; in short, sir, you can read his character in 1 Corinthians, chap. xiii. I owe him more than woman ever owed to man. His unfortunate attachment to me lost him his position in society; his father never forgave him for marrying a farmer's daughter. I thought then I did right, because he, just one-and-twenty, said he could bend his lot to mine, and laugh at poverty, and not live without me, and such like things—as, perhaps, you have said yourself, before you were married."

"I beg your pardon, my good woman," interrupted the bookseller, "but I never was married, and never uttered such absurdities in my life." Mrs. Dolland coloured, and twisted the end of her shawl round her finger.

"Lucky, sir—lucky for you—and for—but I beg your pardon; perhaps you never were in love."

Mr. Whitelock fidgetted, and grumbled something; and the widow's instinct made her comprehend that he did not relish her conjectures. She continued:—

"I believed every word he said; I could not understand his sacrifice, because I had never moved in his sphere, I thought it a fine thing to marry for love, and outstare poverty. I did not know that the gaze of its stony eyes, and the clutch of its bony hands, might drive him to his grave. They said he was consumptive from his birth; I don't believe it; I know that labour and want take its form. I went to his father; I knelt to him; I told him I would leave my husband—go where they should never hear my name—if he would only receive him and his son; I did indeed, sir; but he turned from me with cruel words. And, though he knew he was teaching a few poor scholars, just for bread, so he left him—and so he died. I only wish that young poor girls, who think it a fine thing to marry a gentleman, could know the misery it brings; the hardest lot can be borne alone; but to bring another to it, and that other the one you would die to make happy—Oh! that is the hardest of all things to bear! I beg your pardon, sir; but if I did not begin from the first, you could not understand my feelings."

She wiped away her tears, and Mr. Whitelock told her to proceed. He was so much interested in her tale, told in her simple manner, in her soft voice—a voice so full of that low intonation, which is distinct even in its murmurs—that he could not help wishing some one of his favourite novelist, people who, long ago, wrote the most innocent tales, in five or seven volumes, were there to hear it. By his own dreamy abstraction, she was transformed into a young shepherdess, tying a blue ribband round a lamb's neck; and the vision, with its adjuncts of green fields and purling brooks—which he never saw more than twice a year—with an enraptured youth leaning over a stile, and the village church steeple peering above the distant trees, was only dispelled by her resuming her unaffected narrative.

"And speaking, as I was, sir, of understanding the feelings, I know that to the last I never quite understood those of my husband. I can't tell if it was because of the difference of our birth, or of our bringing up, or of both; though, as to the birth, his father had been a poor man once, and got rich, some said, not over rightly—though I can't quite believe that of my dear husband's father. I never, as I said, quite understood my husband; for, to the last, I know I gave him pain, by little ways which he never complained of, and I knew not how to change; but what I could understand was his PIETY. He lived the last year of his life a life of such faith and hope, that the world seemed to fold itself away from him like a vapour, and he looked upon all that stood between Christ and him as evil. He delighted to teach our child texts of Scripture; and even the wise-like copies which he used to set him from Poor Richard's Almanac, faded from his memory towards the last, though Bible words remained with him, and scraps of Watts's hymns, and long passages of holy poetry; but what he dwelt upon was the future of his child. At that time I got constant work as an embroideress. But the last year he might be said to be more in heaven than on earth; the world was not with him; only hour by hour he used to call me to him, and say, 'Remember our great salvation,' and the next minute he would pray me, clasping my hands within his, not to care about the little lad's learning, so that he could win Christ. He would go on, adding scripture to scripture, to prove that all this world is nothing worth, without that which ensures eternal life. He desired neither riches, nor honours, nor wealth, nor learning for that boy—nothing, but his becoming wise unto salvation. Sir, I understood that—that came home to me. Now, sir, the lad is a good lad—tender and loving to me, his mother, and, I believe, dutiful to you, sir; though the person below did hint, rather than say, things which I own gave me concern, just now—things which make me fear he may not be altogether what I hope; but he is young, and—"

"It is only Matty's unfortunate manner," interrupted the bookseller. "She does not mean it; she has an ugly trick of insinuating evil, where she means good."

"How very strange," said the meek woman. "I am so glad I mentioned it; I should have made my son so unhappy. What a pity she does not hope, sir; poor thing! not to have hope is worse than blindness. Well, sir, have I explained how anxious my husband was that this dear lad should become a righteous man—not a formalist, but a vital Christian—abiding continually in the faith, faithful above all things; believing, like his father, in Christ, and evincing that belief by acts of charity—in word, in deed, in thought—towards his fellow-creatures. That, sir, was the religion in which he lived and died; and I should feel unfaithful to his trust, if I did not, by prayer, supplication, and entreaty, try to keep the lad in the path which his father trod. But he is getting too strong for me: his mind swells like a river after rain. He reads his Bible, to be sure; but he reads other books more frequently. I don't know if that is quite right. Oh! sir, I weary heaven with prayers to teach me how to keep him in the right; so that, even if he halt, or turn aside, he may return."

"The boy is a good boy—an excellent lad: I have been turning over in my mind what I could do for him, to put him in the way of bettering his position. He is a right excellent lad," repeated the bookseller; "and I would have you beware of drawing the rein too tight: I think you are anxious overmuch."

She shook her head mournfully. "Sir, I have lived on hope—a holy hope, a hope above the world—the hope of one day seeing him in the courts of his Heavenly Father, met by his earthly father. With that hope to light me, I can walk thankfully into the grave—which, if I live a few months longer, cannot be darker than my sight—certain of the brightness which shall be revealed hereafter. But, oh! sir, if he, his child, should be beguiled by too much worldly wisdom, or learning, to forget God, how could I meet my husband—how could I answer to him for the soul which he left to my care upon his bed of death?"

"My good woman, all the most righteous parents can do is to letter and bind the book carefully, and let the world cut the leaves."

"Yes," she answered, "and to pray for him, and keep evil, especially the evil of unbelief, from him; and that is one great reason of my visit, sir. You lent him—"

"The works of Benjamin Franklin—I remember."

"Is it the sort of book, do you think, sir, that is fit for my little lad? I know it is full of knowledge, about his catching lightning, and inventing wonderful things, and contains great and good advice to young tradesmen; but I fear, though a great man, he wanted—"

"What the best of us want, more or less, my good lady," said the bookseller, with unusual briskness, "and had much that few of us possess." And, then, after some consideration, he added, slowly, rather as if talking to himself, than addressing another, "Let me see. The early part of his life was stained, like the lives of many—John Bunyan to wit—with faults almost amounting to crimes; and those would have remained untold, unrecorded—indeed, perfectly unknown, even by his most intimate friends—but for the extraordinary truthfulness of the man's great nature. In the brief account of his own life, he confesses that he was blown about by every wind of doctrine; and to what purpose? to fall into the quagmire of unbelief. Now, this would be dangerous to read and think over for lads of Richard's age and eager temperament, if the entire honesty of Franklin's nature—downright, brave, looking-straight-in-the-face, truth—had not made him confess and condemn his errors. He was scourged—as all unbelievers are, if they would only admit so much—by his unbelief; he had to endure the bitterness and self-reproach of knowing that the young friends, whom his arguments had perverted, turned upon and ill-used him; he recalled his own misconduct, born of, and nurtured by unbelief; and, though his nature was neither pious nor enthusiastic, like that of John Bunyan, he saw, like Bunyan, the evil of his ways, particularly in a reasoning point of view. He learned that unbelief was the proof of a weak, not of a strong nature; he saw how foolish it would be to call a boy "strong-minded," because he would not believe what his father told him! As he grew in years, he strengthened in truth; another proof of his great mind. And then his works live in our literature; they keep their place by their own specific gravity. The lad is old enough to understand this man's greatness, and the value he was to his country—indeed, to all countries—and to imbibe those lessons of usefulness and industry which are taught in his works, without being tainted by his confessed sin. Infidelity is put, and by himself, at such a disadvantage, that it holds out no temptations; it shows from first to last the confessed blot upon a radiant memory. Aye, indeed, this great man, this man so in advance of his time, this true man, was, as I have said, scourged by his infidelity; and he shows his stripes. I daresay"—(the bookseller was a great phrenologist, and the science engrafted much charity on his simple, yet shrewd, mind)—"I daresay the organ was depressed at veneration, but large in benevolence, with an almost overweight of the reasoning faculties. Ah! if historians would only give us the measurement of heads, and their developments, instead of their own crude or prejudiced analysis of character, we should better know where to render our hero-worship. Don't you think so?"

The mother looked upwards; the spirit's vision was unimpaired, though the sight was fading day by day. Still she always looked upwards, as if all her consolation came from thence. "I do not understand, sir," she said, simply, "what you have observed has to do with my Richard; but if you are sure the book won't harm him, won't shake his faith, or make him think too highly of worldly gifts—" She paused, and then added, "You, sir, being a Christian man, know best. I am certain it teaches plenty of hope for this world, and great reliance upon human gifts."

"Your pardon, my good lady," said the bookseller, "but which of our gifts is not divine?"

"Aye, sir, but we must acknowledge their origin; and, as my dear husband used to say, not be too fond of setting the furthing candle of reason to give light to the sun of revelation. He made me understand that."

She rose to withdraw.

"I fear you are not satisfied, even now?"

She shook her head. "I pray night and day that he may be so guided as to win heaven. I would fain know what to do," she continued, still more feebly; "you are so good to him, sir! May God bless you for it! But the lad—and that book. I wish he had taken to it when my sight was strong, I could have read it then: now, if he reads it to me, I think he picks out the passages he knows I would like, and leaves the rest."

"Did he ever read you the great man's epitaph, written by himself?"

"Yes, sir; there is hope in the last lines, about his appearing (after death) in a new and more beautiful edition, corrected and amended by THE AUTHOR. Certainly, no bad man (Christianly speaking) could frame that."

"Bad man!" repeated the bookseller. "Why there are scores of editions of his works!"

This, as a proof of his goodness, did not strike the widow.

"Then, sir, you are quite satisfied with Richard." The poor woman's hands trembled as she folded them together, and the long-suppressed tears flowed over her cheeks. "I beg your pardon for troubling you—I have no right to do so, you are so kind to him; only, sir, please to remember that he has two fathers in heaven, and that I—poor creature that I am—feel accountable to both. I cannot sleep by night; I fear I neglect my duty, and yet I fear to overtax him; he gains knowledge so quickly that I tremble for his faith; and when I am sitting alone, between the dimness of my own sight and of the twilight, a thin, filmy shadow stands before me, and I think that I can see the parting of its lips, and hear them whisper, 'Where is my child—does he seek to win Christ?'

The compassionate bookseller gazed upon her with deep feeling: the woman so feeble in body, yet so steadfast in what she believed right, was a new interest to him. He rose without a word, went to a dingy escrutoire, opened the top, which folded down, and taking out a small bag of gold, selected a sovereign. "Go homewards," said he, "and as you go, purchase a bottle of Port wine, and what my housekeeper calls a shin of beef. Make it all, mind you, every atom, into beef tea."

"For Richard?"

"No, woman, for yourself; the weakness of your body adds to the weakness of your sight, and may, eventually, impair your mind. Pray, my good soul, for yourself, as well as for your son. Lay out the money faithfully for the purpose I have named; I know how it is, I know that you feed him—but you devote his surplus earnings to pay your little debts. I have seen you, on a Monday morning, enter a baker's shop, with a thin marble-covered book rolled in your hand. I have seen you pay the baker money, and you have left the shop without a loaf. Now, mind what I say."

"But a whole sovereign!" she said, "it is too much—might I not pay—"

"Not a farthing out of that!" he exclaimed, "why you are quite as much of a shadow as when I saw you first. Well, if you are too proud to take it as a gift, your son shall repay it hereafter. And do not be so anxious about Richard; have you ever considered that great anxiety about any earthly thing, is want of faith in almighty wisdom and goodness? Has He not taken your husband, as you believe, into his presence for evermore? At the very time when you feared most for your boy, did not a door open to him? and was not the crooked made straight? It has always seemed most unaccountable to me, how people, and good people like you—who have hope for ever on their lips—suffer so much fear to enter their hearts."

But there was so much to cheer and encourage in the generosity and kindness of the worthy man, and in the faithful, yet unpretending, nature of his words, that the widow's hope returned, at all events for a time, to her heart as well as to her lips. She might again have wandered—again have inquired if he thought her "little lad was quite safe," for she never, in her best of days, could embrace more than one subject at a time—but his housekeeper entered with two cups of broth.

"You forget the time," she said, abruptly—"though I'm thinking it won't return the compliment to either of you; I can't say much for the broth, for the meat is not what it was long ago."

"If the master gets a fit," she continued, turning to the widow, "it will be your fault—keeping him without bit or sup—here, take the broth, it ain't pison, and master's no ways proud; I wish he was. If you can't take your broth here comfortably, come with me to the kitchen." Holding the cup in one hand, and lending the more than half-blind sempstress with the other, she conducted her down the narrow, dark stairs, as carefully as a mother would lead a child, but before she had seated her by the fire, the bell rang.

"I rang for you," said her master, "knowing that your heart and words do not always go together—"

"Then I tells lies; thank ye, sir," she said, curtseying.

"No, only I wish you to bear in mind, that Richard's mother is in a very low, nervous state."

"How can any one passing through this valley o' tears be anything else?" interrupted the incorrigible woman.

Her master seemed as though he heard her not. "And if you speak to her in your usual grumpy, disagreeable manner"—she curtseyed more deeply than before—"you add to her misery. I am sure your natural kindness of heart will tell you how cruel that would be."

"Putting live worms on fishing-hooks, or roasting live cockles would be nothing to it," observed Matty. Now as the bookseller had a piscatorial weakness, was, moreover, fond of roast cockles, and had recently complained that Matty had forgotten his taste;—this was a very hard hit; he looked discomfited, upon which Martha rejoiced. He was by no means ready-witted—but he was occasionally readily angered—and replied to the sarcasm with a bitter oath, producing an effect directly contrary to what he intended. Martha quitted the dusty room, as if suffocated by satisfaction, and went grumbling and tittering down stairs.

"It was a Lucky Penny, sure enough," she said, "that brought my master and your son together."

"God bless him!"

"Which him?"

"Both, mistress; we hope he will bless what we love best in the world."

"Aye, indeed, true for you. I heard tell of a man once who was hung through a 'Lucky Penny.'"

The widow pushed away the unfinished cup of broth.

"And of another, who made his fortune by one—just as Richard will," added Matty, relenting.

And yet, despite this and her other sarcasms, it was curious to see how Martha struggled to keep in her bitter words; when she looked at the widow's shrunk and trembling form, and wasted, though still beautiful features, her better nature triumphed; but if her eyes were fixed upon her kitchen duties, she became sharp and acid immediately. Had she moved in a higher grade of society, with her peculiar talent, she might have been

"That dangerous thing, a female wit," as it was, she kept her master (to whom, from her stern honesty of pocket and purpose, as well as from "habit," that great enslaver of our "kind," she was invaluable) on a species of rack, while the only peaceful time Richard spent in her society, was while he read to her what she called, "the state of Europe on the paper."

"He will soon have been twelve months in his place," said the widow, smiling.

"Come next new-year's-day, if we live to see it; Richard says he'll watch at the corner for the old gentleman."

"Bother! I daresay he's dead long ago."

"No, he is not dead; I am sure he is not dead," replied the widow. "I should like him to see my boy now; I hope he is not dead—"

"Ay, ay, well we shall see," quoth Matty. "Before Peter—(down, Peter, jewel!)—before Peter came, we had a dog called Hope—the most desaven'est crayture she was that ever stole a bone; and always brought it back—when there was nothing on it."

ST. MAWES.

THE county of Cornwall, in which St. Mawes is situated, presents few points of attraction to the artist, unless it be the bold rocky scenery found on its coasts. In this general absence of the picturesque, it affords a remarkable contrast to the topographical features of the neighbouring county, Devonshire, so abounding with all that the landscape painter loves to look upon and portray; deep glens and well-wooded heights, streams and water-falls, rich pastures and green moorlands; seawards and inland, the aspect of the country is most luxurious and magnificent. The artist, travelling through it must not say that he is "in search of the picturesque," everywhere it surrounds his footsteps; his difficulty is that, being so embarras des richesses, he scarcely knows how or where to select.

But Cornwall also is not without its wealth; it lies, however, far below the surface, while that of Devonshire is visible on all sides; the genius of the country, like the ancient King of Judah, spreading out its treasures openly for the admiration of the stranger, who, if he proceeds farther westward, must descend into the caverns of the earth to find its hidden stores. And yet there is not a single district in the whole of England which, regarded commercially, geographically, or historically, is of more importance in its products, or more curious and interesting with respect to the manners and customs of its inhabitants. It is universally admitted that long before the Roman legions had found their way hither, the ships of the Phœnicians had cast anchor in some of the innumerable bays on the Cornish coast, to permit the Syrian sailors to freight their vessels with the lead and the tin of the "Cassiterides," or "tin islands," as the ancients named the country; in return for which, Strabo writes, they left behind them earthenware, salt, and copper-goods. A story is told, though we forget by whom, that at a later date, a Roman fleet followed a ship, engaged in the traffic, from some port of western Europe towards Britain, for the purpose of ascertaining where these metals were procured; and the captain of the trader, rather than divulge a secret he was desirous of limiting to his own country, run his vessel ashore on the French coast, and perished in it with all his crew. It will be sufficient for the purpose of showing the present importance of these mines, to state that more than three-fourths of the entire population of the county are directly, or indirectly, employed in working them.

But it seems strange that, as we learn from Strabo, the Phœnicians should have imported copper articles to the extreme western part of England, when copper and tin are now found to be the chief minerals it produces. If this statement be correct, we can only suppose that the ore of the former metal had not then been discovered. The geological formations of the mining districts are very singular, and can scarcely be accounted for on any known laws of natural production. Writers on the geology of this district inform us, that the extent of many of the metalliferous veins is unknown, as well as the depth to which they extend: no miner has yet seen the end or bottom of a vein. Their width also varies much, "from the thickness of a sheet of paper to thirty feet," but they are commonly found one to three feet thick. The ores of copper or tin do not often occur together in the same vein, at any very great depth. If tin be first discovered, it sometimes disappears after sinking about one hundred feet, and is succeeded by copper; but if copper be discovered first, it is rarely, if ever, succeeded by tin. It is seldom that either ore is found nearer to the surface than eighty or a hundred feet; and if a copper vein meets one of tin, the former usually passes through the latter, and "heaves it out of its course."

It was probably owing to the mineral wealth of this county, which, commercially, was of so great value, that Cornwall had peculiar rights of its own, and a jurisdiction independent of other parts of the kingdom. Edward the Black Prince, was created Duke of Cornwall in 1337, and an act of parliament settled the title on the eldest son of the kings of England in perpetuity. The immediate government of the county is vested in the Duke, who appoints his chancellor, attorney-general, solicitor-general, sheriffs, and his court of exchequer. At the present time, and until the Prince of Wales becomes of age, his Royal Highness Prince Albert acts for him. The revenues attached to the dukedom, which arise from the duty on tin, the rents of manors, and various other sources, amounted some few years since to upwards of twenty thousand pounds annually. The miners claim to be exempt from all jurisdiction but that of the "stannary," or mining courts, except in cases where "land, life, or limb" are concerned.

Some of the most curious antiquarian remains in Cornwall are the numerous blocks of stone placed either in lines or in circles, and which would seem to have a druidical origin, while some writers suppose them to be monumental. Near Liskeard, for instance, are three circles, tolerably close to each other, formed originally by erect stones placed at some distance; several of the stones have been carried away, and others thrown down. The superstition of the people has attached to these remains a legend that they were once men, who were transformed into stones, as a punishment for engaging in the sport of hurling on the Sabbath, and hence they have acquired the epithet of "the hurlers." A similar story is related of another heap in the parish of St. Buryan, where nineteen girls are said to have been converted into as many blocks of stone, for dancing on the Sabbath-day.

The introduction of an engraving like that from Mr. Creswick's picture of "St. Mawes," affords an appropriate opportunity for making a few observations of a general character upon the country which the artist has visited; and especially so, when the immediate locality presents no very interesting topic for description. St. Mawes stands on the southern side of the county, on an arm of the Carrick-road, an inlet of the sea on which Falmouth is placed. The town, which up to the passing of the reform act, returned two member to parliament, is a miserable little place, consisting of one street only, built under a hill by the sea, and containing a few houses inhabited by fishermen. It had neither church nor chapel till about forty years since, when one was erected by the late Marquis of Buckingham. The castle was built by Henry VIII., it defends Falmouth on the east side, as the larger fort of Pendennis does on the west. Mr. Creswick has selected the most picturesque point, to show the peculiar features of the scene.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE,

AT PENGE PARK.

"The Crystal Palace"—we like better its old name, simply because the Crystal Palace was "the palace of the people," and because the prestige of its old name is something so dear to our memories, that we would not have it changed. It was "the people's palace" from the first—consecrated to them, and for them, by their Queen; and we believe, that, when transplanted to another soil, it will flourish, "like a green bay tree,"—sacred to utility as well as to enjoyment.

There are, of course, many who protested against its removal, many who objected to its distance, and now many who gravely prophesy that "it will not succeed," that it will not be patronized, that it is too far from town, that the west-end people cannot get to it, that—that—in short, it is something that never was before, and therefore cannot prosper. We differ from these objectors. We believe, if the plans are carried out, that the structure itself will be a great improvement on the old edifice, presenting three transepts instead of one, and an arched nave. The fall of the ground on one side has led to a clever arrangement of the building, with deep recesses in the ends of the transepts, and an open corridor, the whole length of the intermediate parts, containing sculpture. Within, there will be courts fitted up to illustrate the architecture of the various periods of the world's history, including an Egyptian, Grecian, Roman, Byzantine, Alhambraic, Mediaeval, Renaissance, and Elizabethan court, each under the direction of competent men. If, as we have said, these plans are carried out as proposed, the new Crystal Palace will be the most extraordinary structure in the world; and if so, it will not lack patronage. As to the distance, the company will arrange so as to obviate that objection before it is ready to receive the public; it will be a matter of time, not of distance. "The west-end people" will be able to get to it with much more ease and rapidity, and at less expense, than the Parisians incur in their transit from Paris to Versailles. We drove, in a one-horse "fly," from Waterloo-bridge through Cumberwell and Dulwich in about three-quarters of an hour; and the inhabitants of Belgravia would find the route much shorter by crossing over Vauxhall-bridge. Nothing can be more delicious than the drive, after you escape from "mere London," Dulwich, with its fine old college, its beautiful collection of pictures, its magnificent trees, its deep-plashy pools, its quaint-garlanded houses,—is well worthy a pilgrimage; and is only three-quarters of a mile from the site of the vast undertaking, which commands a panorama of one of the richest landscapes in England.*

At present, the railway station is 200 feet below the summit of the hill; but the great magician, Sir Joseph Paxton, has determined that one of the glass wings of Crystal Palace the Second shall shelter the railway terminus, so that visitors will descend from the carriages in the palace itself! This is only one of the wonders promised by this very extraordinary man, to whom the word "impossible" suggests "something to be overcome." It will be highly interesting to those upon whom the beautiful country, viewed from Peuge-park, on the 5th of August, 1852, burst so unexpectedly, to see the change promised by the 1st of May, 1853. Terrace-gardens, adorned by fountains and statuary; jets, rivalling "the Emperor," at Chatsworth; cascades; fountains; baths of sea-water, renewed by each flowing tide, and conveyed in pipes across the country; the brightness and magnificence of the erection itself; the profusion of hardy and half-hardy plants; Loddige's magnificent collection of palms; all these, and a thousand other "things of beauty" and of interest, congregated upon, and crowning, that glorious Kentish valley!

The ceremony of the 5th of August was as simple as the occasion was grand. Flags of all nations were unfurled upon their lofty staves, enclosing a vast area, sloping down the hill; and around this, hundreds of ladies, in every variety of brilliant summer costume, were seated. The band of the Coldstreams on the hill, and the Artillery band in the valley, floated the air with music. Within the circle was a gigantic flag-staff, upon the top of which the flag of England was closely furled. Beside this, the pillar was slung, ready, at a given moment, to drop into its socket. Soon after half-past two, the procession advanced. Six workmen, bearing a large and handsome banner, inscribed, "Success to the Palace of the People," were followed by Mr. Laing, M.P. (the chairman of the Crystal Palace Company), Mr. F. Fuller, and the other directors. The column was immediately raised and inserted in its socket, three young lads assisting at this operation.

When this was completed, the British flag slowly and gracefully unfurled, and the bands burst into that anthem which creates fresh enthusiasm every time it is performed. When the burst of loyalty had subsided, the chairman spoke, not long, but well, saying a great deal in a few words, and explaining what the intentions and hopes of the company which had planned this wonderful erection were. When this was concluded, the feelings of the assembly took another direction, and a rush was made to the refreshment tent, where tables were prepared for 600 people, and all was on a scale of princely magnificence.

* "The site chosen for the re-erection of the Crystal Palace is an irregular parallelogram of 300 acres, extending from the Brighton railway, where it has a frontage of 1,300 feet; between the Sydenham and the Anerley stations, to the road which borders the top of Dulwich-wood, where it has a frontage towards the road of 3,000 feet. The fall from this point to the Brighton railway is 200 feet. It was at once felt that the only position for the new building was on the summit of this hill, and immediately adjoining the road. The building, placed in this commanding position, will be visible from London on the one side, and from a vast extent of country on the other."—The Times.

Mr. Laing, Mr. Scott Russell, and Sir Joseph Paxton spoke to the several toasts, and soon after, the assembly broke up; though many seemed disposed to linger around the plans and drawings, which were displayed in another tent, and to enjoy what, to the London citizen, was as the gush of pure mountain air.

So far, this great undertaking is launched on its way, and as we have faith in the brains which conceived, and the hands that can execute, we believe it will be brought to a glorious termination. But there are two propositions connected with the under-current of this mighty whole, which we cannot but regard with anxiety: the first is, as to the grounds being entirely, and the palace partially, open to the people on the Sabbath-day. We know the arguments for, but we know the COMMAND against Sabbath-breaking, and we know how some say that Sabbath-breaking consists in so and so, and others exclaim no, "not that, but this." For ourselves we say, that recreation is not Sabbath-breaking, but merry-making is; and that money-making and money-changing of all sorts is at open war with Sabbath peace. If Penge-park is to be open at all on Sunday, it should be as Hyde-park and St. James' are—simply as LUNGS for the people; and for this there should be no charge; if there is a charge, no matter how small, it is, to all intents and purposes, Sunday-trading, and for this, as a christian people, we can offer no excuse. We cannot punish the tradesman who keeps his shop open for sales on Sabbath-days, and permit the Crystal Palace Company to charge for admission to their park and gardens.

Again, there should be no sale of any species of intoxicating fluid within the precincts of the Crystal Palace at any time. The restriction on this point at Crystal Palace the First in no way lessened the number of visitors. It promoted that peace, good order, and good behaviour, which so eminently distinguished the multitudes who flocked to imbibe beauty and instruction from its contents. The recreation afforded by Sir Joseph Paxton's plan is purely intellectual; and no mis-called "refreshment," tending to excite the passions and weaken the judgment, should be sanctioned by the company. We cannot express ourselves too strongly on this point, when we say, that if the sale of intoxicating fluids is permitted within the enclosures of Penge-park, a little time will see it degenerate into a daylight Vauxhall, from which the more respectable classes will be obliged to withdraw. What parents could take their children for amusement, or instruction, to a place where their enjoyment would have a chance of being destroyed by the intoxication, or "excitement," of that class of men who kill time with cigars, and their almost invariable accompaniments? If the directors permit the sale of spirituous liquors, they degenerate into tavern-keepers.

It is because we are deeply and earnestly anxious for the success of this great undertaking, that we dwell upon the two points upon which must depend its popularity. A large portion of English mothers will desire to take their children to the Crystal Palace for instruction, a still larger, for amusement and health. The patronage of the fashionable world will entirely depend upon the non-violation of their tastes, and the patronage of the people's world upon pleasure and instruction; they are learning how to appreciate the beauties of nature and of art, and have acquired, of late, much more instinctive knowledge of the graces, as well as the proprieties of life, than the higher classes believe. Let us, moreover, not forget the very large number of the middle and humbler classes who repudiate the use of intoxicating drinks.

The Crystal Palace will come before the world as a great teacher, a great amalgamator, a combination of ALL that can be desired by the highest civilization—and a civilizer of the uncivilized. One scene of inebriety would destroy the confidence of thousands.

CHRISTIAN ICONOGRAPHY.*

Few books could have appeared at a more opportune period than the present volume, and, although the policy of translating a book before the original is completed is, generally speaking, questionable, the information conveyed by the work of M. Didron is too precious to be kept longer from the English reader. However, the first volume is complete in itself, and does ample justice to the subjects enumerated in the title-page.

Every student of art is aware how minute and how varying are the features by which the comparative antiquity of its productions is measured. The beard of a Hercules, the arrangement of the hair in a female figure, and the most trifling change in the folds of a drapery, will oftentimes settle a question upon which we have no historical means of deciding, and teach us not only what conception the ancients formed of particular objects, but how they gradually arrived at their perfect and artistic embodiment.

The author of the present publication is well known on the continent as an archaeologist of great learning and ability; and the present work supplies what was hitherto a desideratum in the history of art—viz., a systematized description of those leading features of decoration, which are our best guides in determining the real antiquity of productions ascribed to the ingenuity of the middle ages.

The great predominance of certain peculiar ornaments, either in the architectural or illuminated decorations of this period, and the modifications of those ornaments—in which, however, varied or amplified, the leading symbolical features are never lost—forms a most interesting study, whether it be regarded as an antiquarian test, or as enabling us to judge of modern productions in a similar style, by a just and authentic standard. The decorations surrounding the head, or the whole person, and sometimes whole groups of figures, whether circular, oval, triangular, or in any other form, are in all cases modifications of the nimbus, the aureole, and the glory. It may, however, be observed, that the aureole is but an enlarged form of the nimbus, the nimbus a diminished aureole. Both denote glory, honour, and strength; but the nimbus, whether radiating from, or encircling the head, is unquestionably the earliest in its origin. The story of a flame encircling the head of a future hero is as old as the days of Virgil; and, if we go into mythological antiquity, we shall find an approach to the same idea in the representation of Apollo darting forth rays of light from his head. Nor is the Hindoo mythology deficient in examples of the nimbus.

The glory, properly so called, is applied by M.

Didron to the union of the nimbus and the aureole—an arrangement which, although somewhat artificial, is perhaps calculated to prevent some confusion.

Did our limits permit, it would be interesting to trace the progress of these symbols, especially of the nimbus, in their application and design—to observe the comparative rapidity with which they gained ground in the east, and its lavish application to all sorts of figures, until it sank into a mere decoration, apart from their deep figurative meaning, and gradually fell into disuse. It is observed by M. Didron that, “even on the vases procured from China and Japan, which we see exposed for sale in old curiosity shops, we often find figures of persons of a secular character, adorned with the nimbus, and that it sometimes even surrounds the head of those monsters of fantastic beasts which seem to grow at us from our brilliant porcelain, and bear so strong a resemblance to Christian devils, or the open-mouthed gargoyles of our cathedrals.” (p. 153.) In the west, on the contrary, the introduction of these ornamental attributes was not only more gradual in its introduction, but was subjected to more reverential limitations. M. Didron is inclined to look upon the prevalence of light in the eastern nations as the main reason of this, and his remarks are so interesting, that we unhesitatingly transfer them to our pages.

“That the nimbus is a luminous fluid has been abundantly proved. In the fifteenth century, with us, this mystic head-tire, adorning the heads of the saints, appears, in the monuments cited, like an expansion or unfolding of flamboyant rays, or the beams of a glowing sun. Now, every image, allegory, symbol, or metaphor even, must be borrowed from the imagery, or, to speak more correctly, from the reality of nature. The ideal is transformed into the corporeal. I feel, therefore, convinced that the nimbus was first attached to the heads of intelligent and virtuous persons, from its analogy with that radiation which we may observe to be exhaled by natural objects, in the most mature and energetic periods of the year. In summer, during the hours of noon-tide heat, everything radiates in the field; all nature emits light; a brilliant vapour rises from the earth, floating around the ears of corn, and the topmost branches of the trees. This flame plays around the plants, like that which crested the hair of the youthful Iulus, or the young Servius Tullius, or which descended on the heads of St. Henri and St. Léger. Every branch and flower, every group of trees, the summit of each distant hill, or rocky eminence, seems gilded by an aureole—a kind of natural and universal nimbus. Now what with us is but an accidental appearance—what in our climate is seen but rarely, at certain seasons, and on certain days of intense heat, is in the east an habitual occurrence.”

But it must also be remembered, that the more gloomy cast of mind which distinguished the western nations, and the rigour of their devotional character, was better calculated to preserve those symbols to their more solemn uses, and to contemplate their intrinsic meaning and purpose, rather than their subserviency to general ornament.

Some idea of the importance of these symbols, in

* Christian Iconography: or, the History of Christian Art in the Middle Ages. By M. Didron, Sec. du Comité Historique des Arts et Monuments. Translated from the French by E. J. Millington. Vol. I., comprising the History of the Nimbus, the Aureole, and the Glory; the History of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. With numerous illustrations. London: H. G. Bohn.

† Especially as the author of a most interesting work under the following title:—Manuel d'Iconographie Chrétienne, Grecque, et Latine, avec une introduction et des notes, par M. Didron, de la Bibliothèque Royale, etc. Traduit du manuscrit Byzantin, Le guide de la Peinture, par le Dr. Paul Durand. Paris: Imprimerie Royale, 1845.

testing the antiquity of mediæval productions, may be formed from the fact, that at the close of the sixteenth century, the nimbus almost wholly vanished from the heads of divine personages, and that the churches of Paris, for example, those of St. Germain-des-Prés, St. Sulpice, the Ste. Chapelle, St. Germain-l'Auxerrois, St. Eustache, and St. Etienne-du-Mont, &c., embrace every form and variety of the nimbus, during a period of seven, nay, perhaps nine centuries.

If the subject be one of some difficulty, the reader may safely anticipate considerable assistance from M. Didron's work, in treading the mazy paths of mediæval antiquity. Everything that clearness of description—sometimes, it must be confessed, degenerating into tautology—can do for the illustration of this interesting department of archaeology, has been done in the volume now before us. Moreover, the heaviness of description is relieved by the happiness of the poetical and legendary digressions in which the author not unfrequently indulges.

The present volume, from obvious financial reasons, does not contain the whole of what M. Didron has already published; but we must take a brief notice of some still more interesting subjects which it includes—viz., the history of the portraits of the three persons of the Trinity, and the valuable chapter on the archaeological signs which enable us to distinguish the representations of our Saviour.

The different age of Christ and of his mother, as they are variously represented, is by no means one of the least interesting guides in distinguishing the relative antiquity of portraits or other representations. "In the long series of monuments," our author observes, "two iconographic facts are seen to develop themselves side by side. The figure of Christ, which had at first been youthful, becomes older from century to century, in proportion as the age of Christianity itself progresses. That of the Virgin, on the contrary, who was originally represented in the catacombs as from forty to fifty years of age, becomes more youthful with every succeeding century, until, at the close of the gothic epoch, her age appears to be not more than fifteen or twenty. In proportion as the son grows older, the mother is represented as more youthful. Towards the thirteenth century, Jesus and Mary are of the same age, about thirty or thirty-five years. The mother and child, who have thus met, as it were, afterwards separate, and thence continue to diverge still more widely one from the other."

M. Didron proceeds, with mingled erudition and clearness of discrimination, to point out some still more certain signs of distinction, not only in the portraits of Christ, but of other divine personages. Indeed, the main value of his book is its chronological accuracy. We need scarcely allude to the loose use of the term "middle-aged," to designate anything between the sixth or seventh and the seventeenth centuries; nay, sometimes, a still greater interval. But the work of M. Didron is, in this respect, as nearly perfect as can be expected, if we consider the difficulties attendant on the study. The loss of some monuments, the imperfect preservation, or, still worse, the officious alteration of others, will always invest the science of archaeology with a degree of obscurity. Nor is this very uncertainly devoid of its advantages—at least, of its means of exciting pleasurable feelings. To elicit something like rules of criticism from materials so variable and uncertain—to place the works of different ages side by side, and trace the development of man's handicraft from rudeness to perfection, and, in turn, to lament over its retrograde condition, when unkindly influences prevailed, and when ignorance and apathy bedimmed the imagination, and held back the pencil of the artist—is surely a study most akin to man's nature, most calculated to employ those faculties of discrimination and preference which are his most distinctive and most valuable characteristics.

A taste for mediæval art, not always attended with the happiest results, has arisen of late years; but, whatever may be our doubts as to a free revival of mediæval symbolism, it cannot be denied that its impressive quaintness has never been surpassed, and that, without adopting its superstitious glamour, we may advantageously take a leaf out of the book of the middle ages, if we would make our churches ecclesiastical in their outward character. If art has any rightful connexion with religion, (and, as the visible exponent of the Beautiful, such a connexion cannot be denied,) every work becomes valuable which places within our reach the parent examples of particular styles, which assigns the time and origin of those examples, and, by unfolding the history of symbols, teaches us, as we contemplate their varying and changeable character, to look only to their inward meaning, not, in the spirit of iconolatry, to forget the Creator in the images of our own device.

To return to M. Didron. His work, from the great variety of his materials, is equally useful to the architect, the painter, the sculptor, and the student of history. Nor will those who contemplate visiting the cathedrals of the continent find it an unsuitable introduction to an acquaintance with the statuary and decorations of those wondrous monuments of mediæval industry. But we have one fault to find with our author. Like too many of his countrymen, he talks lightly of serious matters. Without wishing to impugn his honest belief in the faith he professes, and without in the slightest degree desiring to lay a charge of intentional irreverence, we must express our regret that many expressions—harmless enough, no doubt, to French ears—have not been softened in translation. If there is one fault that will keep the work from being generally read, it is a freedom of language, often approaching flippancy, and conveying the idea of a religion of art only, not of a theory of art humbly and fitly subservient to the adornment and honouring of God's worship.

In other respects, the present publication is quite satisfactory. The translator has added many notes of a useful character; and the numerous woodcuts, while they are "the identical ones used by M. Didron," (Preface p. iv,) vie with the French impressions for spirit and accuracy. Altogether, the book is a highly interesting one, and deserves the attention of all who would trace the rise of mediæval art out of the ruins of pagan art—the triumph of Christian over heathen symbolism.

BOOKS AND THEIR AUTHORS.

SHAKESPEARE.—In the dearth of literary announcement, which characterizes the present period of the bookselling world, we may notice somewhat fully a gigantic private undertaking, by a literary gentleman, whose industry seems unbounded. Mr. HALLIWELL, whose labours in mediæval literature are sufficiently well known, has announced his intention of producing a new edition of Shakespeare, in twenty folio volumes, which are to contain entire reprints of all the novels and tales on which the plays are founded; copious descriptive notes, archaeological, biographical, and literary, tending to elucidate the poet's meaning and allusions; thus giving the reader an idea of what may have been floating through the mind of the poet when writing. For this purpose, about a thousand illustrative engravings are to be given, consisting of every antique object alluded to, whether of every day use in Shakespeare's time, or in that which he has fixed as the period of his various dramas; antique views of places named by him; monumental effigies or personal relics of characters mentioned. So that the works of Shakespeare, the greatest of all uninspired authors, may be elucidated by the learning of the student and the pencil of the archaeological draughtsman. The selection and superintendence of the engravings is to be consigned to F. W. FAIRHOLT, F.S.A., who, together with Mr. Halliwell, has devoted much time and thought to the collection of materials at home and abroad. Nothing fanciful is to be engraved, or any attempt at meretricious picture-making allowed, the engravings being, in fact, pictorial notes on the text of the dramatist. Mr. Halliwell's intention is also to avoid the tiresome controversial notation which has now so seriously overlaid the text, and to restrict himself to pure elucidation. In this, we think, he acts with the best judgment; for when we consider how the greatest critics have failed in their conjectural emendations, we must own to much scepticism generally. When Dr. Johnson, restricted by the knowledge of his own time, writes, in allusion to Shakespeare's description of the hurried workman in "King John," standing in shoes which

"His nimble haste
Had falsely thrust upon contrary feet," and tells us that the mind of the poet, in this instance, seems to have been confused by the confusion he is describing, for that "each shoe will equally fit either foot," he but betrays his own want of acquaintance with the constant ancient custom of shoes being made to fit each foot alone. The eminent and learned critic, Bentley, reading the lines describing the attendant who

"—— so woo-begone, Drew Priam's curtain in the dead of night," having his mind over-filled with classical allusion, proposes to give a proper name to the man, and "restore" the passage thus:—

"—— so Ucalagon!!
Drew Priam's curtain," &c. &c.

A "restoration" that would not a little surprise the bard, could he again "revisit the pale glimpses of the moon." But poets themselves have been equally unfortunate in their "emendations." Witness Coleridge, who, in "The Merry Wives of Windsor," proposes to alter Pistol's language in reply to the immortal Sir John's declaration, that Mrs. Page has "legions of angels" at command; and who says:—

"—— So many devils entertain,
And 'to her boy,' say I."

Coleridge would force a scriptural allusion, improper in every sense, thus:—

"—— So many devils enter'd swine,
And 'to her boy,' say I."

Dr. Farmer's anti-poetic temperament induced him to consider Hamlet's fine lines—

"There's a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we may,"

as a mere metaphor which occurred to the poet, from his familiarity with the phraseology of the makers of wooden skewers, who rough-hew, and shaped their ends, for the use of the townsmen of Stratford-on-Avon! Commentary is, therefore, only useful when it is strictly confined to elucidate the text from fact alone; and if Mr. Halliwell and Mr. Fairholt, conjointly, will do so, by giving reprints of the literature of the Shakespearian age connected with his dramas, and representations of actual objects, places, or persons mentioned by him, we shall then possess an edition combining the reading of the student and the knowledge of the archaeological draughtsman; and one that will be of great value in clearing absurdities in the text; forming also a body of Shakespearian literature and illustration, a sort of cyclopædia to which the student may turn with advantage at all times. Such a work can, however, only be appreciated and supported by the few, and to them the appeal is made. Mr. Halliwell proposes to publish it for subscribers alone, and they are limited to 150. The unwearied researches of many years Mr. Halliwell confidently hopes will be thus rendered available to combine in one edition every source of useful illustration, where, "even if there be something redundant, much will remain suggestive of familiar explanations of obscurities and mere popular uses." The idea is most comprehensive, and we hope to find it as completely carried out.

Mr. JERDAN has issued the second part of his interesting autobiography: it includes the period of his life between the years 1814 and 1818; consequently, we are not introduced to many of the celebrities who belong more immediately to our own time; the value of the work will therefore increase as it proceeds. This part is full of valuable gossip: a large number of remarkable persons are noticed; some of them are introduced at full length, of others there are only slight sketches; but in all cases something is given which is worth recording, and ought to be remembered. Much is new, too—as will be supposed, concerning the personnel of the writer. It is only just to him to say, that he does not spare himself—nay, he is rather more severe than others will be on his own "short-comings"—his sins of omission and commission—his main purpose being, as he tells us, to "point a moral." The following passage may be regarded as a key to his design throughout:

"If I were writing a romance or a novel, I could make my principal character suit the tastes of those who admire perfect heroes; but I am endeavouring to write the genuine life, and describe the motives, springs of action, and reflections of a real human being—a mixture of good and evil. I do not set up to teach as a schoolmaster, but to tell the truth, and develop causes and effects, as fairly as my philosophy can appreciate them, so as to operate in the way of example. I am neither concealing nor apologizing for what may be wrong, nor boasting of better qualities and laudable deeds."

Once for all, let us, as among the many critics to whom Mr. Jordan will now be subjected, speak of him in terms rather of affection than of severity—certainly of regard, and not of condemnation; but let us not incur the hazard of admitting all the evils he pictures as environing the career of a man of letters, because one of the most eminent of the professors of literature has been (the fact is notorious enough) unprosperous during the later years of his arduous and useful labours. Mr. Jordan occupies many pages of this volume to show that "literature is neither appreciated, encouraged, nor honoured as it ought to be; and that its professors (if dependent altogether upon it) are liable to worse usage and more misfortune than any other intellectual class in our social scheme." While we admit the force of the first part of this position, we deny its truth as regards the second. Mr. Jordan is very intimately acquainted with all the intellectual classes, and surely he ought to know how few, if any, are prosperous, compared with the many who have to endure obscurity—it may be poverty—it may be want. In this country, it is unquestionable that wealth is everything: rich and worthless men are appreciated, encouraged, and honoured; a railway speculator, being successful, shall have his testimonial of £20,000, while the author of a hundred good and useful books shall live neglected, and die deserted. But what is true of literature is true of science and especially true of art. Cases like that of the "inventor of gas," so to speak, are numerous enough; and surely experience supplies us with many examples of painters and sculptors perishing for lack of food! Mr. Jordan, indeed, gives us a list of artists who are living or have died comparatively rich; and he places such list in contrast with that of as many men of letters who are living or have died poor. But the list is not a correct one. Of artists, he names Eastlake, Uwins, Webster, Maelise, Bovall, and Roberts. Sure we are that neither of these accomplished painters, heads of their profession, can do more than make "the two ends meet," while maintaining in society a position which they are bound to uphold. But what shall we say of such men as — and — and — sculptors; of — and — and — historic painters (the blanks may be very readily filled up); men who are the admired of the world, but who rarely have "commissions," and whose annual incomes seldom exceed that of stone-masons and painters and glaziers. Moreover, be it remembered, pensions are enjoyed by many men of letters: there is not the name of a single artist on the list.

In the Dublin University Magazine, a story has been commenced by "THE O'HARA FAMILY." In a brief introduction, it is stated that the tales, which became exceedingly popular some twenty years ago, and which still retain their hold on public favour, were the joint productions of two brothers, the younger of whom, JOHN BANIM, a man of letters by profession, enjoyed all the fame of the authorship, the elder brother having, as it now appears, much of the toil. Mr. MICHAEL BANIM was, and perhaps is, in trade in Kilkenny, the native city of both. Mr. John Banim, a most industrious and most meritorious labourer in the fields of literature, suffered terribly from ill-health. During the latter years of his life, he was able to do very little, and a pension was accorded to him, which, after his death, was, in part, continued to his daughter, since dead, and subsequently to his wife. Banim was a man of veritable genius: his first effort was a joint production, the tragedy of "Damon and Pythias," with Mr. Shiel, whose share of the work was, we imagine, small. He toiled hardly and earnestly, and in the midst of serious difficulties, in London; and at length, worn out, of a surety, with overwork, he returned to his native home, to die, in the prime of life—that is to say, in its prime as regards the number of his years. We rejoice to find that his brother is resuming the pen he had so long laid aside. The story referred to—Clough Finn; or, the Stone of Destiny—begins well, with vigour and pathos: we expect to find in it another valuable contribution to the rich store of Irish works of fiction.

We believe there never was a more literary family than the Stricklands—inhabiting an old mansion in Suffolk, and having abundant leisure, and active, as well as refined, minds. These ladies commenced their career as authors, when "the annuals" were in bud, and some of Miss Strickland's first historic efforts are to be found in the pages of The Souvenir and The Amulet. Since then, we believe, two or three of the younger ladies have married, but others still reside in their ancestral hall; and Mrs. TRAILL, who, we remember, wrote some pretty and playful children's stories, has just, from her home in the far west, sent us over a very charming book for the young, called The Canadian Crosses, a tale of the Rice Lake Plains; and a very pretty tale it is, full of interest and information—no more agreeable present could be made to those who, in the early spring of life, are about to leave the old, for the New World, than The Canadian Crosses. The illustrations are drawn with Mr. Harvey's well-known taste and spirit; but why will he persist in putting "old heads on young shoulders," an operation declared to be "impossible," and which, when Mr. Harvey makes it possible, is anything but pleasant.

THE REVEREND THEODORE ALVIS BUCKLEY, B.A., of Christ Church, is one of those who, ministering to the call for cheap and concentrated translations from "the old masters," has literally produced as many books, almost in his minority, as would occupy the life-long years of those who laboured at translations some forty years ago. But his labours are not limited to translations only; he has made himself a reputation amongst our periodicals as a writer of brilliant fiction—and is altogether gifted with the power of rapid composition and quick perception—which, added to his learning and imagination, give him great advantages over many. He has just published a volume Ancient Cities of the World, which conveys, particularly to the young student, a great deal of information in a small compass. The illustrations are of average excellence, and the volume is got up so as to make it a pleasant "hand-book" of history.

The Calling and Responsibilities of a Governess, by AMICA. Messrs. LONGMAN have just published a little volume under the above comprehensive title. We intend to revert to it hereafter, as a key unlocking some of our own thoughts on the same subject, and a valuable key it is. The Calling of a Governess is, indeed, important. Amica is anxious to draw attention to it, and has devoted not only much thought, but much sympathy, to the "class" governess. We can safely recommend the book, and have reason to believe that, in the second edition, which we imagine will soon be called for, the author will extend her observations, and add considerably to the "list of works," which she considers should be known to "a governess." While we feel inclined to draw our pencil through the list of "Greek, Latin, and Hebrew" books, we would wish to substitute "Hannah More's Essays," and Miss Edgeworth's "Treatise on Female Education;" from these a very perfect system might be formed—certainly no female library could be considered complete without the works of Maria Edgeworth—but as we intend returning to this subject, we take our leave of it for the present FREEMASONS' FEMALE SCHOOL.—The opening of this school, at Wandsworth, took place on the 2nd of August, with various forms and ceremonies—some of them peculiar to the numerous and powerful body of men by whom the institution is supported. It was originally formed by Chevalier Ruspin, a man of some note in his day, in the Blackfriars-road, at that time a suburb of London, as Wandsworth now is. The school has been removed to a purer atmosphere and a less crowded district; it is now about four miles from the actual metropolis; but who shall say where the next generation may find it—perhaps as completely surrounded by houses, toil, and traffic as the Blackfriars-road of to-day. The ceremony of its inauguration was peculiarly imposing. The freemasons are rarely seen in full costume; there was consequently novelty as well as interest in the proceedings, enhanced by the consideration that between seventy and eighty young girls were there—to be moulded for the hereafter. Upwards of one thousand ladies and gentlemen dined together, under a huge tent, when all the arrangements consequent upon the removal of the school had been gone through, and were concluded. During the proceedings, a very charming little girl repeated the following lines, which had been written for the occasion by Mr. S. C. Hall, at the request of the secretary:—

"Here, from the home your mercies give,
The voice of prayer and praise ascends;
Here, where in hope you bid us live,
We thank our God, and bless our friends!"

"We thank and bless them, while we know
Who bade these generous hearts abound;
And whence these streams of goodness flow—
By those masonic signs around!"

"Signs that to manhood, age, and youth,
Speak of masonic claims, and call
To learn the great eternal truth,
That one GRAND MASTER loveth all!"

"Here shall the weak sweet shelter find;
Here, safe from want, and far from strife,
We gather strength to meet mankind,
And arm us for the fight with life."

"You found us poor, you give us wealth,
That time may touch, yet ne'er decay;
Knowledge and prudence, temperance, health:
Such are the gifts you give to-day!"

"You plant, with hope and faith and prayer,
That the young trees may grow; and you
May know them by the fruit they bear, Grateful and healthful, pure and true!"

"Such the reward—nor more nor less—
To which your future hope extends,
From children whom to-day you bless:
With homes, protectors, teachers, friends!"

"Asking the help of God on high,
To guide the young, the poor, the weak;
Shall we not try, not vainly try,
To give the recompense you seek!"

"May the GREAT ARCHITECT, whose care
For youth you imitate to-day;
May He, whose ministers you are,
Hear our young voices as we pray!"

"And from his mercy-seat above
Bless you with all things pure and good,
With homes of plenty, peace, and love—
And bless your bond of brotherhood!"

PHOTOGRAPHY.—The science of photography has, within the last few years, attained such a position as a "handmaid" to the arts, if the term may be permitted, and such varied and infinite amusement is afforded to those who e-say to use "the pencil of the sunbeam," that any information respecting it finds a general welcome. Hitherto, the practice of photography has been comparatively limited, by the restrictions placed upon it by the patentee, Mr. Fox TALBOT, of Lacock Abbey; these restrictions operating most powerfully, also, against any improvements which the scientific discoveries of others might bring to bear upon the subject, and which, in other countries, have been the means of perfecting it to a degree utterly unknown among ourselves. For a long time past, efforts have been made to induce the patentee to relinquish his rights, which he has at length consented to do, except in the case of taking photographic portraits for sale. His branch of the science Mr. Talbot still reserves to himself, and to those who receive licenses from him. The resignation of the patent will be heartily welcomed by all who take an interest in this beautiful art, which we shall now soon expect to see advancing most successfully. Its application to the useful, as well as the mere ornamental, is now in a fair way of being tested fully.

COUNT D'ORSAY.—A man of no ordinary mind and character has passed from the living world in the person of Count D'Orsay. While the influence of his name gave a reputation to what many would consider as only the frivolities of life, the influence of his genius was exerted most energetically and worthily, in the arts of painting and sculpture; while the warmth of his heart ever opened his hand on behalf of the needy and distressed. They will most lament his loss who knew him best.

THE CAPTIVE CHIEFS OF MOUNT LEBANON;

WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF

MY MISSION TO EGYPT IN 1841.

(By the Author of "Reminiscences in Syria," &c. &c.)

"Thence over Egypt's palmy groves,
Her grotts and sepulchres of kings,
The exiled spirit sighing roves."

MOORE.

THE protracted negotiations relative to the "Eastern Question" had at last ended in an appeal to arms. During the summer of 1840, the "integrity" of the Turkish empire was upheld, Ibrahim Pasha was arrested in his victorious course, and the Egyptians were driven by British broadsides from all their strongholds on the coast of Africa.

Commodore Napier, after capturing Saidâ—the far-famed Sidon of the Phœnicians—had effected a landing to the northward of Beyrout, boldly scaled the mountains of Lebanon, and, with a mixed and greatly inferior force, attacked and defeated the terrible, and hitherto unconquered, Ibrahim Pasha, in his apparently impregnable position, amidst the rocky heights of Boharséf.

The Commodore was, however, recalled, in the midst of his brilliant success. Ibrahim Pasha, unpursued by his conquerors, was allowed sullenly to withdraw across the Anti-Libanus, but was greatly harassed on his way by the exasperated mountaineers; and after committing unheard-of atrocities during his retreat—whose course was marked with fire and blood—he at last concentrated his broken forces at Damascus, for the purpose of falling back again upon Gaza, by way of the Red Sea.

Meanwhile, the Turkish forces, which had already been concentrated at Beyrout, were following the Egyptians in a parallel direction along the coast: the mountains of Naplouse intervening between the hostile armies; and into this rugged district I had been sent, with a roving commission and some irregular troops, with directions to excite its wild population to arms; to organize—as I best could—its savage mountaineers, and hang on the flank and rear of the Egyptians, in order to harass them in their retreat, to cut off their communications and intercept their supplies.

Ibrahim left Damascus in the height of winter, and like a wounded lion seeking his lair, often turned to bay, and showed his teeth, as he slowly retired towards the south, along the route, followed by the pilgrim Mecca caravans.

Although in so southern a latitude, the vicinity of the high mountain ranges—some of them perpetually covered with snow—renders the winters in these regions often rigorous in the extreme. It was during this inclement season of the year that the Egyptians effected their harassing retreat; and the sufferings experienced by them, from cold, from exposure, and from want of supplies, are said to have been most severe; whilst every straggler was cut off by the Bedawees of the Desert, and by the mountaineers of the Houran and of Naplouse, who showed no mercy to their former oppressors, and were themselves visited with fearful retribution whenever they happened to fall into the power of their foes;—for Ibrahim Pasha—never proverbial for humanity—was rendered more bloodthirsty and ferocious than ever by his recent reverses, and the constant hardships and sufferings to which he was exposed.

Having reached the vicinity of the Dead Sea, he crossed the Jordan, and, by a well-executed feint on Jerusalem, he managed to gain a little breathing time, and succeeded in partly concentrating his forces in the arid district of the Wady-el-Ghor, to the southward of the Dead Sea; but the main body of the Turkish army was already crossing the plains of Sharon, whilst a strong column (to which I had recently been attached), after occupying Jerusalem, had débouchéd from the defiles of Hebron. A collision was daily expected, the results of which would probably have been doubtful; for the "morale" of the Turks was at a low ebb, and they still recollected with awe their conqueror at Beilan, at Homs, at Kutayah, and Nezir.

Such was the state of things, when communications were received from Commodore Napier, at Alexandria, informing us that his convention with Mehemet Ali had been ratified by the allied powers, and that the war was therefore at an end.

During the period of Ibrahim Pasha's tyrannical sway in Syria, he had kidnapped and transmitted to Egypt some of the most influential Druse and Maronite sheikhs and emirs—the hereditary chieftains and princes of Mount Lebanon—and these unfortunate men, after enduring every indignity, were sent by Mehemet Ali to work at his gold mines in Sennaar: a remote province in the far interior of Africa, situated under the torrid zone, near the supposed

• sources of the Bahr-é-Abiad, or White Nile. But who—may the uninitiated reader, perhaps, ask—were these “sheikhs” and “emirs”—who and what were the “Druses” and “Maronites,” of which mention is here made?

A detailed account of the Maronites and the Druses may be found in a work I published on Syria, some years ago; * but a few words of explanation on the immediate subject in question may not be deemed here quite out of place.

Amongst the various tribes constituting the motley population of Mount Lebanon, the Maronites and the Druses take the lead.

The Maronites are Catholic Christians, acknowledging, under certain restrictions, the sway of Rome. Their origin is said to have been derived from a hermit of the name of Marounius, who, in the sixth century (a period when religious controversy was already carried to a great extent between Rome and the Lower Empire), lived on the banks of the Orontes, and who, by the penances and mortifications which he underwent, gained many followers, with whom he strenuously supported the interests of Rome against the encroachments of the Greek church. The latter proved, however, too powerful, and obliged Marounius and his disciples to take refuge in those mountains, which, under their own princes, or “emirs,” the Maronites occupy to the present day; subject, however, and paying yearly tribute to the Porte; which circumstance was the ostensible pretext of the invasion of their rocky fastnesses by Ibrahim Pasha and his troops.

The Maronites occupy all the highest ridges of the Lebanon, from the vicinity of Tripoli to the neighbourhood of Beyrout; the province of the Kesbrouan being the head-quarters of the tribe.

The Druses, though less numerous than the Maronites, are a powerful and far more warlike race. They chiefly inhabit the southern range of hills, extending from Beyrout to Sidon, along the Syrian coast. Although idolators, whose origin, belief, and religious ceremonies continue to be enveloped in a veil of the profoundest mystery, they outwardly adhere to many Mahometan rites and customs. Their chiefs are denominated “sheikhs,” a title frequently also assumed by the descendants of the Prophet.

One of the most influential of these sheikhs, Hamoud-abou-Neked, was amongst the number of the mountain chiefs, who, as already related, had been treacherously captured by Ibrahim Pasha, and banished into the far interior of Central Africa.

Now, it was one of the stipulations of the Commodore—forming part of his convention with Mehemet Ali—that all those captive sheikhs and emirs should be immediately liberated; and as he took especial interest in the welfare of the former gallant allies of his glorious mountain campaign, he obtained for me the appointment of seeing this portion of the treaty duly carried into effect.

I accordingly left the late scene of war, embarked near Gaza in one of her Majesty's steamers, and repaired without delay to Alexandria, where, being furnished with the requisite credentials, I proceeded immediately on my mission in search of the captive chiefs.

In those days, the giant hand of steam exerted not its influence on the turbid waters of the mighty Nile; and, not being favoured by a northerly breeze, the kunjah, or river-bout, in which I had embarked, was slowly and laboriously tracked by its crew of Arab fellahs against the stream. It appeared to me that difficulties were purposely thrown in my way; and, on arriving at Cairo, I heard that orders had been previously sent for the release of the mountain chiefs, who were already said to have reached Abou Hamed, in their progress towards Cairo, where, it was added, they would consequently very shortly arrive.

The reports I received, were however so contradictory, that I was somewhat puzzled what to believe, and how to act. If I proceeded further up the Nile, I might possibly miss the party I was in search of: it struck me, from the conduct of the Egyptian authorities at Cairo, and from the opposition I encountered, that they had received instructions to baffle me, if possible, in my design. Whereupon, sending trusty scouts, both by the river and the desert, I impatiently waited at Cairo for further intelligence of my intended charge.

Meanwhile, I occupied myself in visiting the many wonders of this celebrated place—wonders which have been by abler pens so often and so well described, that their recapitulation might probably be considered as superfluous. Whilst thus employed, I had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the man to whose military genius, Ibrahim Pasha was said to be indebted for all his conquests and victories over the Turks. I allude to the French general: Sève, more commonly known as Solyman Pasha, formerly a colonel in Napoleon's army, and who, like many others, had, at the termination of the continental war, sought and made his fortune in the East; and, in the service of Mehemet Ali, had attained the highest military rank, with a degree of reputation which has extended far and wide.

Whilst Ibrahim Pasha, on the termination of the war, had embarked part of his troops at Gaza, Solyman Pasha, with the left column, the baggage, the women, and followers of the Egyptian army, traversed the Arabian desert; and, after enduring great privations and hardships, conducted his force to Cairo, by the circuitous route of Akabah and of Suez.

This movement he effected during the period of my residence at Cairo, and I rode out into the desert, to witness the return of this portion of the Egyptian army—having already beheld part of it at Gaza.

Solyman's camp was pitched some distance to the eastward of the city: on the day of my visit, a large body of cavalry had just arrived, amongst which was a fine regiment of lancers; and as I admired the steadiness of these veteran warriors, weather-beaten by the effects of a long winter campaign—bronzed by the heat of the desert sand—still suffering from thirst, and all the hardships and privations of a long and weary march, I could not avoid comparisons between them and the Ottoman troops—comparisons which proved far from favourable to the latter—or speculating on the chances the Turks would have had of experiencing a defeat, had a general engagement taken place, before the Commodore's convention proclaimed the war to be at an end.

Solyman Pasha received me with the cordial frankness of a soldier: ere many days had passed, I was an honoured guest at his princely abode, in the suburbs of Old Cairo, and feted with all that hospitality for which he was so renowned. Although outwardly professing the Mahometan faith, the old veteran still liked his glass of good wine: and many a bottle of "Chateau-Margaux" and "Lafitte" did we broach together, whilst comparing notes on the events of the last campaign.

The hardships endured by the Egyptian army, during their winter retreat from Damascus, he compared with those experienced by the French when retiring from Moscow, in their fatal Russian campaign; whilst the subsequent sufferings of his own column, encumbered as he was with women, children, and camp-followers, during the march across the desert—from the excessive heat and want of water—he described as being most intense; "ces chiens de Bedouins," as he termed them, constantly hovering on his flanks, and, notwithstanding the peace which had been proclaimed, indiscriminately plundering and murdering every straggler from his ranks; and small mercy did they, if captured, experience in return: being invariably put to death upon the spot.

"My blood be upon thy head, oh, Pasha!" was the dying speech of a Bedouin sheikh, who had fallen into Solyman's unrelenting grasp. "Allah, oh, Sheikh! shall be the judge between us!" was the Pasha's reply, as the Arab's head, on the given signal, rolled on the desert sand.

And, now, after all these sufferings—after unheard and untold scenes of hardships, of wretchedness, of bloody deeds and death—did the veteran warrior fully enjoy the endearments of domestic bliss.

He had, I well remember, two fine young children, of whom he appeared to be most fond. Their mother was a Greek, whom he had rescued from the brutality of his soldiers, at the sack, by the Egyptians, of some town in the Morea, during the war of independence in Greece. Her story was most romantic; but the particulars I cannot now recal, further than his beautiful captive, by her charms and amiability, soon acquired unbounded influence over her master, and became the sultana of his harem, according to the Mahometan forms of the Marriage Act.

Solyman's children and myself at last became great friends; but their mother I never had an opportunity to behold, though particularly anxious so to do; for the old warrior—at least in this respect—was steadfast to the injunctions of his adopted creed!

Most pleasantly did a residence of some duration at Cairo rapidly pass away, till the arrival of the emirs and sheikhs, of whom I had been sent in quest; but my stay was doomed to be still further prolonged, for the "authorities" would not suffer the exiles to depart, until the viceroy had been made acquainted with their arrival, and another order had been received for their transmission to Alexandria, thence to embark with me for Beyrout.

The number of these mountain chieftains, who had thus—through the untiring exertions of Commodore Napier—been released from a state of slavery and suffering, amounted to eleven, besides forty-one attendants; but several had already perished during their captivity in the burning region of Kordofan. Amongst others who had succumbed to the united influence of accumulated hardships, and the effects of an ungenial climate, was the Emir Yousouf, of El Haded: a scion of the regal family of Shehab, a near relative of the Emir Beshir, or Grand Prince of the Mountain, and whose death I regretted the more, being on terms of intimacy with his family, from whom I had experienced great hospitality, and to whom I should now have to communicate this sad intelligence, after having held out to them hopes of shortly escorting back the young emir to his mountain home—to the arms of his aged mother, and of his fond and beautiful sisters, Zuleika and Cherî Shehab.

This unforeseen delay in permitting the departure of my charges, was, as may be imagined, most severely felt by them, anxious as they were to return to their native homes, and, moreover, destitute as they found themselves of even the common necessities of life; for, on their arrival at Cairo, they were without any pecuniary resources—positively in rags—had been all promiscuously thrust into a sort of deserted caravanserai, and, when I first visited them in this dreary abode, were most scantily provided with even the coarsest food.

On entering their prison—for the wretched den in which I found them could only be considered as such—it was affecting to behold the abject and squalid misery to which a state of suffering and destitution had reduced these gallant mountain chiefs, who, a few months previously, might have been considered the "flower of chivalry" of their native hills.

With tears of gratitude streaming from many an eye, they crowded around, and, in the flowery language of the East, hailed me as their deliverer—as the messenger of safety sent by their saviour, the "Comodoro el Kibeer."

The sufferings which, whilst in captivity, they had endured, were described as having been horrible in the extreme; nor did their appearance belie the statement of what they had gone through: pale, wan and emaciated, and—as I have before said—in rags, it was pitiable to behold these princes of their native land, huddled up like so many convicted felons, in the damp and denuded cells of the ruined old caravanserai, which had been so inhospitably appropriated for their temporary abode.

On leaving them, I went immediately to the Governor of Cairo, represented the state of misery and destitution in which I had found the emirs, and requested they might be removed to a residence more suitable to their rank, supplied with money and with clothes, and with a sufficiency of wholesome food to enable them to exist, until the required permission should be obtained for them to depart.

The promises made to my request, were, as usual with eastern officials, most profuse, but were never carried into effect, except as regarded the article of food.

In my frequent visits to the unfortunate chiefs—for I made a point of being as much as possible with them—I ever received some fresh accounts of all that they had endured. I did my best to cheer and encourage them with the prospect of immediate release, and next of a speedy return with me, to their long-wished-for mountain homes. My endeavours to soothe and comfort them were, however, all in vain; for, with one single exception, they appeared broken spirited, and completely prostrated both in body and in mind. This exception was a noble-looking old Druse chieftain: the Sheikh Abou Noked, of Dhair-el-Khamar, or Palace of the Moon. This sturdy old fellow, with his long, white beard, piercing black eye, and hawk's-bill nose, was a fine specimen of the ancient and noble race from whence he had derived his source. Although apparently verging on seventy years of age, his spirit appeared as unbroken as was his tall, sinewy, and manly frame; still full of strength and vigour, soldier-like and erect. Nothing daunted or depressed by what he had undergone, and what he still underwent, the old sheikh philosophically smoked his caloon, and, although in tatters like the rest, looked and showed himself, under all his misfortunes, worthy of his rank and of his name.

I have said that with this single exception, the whole party of whom I was about to take charge, appeared to be all equally depressed. There was, however, another individual in the group, whose appearance, though strongly contrasting with that of the warlike and venerable-looking Sheikh, appeared equally to set at nought all the cares and sorrows of this world.

This was a little negro boy, who had been captured at one of the periodical "slave hunts," in the remotest parts of the Kordofan, purchased by the Emir Hyder of Solymah, on his late release from captivity, in the golden mines of Sennaar, and who, although so recently dragged away from his country, his kindred, and his home, smiled unconcernedly at his fate, and with the buoyant and thoughtless spirit of childhood, appeared to set at nought that state of exile in a far distant land, and the perpetual state of slavery, to which he now appeared inevitably doomed. But as I shall have hereafter much to say about this young "Ethiopian Slave," I now return to the more immediate occurrences of my present narrative. The long wished-for order from Mehemet Ali for our departure, at last arrived, though not without the active intercession of the Commodore, to whom I was obliged to write; I found myself at Alexandria, with my party of mountain chiefs, and then flattering myself all further delays and difficulties must be at an end, I addressed a letter—of which the following is a translation—to the Grand Prince of Mount Lebanon, the Emir Beshir Cassim.

* "Kibeer," in the Arabic language, signifies "Great."

Alexandria, 28th February, 1841.

PRINCE,—I have the honour to inform your Highness, that according to instructions from Commodore Napier, I came to Egypt at the termination of the war, for the purpose of taking back to their own country some of your Highness's subjects: the Emirs and Shiekhs of Mount Lebanon, who had been sent by the viceroy of Egypt as captives to Sennaar.

I met these high-born chiefs at Cairo, in a state of great destitution; difficulties and delays were thrown in the way of my departure with them, which difficulties were at last set aside through the intervention of Commodore Napier, who was, fortunately, still at Alexandria, and to whom I was at last obliged to apply on the subject. The Commodore has finally obtained an order from the Pasha, that the chiefs should be supplied with money, and everything suitable to their rank, and that an Egyptian steamer, or man of war, is to be placed at my disposal, in which I may convey them back to Beyrout; when I hope shortly to be enabled to have the honour of presenting, in person, to your Highness, all these illustrious personages who have been committed to my charge, and of whom I beg to enclose a list; but I am grieved to be obliged to report the death of the youthful Emir Yousouf Solyman Shehab, of El Haded, who fell a victim to fever and to the heat of the climate to which he was exposed.

Commodore Napier leaves this to-day for Marmoorice, and requests me to express to your Highness every sentiment of respect on his part.

This communication concluded with the usual high-flown compliments of the east, and with the following list of the Emirs and Sheikhs of Mount Lebanon, who had survived their captivity in Sennaar, and whom I subsequently took back to their mountain homes:—

Emir Fnaour of Abaye, Emir Faris of the Wad-é-Sharoor, Emir Mahmoud of the Wad-é-Sharoor—all of the Shehab family.

Emir Hyder of Solymah, in the district of Metten; Emir Ali of Brumanah, in the district of Metten—of the Kyad Bey family.

Emir Abdallah of Falouyah—of the Mourad family.

Emir Ali of Deskoutah—of the Faris family.

Sheikh Nickoula Kasim of Kesrouan, and the Druse Sheikh: Hamoud-Ahou-Neked of Dhair-el-Khamar, his son—and Sheikh Abbas Neked.

VERGISZ MEIN NICHT.

FORGET me not!
O loved one, whom my tongue
Now may not name;
For whom I weave this song,
To whom my love proclaim.
In tears thy absence oft I mourn,
With prayers I watch for thy return:
Forget me not!

Forget me not!—
When in the joyous crowd,
Young hands shall wind
A crown of honour proud
Around thy brows to bind;
My guardian-spirit thou shalt hear,
Whispering softly in thine ear,
Forget me not!

Forget me not!
 And when, perchance, thine heart
 New passions move,
 And thy fond lips impart
 To other ears thy love,
 Ah! I conjure thee, by the power
 Of my love, that trying hour—
 Forget me not!

Forget me not!
 Even if hard fate decree
 That I should live,
 Severed for aye from thee,
 And through long years survive.
 Time, in my heart, shall work no change,
 Ah! let thine heart, where'er thou range,
 Forget me not!

Forget me not!
 Yet ere my youth shall pass,
 Should Death's chill hand
 Shatter for me Life's glass,
 And waste its half-run sands;
 My latest breath before I die,
 Shall to thy spirit fondly sigh,
 Forget me not!

Forget me not!
 And if, when life is o'er,
 The dark way trod,
 We meet upon that shore
 Where shines the light of God.
 Ah! then at last my heart no more,
 Of thine shall anxiously implore,
 Forget me not!

ANNIE ORME.*

HOW ANNIE ORME WAS SETTLED IN LIFE, AND WHAT WE DID TO HELP IT ON.
 BY HER AUNT, MISS RACHEL SINCLAIR, MANTUA-MAKER, LASSWADE.

(Communicated by the Author of "Margaret Maitland," &c. &c.)

CHAPTER VI.

WE sat together in this manner for, I think, about half an hour, waiting till Annie should come in; Lexie with her hands clasped round her knees, gripping them tight, and looking into the fire, without once moving; while I was looking at her, and crying quietly to myself, and aye giving the other look behind me at the door, and listening to every sound without, thinking it might be the footstep of that mis-guided bairn. I wearied sore for her every minute, and yet when a step passed the door which I had fancied in the distance was hers, I was glad; for even though I could not but condemn her as much as Lexie, I could not bear that she should have the burden of all Lexie's bitter words. Poor thing! poor foolish, misguided thing! to think there could ever be any happiness proceeding out of the like of this—a wooing begun hidelins, with, may-be, deceit, as well as stealth—that I should speak so of Annie Orme! and clean against the known opinions and special wishes of her nearest friends. But I was not angry; I was grieved to my very heart. Neither, I think, was Lexie to call angry; but she could keep up an appearance of it better than me.

At last I did hear her; I could not be mistaken—there was not another foot in Lasswade had music in it like Annie's, and she was singing low, as she came, an old tune. The poor thing! it was "Kind Robin lo'es me," as I discerned when she passed the window; and thankful was I to think that Lexie, having no taste for music, would not notice what it was; but, for myself, I know all the tunes in the country, I think, good or bad.

Beenie, I suppose, had been watching at the door, for Annie came in in a moment, and I never heard her rap. She had taken off her bonnet in the passage, and came in with it swinging in her hand, and her face had a thought more colour than usual, and her eyes were shining as I never saw them shine before. Indeed, she was just looking happy and bright, as it might be supposed she should look, coming in from the clear fresh air of such a night, and did not seem to have a shadow of fear about her.

The first thing that seemed to strike her when she came into the room was the way we were sitting, and the trouble upon our faces. She paused in her singing, and stood still a moment at the door. "Auntie Rechie, is there anything wrong?" said Annie Orme.

"Oh! Annie Orme, my bonnie bairn!" said I, but I could not say another word.

"Put your question to me, Annie Orme—I'll answer you," said Lexie; and come here before me, and lay away your bonnet: you need not spoil the good ribbons, though ye've spoilt a better thing—for I have something to ask of you."

Annie came forward in a surprised way, and laid down her bonnet on the top of the millinery box. I was wringing my hands, and pleading with my sister; but Annie came quietly, and stood before her, crossing her hands like a bairn waiting for its questions, and looking as innocent and peaceable as if she were only going to say Effectual Calling; though I did observe—but it might be only the surprise, and Lexie's look at her—a blush spreading over all her face.

"Annie Orme," said my sister, rising high in her seat, and looking so like a judge that my heart trembled for Annie; "you've heard us speak of your mother, and how she threw herself away, and how she died. Since your mother died, Annie Orme, have you ever felt the want of her? Has anybody grudged you a single thing, if it were even play or pleasure, or the vanities of youth? Has any mortal ever bidden you work except when you liked, or trusted you with any hardship? You've had as good schooling as Lasswade could give you; you're as much thought of as any lady in the place; and I'm sure there's no lady in the place whose garments have gotten so much pains bestowed on them as yours; besides that, your Aunt Rechie there, like a foolish person as she has been all her life, has made herself nothing better than a lady's maid to pleasure you. I ask you, Annie Orme, what you ever wanted that you did not get, or what thing ever was put upon you that you were not pleased with? Do you hear me, Annie Orme?"

"Yes, aunt," said Annie; and now she put her hands behind her, and drooped down her head, but she said not a word more.

"Oh, Lexie!" said I, "have compassion on her; she's little Annie's bairn."

My sister turned her head round to me with a start, and gave me a glance which made me hide my face. "She's little Annie's bairn," said Lexie; "do you mind what Annie Sinclair was, that ye dare to put me in mind of her now? The brightest spirit and the bonniest face in sight of the Pentlands. But what did she do? She went away, and married a man—a man no more to be compared to herself than the Esk water is to the Firth; and his evil ways and his mean manners broke her heart, and she died. We were but girls ourselves, Rechie Sinclair, and Annie was younger than us. But you put me in mind of her when I am here admonishing her daughter. You will make me daft between you. Annie Sinclair lost, and Annie Orme lost—and what's to become of you and me?"

I did not answer; I was crying to myself sore; and Lexie's voice was very shrill and high, as if but for pride she would fain have cried too. But, for all that, I glanced up at Annie Orme; a single tear was stealing down her cheek, and her eyes were full; but she was looking at Lexie steadfastly, and my heart was comforted by her face.

"Aunt Lexie—" said Annie Orme.

"Whisht!" said my sister, "dinna let one evil bring another;—do not say to me, Annie, a word that is not true. Its no story I've heard—I saw it with my own een; and you have been keeping trystes with this man the whole summer through, in spite of his place and yours—in spite of knowing that this was what I could not bear—in spite of our trust in you. It was time, I say, Annie Orme, high time, we had found out what kind of walks you took on the water-side."

Annie put up her hand to her flushed face, and the tears came down one after another, till it was all I could do to keep my arms from her. "Aunt Lexie, dinna be angry," said poor Annie, and there always came the other sob between; "I did not deceive you in my own mind, auntie; and some day you'll no think so ill either of me—or him."

"Of him! Preserve me in patience! She dares to name the Butterbraes' hind in such a way to me!" cried Lexie. "Let me ever hear his name again, or that you've said a single word to such a person, and I'll leave this place. Yes, Annie Orme, I vow to you I'll travel away; I'll give up the business, and flit the house, and take ye away to the West Highlands, or into England, over the Lammermuirs, or some other savage place. Ye shall never marry the like of him—ye shall never more speak to the like of him—ye shall never be a hind's wife—or ye'll kill me, Annie Orme."

"No, auntie," said Annie; but I thought her mind was away, and she did not know what she answered.

"Lexie," said I, "dinna be angry; you have let Annie ken what your pleasure is, and she does not rebel. Lexie, let us be good friends now. Annie, my dear, you need not greet. Oh, lassie! ye dinna ken how precious you are to us both!"

"Dinna speak that way, Auntie Rechie—dinna," said Annie Orme, sobbing; "I cannot bear that."

Lexie was sitting still, with her eyes fixed, looking into the fire. "This lad spoke about a license," she said, in a low voice, as if it were only to herself; "of getting a license some time in the summer. This is what our niece meditated, Rechie Sinclair; this is what she would leave our honourable house to do. You spoke about Thomas Mouter, Rechie, and I scorned it; but still you encouraged him. Now you'll get your will, mair than you wanted;—and when ye see Annie Orme mistress of a public, selling drams to every vagabond that passes by, you'll repent opposing me."

I heard at this moment a strange sound from Annie Orme, which did not seem like a sob, and immediately she hurried away.

"No that I'll ever permit the like of that," said my sister, raising her voice; "not that it ever shall be; but he dared to propose this, Rechie Sinclair, and she made no objection. If I had listened longer, I might have heard more; but that was what I could not do. Is she away to her own room, Rechie? She deserves solitude and darkness as well as ever one did; but she's no so strong as some. Take in a light, Rechie, and admonish the reprobate; I'll say no more myself this night."

I saw Lexie's heart was moved. After all, though she looks stern sometimes, Lexie is not hard-hearted, nor ever was. So I went quietly ben to my own room, where Annie had gone, for Annie sleeps with me. As I went in at the door, I heard again the strange sound which was not like a sob; and hurrying to see its cause, what did I find but Annie Orme lying back in the big, old easy-chair, with her hands covering her face, and her cheeks all wet with tears, laughing as I never saw her laugh before. To do her justice, I believe there might, may-be, be something of the affection called hysterical (a thing I do not much understand myself) in this of Annie; but it was a real laugh, and real mischief and fun (at such a time!) were in the eye that glimmered out wet to me, from under the shelter of her hand.

"Annie Orme!" said I; "I could not have believed this of you."

"Oh! I think shame of myself for laughing," said Annie; "but I cannot help it—indeed, I cannot help it; you would laugh yourself, if you kent. It was that last thing my Aunt Lexie said."

"Was that about the license?" said I. "Indeed, Annie, it vexes me that you can laugh at that; for a public-house would be a strange place for you. Is it not for a public-house? What is it for? Aye, Annie, now I mind, young Mr. Mouter has a license for simple tea and sugar. If it was that, it would not be so bad; but what tempted ye, woman, when there are plenty lads round about, in your ain degree, to take up with Robbie at the Butterbraes? The like of him!"

"Aunt!" said Annie Orme; "but you must not be angry, Aunt Rechie; no, indeed, I cannot bear that; and I meant to tell you, by-and-bye—or he meant himself—"

"Dear me, Annie," said I; "you must give him up—you must not speak to him more—or it will kill Lexie."

"Must I, aunt?" said Annie; "may-be—but I am not sure about that."

"Annie Orme! you'll have to promise. Woman, think of young Mr. Mouter and his fine business," said I. "Mind I am as much in earnest as Lexie; will you promise me, Annie, never to see him more?"

"He's to go away to-morrow, aunt," said Annie; "but I'll no promise—whisht, Auntie Rechie—you wouldna have me break his heart."

"Men's hearts are no so easy broken, Annie," said I, "never you be feared; and, besides, he's only a servant man. Annie, Annie, think what you're doing."

Instead of answering me by reasonable arguments, she came away close to me, and put her arms round my neck; so that, before I was aware, I found myself speaking as if I was quite pleased with Robbie, and ready to take him into the family in a minute. I am far too easy in my disposition—far too yielding—as Lexie has told me many a time; but I am too old to mend now.

CHAPTER VII.

It was a very quiet night that, with us. Annie sat silent at her seam, and never lifted her eyes; and except that Lexie now and then gave a groan, and me sometimes a sigh, I think there was scarcely a sound in the room. My sister was much softened to see Annie so quiet; but Annie, as I think, was occupied with other cogitations besides grief for our displeasure;—it was natural, poor thing—and it was not to be denied that this Robbie was a wise-like lad.

When I went into my own room, after having had a conversation with Lexie, I found Annie Orme not in her bed, though she had left the parlour about an hour before. When I came in, she had a little book in her hand, which she put away in a great hurry—no doubt it was some keepsake—so I asked no questions about it.

"Now, Annie," said I, having just been speaking to Lexie about the whole matter, "you must have a stout heart for this, my dear. You've done a very wrong thing in taking up with this young man, and you must be done with him, Annie Orme. Mind, I've seen your mother break her heart, because she did not take good advice, and break off in time. It's an awful undertaking, Annie, the like of this. Many a thing else you may make a mistake in, but everything else can be mended; and, Annie, Annie, my dear, just you think what a desolate thing it must be to repent after its done, when nothing in this world can deliver you except death, which it is a sin to seek for yourself, let alone another."

"But, auntie, there is no need for ever repenting, either before or after," said Annie, looking a little angry.

"Annie," said I, "when folk are not equal, they're never happy. A poor serving lad, with no culture or breeding, and the like of you, Annie Orme—I cannot think of it."

"But Robbie is not a common serving lad;

Robbie is—" When Annie had said this, she stopped, and laughed out; so that I was feared Lexie would hear her.

"Robbie is better than his neighbours—no doubt you think so, Annie," said I; "but wait a little till he grows a coarse man, and you're married upon him. Mind, I'm only supposing a thing that's never to happen; for neither Lexie nor me would ever consent to it."

Annie put her arms round my neck again, and leaned her head upon my shoulder. She did not speak a word except "Bonnie auntie!" but what could I say to her after that. She used to call me "bonnie auntie," when she was a little bairn, and wanted something; I aye yielded then, and I am feared I never will learn to refuse anything to Annie Orme.

Just as we were standing in this way, speaking about him, and me myself (being a fool, and nothing else) praising Robbie, and saying what a wise-like lad he was, we heard Lexie's foot in the passage. Both of us started and ran—me to begin to take off my net-cap, and Annie to hide herself behind the curtains, for fear her aunt should see that she was not sleeping.

"Rechie," said my sister, very low, just looking in at the door—and, seeing she waved upon me with her hand, I went out to her; and what do you think Lexie had brought—I said she was not hard-hearted—that I, knowing her so well, should say the like of that!—I ought to have told the real truth, that there scarcely ever was as kind a heart and as good a head as Lexie's put together, in spite of all she has had to vex her, poor woman, one time and another, all her life through.

She was carrying in her hand the little pink china jug full of negus, which she had just been making with her own hands in the kitchen.

"Is Annie sleeping?" said my sister.

"How do you think she could sleep, Lexie," said I, "after what has happened this night."

"Poor thing!" said Lexie, "though she's done anything but her duty to us, we must not fail, Rechie, of our duty to her. Make her take this—it'll do her good; and if you think she's feverish, give her some out of this bottle. She can expect nothing else, after her behaviour; but I would not have her ill either, if I could help it. Try and get her to sleep, Rechie; I must speak to her the morn."

And with a sigh Lexie went away.

When I went to Annie Orme, she had hidden her face in the pillow, and was crying bitterly; I had near cried myself; for though Lexie looked hard sometimes, it was strange to see the tenderness and mindfulness of her, even when she had been greatly angered.

The next morning, I went out early to do some errands, and left my sister and Annie alone. I had a fear about it; but still, after all, I thought it best.

Just on the bridge, I met Robbie; I scarcely knew him, for he had on his Sabbath dress, and looked in every way liker a laird than a hind. He was carrying a box with his things—honest man, it was not a very heavy one—and when he saw me, he stopped to speak to me, though he had never done it before.

"I am going away, Miss Reehie," said Robbie; "and though I am not going far, and its better for me, I am sorry to leave Lasswade."

"How far are you going?" said I—but I could not call him Robbie, and I did not know his last name.

"Only to Edinburgh," he said; "I am waiting to put my box on the coach, but I'll walk myself. Good-bye, Miss Reehie; you'll may-be hear of me aguin."

He held out his hand, and I gave him mine—him a common serving lad! He lifted his hat to me when he went away—neither Thomas Mouter nor Peter Braird would have done more than nodded—and I stood still and looked after him. It did not look like his Sabbath dress; he was as easy in it as I am in my old green merino gown; and, indeed, I did not wonder at Annie, for he was just as little like a farm servant as Thomas Strang, the smith (I could see the red glow of the smiddy, and half a dozen boys round it, at the corner of the street—that is what put him into my mind), was like a minister.

I went up all the way home, thinking of what Phemie Mouter said. He might be a great gentleman, or even a lord in disguise; but I soon saw that was not likely, for he had no motive; and though a great lord might pretend to be a landscape painter, as Annie was reading to me in a ballad the other day, I have great doubts whether it would be as good diversion to pretend to be a farmer's man.

CHAPTER VIII.

"Miss Reehie," said young Mr. Mouter, "will you come in to your tea to-morrow night—you and Miss Annie Orme? It's the last night of the year, you know—Hogmenay, as the bairns call it—and there will be just one or two more—all neighbours, Miss Reehie."

"Well, Mr. Mouter," said I, "I am sure I have no objection; we'll see what Annie says."

I have passed over all the time between October and the end of the year, because there was nothing in it of moment to anybody. We were all going about in our ordinary way, and nothing had happened in the town but what happens every day—a bairn coming home here and there, and an old person dropping off like the last leaves. And touching Robbie nothing was now said, he having clean departed, and nobody in Lasswade, as it seemed, minding about him at all; so that Lexie was again keen about Peter Braird, and I, I confess, began to think that young Mr. Mouter had a chance after all. So I ironed Annie's best collar and her fine sewed cuffs, that she got in a present, and made her put on her new blue merino, with a ribbon round the waist; and, having made up my own good cap, we dressed ourselves, and went down to Mr. Mouter's to our tea. It was not very cold for the season, so that it was pleasant going down the road, seeing the lights shining through the windows, and hearing the bairns singing at the doors. Little Katie Hislop has a miracle of a voice for singing, and she is so very wee a thing, that you cannot believe when you hear it, that such a wonderful sound is coming from a creature that you could almost hold in your hand. There she was, poor little thing, with an old table-cloth tied round about her waist, half full of oat-cakes, and slices of bread, and bits of short-bread, standing at Mrs. Thomson's window, singing one of the longest Hogmenay rhymes—or, rather, it was two or three of them joined together, and sung at the very height of her voice. There were two or three more with her, and just as they ended—

"But we are bairns come out to play, Get up and gie's our Hogmenay."

Mrs. Thomson opened the window, and gave them I cannot tell how many cakes and scones, and a great lump of fine, rich short-bread to Katie herself.

"Now, we'll go to Mr. Mouter's, and then we'll gang hame," said Tomima Hislop, Katie's big sister; "we needna bide lang there—he'll no gie us ony short-bread. Katie, sing."

But they scarcely waited to sing—they just gathered about the door in a cluster, and cried,

"My feet's cauld, my shoon's thin, Give me a piece, and let me rin," when they all ran away; but whether it was that Mr. Mouter had the cakes ready for them, or whether they were feared to face him (being so sedate a young man), I cannot tell.

"You see, auntie, the bairns ken," said Annie Orme to me; "they would not have run that way from our door."

"Nor from your door either, my dear," said I, "when you have a house of your own; but how is a man to ken?"

The table in Mr. Mouter's parlour was set out very fine, with beautiful china, and silver teaspoons, marked all T. M., his own initials—I thought to myself, if he got Annie, they would have plenty of silver things to begin with; for I knew my sister would not let her go to her own house without a good dozen of spoons—and there was short-bread and a great rich bun, and biscuits and bread of every kind. For company, there was Annie and me, and the two Miss Thomsons, and young William Wood and his wife, besides Phemie and Nicol, and Mr. Mouter himself.

"When are we to hear of a mistress to this fine house of yours, Mr. Mouter?" said young Mrs. Wood. "It's a pity to see such a bonnie little room, and no a wife to put into it: we have been looking for it these three months and more."

"It's a serious business; I am not a man that undertakes anything rashly; but there's no saying, ladies—there's no saying," said Mr. Mouter, briskly; and he looked straight round at Annie.

What did Annie do, think you? I was feared she would have laughed: instead of that, she held up her head, and asked Mr. Wood, as grave as if she had been Lexie, when he was last in Edinburgh.

"When I was last in Edinburgh," said Mr. Wood, "you'll no guess, Miss Annie, who I saw. Do you mind the young man that used to drive the Butterbraes' cart? Robbie something—but I never heard his last name. Well, I met him in a little street near the college, dressed in black, as well as anybody need be, and walking with a gentleman. I never was more astonished; but I did not speak to him, for I thought, if he had got any rise in the world, he would not like to be minded that he was once only a servant-man."

"It was very thoughtful of you, Mr. Wood," said I.

"Eh, and was't Robbie?" said Phemie Mouter, "what way did you no follow him, Mr. Wood? I would have gaen step for step, if it had been five miles—and there's nae saying what grand house he might have led you to in the end."

"Dear me, will somebody have left him siller?" said Miss Christina Thomson.

But Annie Orme never spoke a word, though when I looked at her, I saw her eyes dancing, and such a crowd of smiles into every line of her face, that my heart was moved to see her pleasure. The two Miss Thomsons were come of very comfortable folk, and would both have portions—so would Phemie Mouter; but when I looked at Annie Orme, I could not help seeing the difference, though Annie would have no portion, and was an orphan, poor thing, with only two single women, Lexie and me, all the friends she had in the world.

And as I thought upon my sister, the water came into my eyes. When did Lexie seek a pleasure to herself, or when did she spare herself an hour's work that was to better one of us? I have worked with her all my days—it may be thought I am taking a share of the honour, but anybody that knows me may know it is not so. Many a one has thought Lexie hard, even when she was toiling for them, and I question if any mortal but me, so much as guesses what kind of heart she has, or, indeed, if she knows herself.

And there was Annie Orme—little wonder that we were both proud of her—little wonder that we both would have had her well wedded, if we could; but the lad she liked best herself—what if he did turn out some great man after all?

"Annie," said I, when we were on our road home, "is this lad, Robbie, a greater person than he looks? tell me, is he some rich gentleman guisarding in this fashion? for, if he is, I'll tell Lexie, and we must instantly leave this place, and never be within knowledge of him more."

"No, nuntie, he is not a great gentleman," said Annie Orme, "no, he's may-be no quite what he looked like, but he's a true man; and by and bye he'll tell you everything himself—but you're no to ask me."

I was confused and bewildered, I could not tell what to think.

When we got home we heard a sound of voices in the parlour, and there was Peter Braird sitting with my sister. He had been getting a glass of wine—Lexie never offers folks drams—and there was a plate of our new-year's short-bread on the table.

"Dear me, Mr. Peter," said I, "are you going up to Windlestrae at this time of night?"

Peter gave a great laugh, and turned red in the face, "I want to be somebody's first-foot in Lasswade here; I came out on purpose; but I'm not going home to night, Miss Rechie."

"Well," said I, "you are paying somebody a great compliment, coming out all the way at a cold night. Who is it, Mr. Peter?"

"Every thing in its right time, Rechie," said my sister, who was looking uncommonly pleased. It was clear that Lexie expected that he had come to be first-foot to Annie Orme.

"I met a gentleman on the South-bridge the other day, Miss Rechie," said Peter, "and he asked kindly for you. He used to give me a lift in his cart, sometimes, on the Saturday nights, when I was coming home wearied, and a fine lad he is—Robert Scott—you mind him?—he was at the Butterbracs."

"And, Mr. Peter, do you keep company with the like of him?" said my sister, with a kind of horror.

"When I met him he was better dressed than me," said Peter, looking down upon his own coat, which was not quite so well brushed as it might have been, "and I am sure he speaks as good English; but I don't just to call keep company with him, Miss Lexie, for I never saw him but this once."

"Let not the name of any such person be mentioned to me again," said Lexie, "what do I care about his good dress—if somebody had even left him a fortune, what would he be for all that, but an uncultivated hind? No, Mr. Peter, as a man's breeding is, so is he—you may take my word for that."

"But its past eleven, and I'll have to be on the watch, or I'll be cheated after all," said the young man, "and I said I would let nobody be before me. Good-night to ye all, and a happy new-year when it comes; don't say I was here, Miss Lexie, if my mother comes down the morn."

Saying which, Peter went away, to the great astonishment of my sister, who tried to persuade herself he was coming back again after all. But I knew very well that Peter Braird cared nothing about Annie Orme—the great red-headed lout—as if he had discrimination for that.

When Annie went ben the house, to tell Beenie that she was to come to the parlour just before the clock struck twelve, and get a spoonful of toddy, and a bit short-bread, and wish us a good new-year, as was our custom, Lexie looked up to me with a concerned face.

"Rechie," said my sister, "do you believe that Annie is still thinking about that lad?"

"I do not ken, Lexie," said I—for I durst not say an untruth either one way or the other.

"They tell me he's to be seen in Edinburgh, well put on, and like a gentleman—a gentleman!—as if dress was all that was needed for that. He'll be taking his new trade by the hand, Rechie—just you see if I am not a sooth prophet—he'll have got somebody to lend him siller, and before we ken where we are, he'll be setting up an inn or public-house at our very doors, and asking us for Annie. I'll never consent—no, if it killed me to refuse, Rechie Sinclair, I'll never consent to the like of that!"

"There's worse things than keeping an inn, if he had got that length," said I, "and, besides, Lexie, folk need licenses for many an innocent trade; it might be only a grocery shop—it might be—"

"Never let me hear his name again," cried out my sister, and at that moment the clock warned twelve, and Annie and Beenie came into the parlour, and there was not a word more spoken till after the twelve strokes of the clock, when every one of us wished the other a happy new-year.

But no first-foot crossed our door-stone that night.

CHAPTER IX.

ABOUT three or four months after that—it was in April, and pleasant weather—there came a letter to us one day, inquiring if the two of us—being addressed just as "Misses Sinclair, Lasswade"—were called by the christian names of Alexina and Rachel, and were of kin to one Ninian Sinclair, dead in London, who had willed—being a poor old solitary man, though he left a great sum behind him—a legacy of a hundred and fifty pounds to the two daughters of his cousin, Johnstone Sinclair, of Lasswade. Now this being our father, and these being our names, besides that we knew of a cousin Ninian he had in London, Lexie immediately wrote to the law gentleman, in Edinburgh, who asked the question, saying it was us; and there came back an answer from him, telling some ceremonies he would have to go through, and appointing a day for us to come to his office to receive the legacy.

It is not to be supposed we could hear of a great sum like this without some elevation of spirit, and Lexie said immediately to me, "this will furnish a house for Annie Orme," and we were as glad about it as we could be about money. We put on blacks, of course, for the poor old man—I call him poor, not because he was dead, but because he had departed without one to grieve for him—and I thought it in a measure right to mention to folk who we were in mourning for, and what he was, just that he might not be defrauded altogether of some natural notice by the living, of the great end he had undergone.

Just a day or two after this, Annie came in one day, in a great haste, and ran into the parlour breathless. And what was this but to tell us that Peter Braird and Phemie Mouter had run away together, and had come back married folk, and were even now coming up the town with white gloves and white ribbons, on their road to Windlestrae—though what kind of reception they would get there I cannot tell.

I ran to the door in a minute, to wish them joy; but Lexie sat still in her chair, and would not move, and I saw she was just shaking. I was sorry for Lexie, for she had aye thought so much of this lad, though I did wonder how she could ever even like the like of him to Annie Orme.

When the two young fools and their train had passed—for they were behaving just like foolish persons, Peter, especially, looking half out of his senses, though Phemie behaved a little better—and we were back again into the parlour, and at our work, Lexie sat silent for a long time, after which she began to speak to Annie Orme, and to call her "my dear"—a thing most uncommon for Lexie—as if she thought the news about Peter Braird would be a disappointment to Annie.

"I have been thinking, Rechie," said my sister, "that this poor bairn, Annie Orme, is held far too close to one place, and that a change would do her good. So it struck me, that when we went into Edinburgh for this siller, we might take a room for a day or two at Miss Clephane's, and take Annie with us, and just go about and see what was to be seen. May-be, if there was a very beautiful, quiet day, we might go across to Fife, and back again, for a sail, and just let Annie have a little pleasure like others of her age, poor thing."

"Thank you, Aunt Lexie," said Annie, "I should be very glad."

"Would you be very glad, my dear? then we'll go, Annie, and you may think that settled, for ill would I like this day to refuse you anything that would make you glad, my poor bairn."

Oh, Annie Orme! the tear was in your eye for my sister's kindness, but the laugh was on your lip for her deceiving herself. Do you think I did not see the half-dimple on your cheek, or do you think I did not know that you were no more disappointed about Peter Braird than I was?—you need not deny it, Annie Orme.

So it was settled, that on the Friday next—that was a week from the time we were speaking—we should all go into Edinburgh, and that we should stay, perhaps, a week away from home.

That same night, Annie went out to get a walk by herself, for I was busy; and not long after she went away, I heard a rap at the door, and immediately Beenie showed in Mr. Mouter into the parlour. He was dressed more carefully than usual, and had a white lily of the valley in his button hole, and white gloves in his hand—but being a careful lad he had not put them on.

He got a very cold reception from Lexie; so, thinking myself bound to pay more attention to him on that account, and having, besides, aye an idea that he might turn out Annie's Goodman after all, I was very kind to him, and we began to speak about what had happened in the morning.

"It could not be a greater surprise to you, than it was to me, Miss Rechie," said Mr. Mouter. "I have observed some stir going on for a day or two—bits of white ribbon lying about, and frills and collars, and things of that kind, which I suppose Phemie had gotten from Nicol, who is very careless of his money, like most scuffling men; but when there was no appearance of her at breakfast-time this morning, I thought she had gone in to Mrs. Thomson's, or was standing hawking with some of the women about, and never troubled myself on the subject. As the day went past, I got more anxious, but still I thought it was only Phemie's nonsense; so you may judge how I was struck when I saw a post chaise stop at Mr. Trotter's door, and out of it came a couple in white gloves. My first thought was, that they were strangers, and I went to the door to see—when, behold! who was it but Phemie Mouter and young Windlestrae."

"Not young Windlestrae; Sinclair Braird is married upon a gentlewoman like himself," said Lexie, sharply, "you mean Windlestrae's young son, that silly callant, Peter, Mr. Mouter."

"Silly, or no silly, he's my brother-in-law, Miss Lexie," said Mr. Mouter, a little ill-pleased, "and I would not like to hear him spoken of otherwise than civilly."

"He was my second cousin's son twenty years before he was your brother-in-law, Mr. Mouter," returned my sister, "and one of the family may speak, as I believe, from her ain knowledge, without asking any permission from a fremd person. Windlestrae, poor man, will be tried this day—I must go up to-morrow and ask for the family."

"For you see, Mr. Mouter," said I, being scared for Lexie hurting his feelings, "a marriage like this is a trial to both the families, both his and hers. If they had only been prudent, the rash young things, and let their friends ken, and have a right wedding for them—but no doubt it will save much trouble if it does nothing else."

"It brings things to a point with me, Miss Rechie," said the young man, "I cannot do without some woman person in my house; for you see, I am a man by nature who cannot endure waste, and the shop takes me up often, and prevents me looking after things. It is true, Phemie was no great help, but still she was aye there. Now, to tell the truth, I want a wife, and I want a thrifty, quiet one, that will not be extravagant, but take care of the siller after its made, and spend it with discretion. There's your own niece, Annie Orme, Miss Lexie and Miss Rechie—if you'll assure me of your consent, I'll speak to her. My business is a good business, and a steady man can make it better; but if there's any chance of your making objections, I'll no speak to the young lady, for I never like to raise hopes that are not to be fulfilled; for this reason I thought it best to speak to you first."

For a moment there was perfect silence in the room—you might have heard a feather fall, for I durst not speak, though he was waiting for an answer.

"Does my niece, Miss Annie Orme, ken how much you think of her, Mr. Mouter," said Lexie, in a voice of suppressed anger, which, I suppose, sounded quite quiet to the stranger.

"Well, Miss Lexie, I cannot say," said Mr. Mouter, "I am a prudent man by nature; I never put out my hand further than I can draw it back, and not being quite sure about myself, not to speak of you, I never said anything to Miss Annie—but she may have guessed."

"Here she is herself, we'll ask her," said Lexie, very quietly.

The poor young man rose up; "No, no," said he, "if she's to be asked, I'll ask her myself;" but before he could say another word, Annie was in the room.

"Mr. Mouter's sister has married Peter Braird, of Windlestrae, Annie, my dear," said Lexie, "and Mr. Mouter, there, thinks you would make a good wife to him. Now, Annie, I'll let you give the answer for your own hand; would you like to marry this young man, my dear?"

Poor Annie's cheeks grew like crimson; I never saw such a face, and I thought she would have fallen down; but glancing at Mr. Mouter, and seeing him pull his white gloves through his hands, dirtying them far more than if he had put them on, the dimple formed in her cheek again, and she just said, "No, auntie, I would not," and ran from the room.

"Miss Lexie, you've used me very ill," said Mr. Mouter, "I can never look over the like of this. You think I'm not good enough for Annie Orme? very well, we'll see; I would have made her Mrs. Mouter if you had given me civil treatment. Now, though I know very well she does not mean to be ruled by what she said just now, yet I'll be held by it, Miss Lexie Sinclair; and I can tell you I think myself as good as your niece any day, or better, if the truth were told. I wish you good evening, Miss Rechie; you need never hope to see me in this house again, grand as you think it; for I can do better than a poor mantua-maker, before I go a dozen steps, and when that girl, Annie, is an old maid like yourselves, you'll repent the way you've used me."

Saying that, he flung open the parlour door and went away. "I am very sorry, Mr. Mouter," said I, "you see Lexie's that proud—to be sure she has a good reason—but if you like to speak to Annie herself"—

"That's past, that's past, Miss Rechie," said Mr. Mouter, waving his hand, "if she went down on her knees to me, I could not look over this."

"Which she never will do, be you sure of that," said I, in haste, "not if you were a king, instead of having a grocery shop; and its a comfort to think she would not have taken you after all."

I said this last low, and he did not hear me; but, indeed, I came in in a fever at him and Lexie, not knowing which had made me most angry; but then I minded that nobody had so good a right as Lexie to dispose of Annie Orme, and that the young man was not seeking her because he liked her, but because she would make a thrifty wife. Now I had no doubt Annie would make a good wife, if she had a little time to get dounce and settled—but a thrifty one—alack a day!

CHAPTER X.

FOR the whole next day, Lexie was much cogitating in her own mind, and scarcely spoke a word to anybody; but in the evening, as she was standing at the door for a mouthful of air, Annie having again gone out (Annie had really turned very fond of being out at nights), young Dr. Jamieson stopped his horse at the door to speak to us, and after asking very kindly for her and me, how we were, made particular inquiry for Annie Orme. When he rode away, I saw the face of Lexie was full of meaning, and so waited till she should speak.

"Rechie," said my sister, at last, "Annie Orme now will have a tocher."

"And not a bad one, Lexie," said I, "for the like of us."

It was just dusk, and there was a kind of grey, quiet light coming down out of the sky, where the clouds lay motionless, like far-off lands sleeping by the sea. Some of them had just touches upon them of the sun here and there, and some of them were dark and round, as if they projected out of the blue, and some of them were white and soft like masses of down; in among them was a star or two. It looked to myself, being pondering, as if it was the golden streets of Jerusalem, with the evening lamps lighted here and there, and that we in this world could only get this one glance at them before the deep night came over us, and gave us our lawful sleep. And then my thoughts went away from me, up to what they were doing, who went about the streets of Jerusalem where the lights were lighted yonder; and I thought of what the prophet says of grey-headed men leaning upon their staffs, and bairns playing in that city, and the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride; and then I marvelled if the folk yonder might ever win to the walls or to the gates, to look down on the old country far below, and what they thought of it now. And from that my mind wandered to little Annie, and the way she used to cry our names from our old threshold stone; and I looked away over the water, to the side of the brae that glimmered up among the clouds, and I almost thought that if I had been on the road, I could have seen Annie at the door, with her arm round the neck of our dog, Warlock, and him giving aye his little bark when she cried, "Lexie, Rechie," and my mother busy in the room, and now and then passing by the door. I gave a long sigh as my heart returned to me, and my sister must have been thinking the same, for she sighed too. "Its like one of the old nights langsyne, Rechie," said my sister to me.

And then we both gave another sigh; and then, for my part, the tears came to my eyes, and I bade Lexie come in, and we would get a light and take our seams again.

Being returned, Lexie began to speak again about what she was saying before.

"Rechie," she said, "my mind is not changed, though neither you nor me judged discreetly about the proper person—but we'll no controvert that any more. There's that young man that was speaking to us this moment, Rechie—that's a fine lad, and a good son, and a person that nobody could make any objections to—I would be content with him for Annie."

"Dr. Jamieson? but he'll be looking for higher than our Annie, Lexie," said I.

"I would like to ken how he could look higher, or in what respect?" said my sister. "If it were for good looks, Annie Orme is what I call bonnie; and she'll have as much as furnish a good house, and she's come of most creditable people. So, I say, Rechie, we must be civil to the doctor, and ask him to call and see us, for I see nobody in Lasswade that would be as suitable for Annie Orme."

At this moment, Annie herself came into the room.

"You have been long out, Annie Orme," said I, "where have you been? you should take your walks through the day, and no at night."

"I have been just at the waterside again, aunt Rechie," said Annie Orme.

Something in the tone of her voice made both Lexie and me look up. I never saw so happy a face; one smile was coming close on the step of another, and there was a wavering colour upon her cheeks, which rose and fell, and her eyes were giving shy, sudden glances here and there, from under the cast down eyelids, and her breath came a little fast and short, so that you saw her heart was beating quick.

"Dear me, Annie," said I, "was there any body with you by the waterside?"

The next moment I repented having said that, for Lexie saw what I meant, and her face grew red, and she stopped her work and looked at Annie with a knitted brow. Annie never noticed this; she gave a low laugh, twisted the strings of her bonnet, and said to me, "I met Helen Lyon, auntie," and then went quick away to her own room.

I dared not look at Lexie; for to tell the truth, I felt almost sure, within myself, that Annie Orme had been holding a meeting with Robbie, from the Butterbracs.

"Rechie," said my sister, solemnly, "you'll see if I do not speak true. She's dealing unfaithfully with us; see if that hind lad does not come to us, to dishonour our house with his mean proposals. I am as sure as if I had seen them, that Annie met him this night, and the first word of such a thing that's minted to me, I'll take my staff in my hand, and this misguided thing by the arm, and journey away to some strange place—for I'll no bear it. To see Annie Orme serving strangers, and filling measures, and taking pennies and sixpences, from the meanest passer by—it would kill me, Rechie Sinclair!"

Well, if it would have killed Lexie, it may be was even greater pain to me; for you see, I stood between the two, and had sympathy with both, and sorrowed with both in my own spirit, feeling that I could not bear this any more than Lexie, and yet in my heart yearning with pity over the ill-advised bairn. You may believe, too, what a start I was thrown into, when the candle being put out, and me laid down, Annie Orme crept into my arms, and whispered to me, "He's got his license, Auntie Rechie."

"Oh, bairn, bairn!" said I, "do you tell me that;" and I thought I would have broken my heart.

CHAPTER XI.

Now whether it was a natural perverseness of circumstances, such as I have sometimes seen, or whether it was really a sudden liking, I cannot tell, but of this I am certain, Dr. Jamieson called upon us within two days of the time I have mentioned, of his own accord, and told us that our father's cousin, Ninian, was also a far-away cousin of a friend of his, to whom some of the old man's money had likewise come. The doctor was a very pleasant lad, good at conversation, and of a cheerful nature; and I could not help thinking that Lexie would have done better if she had made as discreet a choice the first time, instead of setting her heart upon Peter Braird; but I saw at once, that it would be nonsense ever dreaming about it; for, seeing he was received among some of the gentry and the rich gentlemen farmers, and had money and an inheritance himself, was it ever to be supposed that he would come courting to Annie Orme?

However, I had to keep my thoughts to myself, for Lexie was greatly exalted about Dr. Jamieson, and pressed him to come back again, which he said he would do. And ever after that, Lexie was both anxious and angry if she saw so much as a smile on the face of Annie Orme, and would have done some ill to Robbie, I believe, if he had been so rash as to come to our door.

But the week passed, and we heard no word of him. And who do you think was cried in Lasswade kirk upon the Sabbath-day? who but young Mr. Mouter and Miss Christina Thomson! I could not believe but the preacher was out of his senses when he said the names.

Upon the next Friday, according to our arrangement, having put up a supply of things in the little black trunk, and all our best bonnets in a big box, and tea and sugar for a week in a little basket, we took the coach, and went into Edinburgh. The place we were to lodge at was Miss Clephane's, where Lexie had learned the millinery. It was up a long stair, near the end of the Cannongate, and close to the palace, and we could see the sentries at the gate from our windows, and Arthur's Seat beyond. Miss Clephane was then an old woman, and had given up the business, and lived on her money, just letting a room now and then, and like us she had a niece living with her; but Miss Rosie Clephane was nearly as old as me, and very tall, and as thin as Lexie, so there could not possibly be any comparison made between her and Annie Orme.

They were speaking much at this time about some students who had lodged with them, who were done with their time at college, and now were preachers, ready for kirks, and waiting on them. One of the first things Annie said, when we got to Edinburgh, was, that she wanted to go to one particular church, and no other, a thing which surprised me, seeing that Annie did not commonly express so very clear a will of her own; but as the minister there was a great man, and well worth hearing, neither Lexie nor me made any objection. On speaking about it to Miss Rosie, we discovered that she went there too, so we made up our minds to go altogether, to Annie's great good pleasure; though what special interest she had in it, I could not, with all my skill, make out or perceive.

On the Saturday, we took Annie to see the palace and the castle, and let her out by herself at night—on her promising not to stay long—to go up as far as St. Anthony's chapel. She came in as blooming and happy-like as could be, and I never was prouder of her—though it did not become me on a Sabbath!—than when I fastened her white gown the next morning, and watched her put on her new bonnet with the white and lilac ribbon, which I choose for her myself. You never saw a fresher, bonnier face in Edinburgh or out of it; and she looked as like a lady, I am bound to say, as any one we met, though we passed through some of the grandest streets in the town, on our way to the kirk that day.

CHAPTER XII.

I LIKE to see folk coming into a church. If we are there a quarter of an hour too soon, Lexie always reads her Bible without ever lifting her head, and makes Annie Orme do the same; but, for my part, I like to notice everybody that comes in, and to see who of a family is at the kirk and who is not, and just to take a kindly look of them all. So it happened, being busy looking at all the strange folk, I never glanced up at the pulpit at all, till the psalm was given out, and then I had to hurry to find the place in a very small-printed Psalm-book; besides, I was particularly taken up with Annie Orme, who let fall her Bible a dozen times, I am sure, if she did it once, and grew red and white, and put up her handkerchief to her face, till I grew very anxious, and thought she was ill; I asked her, and said, I would go home with her, if she liked; but Annie answered, "No, no," and let fall her book again. So immediately it came into my head, that may-be she had seen Robbie in the church, and I looked round and round, and lost my own place, and missed the psalm-singing, hunting through the kirk for him; but I could see him nowhere.

What blind inconsiderate mortals we are after all; I was within half-an-hour of what made my heart stir with thanksgiving, and I knew it not.

All through the prayer I was concerned about Annie; I scarcely could attend to it for my trouble about her, which was a great sin in me. So we sat down again, and I was looking into Annie's face once more, and asking if she were unwell, when I heard the click of Lexie's glasses—Lexie is very short-sighted—as she put them on to look up at the minister, and wait for the text. But before there was a word of the text—you may think how I started, both my heart and me, when Lexie suddenly threw up her arms, and gave a cry, which made me think she had fainted. I started from Annie, and turned to my sister, who was on my other side. "Are you ill, Lexie?" whispered I, and there was great drops hanging on my brow with fear.

"Rechie Sinclair, I'm a fool," said my sister, and she panted for her breath. "Look up yonder—up yonder, ye foolish person, I tell ye—its Robbie, from the Butterbraes!"

I looked up; what did I see? past the long, pulpit stairs, past the preacher's desk—there, with his minister's gown upon him, and his fine blacks and white neckcloth, bending his head over the big Bible, in the very pulpit itself, was the same Robbie that took off his hat to me on Lasswade-bridge, and that we did not think good enough for Annie Orme!

I sat there with my mouth open and my eyes—I could not believe my very sight—and at the same time I was half distracted with the constant click of Lexie's glasses, as she put them on and took them off, and did not rest still for a single moment. Also, Annie Orme had hidden her face low down in her hands, and I could feel by the motion of her, being close to my side, that she was crying with all her might. But I could not say a word—I could not do a single thing, but sit with my eyes staring wide open upon Robbie Scott.

Bless me, to think of that—to think of that! But bye and bye I noticed that his voice was shaking, and I steadied myself as well as I could, that the poor lad might not lose his fortitude by looking upon us; I have no doubt it was a grand sermon—not the least doubt—but what it was about at this moment I am not prepared to say.

"Do you ken the minister, Miss Sinclair," said Miss Rosie Clephane, bending over to my sister, when the blessing was said; "did he no do grand? That's our student lad I was telling you about—for the Presbytery only licensed him last week."

I looked at Lexie, and Lexie looked at me—never one of us said a word; but at last Lexie gave a bit short laugh, and rose up and went right away; I saw she thought shame.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE minister came after us immediately from the church, Sabbath-day as it was.

"Annie Orme," said my sister, "your aunt Rechie and me are two old fools. I make no hesitation in saying that—but I am not a dour person—nobody can blame me with such a spirit; so if your aunt Rechie does not object, Annie, we'll ask this young man to stay to his dinner."

"Me, Lexie!" said I.

As if they did not both know that I would never oppose! So we put the minister opposite Annie at the table, and I took the head, and Lexie took the foot, and thus we had our Sabbath-day's dinner in Edinburgh. If any body had told me, three hours before, that Robbie would dine with us that day, I should have laughed it to scorn; yet, here he was, and no one in the room more taken with him than Lexie Sinclair, her very self.

So he told us all his story. It was true his father was a very poor man, with a poor small moorland-farm in the south country, no better than an East Lothian hind; but Lexie never seemed to heed that, though Mr. Robert told us plain. The poor lad said, too, that he lived for his first session on little more than five pounds; that his second he got some teaching; and that over since he had been keeping himself in the hardest way, though principally by teaching, till the last summer, when his father was in want himself, owing to an ailment among his cattle, and he was driven to great straits, and had to hire with Mr. Lait, of Butterbracs.

"A little vulgar pride stood in my way, no doubt," said Mr. Robert, with a smile, "but it was necessity, and I did it. There is no time of my life I shall regret less, Miss Lexie; for when I drove the Butterbracs cart, I had liberty sometimes to walk by the Esk water—and you will let me carry, not the remembrance only, but the companion of these walks with me all my life—will you, Miss Lexie?"

And Lexie said afterwards to me, "how could I, if I had been ever so inclined, have said 'No,' to a minister?"

So he is to get our Annie; and I am sure I am very glad and very well pleased, and proud of him, for a fine looking young man, not to say a minister. There is already some chance of him getting a kirk very soon, and whenever he is placed they are to be married; but though I am very glad of so suitable a man for Annie, and that she will not need to sew all her life, like us, but will be well taken care of and provided for, and have a higher place in this world than the like of us—

Still—but I would have been disappointed if she had not been married—still I am very loth to let her go away; and I think, may-be, the best plan of all would have been to let well alone, and keep her beside us, and have her aye Annie Orme.

It is too late for that now, for she is sitting at the window with Lexie making her wedding gown, which my sister and me bought out of Annie's knowledge, in Edinburgh, last Monday. And Lexie herself can almost come the length of laughing now about the license, and is as proud of the young man as can be. And only yesterday, when we went up to Windlestrae to see Mrs. Braird, who, poor woman, is anything but pleased with Phemie Mouter for a daughter-in-law, I smiled within myself at the change in Lexie—for whereas, a short time ago, she would have been overcome with shame at the very mention of Robert Scott as a match for Annie Orme; now she began of her own accord to tell Windlestrae and his wife the whole story, and all about "the grand sermon (I am sure she never heard a word of it any more than myself) which Mr. Robert preached in Edinburgh to Rechie, and Annie Orme, and me!"

BIRDS IN CAPTIVITY.*

THE BULFINCH.

(Larix Pyrrhula.)

"His head of glossy jet I spy,
His downy breast of softest red."

I DIVIDE this subject into two parts—the educated and the untaught bird. The imperative necessity for adhering to the treatment pursued by the German instructors of these docile creatures would alarm an amateur, satisfied to have a bulfinch in its natural and uneducated state. I am fully convinced that, were our artisans to give the same meed of care as the patient professor of "Cher-Hessen," "Fulda," and the "Vogelsburg," our native birds would equal, if not rival, those of the "Faderland," our melodies being more simple and familiar; the natural notes are pleasing only as being illustrative of a cheerful, loving temperament—their huskiness conveying an idea of an effort to do better.

Naturalists have a variety of opinions as to the migration of these birds: I am inclined to believe that if, with us, it is a permanent resident, it, nevertheless, is more gregarious than is comprehended by a small family party, and that they change their quarters. It is only in the south that the bulfinch is pronounced to be a bird of passage, and I have reason to believe that it is a mere supposition, the result of finding these birds in every European state and abounding in Russia and Sweden. This confirms my opinion, that the delicacy of the German birds is the effect of man's treatment. I doubt that the "black bulfinch" is ought but a victim to bad feeding; the "white bulfinch" I should not pronounce to be so problematical, if the specimens said to be in the "Leverian Museum" had been bred in the house, as these birds pair with canaries; and the bird called "the London mule" (the produce of goldfinch and canary) is nearly white; besides, I have seen a bird called "the white blackbird"—(the term rather paradoxical!) The food for bulfinches caught in a wild state (id. est. the dunces) should be the same as I have laid down for the first and second class feeders, also apple blossom fruit: insects they seek when on the wing, but in confinement they are not necessary; larch-buds and green food making the nearest approach to its natural food; bearing in recollection, that for ten months in the year this bird frequents the woods, and approaches the gardens and orchards only when the buds are full of the embryo blossoms. In May, they return to the hedges and sloe-blossoms, and, by a provision of nature, build about June—later than the mere seed-eating birds. Baths and sand wind up this treatment: the latter is absolutely required, as these birds are inclined to grow fat, and are greedy. Quartz has been found in small particles in their crops. Hempseed only to be allowed as a treat—a few grains a week; flax, canary, and rape to form the standard food.

I now begin the more important theme, and having bought the German piping bulfinches, and had instruction from the dealer, I shall give the substance of the lessons received, as also my experience of their efficacy.

The first food given in Germany, where the art of rearing nestlings is understood, is egg and "sweet summer rapeseed:" the seed is steeped in boiling water, and then washed, so that the husk comes off; after this, a very little seed is mixed with the egg, and with this paste the birds are fed every two hours; each succeeding day a little more seed is added to the egg, and thus the bird becomes at last used to the rapeseed.

Their mode of instruction may be acceptable to my readers. "After the birds have been at home four or five days, the teacher whistles to them, three times a day, the tune which they are to learn; and that which they have not learned when February comes, they will never learn at all. About this time they are all sold to the bird-dealers, and by them brought to England, America, and other countries, where they are disposed of at a high price: even in Germany, a good piping bulfinch is sold for eight or ten louis d'or (about nine pounds sterling)."

The great objection to the importation of a number of valuable birds together is, that they are apt to become "confused" in the air learned, and to take from one another the first or second part of a tune—some of the travellers singing overmuch en route, while others forget the lesson taught; but if the birds have been well instructed, they will resume their own tune or tunes, when separated from the many. At times, a bird can only remember the call-note: a tune may be whistled to it, always in the same key, and liking to sing, and its original tune having been forgotten, it will take to the new one; but it is only the experienced teachers of Germany who will be able to instruct in a new air. After moulting, these birds are frequently distressed, and others are enraged, because their attempts to sing are abortive: in such case, let their health be attended to, and they must be kept warm and quiet, when it is more than probable their voices will come round in a natural way. Any impatience on the part of the possessor will irritate a species that nature, or, what is more likely, training, has made irritable; but when the bird begins his engaging tricks, and looks cheerful, then assistance, by whistling in the same key to which he had been accustomed, may be afforded. It must be remembered that the Germans rear their bulfinches in rooms heated by stoves, and that hoarseness is generally the consequence of their first winter in Britain.

In a single instance I was not successful. My room was not kept sufficiently warm: the bird moulted badly the first season, and forgot his tunes; he partially resumed them in summer, and seemed to be in good health when in my large aviary cage, to which I removed him from his own, for exercise; the second moult he died. I have known these Germans to be in excellent song for years, where windows were seldom opened; and I judge that, being removed from the close rooms of artisans, the first winter is their trial; once acclimatised, they do well. A late authority mentions an instance of a piping bulfinch having lived in a cage twenty years; and the writer (Mr. Thompson) adds, that the age when bought is unknown; but it is easy to know by the feet of a bird, and by other signs, if it be an old one.

Their food should be summer rape, called "sweet summer seed," a little canary, and flax. It is difficult to obtain it: as a substitute, turnip-seed may be given, it is more expensive, but the rape sometimes sold is strong and bitter. But with us there is no seed called summer rape. Not more than five or six grains of hemp weekly, this will be sufficient, and make them tame; they take it off the tongue; also the pips of apples, green food—especially chickweed and salad—apple-blossoms, larch-tops, a cherry, and a fig. The fewer delicacies the better, as these birds are inclined to apoplexy. It is recommended to put a bit of rusty iron in the drinking vessel, if the bird becomes hoarse; also about the size of a nut of manna, given occasionally in the same vehicle, improves the voice. I have never found manna to cure a bird when ill, but it relieves one slightly ailing. For the cure of fits, dip the bird into cold water, and put him then in a warm and quiet place. For this attack, known by the bird falling down, spreading the wings, and opening the beak, a spider may be afterwards given. Some add "a bit of pork," "a sprig of wormwood," but I did not find the bird picked at either; and as a general remark, I would say that simple remedies only have any chance, beyond them you only increase suffering.

Although this species is supposed to be insectivorous, I have seldom found them to take with the avidity of other lozias a meal-worm or raw meat, both of which are good when ailing. I gave about the size of a nut of bread, upon which cold boiled milk had been poured, at least twice a week, as I made a rule to do to all my birds. One reason is, that it is the best remedy against the huskiness produced by constantly eating dried seeds, and also that I found birds prefer the milk so given to it by itself; and milk being one of our best remedies, birds unaccustomed to take it when in health, will not touch it when ill. I also scrape raw beef, and mix it with the yolk of a hard-boiled egg, on which a few drops of water have been poured, and all made into a paste, and given quite fresh, on alternate days, with the above. When this paste (the nightingale's food) was provided, I added a vessel of cold boiled milk—provisions indispensable before and during the season of moulting, and the first winter's trial of our variable climate.

The possessor of a bird who will take an interest in his well-doing, need hardly be reminded to observe if the ailing favourite will take the milk. I have known it prescribed "to withdraw the water vessel." The sufferer sulked, obstinately avoided the milk (perhaps it had become sour), and must have died, if the water had not been replaced; this supports my argument, that it is better to accustom the birds to that which they will really like.

All obstructions in the voice proceed from cold; when the sufferer makes the continual sound of "tjib-tjib," the Germans use a warm bath, by which I have seen two birds killed; and I believe, as I before tried to impress upon my readers, that all unnatural remedies frighten so delicate a creature, and hasten its death. Again, I advise the prevention of cold, given principally by draughts of air. This bird likes a cheerful cage; I found the bell shape the best, placed in a cheerful and yet warm situation. It may seem strange to say, but it is a fact, that these birds, and others also, require occasional change of air; about the pairing season, I restored one of mine to health by a country visit. Experience has taught me that the early training of the taught bulfinch points out the necessity of steady care to preserve health and song—little can be done to cure the consequences of neglect. The trained bulfinch is a delightful companion, he bows, hops on the table, sings at command, and is susceptible of the strongest attachment; if slighted, he grieves or sulks, and fits frequently follow a fright. I prefer the bird that has but one tune, for in more than one instance I have known them to forget, or confuse the march and the waltz, that so delighted the hearers in the former season, and two "pipers" in the same room will cause confusion and forgetfulness; in any case, two birds of the same kind should never see each other. A thrush has been known never to have sung because another was present.

The price of a good taught bulfinch is from three to four guineas. There is an indescribable charm in the melody of these pretty beings, and their desire to attract the attention of those they are attached to, and they are exclusive and constant. As I regret that any bird is in confinement, and know that no benevolent feeling will emancipate the whole class; also that foreign birds cannot be given their freedom, I try to make mine feel less of the irksomeness of captivity, by allowing them at times, when perfectly safe from accident, to fly in and out of their cages; it is the careless neglect of persons not closing their doors to shut out the little toddling feet of children, the gaucheries of servants, and the indifference of casual visitors, together with the undesired attentions of grimalkin, that cause so many "fatal ends to favourites." I say less about fire-places, for, with two exceptions (a nonpareil and a golden oriole), I found that birds, accustomed to leave their cages, avoided the fire; still it is a dangerous practice to neglect placing a guard, or to forget that a large water ewer or basin may lose you your favourite also. When the forms of an early greeting and good will had been gone through, "Pop" (my pet bulfinch) ranged the breakfast-table, and took a bath, cold or tepid, according to season; if I left the room, he watched the door, and prepared his call-note; he hopped to meet me when I entered, and poured forth his airs, looking saucy all the while, for no one else would he sing "at command." I remarked the fondness of these accomplished birds for hats, by which I conclude some association—shall we call it memory?—was connected with early lessons. On one occasion—for I seek all that can take me within the sounds of melody, sweeter to me than that of a prima donna—I saw a ludicrous, and, to the bird-dealer, a rather inconvenient illustration of a piping bulfinch's fondness for that very ungraceful portion of man's attire. I accompanied a lady to Schinge's rooms, and he had one choice and high-priced bird exhibited the last; this he, with merchant-like acumen, had removed to his "family apartment," redolent of onions and German cookery, n'importe, there perched "bully," indifferent to all objectionable matter, and heedless of fastidiousness as we were, when we encountered his bright black eye, he did not obey the sign (the waving of his master's head), a hempsced offered and accepted, still silent; the poor man looked distressed, but conscious, while, in his broken English, he said the words "confused," "sulky." Our anxiety made us look patient and amiable, another trial—there the culprit sat "in dull contented ignorance"—at last, in despair, the owner of the contumacious beauty clapped on his hat, with "dere nou," closely resembling poor Hood's "wooden d—n," and, forthwith, after two or three preparatory calls, bully threw himself, con amore, into his three melodies—to call them either "flute-like," or "bird-like" sounds, would be to wrong the exquisite sweetness of the notes—the more extraordinary that the natural tone of the bird cannot be called a song. I need scarcely add that, after the extorted confession of this monomania on the part of Der Gimpel oder Dompfaffe, my friend not being a Welshwoman, or an admirer of innovations, and with a prudent conviction that the owner of a hat could not be ever at hand when she desired a waltz from the cage, declined the purchase. I have often thought over this, and several instances of similar associations, with surprise, for the German miner and artisan never has, I believe, adopted any head-covering except a cap.

To prove that the bulfinch is fully entitled, by his docility, his excellent memory, and his social habits, to rank in the collection of the amateur as a first-rate favourite, I give the following anecdotes, illustrative of his just claims to favouritism, premising that the term "piping bulfinch" always means a taught bird.

One which a lady (north of the Tay) bought of a German bird-dealer, because of the excellence of its song, was no sooner in her possession than he became entirely mute, and though apparently in perfect health, neither voice nor instrument could induce it to sing. A Hanoverian officer, who happened to be present, whistled several waltzes, but in vain. Bully was still silent; at last the Hanoverian recollected an air he had heard a bird-dealer sing in Germany, and whistling the first bar, the bird instantly finished it.

Another, in Edinburgh, not only sung delightfully, but performed several curious tricks. When its mistress was at work, it flew away with her needle; or if she was writing, it tried to carry off her quill; sometimes a hempsced or two was put into an ivory box, the top being lightly laid on, the bulfinch darted towards it, and dexterously overturning the lid, hovered over the open box, from which he picked out the seed, and flew off without alighting.

I taught mine, also a canary, (and a non-pareil, by means of meal-worms,) to do the same, even taking seed from my half closed hand.

One more instance, and I have done. A lady bought a bulfinch from a French prisoner, the poor exile had painted the cage of his little captive like a prison, and the bird drew up two little buckets, suspended by a gilt chain, one containing seed, and the other water. This bulfinch was extremely tame, and though bred in the woods of Greenilaw, (near Edinburgh,) it whistled a variety of troubadour songs.

I quote the last anecdote, on account of the proof it affords of the teachable nature of this bird, but I enter a protest against training birds with buckets, for reasons which I shall give more fully under the head of the goldfinch.

THE CARDINAL GROSBEEK.

(Loxia Cardinalis)

THE appearance of this beautiful bird is more familiar to our cages than his treatment is understood, which should be simple but varied. Of a brilliant colour and a hardy nature, he is equally desirable as an inmate of an aviary; fierce and destructive to his own species, he never molests even the smallest specimen of any other. The female is of a soft mouse-brown colour, tinged with red, the crest (like that of the male bird) forms a point when raised; she is graceful and lively, and, unlike hen-birds, sings as well as her mate; the notes are softer, but less continuous. The male-bird has been known to evince much jealousy at the vocal powers of his partner, and I have witnessed, with my own pair, serious matrimonial bickerings, requiring a total separation, not only from cages, but from the same room, when at liberty to range about. The Virginia nightingale is of the rare instances of foreign birds pairing in confinement. The late Earl of Derby had a "residence" prepared for these royal visitors, and succeeded in their naturalization. I am also aware of a pair having hatched, and brought out their young in a large cage, but the tyrant caro destroyed his offspring in a jealous fit. I am not a convert to an opinion lately given, that the cardinal grosbeak would bear the severity of an English winter in a wild state; many reasons tend to support my view of the subject, with which a supply of food has nothing to do. They are not calculated to endure hard weather, being subject to blindness; before rain they crouch down and depress their crests, and their joyous notes pending its descent is no proof that shelter in a comfortable domicile is adverse to their taste. Any one who has studied their habits will also allow, that, pugnacious as our robins, "a broad-gauge" would be required. Their price is at all times high, not being imported in large numbers; however, it is with this prince of captives our true history lies.

Of all birds I consider the cardinal grosbeak to require a roomy cage, and baths daily. The latter as a preventive to parasites, to which it is said they are much subject, and a variety such as I have laid down under the head food. I have known these birds perish, and in great agony, merely from the sameness of their food, and neglect as to cleanliness and exercise; my birds have a flight in the room daily, but this is not a necessity; I like to see their enjoyment on the wing.

There is a prevailing idea that the lorias hide their food: observation of their habits induces the belief that they do not like eating from the seed-drawer or vessels, but seek about for a place to which to carry their selection. I therefore placed a little square box (like a nest) near a perch, and invariably they remove their choice bits to it, and eat in comfort. They should have fresh soft food daily, and the "paddie" (unshelled rice) is the seed they prefer, but give them but little of it; Indian corn or hempseed, canary and millet, (especially the former,) being less heating. They delight in barley and wheat in the ear; they enjoy all kinds of fruit and grass seeds. My bird is unusually tame; I leave his cage-door open, and he dashes in and out at will (for no other word can express his rapid movement, and he knows his name, "Dot," perfectly well) when he wants sugar, bathes in preference on the table, and is a determined fly-catcher. It is not usual to tame a Virginia nightingale. "Dot" is very happy, carrying his food to his box, discussing grapes and apples, while waiting for the summer fruits. He likes "high places," and is especially fond of the shelter of his half cover at night. At midnight, he sings suddenly and loudly; as summer advances, the song becomes continuous and incessant from dawn of day.

Although these birds moult in autumn, and are supposed to be in song soon after Christmas, I find a good deal depends upon the season; if severe, a huskiness in the throat checks their early notes, nor can they be depended on until April. The conceited air, when before a looking-glass, the raising and depressing of the crest, together with the rolling motion of the body when singing in the sunshine, render these birds most amusing, also most desirable inmates of the cage. I have only observed, in any instance, the ailments which result from mismanagement—want of variety of proper food, want of exercise, and want of sand. When oppressed by unwholesome treatment, they open their beaks and look sad. I pronounce this loria to be the king of seed-birds; and a friend, who has one twelve years in good plumage and song, gives him in these days the desirable character of being "the most economical of favourites." One canary eats more than would three red birds. This lady lost hers, and he luxuriated three weeks in a garden, feeding on green peas. A red-coat is a grand provocative to a shot, and the gardener was proceeding to kill, when his master kindly interposed, baited a trap with the favourite food, and returned the wanderer to his happy owners.

The vocal powers of these birds vary considerably, their superiority consisting in the prolongation of the "roll" and "jug," from which musical sounds they derive the distinctive appellation of "nightingales." The repetition of a favourite stanza is their morning practice; and it goes sometimes beyond the bounds of the hearer's patience. The character of this species is that of nonchalance and vivacity; he is not of the gentler kind; woo be to the person daring enough to catch him, or to attempt to pare his nails (a necessary operation); he fixes his beak, and bites through the flesh; and before he has accomplished this revengeful feat, he utters loud and angry cries, sufficient to deter from a Quixotic attempt to better his condition.

My hero, "Dot," had, on one of his days of full liberty, a fancy to sleep outside his cage. I returned home late, threw a handkerchief over him, and placed him in his timent: he awoke, and screamed loudly. For three days he resented the liberty—by total silence the first, and a cessation of song whenever I entered my sitting-room, where he lived, on the other two. He is amiable when addressed by name, but flutters when strangers approach without this ceremony! These would be considered trivialities in a petted native bird, but the grosbeaks are not "model" birds in temper; they bear captivity without repining, but mostly retain their wild habits. There is much in kindness to develop disposition, and the Virginia nightingales repay any care. I must repeat that they are most frequently mismanaged.

I find, as with all foreign birds whose health has been preserved, that each additional year in confinement improves their song; the bird of the first year's importation is dependent on the care afforded him for the ensuing period. Seed is but the smaller proportion of their food; therefore heedlessness only can be advanced where fruits, vegetables, and soft food are the staple commodities. The brilliant colour changes by neglect of food and air.

I mentioned to a friend the singular fact, that my Virginia nightingale sung on Christmas-day for the first time after the autumnal moult, and not afterwards until April; and this for three succeeding years. Too polite to express a doubt, this lady could not conceal a look of surprise. The following year, she observed in her own bird the same singular fact. In a very delightful work, On the Passions of Animals, by the late Mr. Thompson, of Belfast, many wonderful details are given, to be accounted for by those very "passions;" but to that just related there is no clue.

A propos to this subject, that of "curiosity" is most remarkable in the cardinals (and I have observed it in most birds). The grosbeak, if nurtured to intelligence, examines all alterations in his food-vessels and petches, the changes of position with reference to the placing of his cage—he even observes the outward aspect of surrounding objects. At the present writing, my "Dot" is in full song by day and night, at a time when other Virginia nightingales are looking abashed at their ragged garments, in this "the silent month." I found my bird, at the ordinary moulting season, drooping too suddenly for this natural process; he had taken cold and was ill. I removed him to a room having on it the morning sun, hung up his cage free from disturbance, administered the remedies already prescribed for the bulfinch and other lozias, with the addition of mealworms, and in a few days "Dot" resumed his melodies, and retained his coat.

The moulting of foreign birds is irregular, being greatly dependant on the period (necessarily unknown to us) when they leave the parent wing—the early or late brood. This simple fact, when unconsidered, causes great perplexity; proper treatment will also prolong the period of song, a desideratum when their resuming it will depend on a mild spring season.

A LADY'S NARRATIVE OF CAPTIVITY AMONG ALGERINE PIRATES.*

AFTER the first week of our detention in Salee, my husband began again to manifest symptoms of ague; mental disquiet, confinement, and starvation had done their work, and the horrid disorder had come back. This put the climax to my misery. We petitioned the governor to be allowed to send to the ship for some bark, but received in answer a peremptory order not to attempt to communicate with it on any account. The old despot did not change to want anything just then. I felt as if I could more readily have pistolled him for that cruel refusal, than I could have performed the same office for Allan Ruberico, in the struggle for liberty. For nine days the poor sufferer did not leave his mattress. Our principal nourishment was now derived from sour black bread, onions, garlic, and turbid water; coffee rarely made its appearance. The heat of the sick chamber was almost suffocating; no breath of fresh air could be coaxed into it; and during the day, from sunrise to sunset, continued confusion, bustle, and noise were around us—constant demands upon me for exhibition; then shouting, bawling, and screaming from the different members of the household; and, between these, interludes of young Judah's vehement treble. I verily believe my spirits could not have borne up against these accumulated sources of wretchedness, had I not cherished the daily thought, that each morning might be the last we should have to endure them.

On the third Friday of our stay in Salee, Samuel Bendenhen came to chat with us. He seemed to think he was promising me a high gratification, when he said I should soon be taken to see the king's wife; adding, that "she was four, and all travelled at once." This puzzling announcement was soon made a little clearer to me by the running commentary—"She is fine thing to see; two is black, and two is white; she is all covered with jewels and gold." I then understood there were four wives in the case; all the Moors increase the fractional division of their better-half as their worldly prosperity augments. The conversation having thus inadvertently gone in the direction of matrimony, I took occasion to ask my instructor in the customs of the land why Miriam, who was a Jewess, did not eat with her husband. He gave me to understand that it was because of her extreme modesty — "she was so very shameful, that she could not eat with him." I unconsciously turned to look for this fine specimen of female delicacy: she was sitting upon the top step of the stairs, at the end of the gallery, completing her purification for the approaching Sabbath; before her was a large brass cauldron of water, in which she was bathing her feet and legs, and immediately beneath her stood the Irish captain, looking on with a puzzled stare.

During this night, we frequently heard the cry of the minaret watchmen, and also the clapping of their hands and wooden shields, as they called the Mahometans to prayer. Soon after sunrise, an extraordinary commotion began in the streets: we could distinguish the continued tramp of soldiers. Bendenhen soon brought the news, that a special courier from a neighbouring town had given the governor information that hordes of wild Arabs were pouring down from the high country. The noise we had heard was caused by Algerine troops marching in to garrison the town; the large gates were already closed, and the walls manned. The inhabitants were used to these incursions of the Bedouins, who, upon such occasions, swept from the mountains in vast unorganized masses, and drove before them whatever booty they could lay their hands upon. Whenever their visit was anticipated, the women and children from Jew-town were brought to Salec, for their common danger effaced for a time all distinctions of faith and of caste. Several ladies came to Miriam for protection, and among them one who interested me exceedingly, in consequence of her being the wife of my friend Bendenhen. She had with her an infant son; and the united ages of the parent and child amounted to only fourteen years and four months.

On the Saturday evening, to my great surprise, when our host had finished his recital of Hebrew psalms, he sang part of our national anthem in very tolerable English. After this vocal performance, he unlocked an old chest, and exhibited its contents, either to amuse me, or to gratify his own vanity. He showed me some fine gold ear-rings, measuring three or four inches across, and set with large carbuncles and other precious stones; each drop could not have weighed less than four ounces, and the two were connected by a strong gold chain, intended to be passed over the top of the head, when they were worn. He also produced some magnificent bunches of pearls, that must have been of immense value, and seemed to enjoy my admiration exceedingly. I did not, however, find that my host was raised in my estimation by this display of wealth; I could only think how vast the booty must have been that had afforded such a share for one individual. As I gazed at the gold and gems, I only saw the plundered ships that had yielded up their freights, the gallant hearts that had battled in vain with robbers, and the sorrowing homes that had mourned the missing ones. After I had inspected the treasures of the casket, Miriam and Una endeavoured to persuade me to let them dress me out in Moorish costume; they wanted to see how I should look in it, and had prepared a very handsome equipment, but my heart was too ill at ease to allow me to submit to their will, and I besought them, by signs, to leave me in peace.

My dear husband was now alarmingly ill; the fever was again at its height, and raging the more furiously, because I was unable to procure either the medicinal or dietetical appliances that I could command while at sea. Half frantic, I begged that some kind of fresh meat might be purchased for us: I was told that we could not have any for five days, as no animal food might enter the purified dwelling of the Jew, unless properly slain by the rabbi, and the rabbi would not kill again before that time. After reiterated petitions, the boy Mehemed was sent off a six-hours' journey, to beg that the rabbi would deign to slay a chicken, at this unusual period of the week, for a sick Christian. When the luxury came, however, we were not allowed to have it dressed to our own fancy; Miriam had it prepared for us, and then sent us but a very small portion of the whole. The hard-earned morsel proved to be, after all, but a sorry boon.

When the measure of my despair was nearly full, and my spirit humbled to the sense of how powerless the arm of flesh was to aid or comfort, the hand of Almighty Providence was stretched out in our behalf, our bonds were rent in twain, and our mourning turned into joy. The Jew came to us on the Monday morning, with the astounding intelligence that the governor had just received an express from the Emperor of Morocco, intimating that the brig Perseverance, then suffering detention at Salee, had been peremptorily demanded of him by the resident consul of Tangier. The communication stated that the Tangier consul had informed the emperor, that unless the vessel, her British captain, her lady passenger, and her crew and cargo, were immediately sent to him, he should forthwith strike his flag. So great was the emperor's anxiety lest this threat should be acted upon, that the imperial despatch was accompanied by a mandate, that we should depart instantly for Tangier, under the convoy of a schooner of ten guns. Our host was amazingly surprised at all this; he could not think how on earth anything should be known at Tangier concerning us. We, of course, were no less astonished than he was: we very well knew that both himself and his courier would keep their own counsel, inasmuch as that would be tantamount, in the existing state of affairs, to keeping their heads. My husband had only once during our captivity in Salee seen the four men of his crew, who were confined with the Austrians. The men were then in very good spirits; they were in a more roomy house than ourselves, were better fed, and seemed, upon the whole, to find their detention agreeable rather than otherwise. They suffered no privations, had no work to do, and were aware that their pay was running on. Under these circumstances, they enjoyed the passing day, and were reckless of the morrow. During this afternoon, they were brought to the consul's house, in order that we might be in the greater readiness for our start. The consul, our host, took this occasion to dilate eloquently upon the great trouble and expense so much unanticipated company had caused him, and then finished his harangue by presenting his bill—a list of exorbitantly heavy charges for the entertainment of ourselves and our men. We were too anxious not to throw any impediment in the way of our liberation to hesitate for an instant about the payment; again English sovereigns were tendered and graciously accepted, and I had once more cause for the deepest gratitude that it had occurred to us to secrete our little hoard of money, as the primo necessary of our condition. If we had not possessed these secret friends, I believe we should have ended our lives in the land of deserts, and laid our bones among the Algerines.

During the afternoon, the poor Austrian came to take leave of us: he had been informed of our good fortune; but the same courier who had been its bearer had also brought orders that he and his sixteen men should be taken up the country, to meet the King of Fex. I always believed that this was merely a blind, intended to deceive us as to his whereabouts; for it was not at all likely that an escort would be spared from the town, when all the surrounding troops and inhabitants were thronging in for its protection. The heart-broken man thanked us for the little kindness we had been able to show him, with tears running down his venerable face; he pressed and wrung our hands, and was considerably comforted by my husband's solemn assurance, that his first act of liberty should be the notification to the authorities of Trieste, and to the captive's owners and friends, of all that had happened. We could only further murmur a prayer for his deliverance, as the soldiers hurried him away.

The evening of this eventful day, that was to be the last of our sojourn in the land of captivity, was marked by an incident in which I was interested, in spite of myself. Miriam and a party of female visitors were occupied in staining the eyes, hands, and nails of the pretty Una; arrangements had been made among her relatives to marry her in a few days to a young man of Jew-town, whom she had never seen. The work proceeded merrily, and the victim seemed perfectly unconscious of the fate to which I fear she was doomed. How earnestly did I wish she had been going away with me; as it was, I left many grateful thoughts with her. She had been a constant and useful friend, and was indeed a creature of singularly warm affections, gentle feelings, and kindly sympathies; she always seemed to me like a pearl that had been cast among swine; I do not think there could be a single dweller in Salee, or in Jew-town, who was able to appreciate her pure lustre at its proper worth.

When my husband had received the notification of the emperor's order, he had sent a message to the governor, requesting that he might have sufficient notice of the hour appointed for his departure, to enable him to procure a supply of provisions for the passage to Tangier. As we had no trunks to pack, this was the only preparation we had to trouble ourselves about; we therefore retired early, and enjoyed a little repose; for this one night, we were alike indifferent to rats, birds, spiders, fleas, and suffocating air. Soon after sunrise, three different parties came for us in less than as many minutes: go we must that instant. So, after all, I was not to be allowed to see either the quadruple consort of his majesty the king, or the spectacle of the land-robbers' attack upon the nest of the sea-robbers. I easily managed to find consolation for these disappointments: the haste of our escort did not outstrip our own willingness to move. We left the consul's house without seeing any of its inhabitants save Miriam, who gave me a hearty parting embrace. We passed through the streets without molestation, and were ushered for the last time into the patriarchal presence at the custom-house.

Joy and hope had operated wonderfully upon my husband's frame, but he was so weak, that he could not stand before the governor. He was accommodated with a chair, while a little pretence at business was gone through: mysterious papers were formally and ostentatiously signed; but, then, at the last, the sleeping lion aroused himself, and shook his mane. My husband said there was something more to be done—he must have his countryman with him; he could not go without the Irishman, and, what was more, he would not. And, enervated and depressed as he was by illness, his generous heart prompted him in the part he had to play so well, that it was at length deemed best to accede to his demand—the Irishman was pronounced free to go to Tangier with us. This knotty point settled, we were hurried once more over the rocks, and down the descent, to the landing-place. A large Moorish barge was waiting for us, with the sails already spread; our old acquaintance, the captain of the port, was at the helm, and the boat was soon scudding with us before the breeze. The port-captain told us that his orders were to take us to the Moorish schooner, and not to our own vessel. This was a little drawback upon our pleasure; but expostulation was useless, and we were forced to make the best of it.

The day was intensely hot, and there was a heavy sea running, so that I was soon insensible to everything about me. We met the schooner's boat at sea, and were transferred into it. The port-captain compassionately took me at once on board the Perseverance, contrary to his orders, and in ten hours my husband joined me there. He had merely been detained on board the schooner until the orders were issued to get the vessel under weigh. Our four men were kept on board the schooner to help to work her. Allan Ruberic and twelve Moors still took command of the Perseverance. The Irishman (I neither remember his name, nor that of his little cork boat) and his crew also formed part of the schooner's complement. The governor had sent on board the brig a peace-offering, consisting of twenty loaves of white bread, fifty pounds of grapes, and half-a-sheep. This was courteously and considerably designated as a present to the Christian woman. The Christian woman saw them delivered, but she saw nothing more of them; Allan Ruberic and his comrades took care of that. We did not much trouble about it, however, as Samuel Bendenhen had accepted a commission from the captain to purchase provisions for the ship. He told us he had done so, and received the amount of his outlay, upon the assurance that he had seen all the things safely locked up for us. This was, nevertheless, a falsehood. My favourite had, at last, managed to get his share of spoil out of us, and had left me to grieve, more for the unanticipated baseness, than for the privation which it entailed.

A gun from the Moorish schooner was the signal for the British ships to weigh their anchors. This was, however, the work of many hours, as there was but one able seaman among the dozen Moors on board; our convoy was out of sight before the anchors were disentangled from the ground. The Austrian brig we left riding where we had first seen her, but she was now floating lightly on the water, the Moors had relieved her of her cargo, consisting of valuable packages of jewellery, watches, and other costly goods.

We were thus once more at sea, after twenty days' residence in Salce. We landed on the Wednesday, and effected our happy escape on the Tuesday fortnight following. But our sufferings were not yet by any means at an end. The distance to Tangier was about a hundred and forty miles, and the passage might have been made, under favourable circumstances, in twenty-four hours. In consequence of being badly manned, and encountering strong adverse winds, we were, however, twelve long fearful days beating about in heavy seas. There were twenty-two of us on board, and we had nothing but salt provisions to live on, and one small cask of water. In ten days, the water was all gone, and for the remaining two of the voyage, we had to endure the most agonizing thirst; at length Cape Spartel hove in sight, and we entered the bay of Tangier. All other thoughts were, at the time, lost in our pressing need; we were more alive just then to our thirst, than to the joy of our deliverance—water was our only hope—water was our only cry. From the first boat that came off to us, we received a small supply of it, and this seemed to us of ten thousand times more value than all the gold we had left in Salce.

Our anchor was dropped in the bay of Tangier on Sunday morning, and a signal immediately appeared from the consul's house, summoning the captain on shore. We were soon in the boat, Allan Rubricee accompanying us. We landed on a sandy beach, with the sea breaking over rocks on either side of it. Tangier lay straggling in front of us, its houses occupying a sort of valley, through which a water-course descended, affording traces along the sides of how heavy the fall must be in the rainy season. The consul's residence stood upon a rising ground to the south, and was built in the Portuguese style, being adorned with verandahs and porticoes. Its interior was furnished with all the luxury and elegance that wealth and a cultivated taste can command. The formalities of depositions and protests having been gone through, we were kindly invited to partake of refreshments, and I was presented to the consul's lady, a native of Gibraltar, dressed in the European fashion, and of prepossessing appearance. Her manner was, however, reserved, and as I was myself still considerably indisposed, I could make no effort to break through the barrier. The conversation was, therefore, exclusively carried on by the consul, Mr. Douglas, and my husband, and related chiefly to the circumstances of our position. After two or three hours entertainment, we returned on board, and found our men quarrelling openly with the Moors; Allan Rubricee was getting very outrageous. For the next two days he and the captain spent their time in countermanding each other's orders, and I was in the hourly dread of hearing that the turbulent African had drawn the long knife he constantly wore at his girdle; at last he attempted to prevent the mate from going on shore with a letter the captain had written to Mr. Douglas. Upon this my husband took me with him, and went on shore himself, protesting that he would not again return to his ship until every Moor was taken out of her. Mr. Douglas said he had made frequent applications to the governor to remove our unwelcome companions, but that that official had refused to do so until the Moorish schooner had arrived. Our ship's papers had been purposely kept on board the schooner appointed to be our convoy, and in their absence, our advocate could of course take no further steps in the proceedings. Mr. Douglas approved of my husband's determination to remain on shore for the present, and gave him a recommendation to a Spanish hotel. Here we remained for four days in comparative comfort. We thoroughly enjoyed the luxury of a pretty airy bed-room; the only annoyances we suffered were caused by the nocturnal inroads of an army of musquitos, and the nocturnal vociferations and clappings of the watchmen upon the four minarets of a neighbouring mosque. These were trifling vexations after all we had suffered. The change in our circumstances was so great as to seem almost incredible; I could not tell what to make of having no requisitions to exhibit myself hour after hour; I no longer entertained any apprehension for our personal safety, and my dear husband was rallying fast under the influence of mental quietude, pure air, and an abundance of delicately prepared food. We were quite satisfied to remain tranquilly within the precincts of our delightful sanctuary. The very noises around it made us more sensible of the realities of its pleasures. The house stood in that part of the town which lies on the south side of the valley; four spacious windows admitted light and air, and overlooked a wide extent of fruit farms, wearing the aspect of richly cultivated gardens. The buildings of Tangier are not ornamental in themselves, but they are so irregular in their outlines, that they impart a very pretty appearance to the valley they occupy. The most striking feature in the scene is the winding water-course, diversified by the variously-coloured soils the torrent has left behind. The eye follows its track downwards to the ocean, and upwards to the distant hills, where the ever-green orange trees, with their golden fruit, and the gracefully waving fan palms, blend together to form a luxuriant drapery for the verdant slopes. To the eastward, the picture is finished by the sea and the bold outlines of Gibraltar's rocky heights; and to the northward, by the little lighthouse of Tariffa. Such was the lovely landscape that greeted us whenever we chose to turn our attention outwards, from the comforts of our temporary home.

Our hostess had brought with her from Spain skill in the culinary craft that is there so highly prized. Our table was furnished sumptuously, agreeable dishes that I knew nothing of, fresh fish in very variety, pigeons that never looked or tasted twice alike. These were but a few of the luxuries we feasted on, and of course we measured the excellence of every dish submitted to us, by our memory of Miriam's garlic soup and sour bread. We had also dates, grapes, figs, and pomegranates, in the greatest profusion, and of finest quality. Fate seemed to be bent on making us amends for one long month of starvation, and to be setting about its work in the handsomest possible way.

The inhabitants of Tangier are a mixed multitude. The Moors only wear the odious flannel wrappers; the Spaniards and Portuguese appear in graceful, dark-blue cloaks; and the French, German and Swedish inhabitants affect even gayer and more diversified costumes. The Moors are no votaries of fashion; their mode of dress has not been altered in a single particular for more than a thousand years. There is still very much in their customs that call to mind the early days of the Patriarchs; they say that they prefer to do without chairs and tables now, because there were none used at the beginning, and why should they want such appliances, when their fathers' fathers did very well without them. All those innovations which we denominate refinements, they call base effeminacies, and therefore shun them; hence the very strange doings we witnessed during our sojourn in Salee, where no breath of foreign influence has yet been able to make its way.

During the first night of our residence in the Spanish hotel, the little sleep the mosquitoes and minaret criers would have allowed us, was frequently broken by tumultuous noises in the neighbouring streets. Crowds seemed to be rushing backwards and forwards, and indulging themselves in a liberal allowance of gun-firing and drum-beating. Our hostess, who spoke tolerable English, came to us to tell us what all the disturbance meant: "You must not be frightful," she said, "it is only a Moorish wedding." She told us that the bride elect was in the midst of the noisy throng, carried in a sort of sedan, by the male relatives of her family. After she had been paraded three several nights in this way, she would be taken to the house of the bridegroom, and be left for a day; if, after this probation, the parties found they could agree together, they would be man and wife; if otherwise, the lady would be returned to her friends. The contract could only be made binding by the occurrence of twenty-four hours of uninterrupted harmony. In the morning, our hostess recurred to the subject of this wedding; she said, laughingly, "I know the lady. She tell me she not let her new husband like her, she look ugly all she can; she never look at him yet, but she look at somebody; she hear he not like a woman talk, she will talk very much; she hear he like sit on carpet, she will stand and walk all day; she hear him not like singing, she will sing, and never stop." We afterwards heard that the promising lady had proved as good as her word. Young Sadam Nedabro took home his refractory bride, but did not prove himself by any means a Petruccio in managing her; she was all too much for him, and the upshot of his wedding was, that he got greatly laughed at, and had to take himself off to another town.

The Perseverance had been seven days at anchor in the bay of Tangier before the schooner that had been appointed for her protection arrived. We had then, at last, the satisfaction of seeing her standing in, with the Irish vessel in her wake; the poor little craft was, however, almost a wreck, in consequence of the unseamanlike manner in which she had been handled by her Moorish crew. My husband immediately presented himself before Mr. Douglas, and signals were made for the master of the Moorish convoy and Allan Ruberie to come on shore. They obeyed the summons, and brought with them the ship's papers, but denied that we were British subjects, and stated that upon that ground they intended to retain possession of their prizes. Thereupon Mr. Douglas despatched an express to the governor, who had found it convenient to absent himself from Tangier just at this juncture. In a few hours an answer was received from the Moorish ruler, in the form of an official document, requiring Mr. Douglas to attend a convocation of the resident consuls at noon on the following day, and intimating that it was generally understood the prizes did not belong to any nation represented at Tangier, and that, therefore, he, Mr. Douglas, had no authority for interference in the affair. Mr. Douglas immediately forwarded a notification to the governor, and to the several consulates, that if any one presumed to question his authority in the matter, or if every Moor was not instantly removed from the vessels, and every person connected with them was not at the same time restored to unconditional and perfect liberty, he should forthwith strike his flag, and take the two British captains across to Gibraltar. His highness Julah Rai was by no means prepared for this energetic course of proceeding. The announcement of Mr. Douglas's intentions produced an immediate change in his views of this matter, and he now seemed only anxious to rid himself of any further responsibility in an affair that was assuming so ugly a look. He, therefore, at once issued a peremptory order to the Moors to deliver up both the vessels on the following morning. This order was obeyed without further hesitation. As soon as the Moors had performed their earliest prostrations, they came on shore, and gave up the ships' papers to the consul, and once more the rightful masters of the vessels assumed entire control and command of them.

As we were on our way from the Spanish hotel to the boat, on this joyous morning, a young Moor, of very exquisite and dandified appearance, addressed us; he was clothed in fine, white flannel, and wore a very tasty scarlet turban, trimmed out with silver, and tasselled with gold; he walked first on one side of us and then on the other, with a mincing gait, and at length addressed my husband in Italian. He said he understood him to be the captain of the great English ship in the bay, that was laden with dollars, and as he wanted money very much, he would be greatly obliged to him for some of them. This request sounded so comically innocent, that I could not restrain my inclination to laugh. My husband was in a more serious mood, but even he could not altogether resist the winning smile with which the petition was proffered. He therefore answered, that he should have been very happy to be able to accommodate him, but that his own considerate countrymen had already taken away from the ship everything but the masts and anchors, and he must, therefore, postpone the consideration of his request until he was himself richer. The young dandy appeared to be thoroughly satisfied with this explanation, and bowed, and smiled graciously to us, as he moved away.

On the same day with our return to the ship, a French brig-of-war came into the bay, to complain of several acts of molestation that vessels of their nation had suffered from Salce rovers. At the very time the French officers were going on shore, my husband and his mate were landing, with the purpose of lodging an information at the French consul's against his highness the Algerine admiral, for having stopped the Perseverance under French colours. Immediately on our arrival at Tangier, he had forwarded letters to Grazia Dio Minerbe, of Trieste, the owner of the Austrian vessel; and he had also written to the government authorities of that port, as well as to the Austrian captain's family.

Those of our men who had been detained on board the Moorish schooner were restored to their own ship as soon as they arrived in the bay of Tangier. They were not a little rejoiced at the change, for they found their fare, in the close, dirty hold of the schooner, a very different thing to their shore living at Salce. They had there neither fresh fish, dates, grapes, nor peaches, their ordinary diet upon land; but they were now, however, persons of great importance in the eyes of their messmates, and had very astonishing and amusing yarns to spin. They fully accounted for the slow passage the schooner had made from Salce; for they stated, that as soon as a breeze of wind touched her sails, her anchor went down, that she might wait for better weather; she had crept along close in shore all the way, and once had positively returned to Salce. During the voyage, she fell in with a British sloop-of-war, on surveying service; the officers had immediately boarded her, to ask what the Moors were up to with the little Irish craft. The answer was, that they were taking her to the British consul at Tangier, because she was without a Mediterranean pass. This account did not satisfy the officers, and they insisted upon seeing the Irish captain, that they might hear his account. The poor fellow was brought to them, but his energies had been so crushed by suffering and fear, that when they inquired whether he stood in need of any of their assistance, he answered unhesitatingly, "he did not." When again interrogated as to whether he was suffering any restraint, he again said, "he was not." Nothing further could, therefore, be done for him, and the British cruiser had reluctantly allowed the Moors to continue their course. While this conversation was passing on deck, our four men and the three Irishmen were in confinement below, Moors standing over them with drawn sabres, to compel their silence. There is no doubt that the captive on deck had by some means been impressed with the part they expected him to take, and had had his fears so played upon, that he dared not depart from his instructions. The result showed that the Moors had not been mistaken in the character of the poor fellow they were dealing with; their craft had for this time at least been equal to the occasion.

It had often been matter of considerable surprise to us that Allan Rubricee had kept the secret of our having money and watches in our possession; this matter was no longer to remain an unsolved enigma. Before we left Tangier, he came on board, under the pretence of wishing to take leave of us, but really to claim the bribe we had offered him in the first week of our captivity. He said the reward was promised him on condition that he should bring the brig to Tangier, and as he had now fulfilled his part of the bargain, we must also fulfil ours. The prompt refusal he met enraged him excessively, and he took his departure, vowing vengeance in every possible Moorish form.

Our Irish companion in misfortune now came to tender us his thanks, and to take his farewell of us. His expressions of gratitude were as boundless as they were extravagant;

the tears once again coursed down his cheeks. My husband went on board his sloop with him, to see what the Moors had done with it; he found it a complete wreck—leaking, and plundered of everything moveable. He therefore counselled that she should be taken across to Gibraltar, and that a survey should there be called, to determine whether it would be best to condemn her as unworthy, or to refit her for the voyage homewards. The Libernian gladly followed this judicious advice, and soon after hove up his anchor. We had the satisfaction of seeing him glide out of the bay towards the shore of liberty. The wind soon failed him, but we knew that the current would, nevertheless, carry him into Gibraltar, even before we had time to get under weigh. I shrewdly suspected that if the simple-hearted Paddy once more found himself safe at Cove, he would never again venture out of sight of Irish shores.

We found that the worshipful company of rovers had plundered us of every moveable object they could by any means appropriate; they had also either used or destroyed every vestige of the ship's stores. We were going to Seville light, being chartered for a cargo there; so that fortunately there was no merchandize on board for them. It was the general opinion in Tangier, that if the British government made a claim for compensation for the ship's unlawful detention, and for the loss of property entailed by her plunder, even though the claim were not acceded to, the commander of the gun-brig who had taken us would be punished with the loss of his head. Success or failure, in Barbary, makes any action right or wrong; and deeds that are rewarded with honours when they issue well, are attended by disgrace and death, when they lead to unpleasant consequences. In Moorish despotism, heads are generally considered as the most convenient kind of palliation that can be offered to conciliate offended potentates. If one does not seem to be sufficient to prove that the emperor has no wish to assume the responsibilities of his subordinates, a dozen are sacrificed, as a matter of course; there is no measure to the amount of compensation that is readily given, when the account is allowed to be settled by human life.

As soon as we had laid in sufficient stores to last us to Seville, we went to Mr. Douglas, to thank him for his kind and prompt attentions. We were keenly sensible, that but for his bold and resolute conduct, even our hoard of gold might have failed at last in restoring us to freedom. We chanced to name, during the interview, that my husband had again suffered a paroxysm of ague on the first night we slept on board the brig, the consequence was, that when we returned to our boat, we found a present awaiting us of a packet of bark, and half-a-dozen of old Port wine. Words would ill express the gratitude I felt for this last touching proof of our good friend's consideration; I am sure that he found in his sense of well-performed duty a rich and ample reward for all that he had done.

In the evening, our anchor was hove a-peak, in expectation of the land-breeze; but we were becalmed throughout the night. We were lying within a quarter of a mile of the French brig-of-war; but the expression of Allan Rubrice's face, as he passed over the ship's side, had been so full of sinister meaning, that it was deemed prudent to keep the entire ship's company alert and on deck until daybreak. Our men accordingly paced backwards and forwards in the calm summer's moonlight, re-spinning old yarns, the captain every now and then visiting them, to make sure of their watchfulness. Just before sunrise, the breeze of our desire came, the ship gathered way before it, and when the orb of day rose into sight, we were making good speed for the Guadalquivir.

In a few hours we were at St. Lucar, but we found that our troubles were by no means ended by our return to a civilized land. It would be foreign to the direct object of my narrative to record all we had yet to suffer. We were detained for a quarantine of twenty days at Bouanza, on account of coming from an African port; in the Guadalquivir, four other days were added to the detention, because an epidemic had broken out at Gibraltar; at the end of these, we were ordered to return immediately to sea, without holding any communication with the land. To have done this in the state in which we were would have been to have rushed upon starvation, for we were literally without the necessities of life; my husband, therefore, simply answered that he could not, and would not go. During the four succeeding days, soldiers were sent to enforce the order of departure; my husband's reply was to point his loaded cannons at the boat that contained the armed men, and to advise them not to undertake a task that would prove to be beyond their strength. On the fifth day, his obstinacy seemed to have gained the victory, for the boat then came to us from the quarantine guard-ship, with a flag of truce and a pass, authorising us to go where we pleased. My husband immediately proceeded to Seville, some miles higher up the river, to claim his cargo from the merchant; but, alas! the cargo had been already shipped some weeks in another vessel, on account of the Perseverance not presenting itself at the expected time. After some delay, the captain accepted another freight, consisting of wool, for London, and began to load at the Garden of Olives. During the lading, the rain came down, and the wool was damaged, and the owner forthwith instituted an action for the recovery of the amount of damage, in one of the courts of Seville. After nine days spent in law proceedings, the cause was turned over to arbitration, and it was decided that the amount demanded should be deducted from the freight payable in London. We then dropped down to St. Lucar, took in our sea-pilot, and in a few hours were once more on the open ocean, homeward-bound.

Our passage to England was a tedious and a stormy one; for three weary weeks we were beaten about in heavy seas and adverse winds, at the entrance of the channel, and during this time we were short of water, short of provisions, short of fuel, short of patience, short of everything, in fact, excepting salt water, of which we had more than enough. At last we made Dartmouth, recruited there for four days, while waiting for a change of wind, and then finally ran for the Thames.

During our short stay at Dartmouth, the dreadful intermitting fever again attacked my husband; it came with a severe paroxysm of spasm, apparently the immediate result of sleeping in the damp bed of an inn. In consequence of this fresh accession of illness, the captain remained on ship-board until the vessel was cleared at the Wool Quay in London; then a broom was hoisted at the mast-head, and a negotiation was opened for the sale of the ship. In a few days the bargain was concluded, and the money paid; the Perseverance passed into other hands, and I saw her debilitated and invalided master carried on shore from the berth that was no longer his own. At the time, it seemed to me that we were taking leave of a vessel that had been cursed to us by some disastrous spell. Afterwards, when my dear husband was once more restored to health and strength, I was able to look back upon the past with different feelings; I then saw that, however great our trials and sufferings might have been, the mercies bestowed with them had vastly exceeded them in amount. We had been surrounded by the dangers of the mighty deep, but had been carried in safety through them; enemies had hemmed us in, yet no hair of our heads had been hurt; famine and sickness had grievously assailed us, yet, when the jaws of the grave seemed to be opening before us, we had been snatched from the brink of the yawning cavern, and healed in the hour of our greatest need. And, more than this, we had been led into temptation, but not left there; impulse and casuistry had urged us to take upon ourselves the sin of bloodshed, but even at the last moment our hands had been stayed from the dreadful deed, and our memories saved from the heart-rending remorse that must have followed. In a worldly sense, our Algerine captivity and voyage to Seville had been fraught with loss and disappointment; but, in a spiritual sense, they were profitable and blest to us—they had taught us experimentally that “affliction cometh not forth of the dust,” and that “trouble springeth not out of the ground.” We had gone forth in the pride of our strength, and with stubborn hearts, but had fallen among barbarians and heathens, and had returned from their companionship humbled and chastened. We had been shown, by adversity, that there is a happiness apart from worldly prosperity, which grows stronger and deeper, in proportion as the more evanescent joys of life reveal their shadowy and uncertain character. We had proved, in our own experience, that good comes out of evil, and that, therefore, patience and long suffering are never without their ultimate reward.

In concluding the above narrative of an incident of real life, it may be as well to state, in explanation of the proceedings of the Algerine pirates, that, previously to the beginning of the sixteenth century, the lawless horde of Arabs, inhabiting the northern Atlantic coast of Africa, had been in the habit of plundering indiscriminately the trading ships of all mercantile nations. About this time, however, their depredations became so troublesome, that the mistress of the seas was induced to expostulate in rather high and earnest tones. A formal demand was made of the Emperor of Morocco, that the merchant ships of England should be allowed free and uninterrupted ingress to the Mediterranean, then one of the great emporia of its commerce. His swarthy highness did not deem it prudent to demur to this demand, and, accordingly, a treaty was entered into, by virtue of which it was arranged that British ships bound to the Mediterranean should take a safe-conduct with them, which should suffice to secure civil treatment at the hands of the subjects of Morocco. For this safe-conduct it was agreed that the owners of the vessel should pay a small tribute, amounting to a few shillings. The document was made out on parchment, and embellished with an ornamental figure of Britannia, and in this guise was distinguished by the appellation of "The Mediterranean Pass."

As years rolled on, the Moorish treaty continued in force, and by degrees its provisions became matters of custom; so that the "Mediterranean pass" remained one of the ordinary papers all ships provided themselves with when about to enter the great inland sea. The Moorish cruizers were allowed from time to time to board such vessels, and ask for a sight of their pass; but they had no right to institute any other kind of examination into their papers; neither was it in any way lawful for them to demand a pass of vessels bound only to the outer Atlantic ports.

Upon the shadowy pretext of this almost obsolete treaty, three centuries and a half old, Algerine piracy has managed to drag on a precarious existence even to the present day. From time to time, ships have been fitted out, in the remote port of Salce, by lawless adventurers, whose policy it has been to interest the Moorish authorities in their occupation, by yielding to them the lion's share of the booty, after each successful expedition, taking in return only the name of servants of the emperor. Whenever cruizers of this nature fell in with the armed vessels of civilized nations, they were invariably found under Moorish colours, engaged in the harmless and peaceful work of asking for a sight of the Mediterranean pass; but when, on the other hand, they chanced to pounce upon prey of inferior strength, false colours appeared, as in the rencontre with the Perseverance, and, under the pretext of some informality in the papers submitted to their inspection, they carried off their victims to Salce, and retained them there in secrecy, until they had ascertained whether any inconvenient inquiries after them were likely to be made. If all seemed to promise well, after a sufficient time the vessels and cargoes were appropriated, and the crew carried up into the country, and there detained, upon the chance of extracting ransom for them at some future time. Every now and then it has chanced that the buccanniers have caught Tartars, and have paid heavily for their temerity. They have, upon such occasions, been quiet for a time; but after an interval of repose, they have again appeared in the open seas, when least expected, and recommenced their predacious work. In the affair with the Perseverance, they were very near meeting the chastisement they merited. In consequence of the representations of Mr. Douglas to the Foreign-office, four ships of war were sent out to Tangier, to demand compensation for the plunder and detention of the British ship; the Algerine port was blockaded; but, soon after the commencement of the blockade, a severe epidemic broke out at Gibraltar, and the ships were withdrawn, to procure supplies for the rock fortress, and there the matter ended. Some time afterwards, the owner and captain of the Perseverance had an interview with Sir G. Murray, then secretary for foreign affairs; but the interview only led to an expression of regret that nothing further could be done.

Something, however, was done, in one sense, the sympathising reader will be glad to know. In consequence of the generous Englishman's letter to Trieste, the poor Austrian captive was demanded and restored to his friends, and soon after an Austrian squadron presented itself at Rabat, and bombarded the nest of the piratical horde. The three principal Moorish ships that were in the anchoring-ground at the time of the bombardment were entirely destroyed.

In the Morning Advertiser of February 2, 1830, the following paragraph appeared:—"On the 27th of October last, a bottle was picked up at Bottle Creek, Grand Caicos, latitude 21° 20', N., longitude 71° 20', W., which was found to contain the following note:—"

August 1, 1828.—Should this be picked up by any one, I beg they will make known, as soon as possible, that the English brig, Perseverance, is taken by a brig of 10 guns and 150 men, apparently Turks, and carried into Salce. Taken off Cape Finisterre on the 26th of July, 1828. I have my wife on board.—Brig Perseverance, W. S. Master.

It will be at once perceived that this was the document spoken of in the first part of the narrative, as being thrown overboard from the bows in a cask, the night after the purpose of the Moors to take their captives to Salce was discovered. The cask was launched into the Atlantic, near the latitude of Cape St. Vincent. It must have thence been carried southwards, to the neighbourhood of the Canary Islands (for such is the well-known direction of the ocean's drift); there it must have become involved in the northern edge of the great equatorial current of the Atlantic, which the earth's rotation causes to set into the Gulf of Mexico, between San Domingo and the main land of South America. The Grand Caicos bank, where the bottle was stranded, after a voyage of nearly fifteen months, is just north of San Domingo. It is worthy of remark, that Humboldt has given an estimate that the equatorial current of the Atlantic would drift a floating body from the Canary Isles to the Caracas in thirteen months.

R. J. M.

THE SICILIAN MOTHER.

It is the privilege, or rather the office, of the painter, to deal with the common incidents of life as if they were not of ordinary occurrence; or it may, perhaps, with more propriety, be said, that he is allowed to invest them with so much of poetical imagination as, while retaining their natural features, to give them a character and beauty not invariably their own—to wrap them in sunshine or in shadow as his fancy pleases. And, when left to follow the current of his own free thoughts, unfettered by commissions for given subjects, which he neither feels nor cares to feel, except as they may affect his interests or his reputation; the works of every artist are a tolerably sure index of his own mind, the reflex of his thoughts upon what has been presented to his observation, either personally, or through the medium of indirect channels, such as come to him by reading, for instance. And hence, they who have studied the pictures of the great masters of art, whatever their age or country, and have also become acquainted with the individual character of the painters, cannot fail to come to the same conclusion. Raffaele could never have sketched the gaunt and miserable beings that Spagnoletto delighted to picture; nor could Guido have associated with the ferocious bands whom Salvator Rosa is said to have made his companions; simply because the artist would, in such cases, have had no sympathy of feeling with their models, living or only imaginary: the art which results only from the eye and the hand, and that expresses not the love of the painter for what he represents; as one delights in that which is agreeable, will be, perhaps, a piece of clever mechanism, but nothing more.

Now we know only by reputation the artist who painted the picture of "The Sicilian Mother," but we will venture to assert he would never have selected such a subject if he had not thoroughly felt it, and had some sympathy with the joyous pride of the young matron in her children. There is no doubt some such scene may have attracted his attention in the country to which he has assigned it; but he has thrown around it the charm of his own fancy, and tinged it with the poetry of life.

We have sometimes heard the question debated whether the father or the mother possesses the deeper affection for a child; yet the argument has never, to our knowledge, been satisfactorily settled. In Mrs. Hemans's "Siege of Valencia," she puts forth the claims of the latter very strongly; the quotation is rather long, but the language of her reasoning is so beautiful in its simplicity, and so natural in its fervour, that no apology need be made for repeating it. Elmina has been vainly attempting to induce her husband, Gonzalez, the governor of the city, to save the lives of her young boys, who have fallen into the hands of the enemy, by surrendering up the place: he continues determined in his refusal, and her entreaties give way to reproach:

—"There is none

In all this cold and hollow world, no fount
Of deep, strong, deathless love, save that within A mother's breast. It is but pride, wherewith
To his fair son, the father's eye doth turn,
Watching his growth. Ay, on the boy he looks,
The bright, glad creature springing in his path;
But as the heir of his great name, the young
And stately tree, whose rising strength ere long Shall bear his trophies well. And this is love!
This is man's love! What marvel! you ne'er made
Your breast the pillow of his infancy,
While to the fulness of your heart's glad heavings,
His fair cheek rose and fell; and his bright hair
Waved softly to your breath! You ne'er kept watch
Beside him till the last pale star had set,
And morn, all dazling as in triumph, broke
On your dim, weary eye; not yours the face,
Which early faded through fond care for him,
Hung o'er his sleep, and, duly as heaven's light,
Was there to greet his waking! You ne'er smoothed

His couch, ne'er sung him to his rosy rest,
Caught his last whisper, when his voice from yours
Had learned soft utterance; press'd your lip to his,
When fever parch'd it; hushed his wayward cries
With patient, vigilant, never-weary'd love!
No! these are woman's tasks! In these her youth
And bloom of cheek, and buoyancy of heart,
Steal from her all unmark'd!"

The women of Sicily are, in general, remarkably handsome, very fascinating in their manners, but, unfortunately, scarcely less lax in their morals than the females of the other Italian states. The island has been so frequently colonized by both its European and African conquerors, Greeks, Carthaginians, and Saracens, Normans and Spaniards, that it sometimes is not difficult to trace the origin of certain classes of its inhabitants; but the Greek and Punic features and character seem to prevail most in the higher grades of society. Their fondness for music, the dance, and the song, their high degree of civilization, the beauty of the country, and its genial atmosphere, all contribute to render a temporary or even lengthened sojourn in the island most agreeable to the traveller, who may easily reach it from Reggio, at the extreme southern part of Italy.

Q

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

CHAP. IV.

Matthew Whitelock, reclining in what he called his "easy chair," was musing, rather than thinking, over the inconsistencies of the most consistent, and pondering as to which was the more beautiful to contemplate—the love a mother bears her child, or the devotion a child renders to a parent; thinking how many instances there are of the former, and how, comparatively, few of the latter; hoping that the widow would really buy the wine and meat, as he desired; and having, like all genuine Englishmen, great faith in "creature comforts," he converted the worn, attenuated widow into a portly woman. Having arranged this, he indulged in a vision he had of late enjoyed so frequently, that it had become almost a reality—that Richard would turn out something like Whittington: his dreams of the future had gradually taken Richard in, first as a shadow, then as a substance, until he formed a portion of all his day dreams—wondering if he could tie up fishing-fies, yet fearing to ask him, lest Martha might make it another subject of complaint; varying these fancies with probabilities as to whether he should have good fishing the first of the following June, when he made his annual journey to Teddington, and, be the day hot or cold, invariably returned with a swollen face, wonderfully helping Martha's sarcasms during the following summer and autumn months; indeed, she constituted it a red letter day—everything occurred "before" or after "master went bothering after the bits of fish, that the cat would'n't eat without butter, and got the bad face." Then again his thoughts would dwell upon Richard, whom he believed—and with fair show of reason—endowed with a rare capacity for acquiring knowledge, and turning it to the best account. He never thought of another power he had—that of attaching to him those who seldom formed attachments. Some observation made by the lad, in a careless, off-hand manner, would frequently set his master calculating what he could do for him. He delighted in lending him books, and to draw forth his opinions upon them; devising many clever expedients to overcome Richard's shyness, and make him "speak out." As the lad's accumulated and accumulating knowledge became better known to him, he felt almost inclined to apologize when it was necessary he should take out parcels; but what especially charmed him was the boy's unconsciousness of his own book improvement and superiority. Had it not been for the unaccountable fear Matthew Whitelock entertained of his housekeeper—which he only overcame by fits and starts—he would have forbidden Richard the kitchen, and seated him at his own little table in the dusty back room; but he knew that such a movement must lead to open rebellion. He had grown positively uncomfortable at the idea of Richard's brushing his shoes, and cleaning knives—"a lad capable of writing the Latin names of his books without a dictionary, and was a better penman than he was himself!" However difficult it may be of belief, considering his "calling," it is a positive fact that Matthew Whitelock revered literary acquisitions; and when a clever book did not "sell," Matthew would take the part of the author against "the trade"—a proceeding which caused him to be considered "a fool" by many who are wise in their own conceits.

These and such like thoughts were passing through Matthew's mind, in a half-dreamy way; now lingering, now rushing onward, and then off, while Peter lay at his feet; and he began to long, as he often did, for Richard's return; for he enjoyed a chat with his messenger, as he used to enjoy a newspaper. Without his perceiving it, Matty entered, and shutting the door, as she always did when she had anything particular to say, placed her back against it, wreathed her bony arms together, and passing one foot over the instep of the other, stood on one leg, "shouldering" the door-case.

"Its my opinion, si, that you make too much fuss entirely with that boy, and that he's forgetting his place."

"Is it—how?"

"Well, thoughts is thoughts, and its hard to put them into words; but here they are! He'd rayther any time stay fiddling after one bit of dust or another, or stitching ould tataration books, that's going to the bad since the year one, or mending your pen—as if you had not eyesight (the Lord preserve it) to do it yourself—than sit and rest his young bones at his supper; and as to rubbing over the knives, he does them in no time, without a bit of a stop between; so that I never have a word out of him. And the paper! he reads it shameful! treating polyticks as if they war dirt; and so ignorant, that when he's done, he knows no more of the state of Europe than when he began. His mother says he lives without sleep, or as good as: there's a heart-break for a tender mother! I hate unnatural ways. The truth is, he's above his business."

"I quite agree with you."

"Then," said the contradictory Matty, "it's a sin and a shame for you to say so, sir. You have nothing to complain of: he's willing enough to do every hand's turn for you. I'm nothing in the house—just no-thing! He's as civil and smooth as crame—with his good morning, and good evening, and fine day, Mrs. Cook! but that's professional—there's no love with it. He's all for learning and books. If he goes on this way, you'll have to take him into partnership."

"Very likely!"

Matty immediately stood erect.

"Then, sir, you must look out for another housekeeper, that's all: I'm not going to have two masters, and one of them no better than a dog-boy! Oh! that I should come to that! He's bewitched you, so he has—put his come-ther over you. I should'n't wonder if you made him sit down at your table, and printed his poems."

"His what?"

"Poems! Hav'nt I heard you say many times that there was no good in books now, since there's such a many writers; that a book is no longer a book, only a rubbish; and that all the half of the writers do is to spile paper and pens, and waste ink. Them's your words, master, when you war in one of your pleasant humours, discoursing upon the ruin that's come into the world. And now this boy goes and writes poems, and you'll print them!"

"Go down stairs, Matty, and bring me those poems."

"And to be made a paper weight in my old days—just to stand upon papers."

"Do as I desire you."

"I can't: do you think I'd keep 'em in the kitchen? There they aro!" she continued, throwing a roll of manuscript on the table; "there they are! As if he had any right to set up for a poet—as if his mother and him hav'nt gone through starvation enough without that. That's what comes of his neglecting the state of Europe, and hurrying over the knives: his mother wanted to tell you about it, but had no courage, and no wonder. Its asy to see what's before him now; and his poor mother blind and desolate. Poems! Oh! no wonder my hair's grey! But its your fault, master—in-forming his mind! I wonder who ever troubled about my mind!" And out she flounced, while her master, not without some secret apprehension—more anxiety, in fact, for Richard than he had ever felt before—unrolled the manuscript, and, after wiping and putting on his spectacles, commenced its perusal.

CHAP. V.

IN Harley-street, where the houses bear a near relationship to each other, and seem to have been erected by some grave builder, who was never ambitious of being considered an architect, but heaped brick upon brick, in the heavy, old-fashioned style; laying down solid floorings—putting in solid windows—bearing in mind that there might be dancing in the first floors, and dinners in the dining-rooms—and so created (giving the walls time to dry, and the plaster to harden—doing, in fact, everything which builders do not do now) the long, solemn street, which so admirably illustrates the term "respectable." In one of the most sedate and self-important houses of this very respectable street, lived Mr. Francis Oldham. His name was upon a brass plate on the door, showing that he was not ashamed of it. The brass plate was as lustrous as if it had only been put up the previous day, and the door-steps were white and spotless as snow; the windows were bright in the lustre of unstained plate-glass; the paint all fresh. Many beggars, well or ill-dressed, passed up and down that street, in sunshine and shower, but few knocked at that particular door, or addressed begging-letters to Mr. Francis Oldham, though his name could be read from the opposite side of the gaping street; indeed, if a beggar did knock at that bright-plated door, the policeman (policemen and dogs know beggars by intuition) on his lonely beat would have set the knocker down "as a real case, and no sham—a green one." No regular beggar would waste time on such an act, it being currently reported amongst the clique, that Mr. Francis Oldham never did an act of charity in his life, and never would do one.

The house without was an index to the house within: it was so well ordered as to be positively uncomfortable; the bright bars had the effect of ice—it was impossible to imagine they had ever contained a fire; the polished oaken floor of the dining-room had a small, square Turkey carpet in the centre, upon which stood a solid mahogany table, like a tomb-stone. There was a picture (how such a picture ever came there was a mystery) of Christ overturning the tables of the money-changers in the temple. It was gloriously treated. The figure of the Saviour in the foreground—calm and erect, the face more than half-turned towards the cowering crowd he had reproved, while withdrawing from a presence whose authority they dared not dispute—was full of the most sublime dignity of displeasure; the effect produced upon the people was the effect of will, rather than of words; the attitude was in itself all-elocuent—all-powerful. If you looked at the picture before you noted the frozen bars and tomb-like table, and desolate aspect of the room, you would never notice them at all—it would absorb your attention from the first to the last moment you passed in the shivering atmosphere of the rich man's inhospitable chamber. The Saviour's right arm was outstretched, yet not fully elevated; it seemed as though the tables of the money-changers had been crushed and broken while he raised it from his side—the arm of flesh being the symbol of the arm of the Spirit; there was a positive halo—a radiance—around the head, not painted in the ordinary way, as if brought there, but a tender light exhalng from the Christ. It was impossible to tell how the effect was produced, there it was, a thing to dream of; inspired, doubtless, after holy prayer and supplication, that it might be given to mortal man to show what Jesus was—what Jesus did. The whole picture, in every effect, in every detail, was magnificently painted; and yet it was the Saviour, the Saviour alone, that rivetted attention. You would have given much that the face had been turned away from the multitude, and towards you; and yet who could look upon the severity of its beauty unseathed! Oh! rare painter—and wise as rare!

The wonder was, how Mr. Francis Oldham could endure the silent reproof of such a picture; for the tale was whispered that he had been, and was, a money-changer—one who gave gold for bills, and took large interest. It might have been untrue, but so went the tale; and if true, then it is not to be wondered at that Mr. Francis Oldham rarely dined there, but partook of his solitary meal in a little back room, where the barred window looked into a small, square, paved court, surrounded by high, white-washed walls, which even the Harley-street cats, could never scale!

The house, despite its glaring and ostentatious cleanliness, felt as if uninhabited; and there was a close atmosphere, caused by want of ventilation, which oppressed the spirits of those who were accustomed to breathe fresh air. It was also a silent house, nothing moving about it except a very beautiful little spaniel, of a bitter, unamiable temper, who attempted to bite every visitor, without the courtesy of a warning bark.

Contrary to his usual custom, Mr. Francis Oldham was pacing up and down the drawing-room. The chairs and sofas must have been rare and costly, to match the inlaid tables and buhl cabinets; but they were all carefully covered with brown holland—cold and glazed; the rich paper looked as if it had not been hung a week; and the dreadful holland that shrouded the carpet was spotless and chilly as a field of snow. The little dog paced after its master, pausing occasionally, as if wondering why he walked there at all: it was not at home in the room, seemed to have no place to lay down upon, and was thoroughly uncomfortable. A magnificent pendule, and two costly, but heavy and tasteless, lustres, were on the chimney-piece; and the old man (for he was old) never failed to pause before the clock, to see if time lingered as usual. He frequently glanced at the arm-chairs, as if intending to sit down—perhaps it was their cold and comfortless air which prevented his doing so, or perhaps he did not like to crease the covering. A very small fire was burning in a fire-basket within the grate, and yet the short November evening was closing in, with more than usual fog, and creeping, creeping cold—a cold which rhimed the windows, and made the street-lumps look dim and wet. Mr. Francis Oldham walked on; sometimes rubbing his dry, hard palms together, and feeling if there was another button to draw his coat still more closely over his narrow chest; he coughed frequently—it echoed like a death-knell in that still house. After a long time, a step was heard ascending from below; it came stealthily up, as if unwilling to disturb the silence. The drawing-room fire was nearly out, only one or two cave-like coals glowing at the back of the basket, and the mystified street lamps cast their palest light into the room; still Mr. Francis Oldham walked, and his shadow, broken off at intervals by the piers between the windows, to which the curtains were drawn tight back, and covered with that ghastly holland, came and went, a thin, crazy-looking shadow—now on the floor, now on the wall. How dim and homeless everything appeared in that chill, unsocial room—it was becoming positively spectral; at last the step paused at the door, and then the handle turned, and a gaunt-looking woman, shading the candle with her hand, said:—

"The cook, sir, declares the rabbits will not be fit to eat, shall she?"—

"Rabbits," he interrupted, and his voice was hard and grating, "I told her if my brother did not come, she should dress but one."

"I don't know, I am sure, sir; that was what she said."

"It is past six?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then tell her to put the dinner by, it will do for to-morrow. I cannot eat at this new-fashioned hour; clear away the things below, and get me some tea."

As if the dog understood the mandate which deprived her of her bones, she leaped up to her master's hand; he stooped and fondled her, "No, no, Fan shall have her dinner; tell the cook to send me up Fan's dinner—poor Fan." He took the little animal in his arms, and caressed it tenderly, and his eyes lost their fierce, suspicious look, while playing with his little favourite; it was strange how much the cold man and the cross dog were to each other. Mr. Francis Oldham never looked sternly or suspiciously on Fan, never grudged her her food, never withered her by unkindness, or spurned her, as he did his fellow-creatures, with contempt from his heart and door. In a short time, both were seated in the little back room. Tea was the only luxury he indulged in, and this he drank so strong that, if he had taken council of a physician, he would have learned that the excited state of his nerves, and the irresistible humours from which he suffered, were the results of his libations to the Chinese gods. A knock came to the door, single and deep; the lonely man sprang from his chair as if electrified, and Fan barked furiously; the step from the depths below again ascended the stairs, and in process of time, the gaunt housemaid entered with the newspaper—which Mr. Francis had long since ascertained he could keep for two hours in the evening for the charge of one penny—he read it in less than one, for he was quick of eye and comprehension; but he calculated on the possibility of not being able to read it in one, and, besides, it was a bargain, "I told him," said the maid, in answer to her master's angry look, "I told him, over and over again, he must ring, not knock."

Hard, iron-hard, as that man seemed—unimpressible—his features and expression remaining unchanged, while perusing column after column of disastrous warfare, of frightful shipwreck, of murder and rapine, of execution, of marriage, of insanity, of gay balls, of costly city pageantry, of advertising misery, of catch-penny falsehood; redeemed from time to time by a burst of honest enthusiasm for a noble cause, or a noble virtue, or marked by the no less noble sarcasm, shivering a false speculation to atoms, or torturing some hoary sinner by the public exposure of his gilded sins. Unmoved, I say, as the old man looked; unmoved by wit, or eloquence, or heroism; untouched by misery; stolid, silent, except when shaken by his warning cough—there was still beneath that mask of wrinkles, within that petrified heart, one eternal pulsation, that beat there night and day, that would not, could not rest; throbbing on, gaining strength from his weakness in its fearful monotony—still talking of the past!

Another knock, by a hesitating hand, followed rapidly by one loud and redoubled—a will-come-in, whether-at-home-or-not, sort-of-knock—and then a tearing ring, vibrating through the house! Fan was paralyzed, she opened her mouth twice or thrice to bark, but could not; Mr. Francis dropped the paper, clutched the arms of his chair firmly, and gasped for breath.

"What a waste of noise!" he murmured, thirty years has not changed his knock; another! why will not that woman hurry, he will shake the paint off the door."

There was loud and joyous questioning in the hall, a voice of boisterous cheerfulness shouting with all the eagerness of fraternal affection for his "brother." Mr. Francis Oldham was moved, he did not understand it, but he was moved; he almost staggered to the door, and staggered still more when his brother, after an embrace close as the hug of a brown bear, wrung and shook his hands until they ached again. The old men looked each the other in the face. "Why Frank, God bless me, your features are our poor father's; your height, size, all his! But are you ill, brother? or has any sorrow since the last I know of, come upon you? No; well, that is good; but you show sorrow—you must brighten up."

"But for your voice, John, I should not have known you. Your hair, however, is not white as mine." By a dexterous movement John Oldham removed his wig; "there," he exclaimed, "how do I look now, and not afraid of the phrenologists. But where are your fellows? I want my things brought in and taken up stairs. What, no men servants; well, my rascal will soon be here, I left him to look after the luggage, and take care (don't be frightened, Frank, my boy) of my monkey; the nicest creature you ever saw. I hope your dog is good-natured; Jebb is quiet enough, but if she teases him, he'll flay her alive, he will by Jupiter!"

"He'd better not," growled Mr. Francis, snatching up his favourite. "John, this is my only companion, or friend; she betrays no secrets, tells no tales, and knows a beggar even in the disguise of a gentleman."

"Ah! Frank, you were always cynical. Make a dog your only companion and friend, when there are friends to be had, ay, in plenty, if we only deserve them; and as to the beggars, poor devils! why Frank, you remember our own young days; a broom and a crossing would have been a fortune to me, when our luxury consisted in sniffing the savoury steams that loomed from the kitchens of the London Coffee House; talk of the increased power of steam after that," and he laughed joyously; 'and then do you remember how we worked for a supper—' Want a coach, your honour?' 'here Frank, hold the link to his lordship!' 'Chairman! See-dan—ay—ay—all ready!' Ah! the days of Ranelagh and Vauxhall! we were hungry, half-starved link-boys, errand-boys, serving-boys then; but we had youth, and hope, and energy; strong wills, though in tangled ways, and triumphed. Lucky dogs we have been, eh, Frank?" and again John Oldham shook his brother's hands; while the proud, rigid brother writhed under the remembrances in which John gloried, and continued, "Do you remember, Frank, our unlucky sixpence? I never forget the tenderness I felt for that last coin we had in the world! and how, after a hard day's fug, and a hard day's disappointment, we went to the baker's to buy us a loaf, depending on the change for a bed, and how the sixpence was a bad one! and how the baker would have it that we knew it, and threatened us with a constable; but the baker's wife said him nay—that I "looked honest," and "you looked starved," and she gave us a stale roll. That woman's kind eyes have shone in my dreams many times since then! what a living, abiding thing is charity!"

It was well that John did not then look at his brother Frank.

The baker's wife was right; more than fifty years had gone past, grinding its thousands, and its tens of thousands, and its hundreds of thousands, into nameless or forgotten graves; a generation had come and gone, yet her judgment was still true—"the one looked honest, the other starved." The children had grown into boyhood, into youth, manhood, age! had passed through six of the "seven ages," with toil and labour, been elevated by "lucky hits," and depressed by commercial changes; had been both battered and cherished by what the one called "Luck," and the other "Providence;" had been stimulated by extraordinary energy, and strengthened by a fixed purpose; nurtured, they could not imagine how, though they could tell where; they had achieved the same end, by different means, and in different hemispheres, and still "one looked honest, the other starved."

Mr. John and Mr. Francis Oldham sat opposite to each other in the little parlour, that commanded a view of the small square courtyard, with the high walls; there never before, had been such a fire in the grate, the coal seemed endowed with a spirit of life, and crackled and sparkled—resolved to "make a night of it." The spring of the candle-lamp gave an occasional click, a sort of hurra in steel, and a bound, thrusting the candle up so as to form a mimic illumination. Fan did not partake of this dumb hilarity; she knew the monkey was in the house, and crouched her nose between her paws, ready to spring forth in a moment. She groaned and growled to herself, wondering, doubtless, in her canine selfishness, what her master could want with a brother or a monkey, when he had her.

Wine, of marvellous age and flavour, was poured from cobwebbed bottles into glasses which had been dry and dusty for years; it evinced its power by fevering the one, and rendering the other still more hard and bitter; but both men were "moderate"—the one from penurious habit, the other from a principle instilled by wisdom and experience.

"I wonder, brother," said Frank, abruptly, after many topics had been exhausted, "I wonder you never married."

"I think," replied John, after a very long pause, during which the thoughts of both had been rushing wildly among memories of the past—long forgotten; while some almost obliterated associations started like skeletons from mouldering graves, or arose with all the freshness of mocking youth before them; trials and turmoils, hopes, disappointments, a mingling of life and death, vapoured through the long vista of time, into which each gazed bewildered! John's jocund face assumed now a sad, and then a serious expression, like the long-drawn rays of a winter sunset; his thoughts had strolled back to the present, laden heavily with the memory of a wrong, revived, cruelly and unnecessarily by his brother's question. He felt constrained to speak, and yet feared to give his thoughts or feelings voice; his age was forgotten, or only recalled by the shrivelled, blighted man, whose manner and words had jarred upon the heart that only wished to feel how they, two remnants of the past, were alone in the wide world; and that it would be wiser never to touch the chord, that already the brother had struck with heartless violence.

"I think, Frank," he said, at last, "if your memory does not fail you, you cannot wonder why I never married."

"If" replied his brother, and his words came hard and broken through his compressed lips, "if you mean that her memory prevented it, so best. One was quite enough to be ensnared into matrimony. I congratulate you on your escape, brother John."

"This comes ill from you," replied the brother; "she preferred you."

"She married me," interrupted Frank Oldham, with bitter sarcasm. John rose from his seat, and looked fixedly at his brother.

"If she had not loved you, she would not have married you; there was nothing to induce her but the love of woman—the unselfish love which we so little understand. She sacrificed all for you, Frank; you were not then the prosperous man that you became—she was a blessing."

"A curse!" groaned out Francis Oldham, fiercely, prolonging the r, grating it between his teeth, while his dark, sunken eyes, glared like a tiger's in the dark. "A cu-r-se," he repeated; "I wish you had had her, with all the luck she brought to me!"

A variety of contending feelings wrestled in John Oldham's bosom; his distress was suffocating—agonizing; he gazed on the distorted features of his brother, and thought, "Was it for this I returned—despite his written words, is he unchanged?" And then, terror-stricken, he fancied that Frank must be insane. For a moment, frightful as this was, he would rather have had it so, than know that, in his senses, his brother had ever dared to express such thoughts: he summoned his better angel to his aid, by a rapid supplication for strength, and power to overcome evil by good. After another moment, he felt compassion for the rich, wretched man, who was grasping convulsively the handles of the chair whereon he sat, and muttering. "Brother," he said, "more must have passed, during the many years of our estrangement, than I have ever known. We are old men, both; we exchanged brief letters; at first they were cold and formal—but of late our hearts drew towards each other—mine did, God knows, towards you! We are, to all appearance, once more together, beneath the sanctuary of your roof, warmed by your cheerful fire, stimulated, perhaps, over-much by your good wine—but we are, in reality, beside the graves which yawn for those who approach three-score and ten. I have given up the associates and associations of forty years, for my heart yearned to be with you, brother, so that we might end our days, as we began them—if it was God's will—within an hour of each other. For this I have crossed the sea, determined, because of the long estrangement between us, that we should now be all in all to each other; but while I breathe this air, and have the power of speech, I will suffer no shadow to be cast upon her memory. You wooed her from me, brother, and far-off I bore, silently, unrepiningly, the misery which I believed secured her happiness."

Age had failed to paralyze that large heart! it was beating at that moment with the fervour of youth within his breast; tears overflowed his eyes, and, if he had yielded to his feelings, he would have covered his face and wept; but there was a stern severity, an unmelting nature about his brother, which brought his years back upon him, and though his purpose remained his enthusiasm faded.

"We will not speak of it," said Frank, abruptly; "we are two old men now, waiting annihilation."

John Oldham shuddered, and drew back, as if stricken by sudden ague. "Not so," he said, "waiting the perfecting of a life commenced here, to be purified and immortalized hereafter." Such was his noble nature that he could hardly help—as he stood looking down upon the man, "the muck worm," writhing in the toils of infidelity, ashamed to let his face be seen, so that he covered it with his hands—falling on his knees beside him, and praying that his heart might be changed; he forgot his indignation in his horror and sorrow at the confession which had escaped from those shrivelled lips; his sanctified benevolence, born of true Christian charity, came forth, and he longed to take him to his bosom as a little child, and nurture him with tidings of great joy; the cause of the deformity of his brother's nature was laid bare before him; the hideous skeleton of his life was there in all its frightful, fleshless deformity; the coil of the great sin-serpent was around him, its breath stifled him, its eyes pierced him, its poison mingled with his blood, he was existing without hope! without faith! trembling on the brink of the damp, hollow grave, from which he believed, or desperately thought he believed, there was no resurrection. What availed his heaps of gold, the greetings of men in the market-places, the notoriety achieved by his wealth, he must exchange all for the putrid grave—for that consummation he had toiled—living his latter years unloving and unbeloved—living without a blessing, dying without a hope!

John, the eldest of the two old men by one hour, laid his hand gently—pitiingly—on his brother's shoulder. "Frank," he said, "this must not be—this cannot be! My poor brother, what fearful tortures you must have gone through to have come to this."

The gentle, tender tone of the voice, the loving pity of the words, touched him; the wine fever was abating—the bitterness giving way; he was never otherwise than hard and severe, but he had become a demon under the unusual influence of the old wine. He withdrew his hands from his full, but wrinkled brow, and spoke:—"You do not spurn away your infidel brother? She learned to shrink from my touch before she died. The preachers got hold of her; men who cry perpetually, 'Flee from the sinner—flee from the sinner, and leave him to destruction;' but that was not all—the mother of five children—but one survived—one boy—beautiful as she had been. I looked to that boy to take up my life, and in his turn bequeath it to his child—that was the immortality I sought! John, she taught that boy to shudder at my voice; she did more! she strengthened him in what she called a faithful standing up against Apollyon. I will tell you; I would not have my child think and feel as I do for the universe! I would teach my enemy to do so, not my friend—not my child," the old man groaned.

"Speak freely," said John, soothingly; "I pity you the more, but do not love you the less, my brother!"

"But Margaret thought I would have taken away the stay, the hope, from my own child, though I had nothing to give him in return! She made him dread his father. My child shrank from my side; those eyes of light became dark when I drew near; and when my wife lay dead, that boy watched beside her, lest I should disturb the inanimate clay by my presence. He rose against me when I crept into the room to look my last on her—it might be in love, or hate—he rose against me, upbraided me like a strong man, for having broken her heart. I did not do it, John—women have pined and died from contradiction before now! I could not help it! if she would watch and pray by night, and catch consumption, what could I do? She had a doctor, too; though the boy upbraided me, and said, 'not until it was too late!' My own child taunted me; and that dreary night I was heated, as I was but now; for I had drunk much wine, to give me strength to look upon the face of death. Thus nerved, he bade me back—dared me to take the seat which he had left—stood in my path—I struck him down. As I am a living man, the dead cried out! It was no fancy; for years I have been started from my sleep by that same cry!" His shrunken chest heaved convulsively, and he shuddered so, that his after-words came trembling from his quivering lips. "I raised him in my arms, and laid him in my own bed; and when I went for help, he crawled back, and there again I found him, kneeling beside her corpse. If I injured her, she was revenged by the deep hatred that most beautiful of boys bore to me—his father! Oh! how I watched and waited, thinking to win his love; how I sought to discover his tastes, his fancies, and force them to the one purpose—affection for myself. All spoke of his beauty, and congratulated me on having such a son, a scholar and a gentleman, to hold high place in good society. I wish I could have hated him; no, cold as he was to me, he was my pride, but as he grew, his genius was cramped by fanaticism; he sought conventicles, and took companionship with Methodists, little caring what I thought. And then his health failed, and I sent him from his associates into the country, hoping he might be tempted into the manly pastimes of the English field. What did he then? Married—while a mere boy, he married a farmer's daughter. He, whom I hoped would have brought family and distinction, enriched our blood by means of my hard-earned wealth, wedded a low-born, silly girl—a loving fool, no more! And when I questioned him—hoping they were not wed—he said she was good enough for him; that his mother had often told him of the lowly struggles and station of our young life; and how riches, such as I possessed, never brought honour or honourable distinction. I told him he was no more son of mine; and he coolly wished that such were possible! I never saw him after."

"Did he leave no children?" inquired John.

"What care I!" said Frank, fiercely. "If he left a swarm of children, what is that to me? My heart was forthwith locked against him and all the world; I have long shut out all human sympathies, and never thought to be moved again as I have been moved to-night. Now, brother John, you know me, or nearly so. It may be that you leave me to-morrow: there is no reason why we should seek to please each other—neither can serve the other's interests."

"Enough of this stony creed!" exclaimed the stranger. "I have heard so much, that I can endure no more to-night. I warn you of one thing—if your son left children, I will find them out. I do not seek to exculpate him from the great crime of disobedience, but I will find his widow, and her children."

"Aye, try it; I knew you would," said Frank, worn out by his unusual emotion; "they will be Margaret's grandchildren."

"And yours."

Frank Oldham tossed his arms wildly out, as if he would cast them from him; and the old men separated for the night.

ITALY AND HER FOREMOST MEN.*

IN our preceding remarks concerning Rome and the Papal States, we have shown upon what obsolete and absurd principles their present existing laws are founded; the unjust and contradictory manner in which those laws are administered, and the disreputable character and conduct of too many of the individuals to whom the power of carrying them into execution is entrusted. It is now our more painful duty—a duty we owe alike to humanity and truth—to inquire into the effects of such a system of government upon those unfortunate enough to be subjected to its tyranny; to consider the severity of the sentences that follow a secret accusation, and a mockery of a trial; and to throw open the doors of the prisons, wide enough to show the horrors to which their unhappy inmates are exposed.

Under the old clerical régime, the prisons and galleys of Rome were in a most deplorable condition. At the epoch of the Italian revival, and during the constitution, Doctor Luigi Carlo Farini, at this time minister of public instruction in Piedmont, was appointed to the superintendence of them; and under his direction many abuses were destroyed, and the whole system was much ameliorated. But with the restoration of the papacy came the restoration of all the evils, in every department, of the old clerical administration.

We have already stated that a Roman citizen may be dragged from his home, even in the middle of the night, without any charge being specified against him, and confined, for an indefinite period, in any of the ordinary prisons. That of Monte Citorio is the one to which an unfortunate is usually sent, immediately upon his arrest; from this depot, as it may be considered, and which we have already mentioned as receiving within its walls, in the first seven months of the past year, 3745 persons, from a population not exceeding 120,000 souls, the prisoner is generally removed to the Carcere nuove, or new prisons, where he is placed in segreta, or secret confinement. This segreta is a subterranean chamber, about ten or twelve feet square, and the same height, with a vaulted roof, containing one sole aperture for air and light. In this cell frequently twelve or fourteen unhappy wretches, not condemned, but only suspected, are pent up, in a space that does not allow more air than is required for four or five. In one of those cells, by order of some previous Pope, who had more compassion for the sufferings and sorrows of his subjects than Pío Nono has ever shown, a marble inscription was put up, directing that not more than eight persons should be confined in it at once; notwithstanding which edict, twenty-two persons were very recently crammed into this same cell!

What renders this over-crowded state still more intolerable is, that no classification, either with regard to offence or station in society, is made. A young man accused of attending an obnoxious meeting, or merely suspected of political disaffection, may be placed side by side with a murderer, or a miscreant whose crimes disgrace humanity; and Colonel Grandoni, a gentleman in every sense of the word, is at this moment associated, by the infamy of his gaolers, with the very dregs of society, in one common prison. There are at this time seven hundred prisoners in the Carcere nuove. Out of seventy-five who were personally known to a highly respectable resident in Rome, holding an important official situation, only thirty remain; fever, consumption, sickness of the heart, and, unhappily, suicide, having burst the bonds of the rest.

Each prisoner has a bag of musty straw, never changed, and generally swarming with vermin, for his bed, without any sort of covering. Of the internal arrangements of the cells we cannot allow ourselves to speak; suffice it to say, that anything more revolting to decency, more injurious to health, more disgusting in every respect, cannot be imagined. The most ferocious and hardened criminals in the cell make a point of assailing and stripping all new comers, and subjecting them to the most atrocious outrages, whilst the keepers themselves have frequently cruelly beaten, for pretended insubordination, the injured parties, who have cried to them for help; nay, murders have been committed within the very walls of the prison, and no notice taken of them.

The food of the prisoners is usually calculated at two pounds of bread, twelve ounces to the pound, nominally, but in reality eighteen or nineteen ounces in the whole, instead of twenty-four; a soup of paste, rice, or beans; three ounces of meat, of the most disgusting quality; and a foglietta, about a pint, of the commonest wine. This is the ration issued once in every twenty-four hours. The style of the prisoners' living may be appreciated by our readers, when we inform them that the original contract between the government and purveyors of the prisons, allows nine-and-a-half baiocchi (fourpence three farthings) per diem, for the food, clothing, and all other expenses of each prisoner. This contract is then taken by a sub-contractor, at only seven-and-a-half baiocchi per head; and in some of the provinces it is still lower. It is in speaking of the segreta that we mention meat, such as it is, being given every day; in many prisons it is only allowed twice a week.

With these seven baiocchi and a half, per diem, for each prisoner, the contractor has to pay all his underlings, besides the expenses of warehouses and carriage, and the interest of the capital he may employ in the speculation. He must, moreover, have all the keepers and inspectors accomplices in his frauds, because, if he were to abide honestly by the terms of his contract, he would be ruined, as far as his worldly interests might be concerned. These gentry must, consequently, be very highly bribed: we know of one keeper who receives from a contractor as much as thirty scudi a month, under various false pretences. It may easily be imagined what much larger sums the inspectors and superior officers are paid in proportion; and all these sums have to be deducted out of the miserable pittance allotted to the maintenance of the prisoners, whether innocent or guilty, accused or condemned! But the badness of the diet, trying as it must be, even to the strongest constitution, is, perhaps, more supportable than the badness of the air; which, contaminated as it is at all times in the prison, by impure drains and other sources of pollution, becomes, under the oppressive heat of an Italian summer, a misery sufficient in itself to produce madness and suffocation. In the segreta, the prisoners are allowed to be shaved once a fortnight, and, the operation being performed outside the entry of the cell, it is eagerly anticipated by them, as affording them their only opportunity of inhaling for a few minutes a pure atmosphere. If any of them are indisposed, they are not allowed to see a medical man until the day after they have made their complaint; and a young man from Albano, in the month of August, 1851, was suffered to expire on his bed of straw, in presence of his fellow-prisoners, without the smallest bodily aid or spiritual consolation. Indeed, the religious observances, on which the priests lay so much stress, when anything is to be accomplished by the outward display of them, seem to be thought no way necessary for unhappy captives shut out from every other solace; and even among the medical men that attend the prisons, there are more who are cruel enough, like Dr. Valeri, to insult the sufferings of their patients, than to soothe them, as the humane and honourable Dr. Bacelli does, by the language of condolence, and an attentive inquiry into their maladies.

In proportion as the keepers are careless and brutal, with respect to the comfort and health of their victims, they are ferocious and vindictive in the exercise of the power put into their hands of punishing insubordination; by which term they almost exclusively understand any appeal made by a prisoner against the violence and injustice of the ruffians who may surround him. The modes of punishment which the keepers are allowed to use are the carolina, the stick, fetters (sceight à discrétion), and segretino. The carolina is an instrument lately imported from Austria, resembling the stocks, in which the prisoner is fastened, whilst he receives a certain number of blows from a stick, according to the humour in which the keeper may find himself at the moment of pronouncing the sentence. A prisoner, who was condemned by the despotic will of one of these monsters to receive fifty blows every day, expired under the forty-fifth, on the second application.

It is to the Austrians that Italy is indebted for the introduction of the stick, as an instrument of punishment; and in their merciless hands it frequently becomes the instrument of what an English jury would bring in wilful murder, as a certain number of blows are allowed to be given across the stomach, which is almost inevitable death. The Italians were horrified at a ferocity they had never before witnessed, and in some cases the display of it led to the most tragical results. One instance may suffice, though many might be given. A respectable man, a widower, at Forlì, by trade a shoemaker, had an only child, a boy thirteen years of age, who, besides being the delight of his father's humble dwelling, industriously assisted him in his business. One day, the boy was walking along the road, accompanied by his little dog, when he unfortunately met an Austrian officer, who was taking an airing on horseback, and who was likewise accompanied by a dog, but of much larger breed; the big dog flew ferociously upon the little one, and the poor boy, alarmed at the peril of his canine friend, seized some stones, and struck the assailant so courageously and repeatedly over the head, as to kill him on the spot. The officer, enraged at this termination of a combat which he had before looked upon with considerable satisfaction, immediately had the boy seized, and condemned him to receive twenty-five strokes of the bastinado. It was urged to him that the youth, being slender and delicate, might not be able to sustain so severe a punishment; but he would hear of no mitigation of it, and the poor child expired under the seventeenth blow. The wretched father, frantic at the intelligence of his child's death, rushed the next morning into the coffee-house where the Austrian officer was composedly taking his breakfast, and stabbed him with seventeen wounds, leaving him lifeless, and himself quitting the horror-stricken circle without any one making an effort to detain him.

Nor is this cruel and degrading punishment confined to the humbler classes; the most respectable members of the community are not secure from it. A short time ago, a party, seventy-five in number, of the principal citizens of Jesi, a place we have already mentioned as rejoicing in Cardinal Cesari for its bishop, wished, in compliance, we would take the liberty of suggesting, with the most sacred in-born feelings of the human breast, to solemnize the anniversary of the day on which they had to mourn the fall of many of their nearest and dearest relatives and friends on the field of battle, in the vain endeavour to preserve the precious gift of liberty to their country, at the expense of their blood. These citizens, aware of the despotic tendency and hypocritical holiness of their governors, would not give them a plea for persecution, by celebrating a mass for the souls of those dauntless heroes,

"—— who sank to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest," though that very mass for the defunct, if paid for, is held out by the priests as the surest release from purgatory, and passport to the gates of paradise; they therefore limited the expression of their living regrets and hallowed remembrance to the simple insignia of a black scarf. Would it be believed by Englishmen, by any one possessing a spark of human sympathy, that this mere outward sign,

"The show and semblance Of their grief ——"

as Hamlet would express it, should be construed by the self-installed ministers of a religion honoured by the precious tears of its Omnipotent Founder himself, who, in his human garb, sympathising with human sorrows, wept with the weeping sisters of Lazarus dead, though, in his omniscience, he knew that he should restore the same Lazarus to life, ere these precious tears upon his own sacred cheek were dried—would it be believed that this mere outward sign of mourning, adopted in all classes of civilized society, as the natural expression of an interior sense of deprivation and regret, should be construed by these same ministers of "peace and good-will towards men" into a crime, subjecting those guilty of it to imprisonment and the stick! Yet so it was. Had but our readers seen, as we did, one of the most gifted, the most eloquent of Italian exiles in our land of refuge, turn pale, when he was apprised of this horrible treatment of his countrymen, they would have joined, as we did, in the exclamation, "not loud but deep,"—

"Bastonavé i Italiani! ma il giorno verrà!"

But we must return to the prisons. The punishment of the stick is usually inflicted in the court-yard, in sight of the other prisoners; Farini had put a stop to this abuse; since the restoration, however, of the priestly régime, it also has been restored, with more inhumanity than ever. After being thus beaten, almost to a mummy, at the pleasure of the keeper, the miserable prisoner is laden with fetters, sometimes to the weight of eighty pounds, and thrust into the hole called the segretino, where he is left to his fate. Last summer, an unhappy wretch in this condition, smarting under his lacerations, tortured by thirst, and tormented by fever, shouted in vain for water, from an hour after dark until six in the morning, when, happily for him, he was found dead upon the floor of his cell! And where, among the thousand priests of Rome, where was his ghostly comforter? his spiritual adviser? without whom the death-bed of the rich man is considered neither holy nor safe! where the disciple of Christ, who, in visiting "the sick and in prison," is considered to visit his Blessed Master, who graciously identifies himself with all who are in suffering and sorrow!

The prisons termed Alla Larga, or at large, are certainly more humanely organized, especially the new ones of Monte Citorio, the prisoners in them being allowed to receive clothes and money from their relatives and friends, but it is on the condition of bribing their keepers heavily; and the cells are subject to a very unhealthy degree of humidity.

The prison of San Michele, which occupies no inconsiderable part of that immense building, is solely devoted to political prisoners, and is at this time as full as it can hold. The keeper is one of the most ruffianly fellows in Rome, and the prisoners are treated with the most atrocious barbarity—nay, even their relatives and friends, anybody, in short, connected with them, who may present themselves at the gate, in the hope of seeing or procuring tidings of them, are subjected to every insult that the cruelty of a bad heart, joined to "the insolence of office," can suggest. One instance may suffice of the behaviour which is suffered on these occasions, and we will select it from many of a similar nature that occurred last year, when Signor Marco Evangelisti was superintendent of the prison. A young man, of the name of Apollonj, the son of a respectable advocate, was seized, on some political pretext, and dragged to the prison of San Michele, where he languished week after week, month after month, denied any communication with his family. His father, an aged man, repeatedly petitioned Evangelisti for leave to see him, but was always sternly refused; at length, after eight months, he took courage to address Monsignor Giannagi, who, more merciful, granted him permission to pay the young man a visit, accompanied by his wife and daughters. They accordingly set out for the prison; but when they arrived there, they were most brutally received by the keeper and his agents, and some time elapsed before the prisoner was allowed to be brought out. At last he came; but when he stood before them, pale, emaciated, loaded with fetters, and covered with filth and vermin—an inevitable consequence in an Italian prison—the unhappy father was so agonized at the sight, that he fell to the ground in an apoplectic fit, to the horror of the son, and bewildered terror of his mother and sisters, whose shrieks and cries for help filled the air. At that moment, Evangelisti, as naturally attracted by sounds of distress as the tiger by the scent of blood, came to the spot, and instantly ordered the young man back to his cell, and the father to be dragged into the streets; which he actually was, in his unconscious and apparently lifeless state, by the feet; and we state this upon the information of a gentleman of the highest respectability in Rome, and of considerable official importance, who was an eye-witness of the fact. Signor Evangelisti then turned round to the distracted females, and told them they "must not stay there to act their farces," and actually threatened them with personal violence, if they did not instantly depart. Shortly after, this man, who, as chancellor of the Sacra Consulta, and secretary of the Council of Censure, had caused misery and death to hundreds, himself fell, under the stroke of an assassin.

We now come to the places of confinement for convicts, of which the principal is the Carcere de Termini, intended originally solely for galley-slaves, but into which the uncondemned are often thrust, at the tyrannical caprice of the authorities, as was the case with our unhappy countryman, Edward Murray, who, in a letter which he was fortunate enough to get conveyed from his prison, in Ancona, to this country, thus describes his situation at the time:—

"The epoch of my judgment now approaching, Mr. Moore advised me to go to Rome, in order to go in person before my judges, and he obtained that for me.

"Fresh sufferings were continually added to the old ones. Often they refused to give me some wood, under pretence there was no order from the government. When I Spoleto, the chief of the gendarmerie—a man of the most ferocious temper—loaded my hands and my feet with heavy iron chains. When in Rome, I was confined in the horrible galley of Termini. While still uncondemned, had they the right to stamp a mark of infamy on my name, associating my existence to that of robbers and murderers! My process had been completed a year ago; since a year I had no more been kept up in a solitary dungeon, but in a common prison. Consequently, according to what laws could they shut me up again in so horrible a prison, or, I should rather say, in so horrible a grave! For such it was. A very damp-looking place, seven feet long, and four wide; unwholesome, and completely dark; no breath of air penetrating into it, for there was no window at all. My physician declared half-an-hour's walking, every day, to be indispensable to me; but they refused it constantly.

"Were I to mention my several sufferings, I should say they were far beyond physical tortures; I was innocent, but unable to prove it to the world; I had no means to remove from my face the stamp of ignominy, the vengeance of men I never offended had stamped upon it—of men who, by an extraordinary refinement of cruelty, granted me to see my family, but only in the presence of ignoble spies, who were there to catch every word, to interpret every sigh of the afflicted soul!"

Alas! how many could tell a similar tale!

The places of confinement for criminals, or those pronounced by the tribunals to be such, exhibit the same disorders and abuses as the prisons of detention, with the addition of others peculiar to themselves. Here, also, the keepers beat the prisoners, and rob them likewise, but according to a particular system; the keeper acts as a check on the contractor, and the capo-stanza, or chief of the room, who is always one of the oldest and most wicked of the prisoners, as a check on the keeper. What are the consequences of this system? The contractor hands over to the keeper, wine, broth, or soup, which passes through the hands of other officials, and, finally, through those of the capo-stanza, or distributing prisoner; so that before it reaches the mouths of the prisoners, en masse, the food becomes strangely diminished in quantity, and the wine as strangely diluted in quality. These facts can be proved by certificates drawn up in the time of Farini, in consequence of which Pietro Perotti, the chief keeper was removed, along with some others, since restored to favour and to office.

The consequence of these connivances is, that the chief keeper is obliged to wink at the excesses of the capo-stanza, who is generally the tyrant of the whole room, and ill-treats and strikes the rest of the prisoners, particularly any that may have belonged to the Civic Guard, which body was noted for its activity against robbers. The capo-stanza, Antonio Sabbatini, was an accomplice in the frauds of the chief keeper we have just mentioned, Pietro Perotti, who, in return, screened him, when he not only cruelly beat and wounded many of the prisoners, but even outraged one of them, in a manner too revolting to describe. If any of the prisoners complained to the head-keeper of the tyranny and brutality of this man, he paid no attention to them whatever; and at this present time, if they do so, they are placed in the stocks and beaten.

A keeper in the fortress of Narni, named Carticini, has so frequently and so cruelly administered the bastinado in this manner, that several prisoners have died under his blows. The attention of the authorities was at last called to the case, and he was removed, but not deprived of the power he so much abused, as he is at this time in office, in the prisons of Civita Vecchia; so little regard does the Papal government pay to the lives of the unfortunates whom they are called upon, at any rate, to protect as fellow-creatures, if not as sheep, even though stray ones, of that fold of which the Pope professes to be the true and only shepherd. But it is not only directly that the head-keepers and capo-stanza rob the prisoners, many indirect means of accomplishing the same end are open to them. The head-keeper is generally the proprietor of a dépôt, or shop, at which he sells whatever articles the prisoners may require—such as tobacco, wine, or spirits—of course at an exorbitant rate. In the prisons of Monte Citorio, this trade is carried on by a man of the name of Fevri; now a shirro, or police ruffian, instead of following his former occupation, one, if possible, more base.

The capo-stanza frequently buys up beforehand, for a mere trifle, the rations of improvident prisoners, who, in some cases, have actually expired of hunger afterwards; indeed, in the month of August, 1851, six were found dead in their cells from this cause. This insane folly is generally the consequence of gambling; and the profiting by it, though strictly forbidden, is constantly connived at. Indeed, all these abuses are well-known to the authorities; but when men so closely connected with the ruling powers as Monsignor Savelli, and the brothers of Cardinal Antonelli, have an interest in the contracts, no wonder that the contractors should rarely become the subjects of judicial inquiry.

On the same ground of speculation, it becomes an important point to the speculators to keep as great a number of persons as possible in the prisons; and many are detained in them, under various false and fraudulent pretences, long after their term of imprisonment is expired. This abuse, also, Farini had in a great measure done away with; and in one year he prevented the infliction of 16,000 extra days of imprisonment on various prisoners, thus saving the government 1500 scudi, which it must otherwise have paid the contractors for their maintenance. The abuse is now, however, revived in full vigour.

Under such regulations, the morals of the prisoners, in general, may be pretty well imagined. In no other country do offenders so almost invariably relapse into crime, after their release; for, even if they were disposed to remain honest, it is next to an impossibility for them to do so, no lawful means of getting their living being available to them, after having once been in the galleys. Of course, we except men of honourable character—honour not to be tarnished by the breath of calumny—men who have been the mere victims of tyranny, such as the brave and unimpeachable Calendrelli. We have already made mention of this ill-used man, but we will now lay some further particulars of his case before our readers, as a specimen of the mode in which justice is administered by the Consulta Tribunale in Rome.

Alexander Calendrelli was many years an officer in the Engineers, esteemed by all who knew him for his acquirements, probity, moral character, and religious feelings. He it was who prevented the firing of cannon, on the 16th November, 1848, against the pontifical palace, in a moment of popular indignation, when the vacillating character of Pio Nono, since too clearly made manifest, first began to be suspected by his subjects. He was also greatly instrumental in preserving sacred the libraries, palaces, and villas of Rome; and he saved the lives of the few soldiers who endeavoured, during the revolution, to raise again the Papal banner. He was made minister of war during the republic; he afterwards resigned that office, though he continued to serve the cause of liberty by every exertion of his courage and military knowledge. After the resignation of Mazzini, who refused to sign the capitulation of Rome, Calendrelli was made triumvir, and in that capacity he held stores in the artillery, and a great deal of property elsewhere, which had been exacted by the republican government for the necessities of the state. On the entrance of the French, he, as member of the triumvirate, consigned to the restored authorities 200,000 scudi in paper, and 60,000 in gold and silver—a fact proved by incontestible documents. He remained in Rome purposely to give an account of his administration, although he well knew that he endangered his head by so doing. He repaired to the municipality, and stated what articles were in his possession. He also declared to the Commission of Recovery the quantity of copper and other articles he had, and assisted in restoring them to their owners. He sent three cart-loads of books, belonging to the ecclesiastical library, to the librarian, Abate Saliceti, and several baskets full to Monsignor Cardona, superior of that institution; and on Saliceti's stating that some works were yet wanting, he exerted himself to the utmost to recover them from various quarters where they had been dispersed. The Abate Saliceti still, however, dissatisfied, applied to a commission, instituted by General Oudinot, for the recovery of books, manuscripts, and other objects of science or art; but his application was rejected, because he could in nowise prove his previous possession of the books he claimed. Notwithstanding this ungenerous conduct on the part of Saliceti, Calendrelli again exerted himself to satisfy his demands, as far as he could, by purchasing some of the required books from the shops of different booksellers, and giving up others belonging to himself, from his own library. For these Saliceti promised to send, but he delayed doing so, with an inertness singular enough, as contrasting with his previous eagerness on the subject, and in the meantime, Calendrelli's house was invaded by sbirri, who carried off all the books, and also a number of works of art, as well as some arms, which he had been a long time in collecting. This seizure was made without any legal intimation or warrant of tribunal; without the presence of a legal appraiser, without drawing up an inventory, in short, without the observance of any of the formalities of the law. It was executed by one Domenico Farina, by trade a pawnbroker, in the Borgo; a man of notoriously bad character, which, however, had not prevented him being made secretary of the commission of recovery; probably, in illustration of the popular adage, apparently a very favourite one with the clerical government, "set a thief," &c. In his official capacity this Farina found, from Calendrelli's own deposition, that he had in his possession certain books belonging to the ecclesiastical academy; the man was a bitter enemy to Calendrelli, and is generally believed to have been the principal instigator of the iniquitous legal proceedings against him.

The articles thus taken from Calendrelli's house were publicly exposed, under pretence of their being identified; but, during that exposure, many of them were stolen away, and it is by no means improbable that many others were secretly added, in order to work the ruin of the party accused.

Several months after his arrest, Calendrelli was accused of theft on various counts. The prosecutante, or conductor of the accusation, was Signor Manzoni, and to him were consigned the written testimonials in favour of Calendrelli, to which we have already alluded. Manzoni constantly affirmed that he had reported these documents, as was his duty, and that his own conviction was that Calendrelli was innocent. It was, perhaps, for this reason that the proceedings were transferred to a man named Mori, not of very good repute, but who still had honesty enough to confirm the presence of the testimonials, among the papers connected with the trial, all of which finally remained in the possession of the Chancellor Pasqualoni. We have already stated that the acts of the Consulta are carried on and completed in secret, without any guarantee for the prisoner. Calendrelli, when accused, could not, according to the tenor of the regulations of this tribunal, either defend himself, or choose an advocate in whom he could trust; he was therefore obliged to take an advocate, ex officio, a man named Gui. The defence was secret, as usual, the prisoner never, in any case, being made acquainted with the nature of the defence made for him, any more than with any other acts of his trial. Yet, by virtue of a trial like this, was this brave and honourable, and most disinterested man, pronounced guilty of theft, and condemned to fifteen years of the galleys for stealing books from the ecclesiastical academy, and five more for stealing arms from the Prince Barberini.

Now comes the question: was this most harsh and unjustifiable sentence passed through the iniquity of the judges, or through the falsification of the acts of the proceeding?—amid the darkness that shrouds the legal administrations of Rome can the problem ever be solved? It is certain that the testimonials we have mentioned, and which have been seen by a most honourable Roman gentleman of our acquaintance, as well known and as much respected among the highest English families that seek the eternal city for health or pleasure, as among his fellow citizens, these testimonials abundantly proved Calendrelli's innocence with respect to the first of the charges against him, and the second was positively rebutted by the Prince Barberini's own agent, Giordani, who affirmed that he himself sent the arms as a present to Calendrelli, in acknowledgment of his exertions to save the Barberini palace from injury, but that he was subsequently paid the full value for them. This statement was confirmed by Enea Viti, who was present during the transaction, and was the bearer of the money from Calendrelli to Giordani. Calendrelli's own account tallied with that of both these witnesses.

The processante Mori in vain endeavoured to corrupt the testimony of Viti, by alternate promises and intimidations; he could no way shake his integrity, so he revenged himself upon him for it, by getting him sent to prison, where he was kept five months without a shadow of pretext or accusation against him. Calendrelli's advocate, Gui, and several of the judges, affirm that none of the testimonials in his favour appeared in the acts of his trial; but if their affirmation be really true, in proportion as it proves their individual innocence with respect to the verdict, it necessarily implies the most shameful infamy on the part of the public administration; the injustice of Calendrelli's condemnation is equally manifest in either case, and a system cannot be too strongly execrated, which, pandering to the worst passions of human nature, only serves to favour the secret workings of cruelty and vengeance in the sacred name of God! If there were wanting further evidence as to the lofty honour and calm self-possession of this brave and high-souled officer, it would be found in his own announcement of the dreary fate before him, for all the best part of his life, in his letter to his sister, just before leaving his prison.

September 8, 1851.

MY DEAREST SISTER,—Yesterday evening my sentence was notified to me; it is to the following tenor: "Fifteen years to the galleys for robbing, to the prejudice of the ecclesiastical academy; and five years of public labour for robbery of twenty scudi, to the prejudice of the Barberini family; besides which, ignominious death, for treason." All this, by the special favour of his Holiness, has been reduced to twenty years at the galleys.

Before setting out for Lalliano or elsewhere, according to my destination, I communicate this to you with the utmost serenity of mind, because I feel that I am no way culpable. Thank my uncle, thank my defender, thank all those who have exerted themselves on my behalf; especially the Prussian minister, to whom present my respects, and entreat him to place at the feet of the king my most heartfelt homage, and my boundless gratitude for the interest he has deigned to take in my case.

I send you my picture; keep it in remembrance of me, but let it be hidden from every eye save your own. I send you also my sheet, pillow-case, trousers, and basin. Collect what linen you can; shirts, handkerchiefs, and two pair of sheets, and send all to the place of my destination; having previously obtained the consent of the Sacred Consulta, through which you will also send me news of yourself and family.

I beg you, my Lisa, to tranquillize yourself, to preserve your health, and to live for your children. With regard to myself, you will see that the very men who are now so deeply humiliating me, will liberate me from the penalties they have inflicted upon me, as soon as their party-spirit calms down, and they become better acquainted with my innocence.

Console Ludovico and my poor father, and tell them that I shall be composed and resigned, if I do but know that they do not take to heart a thing which I hope will be but temporary. I am on the point of going, and in setting out, I remember that on this same day, a few years ago, I and Ludovico were all intent on adorning our house, and contributing many studi to the grand festival in honour of the Holy Father. (Alluding to the splendid demonstration of affection and gratitude with which the Pope was greeted by the people, September 8, 1846, after having granted the celebrated amnesty to political offenders.)

Now, I set out poor and abandoned, with only thirty-six batecchi (eighteen-pence) in my pocket.

Such is the fruit of my plundering! I embrace you affectionately; believe me to be always your brother.

ALEXANDER.

P.S. I beg you to make interest for me, that my little dog may not be taken away from me. This is the favour that I request.

We leave our readers to form their own opinions as to the present state of justice or humanity in Rome. Our next remarks will be upon the system of education and public instruction pursued in the Papal States, and its influence upon the character of the people.

A VISIT TO JERUSALEM IN 1827.

Extracted from the Private Journal of Lady Montfaucon.

THURSDAY, October 18. Jerusalem.—There is no city in the world which can bear comparison in point of interest with Jerusalem,—fallen, desolate, and abject even as it appears—changed as it has been since the days of its glory. The capitals of the ancient world inspire us, at the sight of their decaying monuments, with thoughts that lead us far back into the history of our race, with feelings that enlarge the sphere of our sympathies, by uniting our recollections of the past with the substantial forms of things present: but there is a power in the human mind by which it is capable of renewing scenes as vividly without external aids, as when they are most abundant. There are no marble records on the plain of Marathon, to aid the enthusiasm of the traveller, but he feels no want of them: and thus it is, whenever any strong and definite feeling of our moral nature is concerned; we need but be present on the spot where great events occurred, and if they were intimately connected with the fate of multitudes, or with the history of our religion, we shall experience a sentiment of veneration and interest amounting to awe, and one above all comparison nobler than that which is excited chiefly by the pomp or wonders of antiquity. It is hence that Jerusalem, notwithstanding the ploughshare of the heathen, infinitely exceeds in interest Rome, Athens, and even the cities of Egypt, still abounding, as they do, in monuments of their former grandeur, and wonderful and venerable as they are, above all other places on which the mere temporal history of mankind can bestow a sanctity. No place has ever suffered like Jerusalem: it is more than probable that not a single relic exists of the city that was the joy of the whole earth; but the most careful and enthusiastic of travellers confess, that when they have endeavoured to find particular marks for their footsteps, there was little to encourage them in the investigation. But it depends not for its power of inspiring veneration on the remains of temples and palaces; and were there even a less chance of speculating with success respecting the sites of its ancient edifices, it would still be the city towards which every religious and meditative mind would turn with the deepest longing. It is with Jerusalem as it would be with the home of our youth, were it levelled with the earth, and we returned after many years and found the spot on which it stood a ploughed field, or a deserted waste, the same thoughts would arise in our hearts as if the building was still before us, and would probably be rendered still more impressive from the very circumstance that the ruin which had taken place was complete.

It is almost a matter of necessity that the traveller should have these feelings on visiting Jerusalem. It is only in proportion as he venerates the spot, independent of what he at present sees there, that he can properly estimate its sanctity. If his thoughts refuse to obey the simple impulse of his spirit, or if his mind be incapable of waking into action without the aid of monuments, inscriptions, or statues, he must not look for gratification in Jerusalem; and if he trust to the traditions which have been accumulating there for centuries, his reflections will be mere mental shadows. It is to his notions of the general sacredness of the place, that he must resign himself. Jerusalem is the same now, in respect to its monumental records, as it was before it became the city of David; its rocks and valleys alone remain to prove its identity with Jerusalem of old.

But when once the mind is properly roused to the sentiments which should thus arise, independently of external objects, every foot of ground which the traveller passes in Jerusalem, or its neighbourhood, will help to increase the vividness of his emotions. A vast change has taken place in the very clothing of nature here since its fall, and her present apparel is in striking harmony with the later chapters of its history. The olive, the fig-tree, and the vine, still cover many of her hills with their richly-laden branches; even the rose is seen flourishing in bright luxuriousness in the recesses of her valleys, and some of her plains indicate their fertility by plentiful harvests; but there is everywhere some appalling token of desolation, and the traveller can scarcely help feeling that he is in a country of which it might be almost said, without a figure, that the heart of the land is broken.

It is not difficult for a reflecting mind to imagine what a variety of strange—both solemn and pleasurable—emotions must fill the mind of the pilgrim, as he approaches the venerable capital of this singular country. The feeling of awe and melancholy, so natural to the region, is necessarily tempered with that delight which a traveller can scarcely help experiencing on finding himself near the accomplishment of a long and difficult journey. Almost all who have visited Jerusalem describe themselves as having been thus affected.

Little is known respecting the origin of this city, which makes so remarkable a figure in the history of mankind. It is, however, supposed that it was the residence of the ancient monarch Melchisedec, king of Salem; and Scripture informs us that it subsequently became the possession of the Jebusites. As the capital of a nation usually experiences, in the most eminent degree, the various changes of its fortune, Jerusalem, in the time of David and Solomon, was probably the wealthiest city, for its extent, in the habitable world, and justified, without a metaphor, the expressions employed to indicate its greatness and magnificence. The afflictions which its inhabitants experienced in the subsequent wars of the kingdom, were evidently rendered on all occasions more terrible by the wealth and luxury, the stern pride and haughty feeling of security which appear to have characterized them from the earliest period of their establishment in the land. From the description given of the ancient city by Josephus, assisted by a view of the spot on which it stood, it is easy to form a judgment of what must have been its strength, and its power of resisting the attacks of an enemy. It was fortified, he informs us, with three walls, except where it was protected by the better defence which nature had provided, deep and impassable valleys, where one wall was deemed sufficient. These walls enclosed the mountains of Sion and Acra, and encompassed, it is supposed, about the space of an English league. The mountains are divided by a valley; and on the former of them, by much the loftiest of the two, stood the upper town, circling the fortress of David; and on the latter was built the lower town, with the splendid temple occupying the hill known by the name of Mount Moriah, which the Asmonean princes joined to Acra, by filling up the valley which intersected them. Of the three walls above mentioned the historian remarks, that the old one, which formed the strongest portion of the defences, had been an object of careful consideration with both David and Solomon, and of many of their successors.

But never did a city, about to become the prey of a conqueror, offer a spectacle of such magnificence to the eye of its enemy as did Jerusalem. Fitted by its very position, on the summit of hills which seemed to have a meaning in their frown, and hanging over valleys of which the sterility and roughness might be easily imagined to have only been overcome by the special blessings of the God of nature, this city of Zion would have offered a spectacle sufficiently imposing, had it still consisted but of the rude dwellings of the ancient Jebusites. It is not difficult, therefore, to account for the astonishment and even deep emotion with which Titus contemplated the scene before him while preparing his legions for the assault. "Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces," would have been the natural exclamation, probably, of the general under any other circumstances but those in which he was placed. "The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion" would have been more ready to rise in his mind, than a feeling that he should be its conqueror and desolator, when he saw before him, in its grandeur, the Temple of Israel's God. Of that most wonderful building of antiquity we can form no conception from any edifice at present in existence; but the historian has described it in language glowing at once with the spirit of religion and patriotism. "The outward face of the Temple," says he, "wanted nothing that was likely to surprise either men's minds or their eyes; for it was covered all over with plates of gold, of great weight, and, at the first rising of the sun, reflected back a very fiery splendour, and made those who forced themselves to look upon it avert their eyes, as they would have done at the sun's own rays. But this Temple appeared to strangers, when they were coming to it at a distance, like a mountain covered with snow; for, as to those parts of it that were not gilt, they were exceeding white."

It was against the city thus fortified by all the contrivances of ancient military art, aided by advantages of situation scarcely equalled by that of any other city in the world, that the son of Vespasian planted his standards. History has no page on which she has employed a more fearful eloquence to describe human calamity, than that in which she has depicted the fall of Jerusalem; but the records of its subsequent fate are not without details of ruin and suffering almost as terrible. It was not till after many an attempt on the part of the surviving Israelites to throw off the yoke of the conqueror, and many a fierce and bloody conflict, that Hadrian built, on the ruins of Zion, Elia Capitolina, and covered every spot of ground, which had been hallowed by the worship of the true God, with the grossest emblems of idolatry. The emperor Constantine, with his mother Helena, afterwards filled it with places of Christian worship. An immense addition was thence made to the Christian community; and for near three hundred years, Jerusalem enjoyed comparative peace and prosperity. But in the year six hundred and eleven, Chosroes, king of Persia, subjected almost the whole of Syria to his sway; and, three years after, led his conquering army into Judea. The intermediate districts offered for some time a barrier to the holy city; but nothing could resist the perseverance of the invader, and Jerusalem, after a vain attempt at defending her sacred walls, saw her streets crowded with the barbaric hosts.

The Persians, however, did not long retain possession of the conquered country. The emperor Heraclius succeeded in effectually expelling them both from Jerusalem and the surrounding territory; and Palestine again remained undisturbed till the renowned Omar, in the year six hundred and thirty-six, laid siege to it at the head of his victorious Mussulmans, and converted it into the chief city of the Mahometan power in the east. For a considerable period the reign of Islamism remained unshaken; but both Jews and Christians, feeling no diminution in their reverence for the Holy City, continued to traverse its streets and environs, in defiance of the bitter insults heaped upon them by the Turks. The complaints which the pilgrims from Europe brought back to their country, respecting the oppressions they had suffered in fulfilling their vows, at length excited, as is well known, the zeal of the western princes, and gave rise to that series of memorable wars to which, it is argued, modern Europe owes much of its culture and civility. The success of Godfrey of Boulogne again made Jerusalem the capital of a kingdom; but in proportion as the Christians became divided among themselves, the Turkish power recovered strength; and at the close of the thirteenth century the flower of chivalry fell beneath the swords of more than two hundred thousand Moslems, and Jerusalem again saw its walls crowned with the crescent. But the conquerors of the fourteenth century were led by a prince of different character to him who achieved the conquest in the seventh; and the victory was gained under dissimilar circumstances. It is not, however, necessary to search very deeply for the causes which have gradually reduced Palestine to its present impoverished condition. Tyranny and misrule are at all times sufficient of themselves to engender misery, and in Jerusalem they have had their perfect work.

But to pass from these reflections to my own feelings, I can never be sufficiently thankful to Almighty God for suffering us to reach this city in safety. The obstacles that presented themselves, the dangers with which we were threatened, the detentions and vexations which had actually to be endured, all rose in my mind as I gave way to the feeling of delight with which I at length saw the fulfilment of my dear husband's long-cherished wish. Nor was my satisfaction a little increased at the recollection that I had strenuously urged him to pursue the journey, even when his own ardour had somewhat abated, and when I had to oppose my counsel to the advice and wishes of our companions.

Mr. Amzlae has a synagogue in the house, and at day-break the male branch of the family assembled at prayers. Notwithstanding the earliness of the hour, and the little rest we had been able to procure, owing to the number of insects which came forth during the night from the cushions of the divan, or sofas, that formed our bed, Montefiore was induced, by the holy feelings so naturally excited in this place, to join them.

Mr. Amzlae's daughter, by a former marriage, came in the morning to offer her services at my toilette. She is not more than fourteen years of age, but is already married; and her husband, who is only one year older, has so feminine an appearance, both in person and style of dress, that we imagined him, the preceding evening, to be a lady. Mrs. Amzlae, who is an exceedingly pretty young woman, was herself married at thirteen, and is now not more than twenty. This is, however, nothing extraordinary, it being the common custom in the east for marriages to be solemnized as early as the age of eleven or twelve years. The ladies in general wear a profusion of ornaments. A broad, gold belt encircles the waist; but the head is simply covered by the turban, no hair being allowed to escape from its folds, which, when the features and forehead are handsome, is a becoming fashion.

Our breakfast consisted of a cup of coffee and a cake, which was handed round; and we were happy to find Mr. Amzlac, who said our arrival had proved a balm to him, much improved in health. The chief rabbis of the Portuguese and German Jews, attended by the different officers and deputies, together with all the heads of the nation, came to welcome us. These visitors occupied our attention during the forenoon; and after dinner we accompanied our party to see the Greek convent, and then to a large stone, said to be the last relic of the Temple of Solomon. It is held in universal veneration, and is inclosed by a gate, the key of which is held by the Turks. The Jews, who visit it regularly once a week, are obliged to pay every time it is unlocked for them. One of our religion attending us, was recognized by the Turk, who demanded his usual fee; but this claim was resisted, it being argued that, as he simply came as our guide, and it was not the customary day, the exaction was illegal. The dispute created some confusion, and I was somewhat alarmed; but the interference of our Agar prevented the Turk from persisting in his imposition; not, however, without uttering many a threat that he should represent the affair to the governor.

Friday, October 19. Jerusalem.—Having sent our letters of introduction, we had the greatest difficulty imaginable in excusing ourselves from accepting the urgent invitations of the hospitable persons who had prepared rooms for us in their houses, and pressed us, with the most urgent invitations, to sojourn with them during our stay. One of the foremost was a relation of the late high-priest, of the German congregation here, to whom the Rev. Doctor Horschel gave us a letter; but Mr. Amzlac said that it would be offering him the greatest possible affront if we left his house for that of any other friend, having stopped there on our arrival. We were therefore compelled to relinquish the obliging invitations we had received, greatly to the disappointment of those who made them. We could not, however, resist their entreaties to see the apartments they had prepared for our reception, and which we found to be very nice and replete with every comfort.

While Montefiore proceeded with Mr. Amzlac, to visit some of the sacred spots most esteemed in this revered city, I accompanied Mr. Bell and Captain Anderson to Bethlehem. We were escorted by a young monk from the Greek convent, followed by our Agar, Dragoman, Paulo, and Armstrong. I commenced the journey on a mule, but finding its pace too heavy and fatiguing, I changed it for a donkey, which I found far more agreeable. We obtained, as we proceeded, a good view of the mosque built over the tombs of David and Solomon, and the Mount of Olives. We also passed a ruin said to have been the Tower of Simcon, and the monastery of Elias, which is now occupied by Greek monks. The road was rocky; but fig, olive, and mulberry-trees adorned many of the hills, and the declivities were covered with a gay harvest of the most beautiful wild flowers. After an hour's ride we came to Rachel's tomb, which stands in a valley on the right, near to which is a well at present without water. We dismounted to view this most interesting monument of sacred history. It is formed of four square walls, with Gothic arches bricked up, and is covered by a dome-roof. On entering I was deeply impressed with a feeling of awe and respect, standing, as I thus did, in the sepulchre of a mother in Israel. The walls of the interior are covered with names and phrases chiefly in Hebrew and other Eastern characters; but some few English are to be found among them, and to these I added the names of Montefiore and myself. My feelings of gratitude on this occasion were not a little increased by a knowledge of the circumstance, that only six European females are said to have visited Palestine in the course of a century.

The next object which attracted our attention on the road was a Greek convent, at which the monk, our companion stopped to converse, for a few moments, with the superior of the establishment. Continuing our route, the town of Bethlehem at length appeared in sight, built on a hill; and we were soon seated in the Greek convent, to which we were welcomed by its holy inmates, whose appearance, however, was far less robust than that of their brethren whom we had seen on the way. We were here shown the celebrated chapel said to have been built by Justinian. It is adorned on each side with twelve Corinthian columns, each consisting of one solid piece of marble; and the walls are decorated with Mosaics, on a gilt ground which, however, have suffered greatly from the ravages of time. We next descended to a subterranean chapel built on the spot where the birth of Christ is said to have taken place. An arch, or grotto, is pointed out, in which the birth is supposed to have occurred. It is ornamented with several historical paintings, descriptive of the event from which it derives its sanctity. They are productions of very early masters, and are executed on a gilt ground, similar to some that we saw at Pisa.

Opposite to the grotto was a long passage, lighted by two rows of silver lamps. This portion of the edifice belongs to the Greek, Armenian, and Latin churches; but the place of nativity is the especial property of the Greek order, and is the most highly appreciated. We were next shown the place where the three Magi came to offer their adorations, and present their offerings to the infant Jesus. This appertains to the Armenians, and is a grotto similar and contiguous to the former, and adorned, like that, with descriptive pictures.

After this we were led to a dome, said to enclose the bones of the massacred infants, but which is held too sacred to be opened. Leaving these vaulted places of Christian veneration, we gladly accepted the invitation of the fraternity to take some refreshment after our fatigue, and were shown into an upper room of the convent, where we seated ourselves on cushions placed on the floor round the room. Sweetmeats, lemonade, and coffee were presented us, (the same spoon sufficing for the whole party—fortunately I was served first.) We then inspected some mother-of-pearl shells, and various sorts of beads manufactured at this place, and made several purchases. The beads, which come from the Dead sea, are very curious, and are held in great estimation, particularly by Catholics.

After tendering our acknowledgments for the civility they had shown us, and taken our leave of the monks, we left Bethlehem, and on again arriving at the Greek convent on the road, we were invited by the superior, who was standing at the gate expecting our return, to enter. Several of the brothers came and joined in the gracious request; and on our acceding to the invitation, we were led into a comfortable room, and took our places on the divan, the good-tempered superior heading the party, on a raised separate seat, at the top of the apartment. Water and towels were served to each guest; mine being, as formerly, ornamented by gold and silver ends. The president then poured out some liqueur, of which he first tasted; then followed lemonade, scented with otto of roses; and a few minutes after a dinner was served, which proved to us that the merits of a good kitchen were not wanting to the holy establishment. In dividing the poultry, without the aid of knife, or other instrument, except a fork to steady it, our Greek proved, by the expertness of his fingers, that he was a good anatomist among the feathered race. Each person, however, was served with a knife, fork, and spoon. Pomegranates, figs, and coffee, with a cibou to each of the gentlemen finished the entertainment; and this being Friday, a day on which the monks abstain from animal food, their attention to us was particularly manifest. Before taking our leave, we looked into the chapel, and were directed to observe the altar, as exhibiting a proof of the present comparative poverty of the establishment; brass candlesticks having been placed on the shrine in lieu of silver, which were sacrificed to supply the exactions of the Turks, and in contribution to the expenses of a war carried on with their own country. But the complaint of extortion is not confined to one sect. Among the poor Jews but very few families are able to support themselves. There is no commerce, and shops are not suffered on terms which admit of their becoming profitable.

We returned to Mr. Amzlae's at half-past four, having had a most gratifying excursion. Mrs. Amzlae we found handsomely dressed for Sabbath, and the house neatly prepared. Montefiore was as delighted as myself with the manner in which the forenoon had been spent. He had visited, in the course of his ramble, the Valley of Jehoshaphat, the Jewish place of interment, where he saw the cave of Jeremiah, the tomb of Absalom, and inspected, for a second time, the stone, said to be the last vestige of Solomon's Temple. Friday being the day on which it is the custom to view this only relic of former magnificence, and to indulge themselves in which the Jews, poor as they are, pay their tribute. We passed the Sabbath evening in Jerusalem most happily with our kind host and his family.

Saturday, October 20. Jerusalem.—At dawn of day Montefiore arose and went to synagogue, accompanied by Mr. Amzlae. An hour afterwards I repaired with Mrs. Amzlae, escorted by two male attendants, to the same place of devotion. The gallery was thronged with females, all clad in deep white scarfs, which covered their head and figure. There are no seats, but two were provided for us; the other persons who were present placing their handkerchiefs on the ground, and there taking their places. We perceived through the wooden trellis-work that Montefiore was just called up to Sephar; and this being the first Sabbath we had ever spent in Palestine, he offered for all his absent friends individually. Many were the solemn thoughts which rose in our minds, finding ourselves thus engaged in this holy land: the country of our ancestors, of our religion, and of our former greatness; but now, alas! of persecution and oppression. We hear from every one of the extortions that are levied, and that there is no means of support except such as is provided by the bounty of other countries, with the exception of the little help afforded by the few families who continue here from a principle of religious enthusiasm, and contribute all in their power to the support of the necessitous. There are four synagogues adjoining each other, belonging to the Portuguese, who form the principal portion of the Jewish community. The Germans have only one place of worship, and the greater proportion of the congregation are from Poland. There is also a numerous society at Hebron, eight hours' journey from Jerusalem; but they are in a wretched state of poverty. Still, how delighted should I have been, had time allowed our visiting that town, consecrated to recollection, as the burial-place of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of Sarah, the mother of Israel; and interesting from so many other circumstances connected with the history of the Old Testament.

After breakfast we paid a visit to the Haham, who expected us. Sweetmeats and liquors were handed round, as usual; and, what was more agreeable and refreshing, we received the hearty and paternal good wishes and blessings of the reverend priest, who bestowed them with an affecting cordiality, and said that our visit to the Holy City appeared to them almost like the coming of the Messiah. Mr. Amzlae then requested us to call upon an old lady who had, a few months since, lost her husband. He had been one of the most learned and esteemed rabbis of the place. Our friend was much affected on entering the house and beholding the widow.

On our way home we were accosted by a tall gentleman, in so emphatic a manner that his vehemence led me, at first, to imagine that he was a Turk, come with hostile intentions. We found, however, that he was only endeavouring to express how it would mortify his feelings if we left Jerusalem without paying him a visit. It would have been difficult to refuse an invitation so earnestly expressed, and we accordingly accompanied him to his house, which we found to be exceedingly neat, well furnished in the Turkish style, and altogether one of the best we had seen here. The gentleman was about seventy years of age, of a healthful, robust mien, and most cheerful manners: he had returned, the preceding week, overland, from Constantinople, without having encountered the smallest obstruction. We here again accepted refreshment, which its superior quality rendered by no means a difficult task. Every thing, indeed, and not less than the rest, the neatness of the ladies' dresses, exhibiting marks of elegance and refinement.

We remained, on reaching home, a short time to rest, and then proceeded to fulfil our engagement to dine with Mr. Meldel, and prevailed on Mr. Amzlae to accompany us, whereby we hoped to promote unanimity between the Portuguese and German congregations; an object which Montefiore wished to accomplish, it being the ardent desire of Dr. Herschel, who solicited his interference to that effect. The most heartfelt satisfaction was expressed at our presence; every one vied in showing us politeness and attention; and the table abounded with all the delicacies that could be obtained. The female branches of the family were in the same room, but did not sit with us. As Mr. Amzlae had invited Mr. Bell and Captain Anderson to dine with him, he entreated us not to prolong our visit beyond what politeness on our part required. We therefore took leave of our hospitable and worthy entertainers, and found ourselves obliged to partake in a second dinner. Thus there was no deficiency of good cheer for the celebration of this my birthday, which I never expected to pass at Jerusalem. Montefiore requested Mr. Amzlae to obtain a necklace similar to the one worn by his lady; and having succeeded in his commission, I have been this day presented with it by my dear Montefiore, as a memento of this venerable city, and a birthday present.

We had several arrangements to make during the evening, an early hour having been fixed for our departure the next morning. It was our wish to obtain specimens of whatever curiosities the place afforded; but we could obtain nothing except wine, earth, some embroidery on calicoes descriptive of the most celebrated ancient edifices, soap, a silver cup, an ancient manuscript, and some coins. Of the wine we took a small cask, it being made by families only as it is required for their own immediate supply. No stock is therefore kept; and, as there are no wine-merchants, each person procures his own grapes, and makes it at home.

In the course of the evening we were visited by the superior of the Latin convent, who, among other civilities, expressed a hope that, if ever we renewed our visit to the Holy City, we should not pass his convent without entering. He also expressed regret that our friends did not take up their abode with him, instead of proceeding to the Greek Convent. Great jealousy is said to exist between the different orders, of whom the Armenians are the richest. Montefiore had received an invitation from the governor the day before to pay him a visit, but he excused himself, pleading the shortness of our stay. A second invitation, however, having been sent, he was prevailed on to go this afternoon. His reception was most flattering: coffee and pipes were handed; and his excellency expressed some surprise that Montefiore had not called on him before. He then desired his scribe to add a handsome eulogium to our passport, to which he also affixed his name and seal, and offered to send a guard with us to any place we might wish to visit, whether within or without the walls of the city.

Seventeen rabbis read prayers for us, during the night, in Mr. Amzla's synagogue; and after two hours' rest, Montefiore joined them in their devotions.

Sunday, October 21. Jerusalem.—The pious sounds from the place of prayer, which was opposite my chamber, awoke me, and I arose with the sun. The necessary arrangements for our journey were speedily made. Captain Anderson, Mr. Bell, and suite, already awaited us below; the mules and guides were at the gate; Armstrong and Paulo were actively placing the luggage; while the Agar, ready mounted on his beautiful charger, with the attendant dragoon, completed the picturesque group. I now descended to perform the unwelcome task of taking my leave of friends, who, although the acquaintance had been of so short a duration, had gained a place in our affections, by their hospitality and their many kind expressions of regard. The Portuguese high-priest had come, at this early hour, to give us his blessing; nor did I ever behold a more benign countenance, or a more venerable-looking man. Many other respectable members of the congregation also attended, and overwhelmed us with their affectionate wishes. A host of poor widows also, and others, came to ask assistance; but Montefiore had previously arranged this matter with Mr. Amzla. Coffee and chocolate were served; and our amiable hostess had provided a supply of white bread and small cheeses made at Hebron, with a quantity of cakes and wine for the journey; which were increased by the kind present we had received of a large basket of almond-cakes, and two bottles of his best wine, from the gentleman who had so particularly urged us to accept his house during our stay in the city.

At a quarter before eight we mounted our mules and donkeys, amid the blessings and good wishes of a numerous throng, who followed us to the gates. Farewell, Holy City! we exclaimed in our hearts. Blessed be the Almighty, who has protected us while contemplating the sacred scenes which environ thee. Thankful may we ever be for His manifold mercies! May the fountain of our feelings evermore run in the current of praise, and entire devotion to His will and His truth, till the time shall arrive when "the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads!" Isaiah, xxxv. 10.

A fine sunshiny-day brought us safely, though with some fatigue, to the well beyond Abbah-Goush, which we again passed without molestation. A poor Hebrew guide, however, who had remained near me all the way, was detained for his fine. I was not aware of his religion till afterwards, nor of his being in custody; but in about half an hour he overtook us, having paid two piastres. After an excellent meal at the side of the well, we continued our journey to Ramla, which we reached about five o'clock, and were again welcomed by the good brothers of the Greek convent.

CAMPAGNA DI ROMA.

THEY alone who are unacquainted with the Italian language need to be informed that the term Campagna, though generally used with reference only to the country round about the city of Rome, is also applied to other localities in Italy—as the Campagna of Florence, the Campagna Felice, in the kingdom of Naples. The Campagna di Roma includes a vast territory of some sixty miles in length, by nearly fifty in breadth, which contains several towns of good repute, besides the former capital of the western world.

If there be one part of Europe which offers to the traveller whose thoughts are with the past, and whose mind is stored with the spoils of time, stronger inducement to visit it than another, it assuredly is this portion of the Papal States, which, under its ancient title of Latium, once occupied so prominent a position in the history of mankind. Every step his foot takes is on classic ground, hallowed in his recollection by the events which have transpired within its limits; but the portion which more especially would attract his attention is that lying immediately about the city of Rome, to the south and east of the Capitol, and along the Palatine, Quirinal, and Aventine hills, on each side of the Tiber—

“Everywhere

Some trace of valour or heroic toil !
Here is the sacred field of the Horatii,
There the Quintian meadows. Here the hill,
How holy, where a generous people, twice,
Twice going forth, in terrible anger sate Armed; and, their wrongs redressed, at once gave way;
Helmet and shield, and sword and spear, thrown down,
And every hand uplifted, every heart
Poured out in thanks to heaven.”

Now, let us suppose the traveller, after a long day's wandering through this locality, flings himself wearily on one of those lofty eminences, and, as the evening sun lights up the whole scene around him, he falls into a deep reverie, haunted with “visions of the dead,” passing in review before his eyes, from the hour

“when he from Troy Went up the Tiber,” till Generic, the Vandal, covered the land with his barbaric armies. What a dream of glory to the imagination! How the memory recalls the deeds of brave renown in the warriors of ancient Rome—

“Her demi-gods, in senate met,
All hrad to counsel, and all heart to act;—
Her festive games, the school of heroes, see,
Her circus ardent with contending youth;
Her streets, her temples, palaces, and baths,
Full of fair forms, of beauty's eldest born,
And of a people cast in virtue's mould.”

This is the dream of her greatness and her triumph, her magnificence and her patriotism; but it is followed by another, in which tyranny and sensuality, passion and lawlessness, usurped the places of more noble feelings:—

“Hark ! a yell, a shriek,
A barbarous outcry, loud, and louder yet,
That echoes from the mountain to the sea !
And mark, * * * like a bursting cloud,
The battle moving onward ! Had they slain
All, that the earth should from her womb bring forth
New nations to destroy them ! From the depth
Of forests, from what none had dared explore,
Regions of thrilling ice, as though in ice
Engendered, multiplied, they pour along,
Shaggy and huge ! Host after host they come;
The Goth, the Vandal, and again the Goth !”

But, amid the impending desolation of a mighty heathen nation, there arises another power, which Rome, through the cross of Constantine, wields over the civilized world, and brings it into subjugation: the tiara of the priest has pushed aside the iron crown of the soldier; the incense of the Christian's offering smokes upon the ruined altars of pagan sacrifice; and now, at the expiration of fifteen hundred years, we find—

“Groves, temples, palaces,
Swept from the sight; and nothing visible
Amid the sulphurous vapours that exhale,
As from a land accursed, save here and there
An empty tomb, a fragment like the limb
Of some dismembered giant. In the midst,
A city stands, her domes and turrets crowned
With many a cross; but they that issue forth, Wander like strangers who had built among
The mighty ruins, silent, spiritless;
And on the road where once we might have met
Cesar, and Cato, and men more than kings,
We meet, none else, the pilgrim and the beggar.”

Well, it is thus; but, nevertheless, a pilgrimage to the Campagna di Roma is worth the undertaking, even if one cares not to worship at the shrine of St. Peter; and prefers rather to sit, like Marius, among the ruins of Carthage, beneath one of the time-worn fragments of ancient Rome, or under the majestic tree that throws its deep shadow on the waters that run at the base of some modern temple in Mr. Crouch's classic picture.

A LETTER FROM IRELAND, IN SEPTEMBER, 1852.

* * * * * Killarney.

You ask me if the country is much changed: and, now that we have journeyed from the "black north" to the sweet south, what we "think" of it?

I have never had time to "think" while in Ireland; seeing and feeling so much and so rapidly prepares one far too little for thought; thought must be the produce of hereafter; but I can tell you a few of my "impressions." The old friends that remain greet us with their old affection; but more than one, or two, or three high-born families—whom we knew and loved—have been swept, as it were, completely away; and, though we were aware that such was the case, and that their homes had passed into the hands of the stranger, the realization of the fact certainly cast a shadow over our footsteps during our brief sojourn in Dublin. You must not smile when I say the streets of the city look lonely "without the beggars." I pray you to understand that I do not wish them back; those whom the pestilence spared are better off in the workhouse, and the inhabitants and tourists do better without them—no question about that. Their misery is both alleviated and concealed, and Dublin is almost as free from mendicants as London; but yet their bright change of wit was a good exchange for the copper coin, or the silver fourpence, which gained you the ready-made blessing and made you smile. However, as far as Dublin is concerned, "street beggars" are matters of history.*

* Some of the Irish gentry depict all Irish mendicants (who are still in considerable force at the tourist stations) as "impostors," and set down those who relieve or sympathize with them as fools. If the Irish mendicants are all impostors, then are the tales of Irish distress all untruths; for one is the consequence of the other. There are impostors in Ireland, as well as in England; but to say, as I read it this morning, in a very intelligent and pleasing little guide-book, by "An Old Traveller," and published by the Dublin Murray, McIlushian, that "tourists have created this abomination," is—to speak of it very politely—A GREAT MISTAKE. Beggars and begging were rife in Ireland before a dozen tourists had crossed "the herring-pond"—those who repeated their wit and repartee, chronicled what might have been said to a dozen others, but was no less clever on that account. The Irish beggars are not the only wits who rehearse their good things, and repeat them frequently. "You've crammed your wit to cram me," said one of those "hard" gentlemen to a witty beggar. "Why, thin, if I did," was the reply, "it was all I had to cram, and you're too crammed to take it."

The "season" (for Dublin has its season) is over, and the inhabitants are either luxuriating in the beauty of the bays and breezes, the rivers and mountains, of their native country, or "touring it," abroad or at home; still there is a great pulsation going on in the very heart of "the city," which, by next May, will burst forth, not into outrage, but into a peace-offering—a "great Exhibition" of industrial art—proving still more largely what Irish resources are, and at the same time inviting competition from other lands. The plans are all prepared—the site decided upon—subscriptions paid, or promised—the great stronghold being the energy and liberality of the same gentleman who gave confidence to the projectors of the Cork Exhibition, by his liberal donation at its commencement. I do trust and believe that the undertaking will prosper as it deserves. Cork planted its first step firmly, it kept its promise, and more than paid its way; it burst forth with true Celtic spirit—the Dublin committee for the proposed Exhibition has more time to organize its proceedings; and, judging from the present zeal and industry of its various members, the undertaking will not only receive, but command support, and draw thousands of visitors, next summer, to the banks of the Liffy.

There was something singularly strange to us in the great steam "movement," which has, since our last visit to Ireland, altogether changed the character of Irish travelling. We could hardly believe we were skirting the bay of Dublin on a railroad, and then darting off to the "north," freighted with the wisdom of the "British Association," and the brilliant cortège of the popular lord-lieutenant, who were to assemble, on business and pleasure, in Belfast. The line from Dublin to Belfast is not yet completed, so the passengers—first, second, and third class—with their luggage, were turned, in a most miscellaneous manner, into cars and omnibuses, to cross the "Boyne Water," and meet, as one of the drivers expressed it, "the tail of the other tay-kettle," at the opposite side.

You would have been exceedingly amused by the confusion and chaos which occurred during this singular transit, upon which the sun shone with unclouded brilliancy. Every vehicle was crowded—every unfortunate quadruped overweighted: in one corner of a "two-horse car" was seated an archbishop, balanced at the opposite side by the great oracle surgeon of the age—whose wit is as bright as his knowledge is profound—and who enjoyed the mêlée with a true sense of the ridiculous; the pallid Napoleon-like face of Prince Bonaparte contrasted with the restless expression of a Russian prince, whose moustachios extracted some not very original wit from the multitude of ragged boys, who screamed and tumbled along the road—"Will I, sur—will I, my lady, stand on my head? just one ha'penny. Sure I'll stand on my head for a ha'penny; I'll stand as straight as a rush on my head for a ha'penny, sur." Even in that I saw a change—it was not the kneeling, screaming, downright do-nothing begging of the olden days; the ragged urchins wanted to earn the "ha'penny" by standing on their heads; it was a step or a toss with the times—it was (laugh if you please) an improvement—it was more than something; and they did stand on their heads, and scream and jump "Jim Crow," and escape in the most miraculous manner from under the very feet of the horses, until we believed in the opinion expressed by a grim old Scotchman—a philosopher, doubtless—who observed, that "the right way to get boys into danger was to take care of them." And while we rattled and "tore" over the bridge, the beautiful Boyne rolled beneath, freighted with memories of very different import to the still divided "factions" of Ireland. If I journeyed frequently to Belfast, I think I should be sorry when the railway is quite finished, and properly and discreetly managed; a little variety enhances the pleasure of travelling, and Ireland is becoming so very like England in its iron highways, that, but for the guard's plaintive and repeated entreaties at the different stations, of—"Oh! then now, gentlemen, for God's sake take yer seats, will you, if you please? sure the train can't keep time this way, no how! Oh, then, go in, and good luck to ye! Oh, do!"—and the flying peep at a dilapidated cabin, or an exquisite bit of mountain scenery, or a magnificent ruin, or a rushing, foaming river, and the one want, the dreary want, of trees—we might fancy ourselves in "the sister country;" but the "Dublin and Belfast line" is not well managed yet, as the lamentation of a good-natured, bewildered young Englishman testified. He expected considerable sympathy for the loss of "twenty-two pair of boots and a sword," which "his rascal" had put up in a great hurry, and which could be found nowhere! There was something irresistibly droll in his lamentations, and the often-repeated determination to make the railway company pay for them; but, in the meantime, what could he do without his sword and his boots, and his boots and his sword? Still the wonder was, (considering the bustle occasioned by the transit of the British Association and the lord-lieutenant,) not that this half-innocent, half-knowing youth had lost so material a part of his wardrobe, but that anybody recovered theirs. And when at last we found each other, and were all seated "at the tail of the other tay-kettle," we were still more astonished that we all fell into right places, considering how small and ill-organized a staff was appointed to attend to the wants and wishes of such a numerous assembly.

When we arrived at Belfast, we found the population of that highly prosperous and increasing town literally "out of the windows," for every window was open, and filled with ladies waving handkerchiefs, while the crowd beneath screamed and scrambled; and triumphal arches were crowned with flags and flowers, bands playing, and cannon firing; and the mayor met the lord-lieutenant, and the lord-lieutenant met the mayor, as if they had been friends from the days of Fin ma Cowl. The wise, and grave, and learned members of the British Association were quite forgotten in this first burst of loyalty; and, so great was the turmoil, that we were but too happy to escape to the other terminus, where we again steamed away, and in little more than an hour arrived at the noble and hospitable castle, within sight of the inland sea of Loch Neagh, where we were to spend some happy days.

Of all the "four quarters," "the north" progresses the most steadily; not only in one branch, but in art, commerce, and manufacture. In Belfast commenced those extraordinary efforts to give profitable means of employment to the female peasants of the surrounding country, and the blessing of industry has increased the small "comforts" of the people in various ways: the cottages look more prosperous, though they are not so numerous as they were ten years ago; and wherever we turned in Belfast, we heard the sound of the mason's trowel and the carpenter's saw. Buildings are progressing as rapidly in and about this northern town as they are in the neighbourhood of London; the "Linen Hall" is in itself, and for its suggestions, and the beauty of order in its arrangements, worthy a pilgrimage; the "School of Design" is filled with anxious and earnest pupils; the "Botanic Garden," we were told, was greatly improved; and we should have been pleased to inspect the College, but it had been taken possession of by the sections of "THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION."

Men with placards, signifying their office of watch-keepers over the doors of Section A. or B., permitted us to peep in, and hear the "hum of wisdom," to which young and old listened with very enviable attention. "PROFESSORS"—(the Irish never abate a dignity, and are as fond of a title as our Germanic neighbours)—hurried here and there; bishops, princes, philosophers, a stray poet or two, historians, geologists, rhetoricians, a fair sprinkling of indefatigable Americans, mingled with the worthy people, whose "northern manners," warmed to southern heat, and whose hospitality spread "luncheons," which were perpetually replenished from three until five; then there were "evening meetings" and "excursions," and "investigations" of "round towers" and all other "towers;" and visits to "the Causeway" and "Loch Neagh;" and "breakfasts" and "dinner," at the residences of the "nobility and gentry"—"friends" houses overflowing with "friends" and intelligence; and little children in the streets, playing—as big children sometimes do—at "philosophy," and investigating oyster-shells with great gravity.

It was very delightful to hear how much the members of the BRITISH ASSOCIATION enjoyed their visit to THE NORTH, and to feel that then, as ever, the English who visit Ireland are certain to forget, in the enjoyment of the present, the prejudice of the past.

We visited the damask manufactory of ARDOYNE, and there, after the lapse of ten years, again saw the interesting progress of a manufacture which has established a world-wide fame.

Around ANTRIM were spread the bleach-greens of Mr. Chayne, the exquisite linen forming a filmy covering on the bright, green grass, like the first fall of early snow. William Spencer says that

"Noiseless falls the foot of time, Which only treads on flowers," but it falls, nevertheless; and we returned to Dublin by the same route, though with less confusion than we experienced on our journey to the north; and then, by the Dublin and Cork railway, we came on our road to the south. I cannot say too much for the arrangement and good order of the line, which is as yet only completed as far as Mallow; the stations are really picturesque and substantial buildings; but the loneliness of the beautiful country through which we passed, realized still more fully the accounts of the double desolation that has so altered the aspect of the country—indeed, I could not have believed in such a total change, had we not seen it; and when we left the train at Charleville, en route for Springfield Castle, and after spending a couple of days with our friends there, posted on to Killarney, the lonely ruins of the peasants' cottages, by hill-side and way-side, impressed me so painfully, that I was only consoled by repeating over and over again in my own mind the miserable truth—"better in another land—better in their graces—than here."*

AMERICAN OPINIONS.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN.* BY HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.—HINTS ON DRESS AND BEAUTY:† BY MRS. E. OAKES SMITH.

WE have placed these books together, not because of any resemblance existing between them, but simply because they are types of the extraordinary differences which exist between two distinct classes of intellectual American women.

Mrs. Stowe is earnest, intense, faithful, fervent, a very woman in gentleness and love, yet of heroic determination, and inspired in impulse and in action, by the strongest and purest spiritual religion. She is the grand and prominent type of the "Marys" who have "chosen the better part."

Mrs. Oakes Smith is smart, sharp, and intelligent; superficial—more, perhaps, from habit than deficiency—hitting with considerable clearness upon a "fact or two," and making the most of them. Much troubled about the long dresses and externals of womanhood; and yet, with the blackest and bitterest examples of slavery around her on every side, making the welkin ring with republican tirades, winding her periods with praise of the "regal pride of democratic simplicity," and "leading the van of nations in the great sentiment of human freedom." The unblushing manner in which she boasts of "freedom," while so large a proportion of her country's population are crouching in their fetters beneath the slave-lash, is a proof rather of her superficiality than of her want of feeling. Her whole mind is set upon trousers and gipsy hats; she is one of the wide world's "Marthas," "troubled about much serving."

With us, such distinctive classification is rarely to be met with; we are outwardly more alike, and even in our books and domestic habits more closely resemble each other; so that a Mrs. Stowe or a Mrs. Oakes Smith are here seldom encountered. Indeed, the author of Uncle Tom's Cabin stands pre-eminent among women; in the whole range of European and American literature there is no such book; the author has been happy in a subject of all-engrossing interest; her "facts" are as interesting, as full of the wildest adventure, the truest pathos, the blandest humour, as the imaginations of our best novelists could supply. Consequently, we cannot speak of her as an imaginative writer; she has simply and forcibly recorded what she has seen and known; and she has done this as fearlessly, and with as high an object, as ever stirred the heart of woman into action. Wherever this precious book is read, the deepest contempt for the upholders of slavery must follow. Until the America we desire to love, and to which we look as the country of the future—until she is thoroughly purged from the sin of slavery—until the fetter and the scourge are altogether abandoned—it is in vain to claim for the United States a large share of political or intellectual progress. She may continue to achieve commercial greatness—she may be rich and powerful—she may rival Birmingham in locks and pistols, and skim the waters more fleetly than the parent bird who taught her how to spread her wings and trim her plumage—she may talk (as, in fact, she does) more loudly about liberty than all the nations of Europe put together—but as long as a single negro is enslaved within her broad dominions, she remains a polluted and blood-stained object of contempt to every nation under heaven.

Oh! what a bitter thing to be branded as the "Slave State!" "Toll me not of rights," said Lord Brougham, in the unforgotten days of his stirring eloquence; "talk not of the property of the planter in his slaves; I deny the right, I acknowledge not the principle; the feelings of our common nature rise in rebellion against it; be the appeal made to the understanding or the heart, the sentence is the same that rejects it. In vain you tell me of laws which sanction such a claim: there is a law above all the enactments of human codes, the same throughout the world, the same in all times, such as it was before the daring genius of Columbus pierced the night of ages, and opened to one world the sources of power, wealth, and knowledge; to another, all unutterable woes, such as it is at this day—it is the law written by the finger of God upon the heart of man; and by that law, unchanged and eternal, while men despise fraud, and loathe rapine, and abhor blood, they will reject with indignation the wild and guilty phantasy, that man can hold property in man."

It is marvellous how the gentle and pleading tone of this fearless, yet womanly book, sets forth the terrible and gigantic iniquity of American slavery; the faults, and follies, and vices of the negroes, are not glossed over by a single effort to make them better than they are; "Tom" himself is simply a faithful, affectionate creature, sanctified to endure, as only a Christian can, by a firm belief in the truths of revelation. We are so carried away by the holiness of the mission Mrs. Stowe has undertaken, that it is not until after the book is closed we do justice to its literary merits. It is composed of events arising out of slavery, and of characters, for many of which we have no parallels in England. The author excels in her descriptions of natural, as well as spiritual strength; such as, for instance, the escape of Eliza, the quadroon girl, with her child, when she discovered that her master had sold him to a slave-dealer, though she herself was to have remained with a mistress who treated her kindly, and to whom she was much attached.

"It is impossible to conceive a human creature more wholly desolate and forlorn than Eliza, when she turned her footsteps from Uncle Tom's Cabin.

"Her husband's suffering and dangers, and the danger of her child, all blended in her mind, with a confused and stunning sense of the risk she was running, in leaving the only home she had ever known, and cutting loose from the protection of a friend she over loved and revered. Then there was the parting from every familiar object—the place where she had grown up, the trees under which she had played, the groves where she had walked many an evening in happier days, by the side of her young husband—everything, as it lay in the clear, frosty starlight, seemed to speak reproachfully to her, and ask her whither could she go from a home like that?

"But stronger than all was maternal love, wrought into a paroxysm of frenzy by the near approach of a fearful danger. Her boy was old enough to have walked by her side, and, in an indifferent case, she would only have led him by the hand; but now the bare thought of putting him out of her arms made her shudder, and she strained him to her bosom with a convulsive grasp, as she went rapidly forward.

"The frosty ground creaked beneath her feet, and she trembled at the sound; every quaking leaf and fluttering shadow sent the blood backward to her heart, and quickened her footsteps. She wondered within herself at the strength that seemed to be come upon her; for she felt the weight of her boy as if it had been a feather, and every flutter of fear seemed to increase the supernatural power that bore her on, while from her pale lips burst forth, in frequent ejaculations, the prayer to a Friend above—"Lord, help! Lord, save me!"

"If it were your Harry, mother, or your Willie, that were going to be torn from you by a brutal trader, to-morrow morning—if you had seen the man, and heard that the papers were signed and delivered, and you had only from twelve o'clock till morning to make good your escape—how fast could you walk! How many miles could you make in those brief hours, with the darling at your bosom—the little sleepy head on your shoulder—the small, soft arms trustingly holding on to your neck?"

"For the child slept. At first, the novelty and alarm kept him waking; but his mother so hurriedly repressed every breath or sound, and so assured him that if he were only still she would certainly save him, that he clung quietly round her neck, only asking, as he found himself sinking to sleep:—

"Mother, I don't need to keep awake, do I?"

"No, my darling; sleep, if you want to."

"But, mother, if I do get asleep, you won't let him get me?"

"No! so may God help me!" said his mother, with a paler cheek, and a brighter light in her large dark eyes.

"You're sure, an't you, mother?"

"Yes, sure!" said the mother, in a voice that startled herself; for it seemed to her to come from a spirit within, that was no part of her; and the boy dropped his little weary head on her shoulder, and was soon asleep. How the touch of those warm arms, the gentle breathings that came on her neck, seemed to add fire and spirit to her movements! It seemed to her as if strength poured into her in electric streams, from every gentle touch and movement of the sleeping, confiding child. Sublime is the dominion of the mind over the body, that, for a time, can make flesh and nerve impregnable, and string the sinews like steel, so that the weak become so mighty.

"The boundaries of the farm, the grove, the wood-lot, passed by her dizzily, as she walked on; and still she went, leaving one familiar object after another, slackening not, pausing not, till reddening daylight found her many a long mile from all traces of any familiar objects upon the open highway.

"She had often been, with her mistress, to visit some connexions, in the little village of T—, not far from the Ohio river, and knew the road well. To go thither, to escape across the Ohio river, were the first hurried outlines of her plan of escape; beyond that, she could only hope in God.

"No, no, Harry, darling! mother can't eat till you are safe! We must go on—on—till we come to the river!" And she hurried again into the road, and again constrained herself to walk regularly and composedly forward.

"She was many miles past any neighbourhood where she was personally known. If she should chance to meet any who knew her, she reflected that the well-known kindness of the family would be of itself a blind to suspicion, as making it an unlikely supposition that she would be a fugitive. As she was also so white as not to be known of coloured lineage without a critical survey, and her child was white also, it was much easier for her to pass on unsuspected.

"On this presumption, she stopped at noon at a neat farm-house, to rest herself, and buy some dinner for her child and self; for, as the danger decreased with the distance, the supernatural tension of the nervous system lessened, and she found herself both weary and hungry.

"The good woman, kindly and gossiping, seemed rather pleased than otherwise with having somebody come in to talk with; and accepted, without examination, Eliza's statement, that she 'was going on a little piece, to spend a week with her friends,'—all which she hoped in her heart might prove strictly true.

"An hour before sunset, she entered the village of T—, by the Ohio river, weary and foot-sore, but still strong in heart. Her first glance was at the river, which lay, like Jordan, between her and the Canaan of liberty, on the other side.

"It was now early spring, and the river was swollen and turbulent; great cakes of floating ice were swinging heavily to and fro in the turbid waters. Owing to the peculiar form of the shore on the Kentucky side, the land bending far out into the water, the ice had been lodged and detained in great quantities, and the narrow channel which swept round the bend was full of ice, piled one cake over another, thus forming a temporary barrier to the descending ice, which lodged, and formed a great undulating raft, filling up the whole river, and extending almost to the Kentucky shore.

"Eliza stood for a moment, contemplating this unfavourable aspect of things, which she saw at once must prevent the usual ferry-boat from running, and then turned into a small public-house on the bank, to make a few inquiries.

"The hostess, who was busy in various fizzing and stewing operations over the fire, preparatory to the evening meal, stopped, with a fork in her hand, as Eliza's sweet and plaintive voice arrested her.

"What is it?" she said.

"Is n't there a ferry or boat that takes people over to B—y, now?" she said.

"No, indeed!" said the woman; "the boats has stopped running."

"Eliza's look of dismay and disappointment struck the woman, and she said, inquiringly:—

"May-be you're wanting to get over t—anybody sick? Ye seem mighty anxious!"

"I've got a child that's very dangerous," said Eliza. "I never heard of it till last night, and I've walked quite a piece to-day, in hopes to get to the ferry."

"Well, now, that's onlucky," said the woman, whose motherly sympathies were much aroused; "I'm re'lly consarned for ye. Solomon!" she called, from a window towards a small back building. A man, in leather apron and very dirty hands, appeared at the door.

"I say, Sol!" said the woman, "is that ar man going to tote thim bar's over to-night?"

"He said that he should try, if 'twas any way prudent," said the man.

"There's a man a-piece down here that's going over with some truck this evening, if he dur's to; he'll be in here to supper to-night, so you'd better set down and wait. That's a sweet little fellow," added the woman, offering him a cake.

"But the child, wholly exhausted, cried with weariness.

"'Poor fellow! he is't used to walking, and I've hurried him on so,' said Eliza.

"'Well, take him into this room,' said the woman, opening into a small bedroom, where stood a comfortable bed. Eliza laid the weary boy upon it, and held his hand in hers till he was fast asleep. For her there was no rest. As a fire in her bones, the thought of the pursuer urged her on; and she gazed with longing eyes on the sullen, surging waters that lay between her and liberty."

Of course a hot pursuit is commenced, the slave-dealer accompanied, certainly not assisted, by "Sam" and "Andy," two of Eliza's fellow-servants, track her to the house, where he has taken shelter.

"In consequence of all the various delays, it was about three-quarters of an hour after Eliza had laid her child to sleep in the village tavern, that the party came riding into the same place. Eliza was standing by the window, looking out in another direction, when Sam's quick eye caught a glimpse of her. Haley and Andy were two yards behind. At this crisis, Sam contrived to have his hat blown off, and uttered a loud and characteristic ejaculation, which startled her at once; she drew suddenly back; the whole train swept by the window, round to the front door.

"A thousand lives seemed to be concentrated in that one moment to Eliza. Her room opened by a side door to the river. She caught her child, and sprang down the steps towards it. The trader caught a full glimpse of her, just as she was disappearing down the bank; and throwing himself from his horse, and calling loudly on Sam and Andy, he was after her like a hound after a deer. In that dizzy moment, her feet to her scarce seemed to touch the ground, and a moment brought her to the water's edge. Right on behind they came; and, norred with strength such as God gives only to the desperate, with one wild cry and bounding leap, she vaulted sheer over the turbid current by the shore, on to the raft of ice beyond. It was a desperate leap—impossible to anything but madness and despair; and Haley, Sam, and Andy instinctively cried out, and lifted up their hands, as she did it.

"The huge green fragment of ice on which she alighted pitched and cracked as her weight came on it, but she stayed there not a moment. With wild cries and desperate energy she leaped to another and still another cake;—stumbling—leaping—slipping—springing upwards again! Her shoes are gone—her stockings cut from her feet—while blood marked every step; but she saw nothing, felt nothing, till dimly, as in a dream, she saw the Ohio side, and a man helping her up the bank.

"'Yer a brave gal, now, whoever ye ar!' said the man, with an oath.

Eliza recognized the voice and face of a man who owned a farm not far from her old home.

"'O Mr. Symmes!—savo me—do save me—do hide me!' said Eliza.

"'Why, what's this!' said the man. 'Why, i 'tan't Shelby's gal!'

"'My child!—this boy—he's sold him! There is his mas'r,' said she, pointing to the Kentucky shore. 'O Mr. Symmes, you've got a little boy.'

"'So I have,' said the man, as he roughly, but kindly, drew her up the steep bank. 'Besides, you're a right brave gal. I like grit wherever I see it.'

"When they had gained the top of the bank, the man paused.

"'I'd be glad to do something for ye,' said he; but then there's nowhar I could take ye. The best I can do is to tell you to go thar,' said he, pointing to a large white house which stood by itself, off the main street of the village. 'Go thar; they're kind folks. Thar's no kind o' danger but they'll help you—they're up to all that sort o' thing.'

"'The Lord bless you!' said Eliza, earnestly.

"'No 'casion, no 'casion in the world,' said the man. 'What I've done 's of no 'count.'

"'And, oh, surely, sir, you won't tell any one!'

"'Go to thunder, gal! What do you take a feller for? In course not,' said the man. 'Come, now, go along like a likely, sensible gal, as you are. You've arnt your liberty, and you shall have it, for all me.'

"The woman folded her child to her bosom, and walked firmly and swiftly away. The man stood and looked after her.

"'Shelby, now, mebbe won't take this yer the most neighbourly thing in the world; but what's a feller to do! If he catches one of my gals in the same fix, he's welcome to pay back. Somehow, I never could see no kind o' critter a strivin' and pautin', and trying to clarr themselves, with the dogs arter 'em, and go agin 'em. Besides, I don't see no kind of 'casion for me to be hunter and catcher for other folks, neither.'

"So spoke this poor, heathenish Kentuckian, who had not been instructed in his constitutional relations, and consequently was betrayed into acting in a sort of Christianized manner, which, if he had been better situated and more enlightened, he would not have been left to do.

"Haley had stood a perfectly amazed spectator of the scene, till Eliza had disappeared up the bank, when he turned a blank, inquiring look on Sam and Andy.

"'That ar was a totable fair stroke of business,' said Sam.

"'The gal's got seven devils in her, I believe,' said Haley. 'How like a wild cat she jumped!'

"'Wal, now,' said Sam, scratching his head, 'I hope mas'r 'll 'scuse us tryin' dat ar road. Don't think I feel spry enough for dat ar, no way!'

Sam gave a hoarse chuckle.

"'You laugh!' said the trader, with a growl.

"'Lord bless you, mas'r, I couldn't help it, now,' said Sam, giving way to the long pent-up delight of his soul. 'She looked so curus, a leapin' and springin'—ice a crackin'—and only to hear her—plump! ker chunk! ker splash! Spring! Lord! how she goes it!' and Sam and Andy laughed till the tears rolled down their cheeks.

"'I'll make ye laugh t'other side yer mouths!' said the trader, laying about their heads with his riding-whip.

"Both ducked, and ran shouting up the bank, and were on their horses before he was up.

"'Good evening, mas'r!' said Sam, with much gravity. 'I very much 'spect missis be anxious 'bout Jerry. Mas'r Haley won't want us no longer' Missis wouldn't hear of our riding the critters over Lizzy's bridge to-night; and, with a facetious poke into Andy's ribs, he started off, followed by the latter, at full speed—their shouts of laughter coming faintly on the wind."

The power and pathos of this would, we are certain, induce such of our readers as have not already read Uncle Tom's Cabin, to do so forthwith. But it is not detached scenes, or characters, however admirably painted or portrayed, that can convey an idea of the perfectness of this transcript of "negro life." As a whole, the philanthropist will find ample reason in the information here conveyed for putting his theories in practice; and we pray that it may rouse those who are possessed of political influence, to combine with those who write, to denounce slavery to the world, as a curse and a degradation wherever it exists. So much we in England can do; but we must look to the American abolitionists to uproot the iniquity and cast it from them. The love of gain, and the love of tyranny, and in some modified instances, the love of old habit, will of course oppose this to the death; but the spirit of freedom is gaining hourly strength throughout their immense continent; noble-minded American women, sheltered by the banner of love, and charity, and justice, which

Mrs. Stowe has unfurled, can do much—perhaps more than men—to set the captive free; they may combine to avoid all intercourse with slave-holders; they may resolve not to give their maiden hands in marriage to any who sanction slavery; they can unlash the whip and unlock the fetter; and, while exercising this power firmly and calmly within the sanctuary of their own homes, or in the wide-spread circle of their influence, they may feel assured they are among the foremost and truest patriots of whom AMERICA has ever boasted. No one who desires to see the United States respected, no one who longs to see her really enjoy the freedom, which as yet is but the disturbed dream of the bond-slave; no one, who sympathizes with the bold, onward progress with which she rushes forward in other things, but must pray—and more than that, must act the prayer—for the total abolition of slavery. And, in future times, when the mild quadron and the merry negro are free to go, and free to come—it may be as the servants, it may be as the friends, of the white man—they will teach their children to kneel and pray beside the grave of Harriet Beecher Stowe, who, in a book then perhaps faded into tradition, stood before the world as their defender, and the friend of her beloved country.

BOOKS AND THEIR AUTHORS.

Mrs. Howitt, who has long been considered one of those possessing the happy art of leading, without lecturing, children into knowledge, is conducting a magazine for the young, called The Dial of Love. Mrs. Howitt, in her graceful and natural address, says, that her Dial "will have the peculiarity of inscribing its precious and beautiful truths in sunshine; it will be calculated alike for boy and girl; for the thoughtful as well as the merry; for the poor as well as the rich. It will be useful in the school-room, and as an out-of-door companion; and the cheerful light of the flickering fireside-flame will mark its shadow indications no less truly than the broad sunshine of the field and the seashore; it will lie with the playthings, on the seat in the nursery-window, and on the bench of the child's garden, whilst its spirit will be loving and gentle and pure enough for a dial-plate, above the entrance of the temple of worship in every child's heart." The three published numbers realize the promise contained in this extract; and, judging so far of the work, we may cordially recommend it. The young will learn only what is good in these pages; they will so learn as to remember; lured on to knowledge through the pleasantest paths. The woodcut illustrations are sufficiently numerous and good; perhaps, if they were more explanatory, they might be more valuable; but we by no means complain that exuberance of fancy is here prominent, for the fault of the age is the other way. Those who know Mrs. Howitt—and they comprise a very large majority of the old and young everywhere—need not be told, that in thus superintending and directing a publication for the especial use of "boys and girls," she is sustaining another claim to their respect and affection.

LITERATURE in Paris is now in a very quiescent state. During a recent visit, we could not avoid contrasting the aspect of the walls with former appearances. Announcements of novelties of all kinds, from pens of all qualities, used to meet the eye continuously, sometimes simply appealing to the judgment of the reader by the value of the subject, or the power of the writer announced; or ingeniously and powerfully attacking his love of the novel or ridiculous. Every means that invention could attain was resorted to for attraction, and it was neither unamusing nor uninteresting to think over the means which enterprising publishers adopted, to insure notice and sale of the works in which their capital was embarked. Tired, in the end, of the "thousand and one" modes of catching your eye, and wearied with the streets of Paris, if you strolled into a theatre, you might chance to find yourself "caught again"—the curtain or drop-scene was covered with placards also, and ruthlessly fixed before your tired eyes. It would seem as if the noble art of puffery had expired with this "grand coup de théâtre;" for now we see nothing of the kind. There is a drariness, however, in its place, anything but gratifying to a reflective mind, and the sense everywhere as of something wanting. The press in France is effectually shackled, and its great writers silenced or banished. Victor Hugo, one of the greatest, is an exile on our own shores, neither his native land nor Belgium affording him a home; yet, spite of persecution, he still retains his power, which is visible even in the eager search, by the douaniers of the frontier, in every corner of the travellers' baggage, lest Napoléon-le-Petit should lurk there unobserved. To see the master-minds of a country thus crippled, alienated, or persecuted, is a really lamentable thing; this fear of the pen is but another proof of its power, a power which ever has, and ever will triumph, if not in the present, most certainly in the future. It awards justice to the good, and inflicts justice on the bad; the actions of a conqueror are as nothing without the record of the historian, and to him falls the task of fixing the character of the victor. A similar dread of the press seems, also, to be shared at present in Austria, and adds not a little to the difficulties which beset publishing houses or dealers in new books. The publishers are much restricted by the power given to the police minister to refuse copyright to any book he pleases. The dealers have to run continued risk of confiscation in the transmission of their property from place to place, inasmuch as the prohibitory index of the officials may condemn, without hope of appeal, the whole or greater part of the assignment. The discretionary power allowed these censors may induce them to prohibit, for local reasons, a book which has passed freely elsewhere; from this there is no appeal, nor is the unfortunate bookseller allowed indemnification, or permission to take back his books to his own warehouses. The whole of these stringent regulations are under the command of Field Marshal Von Kempen, of whom report speaks highly, as the most fitting man in the empire to carry them out, inasmuch as he possesses a firm conviction that the invention of printing was one of the wickedest suggestions of the Father of all Evil, and one which he is especially bound to nullify. Englishmen have reason to be proud of their "island home," on contrasting it, reflectively, with some continental countries.

NURSERY RHYMES have marvellously gained favour in the eyes of the public. We believe the first collector of these "waifs and strays" of childhood was the industrious literary antiquary of the last century, JOSEPH RITSON. His collection was, however, a small and comparatively unknown book. Mr. HALLIWELL, about ten years ago, took up the subject, and first published an enlarged and classified collection, at the expense and for the members of the Percy Society. The book was afterwards reprinted for the public, and had an immense sale. It was reproduced in America, and it occasioned similar collections in Germany. Illustrated editions were announced, resplendent in gilding and colours, and some displaying great artistic powers. We see that a fifth edition of Mr. Halliwell's gatherings is announced, in spite of the exhaustion which the subject would appear to have undergone.

The Retrospective Review, published some thirty years back, has always retained its position as a stock-book for the library—its price has never gone down—and it has been gladly consulted by all who wish for an acquaintance with the elder writers of England, whose works are rare, expensive, and confined to the costly libraries of the collectors of scarce books. Sometimes these works were of that nature, that an entire perusal would weary any but the most enthusiastic admirer of "books older;" but when apt and interesting quotation was combined with agreeable writing, and instructive comment on the author and his times, the reader never failed of gratification in reading of these by-gone masters of the pen. Hence the popularity and enduring value of the old Retrospective Review, to which the best scholars of the day contributed. Mr. J. R. SMITH has announced a New Retrospective Review, which will continue the same style of research, but will embrace a new feature in one of its departments, that of printing, for the first time, short manuscripts in Anglo-Saxon, Anglo-Norman, and Early English; and another division will be open to correspondence on literary matters. If the work exhibits a due amount of vigour and research, it will be a welcome quarterly visitor to the lover of old literature. The announcement promises well.

Mr. R. B. CALTON, author of Rambles in Sweden and Götaland, has just published a little volume of Annals and Legends of Calais, which possesses much interest, from the curious details it gives of the town which was the last possession of the English in France, and which abounds with historic mementoes. The vicinity of the dreary old city is also possessed of much to attract the lover of famous sites: between Guines and Ardres was held "the Field of the Cloth of Gold," when Henry VIII. and Francis I. met royally, feasted sumptuously, and involved themselves and their courtiers in extravagant debts. The history of the "olden time" in Calais is a curious mixture of war, pageantry, and religious celebration, during the transformation of a nest of pirates into a city of thriving merchantmen. The more modern history of the town "points a moral" in the notices of émigré notabilities, such as the Duchess of Kingston, Beau Brummell, and Lady Hamilton, who fled thence to die in poverty; the last-named was carried to her grave "with a black silk petticoat stitched on a white curtain thrown over her coffin for a pall," that grave being in "the timber-yard, just without the fortifications." There is food for interesting reflection in every page of this little book.

THERE are certain peculiarities affecting astronomical science, which render any attempt to make the study of it easy altogether impossible. It would seem that while Providence has permitted us to acquire, with comparative facility, a knowledge of what it most concerns us to know respecting the earth on which we dwell,—its construction, the laws which regulate its motion, and the times and seasons that affect its external condition,—the myteries of the heavens still remain an occult science, if the term may be allowed to be thus applied, until deep thought and much study shall bring its hidden things to the light of our mind. But the difficulties in the way of attaining this knowledge are under no circumstances so great as to deter any from its acquisition, especially with the aids which modern writers have proffered for our assistance. One of the most simple of its kind, and at the same time most comprehensive, is a little work recently published by Messrs. JARROLD and SONS, entitled A Guide to the Knowledge of the Heavens, by Mr. R. J. MANN. As it is chiefly intended for the use of schools and families, the information contained in the book is arranged by way of question and answer, and illustrated with diagrams of the heavenly bodies, and of such geometrical figures as it is necessary for the student to be acquainted with. With such help as Mr. Mann's volume affords, the pupil will find a rough path made tolerably smooth, as his thoughts travel upwards to a world of which even Newton confessed, that all he had learned only taught him how little he knew.

CHURCH HISTORY.—It may interest not a few of our readers to know that a project has been started to publish, by subscription, the writings of the principal ecclesiastical authors, from the Venerable Bede to Foxe, forming a complete Church History. It certainly does seem strange, as the prospectus which announces this design affirms, "that the people among whom religious controversy, and the affairs of their church, have always excited the deepest interest, should have exhibited hitherto such a strange deficiency in this matter." There never has been, we should think, a more fitting time than the present for the publication of a series of works of this description; now, when the most searching spirit of inquiry after truth is abroad, and the whole fabric of the religious and political constitution of our land is undergoing a thorough investigation for its better security. The writings of the ancient fathers, hitherto known, even to the learned few, only by epitomes and abstracts, are now in a fair way of being placed fully and prominently before the world; so that both priest and laity may learn on what foundations the early church of this realm was built, and how it was supported, till the Reformation cleared away the dross and rubbish time had gathered around it, and its pure and majestic principles of truth and beauty were once again developed in all their originality. The editorship of this important work has been confided to the Rev. JOSEPH STEVENSON, the author of several publications on ecclesiastical history.

SPANISH POETRY.—Considering that Spain has of late years been anything but a terra incognita to the Englishman, and also the earnestness with which our own writers are searching for the intellectual wealth possessed by other countries, it is extraordinary how little we know of the modern literature of this portion of the great European peninsula. It may be, for almost aught we find to the contrary, that the long unsettled state of Spanish politics, the dark cloud which war, revolution, and misrule cast over that fair but stricken land, has overshadowed its intelligence, and blighted the aspirations of its men of science and letters; only now and then do we gather a gleam of light, to show us there still exists some few descendants of a once numerous literary race, and some poets who have not yet hung their harps upon the willows. Messrs. LONONAN have recently published a small volume of translations, by Mr. J. KENNEDY, of the Modern Poets and Poetry of Spain, which introduces the reader to a few names whose writings are worthy of perusal. Mr. Kennedy observes, in his preface, that the last twenty years have been distinguished by a most decided improvement in the tone and character of Spanish poetry, and he is inclined to attribute this to the progress which the English language has made, during this period, among the educated classes of the country; from which they have imbibed more vigorous and manly ideas and feelings than their immediate predecessors possessed. He instances, in proof of this, that ten out of the twelve authors whom he writes of were well acquainted with our language and literature. It is also not a little singular, that the best and most popular of these poets, such as Martinez de la Rosa, Jovellanos, and Do Arriaga were statesmen, actively employed in the bustle and turmoil of political life. We could find many poems in Mr. Kennedy's translations worthy of extract, had we space for them; but we can only direct attention to his volume, as a novelty among our own literature, and accept it as a proof that the land of the Cid is not utterly deaf to the voice of song and the inspirations of the muse.

Among the many valuable books which Mr. H. G. DUNN is offering to the public in a new form, and at a cheaper rate than that at which they were originally published, we notice some of PROFESSOR HUNT's most instructive and interesting works—viz., his Elementary Physics, Poetry of Science, and his Panthea, the Spirit of Nature. These are volumes worth republishing, the offspring of a mind versed in the philosophy of nature, and susceptible of all her poetic influences.

Mr. W. H. BARTLETT, whose illustrated works on eastern countries have found so many admirers, will shortly add to his other publications—Sicily: its Scenery and its Antiquities. These latter consist chiefly of Greek, Saracenic, and Norman remains, of a most picturesque character; engravings from which, united with views of the beautiful scenery of the island, cannot fail to form an attractive volume.

Mr. GEORGE RICHARDSON PORTER, one of the secretaries of the Board of Trade, well known to the public by his admirable statistical publications, particularly by his Progress of the Nation, a work which will convey the history of the present to remote ages, has recently died. Close application to the duties of his office had induced a diseased condition of the system, and having been accidentally stung by a gnat, the little wound became the final cause of his death, at Lemsington.

THE MARRYING MAN.

A TALE FOUNDED ON FACT.

(By the Author of "Frank Fairleigh," &c. &c.)

CHAPTER I.

"Tom, I'm going ashore for a couple of hours; if the first lieutenant should forget to send a boat for me at the end of that time, invent some dodge to jog his memory, there's a good fellow. Is there anything I can do for you in the excellent and amphibious town of Portsmouth?"

"Of course there is," was my reply.

"Let me hear it, then," was the rejoinder; "quick, man, for I'm in an awful hurry."

"Aye! what, is the pretty Polly so impatient, you dare not keep her waiting for five minutes, even to oblige a friend; or do you fear a rival? There was a most fascinating bagman making the agreeable to her yesterday, when I happened to look in at the "Crown" for a bottle of soda-water. What, you won't wait? Well, then, I commission you to buy yourself, at your own expense, a pound of the best Manilla cheroots, in which case you will have a decent weed to give a friend, from time to time. Buy 'em, my dear boy; and to save your white teeth from discoloration, I'll smoke 'em for you."

But ere I had reached this point in my discourse, Charley Burrell was over the side, and a suggestion which I was about to hazard, that he should invite the port admiral to take a friendly glass of grog and a hand at cribbage in the cockpit, some fine afternoon, was lost to the world for ever.

And now, perhaps, the reader will not object to be enlightened on the important point of who Charley Burrell and "I" might happen to be. Who I was, is a question more easily than satisfactorily answered. I—ipsissimus ego—I myself, I, Tom Harrington, was the youngest son of a younger son of a 'good old county family: we had Norman blood in our veins, and "showed breed" in our forms and features; but, although we allowed pockets to be made in our unmentionables, it was merely for fashion's sake, for we never had anything to put in them. My father was one of the handsomest men I ever beheld, and, being only a younger son, held his head high, and felt proud of his family, upon the superfluities and runnings-over (to coin a word) of which he contrived to exist very comfortably; but I, being a generation worse off, was "no-ways proud," (as the old women term it,) and held my head "promiscuously," and as it pleased Providence. I had four brothers older than myself—each possessed a talent of his own, took a line of his own, and distinguished himself in that line. I, on the contrary, had no particular talent, took no line, and distinguished myself only by the facility with which I availed myself of every opportunity of getting into scrapes. Thus I became looked upon at home as the shocking example, and was sent to sea accordingly, where etatis eighteen, I found myself, on the morning when the conversation just detailed took place, midshipman of the watch on board H.M.S. Spitfire, then lying as guard-ship off Portsmouth. To detail the antecedents, or describe the social position of Charles (or, as he was more familiarly termed, Charley) Burrell, is no such easy matter, seeing that from the first moment in which I beheld him, a species of mystery appeared to hang about the man. Although Burrell is a good old name, it was impossible to identify the particular branch of the Burrells to which he belonged. When pressed on the point, he hinted, rather than declared, that he had been brought up in Ireland, where his father was possessed of large estates; and as he always appeared flush of money, no one doubted the truth of the statement, or cared to verify it. He had joined our ship about a year previous to the time of which I am writing, having obtained the appointment of second lieutenant. He had not been on board a fortnight, ere, by his fascinating appearance, polished manners, obliging disposition, and the variety and extent of his accomplishments, he had captivated all hearts. He seemed about twenty-two, possessed a tall, graceful figure, and singularly handsome features, and rejoiced in an admirable Crichton-like facility for doing everything better than anybody else. It may easily be imagined that this favourite of nature soon gained a position among his shipmates, to which any less gifted mortal would never have attained; and ere he had been six months on board, no one would have ventured to pronounce a girl pretty, a horse promising, or a bottle of wine drinkable, till Charley Burrell had established their orthodoxy by the fiat of his approval. Since he had catered for the mess, the wine-merchant was besieged for the same port with which he supplied the Spitfire. The steeple chase he got up became memorable in the annals of sporting, for, although all the horses were ridden by naval officers, only three out of eight came in minus their riders. Then, as to women, every one acknowledged that Mary, the "only daughter" of mine host of the "Crown," was by long odds the prettiest girl in Portsmouth; and if Mary had not lost her heart to Charley Burrell, why she was the most arrant little coquette who ever trod prunella, that's certain.

"Tom! Harrington! Tom, I say! where the — Oh, there you are. Here's the first lieutenant been singing out for you, and swearing like a whole regiment of troopers, because he can't find you," and the speaker, Fred Onslow, a fine, spirited little fellow of thirteen, a particular friend and protégé of mine, rushed into the cockpit so hastily, that, catching his foot against the door-sill, he would have fallen headlong, had not I extended my arm, and caught him. The situation was essentially melo-dramatic, and, flinging myself into a tragic attitude, I availed myself of it, by apostrophising an imaginary long-lost brother, when the urgent voice of the first lieutenant reached my ear, "breathing my name" in tones which proved that he was not in a mood to be trifled with.

"The boat sent for Mr. Burrell has waited for him an hour, and he had not arrived, so the cockswain returned without him. You know as well as any one where he is likely to be found, Mr. Harrington: take the gig, and, if he is in Portsmouth, bring him off with you. Tell him to consider himself under arrest, for neglect of duty."

Having thus spoken, the first lieutenant, who, in the captain's absence, was really a terrific personage, resumed his promenade up and down the quarter-dock, with the air and gait of an hungry tiger. I did know where I conceived Burrell would probably be found; but in vain did I search Portsmouth through, there apparently he was not; he had not visited any of his usual haunts, even the pretty Mary denied having set eyes on him that morning. At last, a half-tipsy hostler deposed to having seen somebody, whom he took for Mr. Burrell, on the top of one of the London coaches, but if so, "he had been and altered himself some-ways." And with this scanty and unsatisfactory information I was obliged to return, and make my report to the first lieutenant, who received it with a most diabolical expression of countenance; but he was an awful man, was that lieutenant, at least, when the captain was not on board.

Well, there was a pretty shindy made about poor Charley's disappearance: the captain went bodily to London to look after him—all kinds of traps were laid to catch him—even a reward was offered for his apprehension—but in vain; and at length a report was circulated, and pretty generally believed, that he had been seen dressed like a common sailor, with his whiskers shaved off, and a carrotty wig on, serving before the mast in a vessel bound for America. One thing only was certain,—Charley Burrell had bolted.

The next question was—why or wherefore he had done so? An answer was quickly forthcoming. No sooner had the news become generally known through Portsmouth, than bills innumerable poured in; not only "little accounts," private and personal, but unfortunately debts for wine he had supplied to the mess, for the payment whereof he had months ago received the money. The result may be easily imagined—a court-martial was called, and poor Charley ignominiously dismissed the service. Popular as he once was, men now vied with each other in abusing him. Still there were some three or four of us, (myself among the number,) who could not so easily forget our friendship, and, in spite of appearances, hoped against hope that some explanation would be found for his extraordinary conduct, without reducing us to the unpleasant necessity of admitting that, for more than a year, we had been the facile dupes of an accomplished swindler.

On calling to inquire how Mary had borne the desertion of her lover, I was informed that the hot weather had disagreed with her, and that she had gone to stay with her aunt in the country, to recruit her energies. For at least three weeks nothing was talked of but the "mysterious disappearance" of Charley Burrell, at the expiration of which period, somebody else's cow died, and the affair was forgotten.

As it is not my intention to write my life, but merely to relate so much of it as is necessarily involved in following the career of Charles Burrell, the Marrying Man, I will skip over the next two years, and beg the reader to imagine me at the age of twenty, highly elated at finding myself a lieutenant, and waiting in London while some of my influential relatives used their interest to get me appointed to a ship. Loitering down Bond-street, one sunny afternoon, my attention was attracted by the splendid action of an unusually fine horse, the taste and finish of a remarkably stylish cab, and the thoroughly workman-like appearance of the whole turn-out. To my surprise, no sooner did a fashionable-looking young fellow who was driving it catch sight of me, than a pair of lemon-coloured kid gloves pulled up the splendid horse with a jerk so sudden as to throw him on his haunches, while a voice that sounded familiar to my ear exclaimed, "Tom Harrington, by all that's wonderful!" and on looking up, I immediately recognised in the speaker, my former friend and associate, Charles Burrell, the runaway ex-lieutenant of the Spitfire. Although the moment I caught his bright sparkling eye, and recognised his joyous devil-may-care smile, I felt something of my old regard stealing over me, I considered it due to my own dignity to resent, what I could not but consider, the impertinent familiarity of his address. A man who had lost his character, and bolted with a considerable amount of money belonging to the mess funds in his pocket, had no right to consider himself fit company even for such a very youngest son as I was. So I merely raised my hat with Grandisonian politeness, and was about to pass on; but Charley was too cool a hand to be shaken off so easily.

"Very grand and dignified, indeed," he said, laughingly; "but, my dear boy, it won't do. Ever since I came into my fortune, and stood right with the world again, I've been wanting to run against one of the old Spitfires, and now chance has thrown you in my way, and I'm not going to let you escape me. Come, jump in, man; don't you see the horse is tired of standing?"

At the beginning of this speech, my mind was quite made up to persevere in my coolness, and to resist any overtures towards the renewal of our acquaintanceship; but, somehow, Charley had a way with him which rendered it so disagreeable to say "No," that, in fact, it became next to impossible to do so. It is lucky he never tried to persuade me to rob a bank, or pillage a church, for I fully believe I should have done it. At all events, I know that on the occasion in question I was seated by his side, and dashing along Bond-street at the rate of twelve miles an hour, almost before he had done speaking.

"And so you all set me down as a swindler, and the old fools on the court-martial actually dismissed me the service, because I happened to have a run of ill-luck, which my purse was not long enough to bear up against, eh? Well, they only saved me the trouble of resigning my commission, which I certainly should have done, when my jolly old uncle in India died, and left me his heir. Handling tarry ropes becomes slow work when one can spend £5000 a year on shore, and yet not consider oneself extravagant. But, as I see you're in a hurry now, dine with me quietly at Morelli's, in the Haymarket, at half-past seven, and I'll tell you all about it, over a bottle of real Chateau Margaux." And, so saying, Charley set me down within a stone's throw of the Admiralty, very angry with myself that I had not been able to muster sufficient presence of mind to refuse his singularly impertinent invitation. As I had not refused it, however, go I must, and go I did, although my joy at finding, on my return to my hotel to dress for dinner, an official letter, appointing me first lieutenant of the good ship Cassandra, put me in such a celestial frame of mind, that I could have feasted with Duke Humphrey, or the Barbecue, or even Sancho Panza, in Barrataria, without complaining of the fare.

The veriest epicure who ever adored turtle, however, could not have complained of the dinner Charley Burrell had provided for my entertainment:—on the contrary, one only felt ashamed that two men who could have dined off a couple of pounds of beef-steak, and a quart of porter, should have had such a banquet set before them.

After the second bottle of claret made its appearance, Charley, who had previously rendered himself especially agreeable on the general topics of the day, began—"And now, Tom, my boy, I will tell you (always supposing you find the subject sufficiently interesting to wish to hear the truth about it) why I astonished the good people of Portsmouth, by making myself scarce upon such short notice—what has befallen me since—and how, if tomorrow comes, and finds me alive and jolly, I intend to employ it."

Of course I expressed my eagerness to hear his explanation, and he continued.

"The fact is, that when I first joined the Spitfire, I went the pace a great deal too fast; but I believed my governor would help me if I got into any scrape, and I trusted to luck to bring me right again. I did pretty well till that confounded steeple-chase; but on that I lost, from first to last, about £1000. Just at that time I received the money for the mess-bills, and as I knew that the tradesmen would wait, and the blacklegs wouldn't, I applied the aforesaid tin to satisfy the more clamorous ones, fully believing that I should be able to replace it when necessary. Whether the captain grow suspicious of me, or what, I can't tell; but he suddenly desired me to make up my accounts, and send them in by a certain day. I instantly wrote to my father, telling him the scrape I was in, and begging him to send me a cheque for £800. My return of post came a letter from his lawyer, informing me that, owing to the failure of one of the great houses connected with the India trade, my father was a ruined man, and that his liabilities were so heavy, that, by his friends' advice, he had determined to keep out of the way till some arrangement should be entered into with his creditors. Well, you may suppose this news, coming at such a time, drove me nearly frantic; and, as a last chance, I rushed to the gaming-table, played for the full amount of my debts, and—lost! I gave an I.O.U., payable next day, for the money, and resolved, before it should be due, to blow my brains out. Accordingly, I came on shore, with a brace of pistols ready loaded in my pocket, and betook myself to the "Crown," meaning to write something between a will and a last dying speech and confession, and then shoot myself. Little Mary brought me pens and paper, and, somehow—(I suppose by a woman's instinct of affection, for the poor girl was desperately fond of me)—she guessed my purpose, and would not leave me till she had obtained my promise not to attempt my life. Having yielded to her persuasions, there was nothing for it but to decamp. Accordingly, disguised as a common sailor, I found my way to London, where I contrived to elude the search made for me. How I lived for the next year and a half, I can scarcely tell you; at times I was no stranger either to cold or hunger, and have gone out in the morning without a farthing in my pocket, or the slightest idea whither to direct my steps. But when things got to the worst, they're sure to mend; so just as I was beginning to lose my last possessions—health and strength—old nuns, in India, who was always an intolerable bore when living, very obligingly died, and from a beggar I awoke one fine morning to find myself rather a millionaire than otherwise. The first thing I did was, as you may guess, to make it all right in regard to the Spitfire 'defalcation,' as the old fogies on the court-martial had the impertinence to call it. And, now, what do you think I am going to be after to-morrow?"

"Get married, perhaps," returned I, naming the most improbable thing that came into my head.

"Right, by Jove! Edipus himself could not have hit it nearer. Yes, my boy, I'm going to do what most people will call a very foolish thing—I'm going to marry little Mary, daughter to mine host of the "Crown;" but she's as good and as pretty a girl as ever lived. She's saved my life; she's remained constant to me through all my troubles; she cares more for me than any one else ever did, or ever will; so people may say what they please, I'm independent of everybody, and marry her I will."

"Your determination does you credit," replied I, grasping his hand, and shaking it warmly. "Charley, old fellow, you're a brick, and I beg your pardon for ever having been induced to think otherwise of you."

"Say you so, man!" exclaimed Burrell, eagerly, "then you shall come and see me spliced; and if you don't say the champagne at breakfast is the best you ever tasted, why I don't know good wine from bad, that's all."

I took him at his word, and a gay and happy wedding it proved. The wine was super-excellent; but a handsomer couple than Charley Burrell and his bright-smiling, blushing, little wife, could seldom have been found amidst all the rank and fashion who take each other for better for worse beneath the lofty dome of St. George's, Hanover-square.

CHAPTER II.

FIVE years had elapsed since the morning on which I had drunk more champagne than was by any means prudent, at Charley Burrell's wedding breakfast, and the giver of the feast I had not encountered since. Having, like Lord Bateman, of lyrical celebrity, "sailed east and sailed west"—having been done exceedingly brown by the sun and the slave-dealers off the coast of Guinea, and been put out to cool in the vicinity of Greenland's icy mountains—having, like the pious Æneas, been "considerably tossed about, both by land and sea," and in short experienced the usual vicissitudes of a sailor's life, I now found myself appointed first lieutenant of the good ship Atalanta, refitting at Portsmouth, preparatory to her departure to join the admiral, then cruising off Malta. Of course, as the operation of taking in her stores was not completed, I was obliged to be almost constantly on board; but the little time I spent on shore I made the "Crown" my head-quarters. One of the first questions I asked mine host was concerning the welfare of his daughter and her husband.

The worthy man shook his head. "Mary is well enough," he said; "she lives in a little cottage, just outside the town, and I generally contrive to spend my evenings with her; it is better for me than being tempted to exceed my one glass of grog, as I often did at home; and it cheers Mary, poor thing, to have even her old father to gossip with a bit."

"Why, how is that, then," I inquired; "does not her husband live with her?"

"Ah! that turned out a bad business," was the reply; "I never approved of the match; she'd better have married some honest young fellow in her own rank of life; but, woman-like, she was so taken with Mr. Burrell's handsome face and dashing manner, that she would not so much as look at any other man. But I expect she sees her error now, though even yet I believe she's very fond of him."

"Well, but what has Burrell done to forfeit her good opinion?" asked I, impatiently, wearied by the worthy man's prolixity.

"He has done this, sir; he has won my poor girl's affections, bound himself to her by the solemn tie of matrimony, and then first, neglected, and finally, deserted her. He has not been heard of in Portsmouth for the last three years, and it's my belief he has left the country, for good and all."

"But what has become of the fortune he received from his uncle in India?" I inquired.

The innkeeper smiled. "He was a first-rate liar, I will say that for him," he resumed; "he'd got such an easy, off-hand way of saying things, that people couldn't help believing him. Why, bless you, Mr. Harrington, he'd no more a fortune left him than you had."

"Then I wish he'd teach me the secret of living, as if he were Dives himself, without one," rejoined I.

"You would not make use of it, if he did, sir," was the reply. "I've learned the truth of a good many of his goings on since I saw you last. When he first cut away from here, afore the court-martial, he hadn't a sixpence in the world."

"So he told me," interrupted I.

"Aye, but he didn't tell you that when he got to London he went as a billiard-marker, and by his cleverness, and a little cheating, whenever he could manage it without being found out, contrived to scrape together money enough to take a share in a fashionable gaming-house, where he grew rich on the ruin of better men than himself. He didn't tell you that, did he?"

My companion then proceeded to relate various minutiae in the career of Charles Burrell, which certainly threw discredit on the story of the Indian uncle; but when one came to sift the evidence, there was always a link wanting to enable one to fix the accusation unmistakably. A person like Charles Burrell was seen several times acting as croupier, and eventually as dealer, in a notorious gambling-house. Times and seasons suited, but still there was always room for a doubt; it might not have been him. Certain facts, however, were indisputable. For the first six months after his marriage he lived quietly and peaceably with his wife, at the cottage Mary still occupied. At the expiration of that period, a letter arrived, which, as he said, required his presence in London; and from that time his absences became more and more frequent and prolonged, till at length he stayed away altogether. Mary's letters were returned unopened, and for three years she had neither seen him nor heard of, or from him.

This account of my quondam friend grieved and annoyed me; but so strong was the fascination he had exercised over me, that I could not help hoping against hope, that partiality to his daughter might have prejudiced the good innkeeper against his son-in-law, and that even yet, Charley would turn out not to be so black as he was painted; with which vague and not particularly well-founded expectation I was fain to content myself.

When her preparations were completed, the Atalanta sailed, and in due course of time reached Malta in safety; thence we were dispatched to cruise off the coast of Turkey, and look out for pirates at the entrance to the Dardanelles. We had been on this station about three weeks, and were lying off one of the smaller Turkish ports, the name of which has escaped my memory, when, one morning, we perceived a boat from the shore approaching us, with an individual in the stern who looked like, and proved to be, a clerk in a public office. He was the bearer of a letter to our captain, from the English consul. The captain of the Atalanta was a man younger than myself; but, having the good fortune to be nephew to a cabinet minister, he found himself captain of a frigate at the age of twenty, while I, five years his senior, was still a lieutenant. Probably, from a latent consciousness of his youth and inexperience, which he studiously concealed by an affectation of remarkable and superfluous decision of character, he did me the honour of consulting me in all cases of difficulty. Accordingly, on the present occasion, he had not been closeted more than ten minutes with the young official, before I received a summons to attend him.

"Sit down, Mr. Harrington; I have just received a communication from Mr. —, the consul, informing me that an English subject having become involved in a quarrel with a French employé of the Turkish government, a duel has been the consequence. They fought this morning, on the sands below the town, and the Frenchman was mortally wounded. The Turkish authorities immediately seized the Englishman; and, as by their law such an offence as he has committed constitutes a capital crime, he is to be executed outside the town to-morrow morning. Mr. — has used every means in his power to obtain a commutation of the punishment, but without success; and in his position he dare not interfere further. The Englishman, it appears, is a young fellow of good family and fortune, and Mr. — is naturally deeply interested for him; he therefore writes to me to say, that if by any chance I should be disposed, on my own responsibility, to send a boat's crew on shore an hour after midnight, he will take care that the prisoner shall have an opportunity afforded him to escape and join them, come on board, and before daybreak to-morrow, find twenty miles of blue water between himself and the fatal bowstring. Of course, I have at once made up my mind how to act; there can be but one opinion on the subject. You see the matter in this light, Mr. Harrington, do you not?"

Too well accustomed to the captain's habits to indulge even in a smile at the tact with which he thus, without committing himself, sought to draw out my opinion, I replied, gravely, "I perfectly agree with you, Captain Flexmore; the rules of the service, and the common dictates of humanity, alike require you to send the boat."

"Of course, of course," was the quick rejoinder, "there can be no doubt about it; only, as the affair is somewhat out of the common routine, and one which may hereafter be called in question, it is a satisfaction to me to find that your opinion so entirely coincides with my own. I will write to inform Mr. — that the boat shall be in readiness, waiting, an hour after midnight, at the point he mentions; and as, if anything should go wrong, some judgment may be required, I shall feel obliged by your taking charge of the expedition in person." I, of course, expressed my perfect readiness to do so, and the conference ended.

Five minutes before the time appointed, I sat, wrapped in a dark cloak, in the stern-sheets of the boat, which, manned by a dozen well-armed seamen, rose and fell with the ripple of the water, within an oar's length of the small rocky landing-place named in Mr. —'s letter as the point of rendezvous.

The moon was low, but afforded sufficient light to enable one to discern the outline, though not the colouring, of objects in the immediate vicinity. After waiting till some minutes past the time, anxiously listening for the slightest sound which might indicate that the prisoner had succeeded in effecting his escape, I grew fearful that the scheme had in some way transpired, and that the authorities had adopted measures to frustrate it, and was just considering what steps it would behove me to take in such a conjuncture, when the flash and sharp reports of a couple of muskets startled me from my meditations, whilst almost at the same moment a figure emerged from the gloom, and, dashing hastily forward, exclaimed, in tones which even then sounded familiar to my ear, "Boat, a-hoy! are you the Atalantas?" And, as I returned an affirmative answer to the hail, the speaker jumped on board, almost before the boat's prow touched the shore, with an ease and savoir faire which proved that he was well accustomed to the water.

"Give way, my lads," exclaimed the stranger, as the men took to their oars; give way with a will; those confounded musket-shots will alarm the town; we shall have the whole swarm turning out directly, and a stray bullet might pick off one of us; I should be sorry if any one got hurt on my account." He removed his hat, and examined it by the light of a dark-lantern I had with me. "A near thing, lieutenant," he said, directing my attention to a hole by which a bullet must have entered, and passed through the hat. "If I'd been one of your long-headed fellows, now, I should have had half an ounce of lead in my brains by this time: this is the third shot I've had fired at me in less than four and twenty hours; so it's not my fate to be food for gunpowder, I suppose."

"No; you're reserved for a more exalted destiny, probably, Charley, my friend, though you've contrived to cheat the gallows, too, this time," replied I, who, during the former speech, had made up my mind that the illustrious stranger, was no stranger at all to me.

"Charley, eh?" repeated my companion, in surprise; "your acquaintance with my name, and the appropriate sentiment with which you accompanied the mention of it, convinces me that you know me; but it's so confoundedly dark that I can't recognize your features. Who is it that I have the pleasure of thanking for my deliverance from, not the gallows, as you so obligingly hinted, or, at all events, only a Turkish version of it, the bowstring? Ah! I thought so."

While this conversation had been going on, lights had been flitting about the town in all directions; and after more bustle and confusion than would have accompanied the arousing and arming a couple of battalions of English troops, some dozen Turkish soldiers came running pell-mell down to the landing-place, and perceiving the boat, which was not yet out of reach of shot, commenced an irregular and, fortunately for us, badly-directed fire upon it. One of the first shots discharged, however, unluckily struck the arm of the cockswain, who was pulling stroke-oar, and disabled him. Charles Burrell (the reader has of course guessed that he it was, and none other), however, caught the oar as it was falling from the man's hand, and taking his place, pulled away lustily, till we had the satisfaction of seeing the bullets fall short of us at each report.

"You may take it more coolly now," observed I; "no shot has reached us for the last minute and a half;—your arm's not broken, I hope, Evans?"

"All right, sir; it's only knocked off part of the sheathing, and cut through some of the running gear, so that my fingers don't act altogether so ship-shape as they used to did."

"Never mind, my man," was Burrell's reply; "I'll splice it for you with a ten-pound note, as soon as we get on board the Atalanta. Those Turkish scamps luckily missed my pocket-book, when they took my traps from me."

On reaching the ship, which we accomplished without further mischance, Burrell, who appeared, as usual, full of money, was as good as his word, for, having obtained Captain Flexmore's permission, he not only gave the wounded cockswain a ten-pound note, but tipped all the boat's crew a guinea each. The moment he recognized me, he, with his usual sang-froid, plunged at once into terms of the closest intimacy, "old-fellowing" and "Tom-my-boying" me at every second sentence he uttered; nor could I, unless I had chosen actually to pick a quarrel with him, do anything to repel his advances. He had not been on board twelve hours ere he became hand and glove with Captain Flexmore; so that, when at last I found an opportunity to relate to that gallant officer my previous knowledge of his guest, nothing I could say would induce him to regard Charley Burrell in any other light save that of an injured innocent; and he boldly declared his intention, the moment he returned to England, to apply to his uncle to institute an inquiry, and have the iniquitous decision of the court-martial reversed, as it was a scandalous shame that such a fine young fellow as Burrell should be lost to the profession, because a crew of old women could not make allowance for a man getting into a scrape. And perceiving that this frame of mind was stereotyped, (for the captain continued in it quite a week,) I ceased to attempt to alter it. Charley certainly was a genius in his way. Before he had been three days on board, he had related a most interesting romance (in every sense of the word) to account for his duel with the Frenchman, in which the interior of a harem and a lovely Greek captive were the prominent features; while for my private ear he had prepared a statement refuting the scandal of the gaming-house episode, establishing the deceased Indian uncle as a great fact, and accounting satisfactorily for his desertion of Mary; to the whole of which narrative he contrived to impart such an air of veracity that I actually gave it credit, and believed, with Captain Flexmore, that he was the victim of appearances.

After Burrell had cruised with us about a week, we fell in with a vessel bound for England, on board of which he secured a passage, and so departed, bearing with him a whole harvest of golden opinions.

As the Atalanta continued on the same station for some weeks longer, I one day obtained leave to go ashore, and dine with a wealthy Greek merchant, to whom I had brought letters of introduction. The old gentleman received me most courteously, mounted me on a mule almost as fat as himself, and took me to see the lions of the neighbourhood, including the ruins of a temple, with all the antecedents of which he expected me to be acquainted, "because the English were such excellent classics," and the site of an ancient battle-field, where, for the same reason, he begged me to point out to him the exact position occupied by each several phalanx—all of which, considering that I could not with a safe conscience have deposed on oath that I had so much as heard the name of either temple or battle before, I flatter myself I accomplished very creditably, my observations tending to exalt, rather than depreciate, the old gentleman's preconceived idea regarding the classicality of an English education.

At dinner, the agrémens of the affair were greatly enhanced by the presence of two very lovely girls, the old Greek's daughters—my attentions being pretty equally divided between the interesting Sophronia, who sat on my right hand, and she, if possible, still more interesting Zoe, who was placed as my vis-à-vis.

vis. The meal passed off most pleasantly, the wines being as good as the young ladies were pretty, until I arrived at a frame of mind in which I felt quite capable of pitching my hospitable entertainer out of his own window, and availing myself of the catastrophe to make double-barrelled love to both his fair daughters at one and the same time.

I am happy to say I restrained the impulse, and merely endeavoured to look my admiration; although, so completely was my mind filled with the lovely objects before me, that, when the young ladies retired, I could not, for the life of me, think of any other remark to address to my host than what a fortunate papa he was, to possess two such beautiful daughters—so I actually went the length of saying it. Moreover, it answered very well, for the old gentleman chuckled, rubbed his hands, and seemed highly pleased with the compliment.

"And which do you admire most?" he inquired, as he filled his own glass, and passed me the bottle.

"Where both are so lovely, it is difficult to decide," replied I, meditatively; "but if I must pronounce an opinion, I think the young lady who sat opposite me is perhaps the most faultless in profile."

"Yes," was the reply, "Zoe's is the higher style of beauty; but you must not lose your heart to her, Mr. Harrington, for she is already married to a countryman of yours, a young Englishman, of high birth and large fortune."

"Indeed!" replied I, with a slight start of annoyance, for, entre nous, dear reader, Zoe was the one at whom I had chiefly been "making eyes," with, as I hoped, no inconsiderable effect. "Indeed; he is a lucky dog, whoever he may be."

"He is, or rather was, in your profession," was the rejoinder; "but he quitted it when he had obtained the rank of post captain. He came here, about two years since, with letters of introduction to me from my London agent, and fell so desperately in love with Zoe, while, at the same time, he grew so delighted with our mode of life, that he became a suitor for my daughter's hand, and promised, if I would bestow her upon him, to give up his own country, and to reside here for the future. They have been married above six months, and he has now returned to England to sell his estates, intending to embark a large portion of his capital in my business, in which he will become a partner."

"And a very sensible thing to do, too! I only wish I were able to follow his example, and try my luck with Miss Sophronia. May I ask," continued I—little anticipating the answer I was about to receive—"may I ask the name of this favoured individual?"

"Certainly," was the reply; "the name of my excellent son-in-law is Mr. Charles Burrell."

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

DEATH has done his work among us! A great victim has fallen! The Duke of Wellington is no more!

That we should have to record this event before very long, we were prepared for. That it did not happen sooner, was one of the many wonders of that wonderful man's career. As far back as 1839, his constitution was supposed to be so utterly broken down, by repeated shocks of illness, that nothing could prolong his existence beyond a few years, or the use of his faculties till the morrow: yet thirteen years have passed over, and still the annual gathering of heroes has been renewed under his presiding auspices, and the British peers have listened with reverence to his voice in debate on questions of the highest import, and he has been ready and able to buckle on his sword to the last, and do good service in defence of his country's interest and honour.

The final hour, however, is come—he is dead! From a thousand churches the bells toll their solemn knell over the departed; and cannon from a thousand bastions and batteries boom forth the death-note of the hero; and the flags on a thousand ships float half-mast high; and crape wraps the colours of the brave, wherever the British ensign is unfurled; and at his post the lonely sentinel, that humblest representative of the system of war, brushes away a tear—his tribute to the memory of the captain he revered; and in the minister's gloom the banner of knighthood droops, and the casque and the falchion are wreathed with funeral emblems, for the pride of chivalry is departed. And, in the secret conclave of many a hostile power, a gleam of exultation darts to light up malignant eyes, for the spell of that name which kept envious and conspiring Europe in awe is broken, and the enemy thinks he may venture once more to look a British battle-front in the face. The empty pomp and procession to the tomb is all that now remains—the plumed hearse, and the muffled drum, and the war-horse, and the spurs, and the sword—the sword that conquered the conqueror of the world: for the hero of an hundred fights and an hundred victories lies low—low as the lowest of his enemies, as the earliest companions of his arms—in the dust; and we feel, and the world feels, that the greatest of soldiers is no more.

But all this—and it is much—would not have stirred the deep feelings of our hearts, and urged us to our task with the ardour we feel, like the thought—the exulting thought, which adds poignancy to our grief, and enthusiasm to our eulogy—that Wellington, warrior as he was, was the great PACIFICATOR of the world, the man who, under Almighty God, gave to Europe that glad and golden interval of peace, within which our national liberties had time to be ripened, our popular institutions matured, and our social system humanized; during which the wealth and prosperity of the empire was consolidated, and scope given for the arts we cultivate and appreciate to grow up and flourish, and—we would fain believe—strike root into the soil of society, too deeply to be again permanently displaced by the brute ferocity of a returning military age.

Yes, Britons! we have lost a hero indeed!—a hero, as boundlessly superior to the soldier he conquered, as fortitude, honour, heroism, and moderation must ever be to ambition, pride, selfishness, and cruelty. To compare the genius of Wellington with that of Napoleon is absurd; probably no man ever lived combining the same diversified, and apparently opposite qualities of mind, as Bonaparte. This peculiarity it is, which, while it explains the amazing resources of his policy, likewise forms the truest point of distinction between him and Wellington. In the latter, was displayed as remarkable a singleness of character and purpose, as in his rival a diversity of both. The only point on which Napoleon was at unity with himself was ambition. But as ambition is a march and not a goal—in which the road is indifferent, if only progress be made along it—so the emperor's meteoric career was as aimless and headlong as it was dazzling. He rushed forward, he knew not and cared not whither, so that in his way he trampled upon the liberties of nations, and decked himself with their spoils. Behold, on the other hand, in the mighty dead before us, the embodiment of the opposite quality. To humble the enemy of Britain and of Europe, to cripple his power at every accessible point, no matter how remote, or how apparently insignificant—in short, to follow out the great conceptions of Nelson, and complete by land what was by that hero begun upon the ocean—and to pause when those objects were accomplished—such was Wellington's policy, from the moment he first set foot in Portugal invested with the independent command of our armies, to that in which, at La Belle Alliance, he resigned the pursuit of the imperial armies he had routed to the Prussian commander.

We do not shrink from saying, that it was the least of Wellington's merits that he was a great general—though even his enemies admit he was that. His distinguishing praise is that he never for a moment sacrificed the citizen to the soldier, or forgot, in the height of his most crowning triumphs, that he was the servant of his king and country, fighting battles not for himself, but for them; and reaping laurels whereof the richest boughs should adorn the statue of British liberty, while only what the nation could spare should be appropriated to himself. His whole career was an illustration of this honest citizenship of his. Amidst the seductions of success, his penetrating glance still darted through the ranks of his enemies towards the peace which lay beyond, and he fought for that, as other men fight for conquest, triumph, glory. The peace he sought, moreover, was no extravagant or chimerical one, to ensue upon the annihilation of our enemies, and the acquisition of the power and possessions they had lost. The war as waged by him was, even when it seemed most aggressive, purely a patriotic one, and not more truly did the Archduke Charles act upon the defensive when he drew up the Austrian army upon the field of Wagram, than did Wellington in driving Soult in confusion across the frontiers of Spain into France. To fight for peace is the most glorious of warfares; it is, in fact, the only one upon which the soldier and nation may safely invoke the blessing of God. 'His glory was Wellington's.

We have neither space nor inclination to offer a memoir of the departed Duke. Information of this kind the public has had on every side; and no doubt extended and detailed biographies will satisfy the world's curiosity upon the subject before long. Still less is it our design to enter upon an examination of his military talents, either in the way of comparison, or upon their positive merits. But it seems due to the dead hero and his surviving fame, to remind the reader of some circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration, in forming a final estimate of what he had to do, and what he did.

When, in 1809, Sir Arthur Wellesley proceeded to Lisbon, charged with the mission by his courage and prudence to repair the disasters of the British arms, certain and peculiar difficulties met him at the outset. The successes of the revolutionary armies, and afterwards of Napoleon and his generals, had gradually given a colour of plausibility to the idea which the French themselves industriously fostered, that the power of France on land was irresistible, and that all operations were hopeless against troops who had the God of Battles so manifestly on their side. On the other hand, although a degree of éclat had attached already to the name of Wellesley, both in India and in the Peninsula, the general opinion of Europe, and more especially of England itself, was strongly against the efficiency of our land forces; with which—the popular idea was—it was absolutely ridiculous to attempt to face the victorious soldiers of the Empire during any continuous operations. And there seemed grounds for this opinion, first in the retreat of the Duke of York, and now, more recently, in the disastrous affair of Corunna, and the discomfiture of Sir John Moore's army. In short, all the influences of prestige, as it is called, which had so materially favoured Nelson in those adventurous and hazardous exploits of his upon the sea, were against us on land. And no one who knows what effect character has upon masses of men will be inclined to slight or undervalue these influences, acting upon the physique as well as the morale of our troops.

Again: Wellington entered Portugal not so much as an independent power as an ally. He was obliged, if not to take orders from the Portuguese Junta, to co-operate with it; which meant to operate, with the embarrassment of its thwarting, vexatious, vacillating, and treacherous policy to impede him. And this counteracting influence of so-called allies hung upon him ever afterwards—through Spain, and even to the field of Waterloo, where his dispositions were all but neutralized by the shameful apathy, or cowardice, of a considerable portion of his force—that portion being the allies. At the commencement of the Peninsular war, had he possessed the advantage of an army unshackled by assistance of this kind, and free to operate in the country according to his own ideas of what would be most detrimental to the enemy, and advantageous to himself, his task would have been an easier one, though not more glorious; for, as these difficulties accumulated around him, and he became more and more convinced that the settlement of affairs was further off than was generally supposed, he came to a coterminous determination that no human power should induce him to relinquish the advantages he had already secured, or forego the object he had originally in view, in undertaking his command;—thus bringing into prominent and early relief those qualities that were so conspicuous afterwards, and alone enabled him to realise, at length, and after various vicissitudes, hopes which would have been chimerical had they been indulged by any one else, or on any other grounds than they were.

But there was another paralyzing influence at work at the opening of the Peninsular operations, which struck at the very root of the efficiency of the British army, and bid fair to neutralize all its efforts: this was the financial condition of England at the time. As the historian of the Peninsular war remarks:—"Her enormous debt was yearly increasing in an accelerated ratio; and the necessary consequence of anticipating the resources of the country, and dealing in a fictitious currency, was fast eating into the vital strength of the state; for, although the merchants and great manufacturers were thriving from the accidental circumstances of the times, the labourers were suffering and degenerating in character; pauperism, and its sure attendant, crime, were spreading over the land, and its population was fast splitting into distinct classes—the one, rich and arbitrary: the other, poor and discontented; the former composed of those who profited, the latter of those who suffered by the war."

How this state of things operated upon Sir Arthur Wellesley's army is well known. In 1809, the British force was expected, in conjunction with the weak and undisciplined troops of the country, to accomplish the deliverance of Portugal, and ultimately of Spain, from the French, whose force in those kingdoms approached 300,000 men—this army of ours numbering barely 22,000 effective men, "weak in everything but spirit; the commissariat without sufficient means of transport; the soldiers nearly barefooted, and totally without pay; the military-chest empty, and the hospitals full!"

The condition of this handful of men as to supplies is thus further described by Sir Arthur Wellesley himself, in a letter to Lord Castlereagh:—"It was, and is, impossible for us to move without money: not only are the officers and soldiers in the greatest distress, and the want of money the cause of many of the disorders of which I have had occasion to complain, but we can no longer obtain the supplies of the country, or command its resources for the transport of our own supplies, either by land or by water." This is bad enough; but the letter to the Marquis Wellesley, of the 30th of October, presents a yet more deplorable picture of the privations of the British army, or rather, yet more striking evidence of the crippling of its resources as an invading power, in consequence of such privations; for the difficulties resulted in this.

Now, look at the state of financial affairs in France at the same period. Notwithstanding the vast expenses of two great wars, the resources of the Empire were fully equal to its emergencies. The budget, no doubt, which had been 720 millions, was raised to 800 millions and more. But the income of the treasury was obtained with extreme facility, the caisse de service abounded in money, and taxation was not overwhelming, while the currency was a sound metallic one. The magazines at Perpignan, Toulouse, and Bayonne were supplied with vast stores of matériel, including all those comforts which, we have seen, the British soldier was without; and accordingly the French troops presented at that period a contrast to ours so striking, as could not fail to provoke the comments of the nation that witnessed it.

Thus, neither money nor men were wanting to this war. The intrusive king, Joseph, was guided by the counsels of his imperial brother; and, although that brother urged him to apply the resources of Spain in its defence to the uttermost, he was always prepared to make good any deficiency, rather than that the masses there in operation should lose anything of their effective strength.

Here, then, is surely a sufficiently remarkable contrast in the condition of the hostile powers, at and towards the commencement of the Peninsular war. It must not, indeed, be overlooked that the British leader had, to aid him, an intense national feeling on the part of the population of both countries, which led them to lend, by means of the Partidas system, or guerilla warfare, much of that co-operation they were utterly unable to afford with effect in the open field; but this assistance, important as it no doubt was, did not become available at the commencement of the war, and could not possibly have been anticipated. It only affords another proof that the strong resolution to succeed under difficulties will have its effect, sooner or later, in raising up means for itself, and developing powers around it, which would never have sprung into existence but for the invigorating and inspiring example of its own heroism.

● But there is a final reflection, which the contemplation of our position in Spain at this period necessarily suggests, and which has reference rather to a fixed law of political dynamics, than to anything peculiar in the circumstances of the time, or the characters of those engaged in the important events then going forward. A country, if it be blessed with freedom, has something to pay for the blessing; while, on the other hand, if a country be cursed with slavery, it enjoys one or two alleviating advantages growing out of its condition. No government is so strong as a military despotism; that is, in no form of government can the whole power of the state be brought so fully to bear upon any particular object. Napoleon possessed this advantage over every one of his enemies, except Russia, that he, as an individual, fought against constitutions. In the case of England, the contrast was the strongest of all. In her, a responsible ministry—a sort of domestic junta—organized, or half organized, a force—equipped it, or half equipped it, by the intervention of jobbers—assigned it its destination at a distance—then appointed a responsible commander, removable at will, at the same time retaining the power of controlling the operations of that commander, while it limited or refused the supplies, in personnel and matériel, which alone could make his combinations or their own successful; and these operations were all the time looked at askance by the whole body of discontent and disaffection in the country, which watched for every slip, and was ready to call prudence cowardice, and heroism rashness; thus realizing the minimum of national physical force. In France, on the contrary, every circumstance combined to raise hers to a maximum. A despot, wielding the whole political and financial resources of his empire, was also the general of its armies, thus uniting the military element with the others, and constituting one solid, single, concentrated and absolute power, which nothing less compact and vigorous could be supposed capable of coping with for a moment.

Thank God, the single element of LIBERTY was wanting to make France invincible. That element Britain possessed; and it stood her ἀσπίς ἀνυσω—instead of spear and shield. Yes; from the days of Leonidas to those of Wellington, freedom has been informed by the same inherent genius of victory; and in estimating the achievements of the Great Man who is gone, this consideration should, in justice to those he led, never be lost sight of, that he commanded an army of freemen—men who, under the sacred banner of Liberty, were nerved with a strength such as to render that memorable expression of their chief not hyperbole—that their warfare was that of giants!

These considerations it will ever be necessary to bear in mind, in forming an estimate of the genius of Wellington. They should constitute the foundation from which any critical analysis of his military career should commence, and be the first postulate demanded of those among rival nations who seek to cavil at and calumniate him. With us, we would once more repeat, his great and crowning glory is his being the Pacifier of Europe. This merit was peculiarly his. We know of few generals—Washington was one of them—of whom it was never suspected that, in the flush of success, they had sought out a field for the further display of military talent, at the sacrifice of political considerations. Wellington was content to do his duty without cutting out fresh work for himself; he had completed it early, and never sought again to embroil his country for his own purposes. His occupation was gone at a period of life when most men are entering upon theirs; but instead of whetting his sword in secret, he beat it at once into a ploughshare, and put his hand honestly to it. We are not now going to analyze his political opinions—people differ about them;—but surely no one, not even a soldier, can refrain from admiring his cheerful and life-long abandonment of the calling which he felt his country could now dispense with. For this we bless him—for this we lament him—for this we do not hesitate to pronounce him an instrument in the hands of God for promoting the happiness of mankind. If the tempest of war should burst upon Europe before he is laid in his grave, still a generation of men has passed over in the sweet calm of uninvaded tranquillity. Nations have cemented alliances, and secured enduring advantages from each other in the time; the sciences, the arts, the charities of life have put forth their tender buds, have blossomed and borne fruit in the time; distance has contracted, thought has gained wings in the time; the servants of religion have gone forth unobstructed, and brought distant tribes to a knowledge of the true and only God in the time. Yes; if the Spanish Godoy, by an impious mockery, was styled “Prince of the Peace,” while he was instigating one of the cruellest of wars, our Prince of Waterloo may be allowed to have merited the lofty and Christian title by truer claims—claims which distant ages will best appreciate, inasmuch as the acquisitions of war dazzle in proportion to their insecurity, while the blessings of peace are an eternal possession of the human race.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

CHAP. VI.

“AND so, mother, as this is the first day of the new-year, after I have given my good friend and master the best wishes a grateful heart can offer, and presented to Martha the gift you prepared for her—”

“Let me see it—let me feel it, I mean,” interrupted Richard’s mother. “To me the shawl looks dull and spotted; yet it is of good substance, a nice soft shawl, and green, you say; what green? is it the bright green green which the young larch puts forth, when the first showers of April hang upon it like diamonds; or the blue green of the infant wheat, clothing a field in velvet; or the deep, dark, indigo green of the solemn pine trees? Richard, my child!” and she laid her hands on his shoulders, closing her eyelids over her dim eyes; “Richard, this blindness has its blessing; I never, until I became dark, would think of the scenes of my early days—when the farmer’s daughter danced for joy in the first beams of summer, or watched from the hayfield the soaring lark, or gloried in the rich harvest-home, or the merry-making round the Christmas fire—I did not dare to shut my eyes and recall those childish things, when I knew they must open on all the cold, cruel, wants of poverty; but now, when you are out, and happy—bless you, my darling! happy in industry—it is quite cheerful to close them against the wall of moths, and stars, and swimming things, that mingle with the daylight. I have but to shut my eyelids, and recall all I ever saw, or lived among; and there it is, the trees! such trees! and the flowing river, fringed with rushes, and floating bunches of forget-me-not; and the nest of the green-footed water-hen, the skimming swallow, the glancing fish, the heavens so blue, so full of light; our own farm-house, where first your father came for health, and loved to read to me, and hear me read, and tried to teach me all things good and holy, and made me see the beauty of the trees, and clouds, and flowers, and blossoming grass; and would ask questions, which, as I could not answer, why tears would come; and then he would call me a silly village girl, and say, with hope, and faith, and love, I needed nothing more, and that his learning would do for both. I see him now, not as you remember him, a pale, dying man, but full of youth and beauty. I gave him (may God forgive me) idol worship, I gave him as much love, as much devotion, as I gave my God, and did not think what he would have to suffer from marrying without his father's leave. I did not know what poverty or sickness were, nor think what it would be to see him and you want food." She shuddered, and then added, "But God took him from me—so best."

The boy looked all the time upon his mother's eyes, and yet she could not read his passionate gaze of love and admiration! boy though he was, he had arranged her cap, and smoothed her glossy hair beneath its borders, and joyed in the tint of returning health upon cheeks no longer thin and wasted; the prescribed diet had done well, but repose had done better. Richard had acted on his master's instructions, and spent more time in reading what she loved best to hear; he had also written a hymn, which, in her own way, she set to an old child-loved tune; and, frequently, while her fingers plied her netting or her knitting, she would croon over those words, dearer to her than all that Milton ever wrote, and conjure up the scenes of her girlhood to the harmony of her son's verses.

"How is it, mother?" inquired Richard, forgetting his purpose, his master, and Martha's shawl—"how is it, that when you speak of those past days, you speak so differently from what you do about other times and things, and look so handsome, dear mother? I only wish you could see how different you look, from what you did this day twelvemonth, before I got my lucky penny."

"God has been very gracious, Richard, but there is a promise: 'Yet saw I never the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging their bread.' I dare say I do speak differently, particularly when I speak and think of your father; he took such pains with us; but poverty lowered me every way, and it is only when I think of those days I rise again."

"But, mother, you always hoped."

"Yes, dear—" and Richard saw her old look return—"yes dear, I should have died without hope; but I don't want the hope that you will be a great writer, your master thinks it is better to print books than to make them."

"Perhaps better than either, to carry them out," answered the boy; and while his cheek flushed, a very different expression passed over his features, from that which dwelt upon his earnest brow the morning that he waited for his master's door to open.

"No, Richard, you cannot mean that," replied his mother, in simple faith that he meant what he said; "you have done a great deal more than carry out books or parcels; but I believe what Martha says is true, that you are a spoilt boy," and she passed her hand fondly over his head. "Now take the shawl to Martha, and don't laugh at her odd English, or mind her unkind words; she means well."

"And so did the old governor, who gave us the pennies! Surely I have had a good master since then; I only wish he was poor, that I might work for him;" and after some more words, and a promise to return to their new-year's dinner, mother and son separated; with her head a little bent, like a listening bird, she harkened for the sound of his footsteps in the court, and when they were no longer audible, she heaved a sigh, as those who love sweet music do when it is ended.

Richard bounded on with the freedom of a sunbeam over the snow, which had fallen as a shroud on the grave of the old year; even at that early hour it was saddened and trampled; but the youth heeded it not; it is doubtful whether he thought he walked upon snow or upon pavement.

Though his master had advised him to avoid poetry as he would a pestilence, (resolving in his own mind that he should emulate Benjamin Franklin, and become, in due time, one of the first booksellers and printers of the world,) yet he had praised one poem, and sent it, very unwisely, to a periodical; the bookseller thought it would keep his vanity down, if he signed it "By an Errand-Boy." Alas! it made him but the more vain; "the pride that apes humility" is the most dangerous of all prides. For some days afterwards, Martha and his master had reason for discontent; the boy, when his thoughts were in "the shop," was as anxious as ever to please, but it must be confessed he now and then built castles which over-topped St. Paul's, and rendered him oblivious of his duties. No mean or sordid visions disturbed his mind; he did not dwell on the wealth, or city honours, or bewildering dinners, or pause before large houses, thinking he should like to dwell therein. He might have altogether longed for fame, had not the life of the American Franklin inclined him to utility, and taught him lessons which recalled him from the "dream land," whose threshold he had but just past. He longed to form charities, to build schools, to erect monuments, and then came the hope and prayer that his mother might live to hear him spoken of as "the great," "the good." He treasured up anecdotes of those whose fortunes have grown, as from the grain of mustard seed; but all his utilitarian views, all his benevolent projects, all he thought of or about, was poetized—the divine essence pervaded his nature—all was steeped in the poetry which may not harmonize in rhyme, but yet impregnate every thought and feeling. After one of these fashions ran Richard's thoughts, while he pushed eagerly through the streets, when he was suddenly seized by the arm, and Martha's unmistakable brogue attacked him.

"Passing the doore! is it passing the doore you are, this blessed new-year's-day? and ye'r as good as a fat taller than you war when you bothered the cars and the heart out of me to come in; passing the doore! there's gratitude! Not that I think of myself, but your blessed master withlin there, that's made a fair fool of you, and of himself, too, so that you should honour the ground he walks on; for many a fine boy has been led to transportation, at the very least, and may be a great deal worse, through his means (I mean the means he takes to set you up as a walking gentleman.) Passing the doore! without a 'God be with ye,' to the fine ould year that found yer mother in light, and left her dark; or a 'welcome kindly to the new,' that may see you as badly off, before its six months' ould, as yo war in the days of its grandfather."

Richard's spirits were so buoyant that he laughed. "It was stupid of me, Martha, to pass the door—a door I know so well, and love so dearly."

"Love an ould doore dearly," repeated the tormenting Martha; "listen to that, its something else you'll be loving some of these days."

The boy looked at her stolid, unsympathizing features, her hard, stoney, glittering eyes; he had grown used to them, and knew that though her words were often cruel, her acts were always kind. "Whatever I love," he said, "I shall never cease to feel the deepest gratitude for your kindness."

"You might name the master first."

"Well, master and you are one."

In an instant a storm gathered and burst forth. "Master and I one; take care what you say, or I'll have you before the Lord Mayor himself, for defamation. One! we're no such thing; them clouds full of snow are not more free from spot or blemish this very moment than me, Martha Conner—an O'Brian by the mother's side, and one grandmother a born O'Donoghoo. Me! one with a tradesman! I am a servant, free to come, free to go—a servant is no slave, I can cast service off when I like—but stick a trade, with lawyer's indentures on a man's back, and there it is to the day of his death, and will sit on his grave, like a black cat, to the end of time. Me! you're an ungrateful, unchristian boy, to even that to me; and I want to know what you mean by it?"

Richard assured her he meant they were one in all kind deeds and thoughts, and that was all.

"Then you should learn English," she said, "you should learn your own language, before you write verses; but that's what none of them poets do, nor never did."

Richard then offered his present; Martha took it graciously, shook it out, looked at it, and smiled.

"I thought you would like green," he said, unfortunately, "because yours is the 'green isle.'"

In an instant the smile vanished. "Did I ever take a pistol to shoot the Queen? (God bless her.) Did I ever change a whole shilling into penny pieces, to break the Duke of Wellington's windows, as my cousin Judy did? Did I ever blow up the parliament house? Did you ever hear me whistle Garyowenen, or 'Orange, lie down?' Haven't you heard me tune up the Protestant boys, of a Sunday morning? Did I ever wear a leaf of a shamrogue of a St. Patrick's day? These questions followed each other with startling rapidity. "Will you answer me?" she continued, having worked herself into what people call "a temper;" "will you answer me, and not stand there, aggravating?"

"I'm sure, Martha," replied the boy, gently, "I never intended to aggravate you, I only thought—"

"That I was a rebel? thank you, young Sirs, that's just what all the English think all the Irish, little knowing the loyalty that beats hard and fast in the heart's blood of the country; but I think you need not put the mark of a rebel on me with a green shawl. I didn't see your dirty meaning at first, I see it now; but I'll keep the shawl, though I am a Queen's woman, and my father was an Orangeman, I'll keep it just to show—"

Not knowing exactly what it would "show," Martha did what was very uncommon—she paused—she was at fault, though but for a moment; the youth caught at the opportunity.

"No, Martha, I bargained with the shop-keeper that if you did not like it, he should exchange it; shall I get you an orange one?"

This kindness made matters worse; nothing irritated Martha so much as proffered kindness. She "rose at it," as critics say the pit of a theatre does at a favourite actor; but this "orange" proposition added insult to injury. Her wrath was a study, though not a pleasant one; her indignation touching the green shawl was assumed. Martha cherished the green too fervently to permit it to be supposed she cared for it. Like many of her country and class, she loved the Queen, while she hated the laws, and reconciled rebellion to her conscience as a royal movement. "Sure it wasn't against the Queen at all they would stand up, but against them murdering ministers, who never let the darlint lady do as she liked, and she so heart-fond of ould Ireland; but to propose an orange shawl to her!"

"Orange!" she hissed forth two or three times, "orange! oh, the curse never fell heavy on my country till now! What did I ever do to you, to make you think I'd go out into the world with an insult to my country lapped about my shoulders? Didn't my father's being an Orangeman make him murder my poor mother, every day of her life, for twenty years? Didn't his being an Orangeman instigate him to fall down and worship that brazen king in Dublin College-green, as if he was a saint? Didn't orange, bad luck to it, make him turn me out, the way he did, upon the wide-wide world, because I liked the ways of my mother's people better than his ways. And you! who are you, to ask me to give up my religion, and all I love and care for in the whole world, for a bit of an orange shawl?"

"But indeed, Martha—"

"Will-you-hould-your-tongue? I never can open my mouth when you're to the forth—small wit many words. Well, can't ye spake? did you never see me before, that you stand there staring the eyes out of your head for nothing? who do you think likes to be stared at, that way?"

Richard turned to leave the kitchen without speaking; she flew to the door, and looked it. "You shan't go, you shall spake," she exclaimed; "I'm not going to be insulted by you this way."

"Then," said Richard, his eyes flashing fire, "if you want to make me speak, I will speak, and you shall listen;" he laid his hands on her shoulders, and pressed her into a chair. Her eyes became fixed, her mouth opened, she was paralyzed with astonishment.

"You shall listen to me, and learn. In England, we do not care for your party-colours; I thought your heart would warm to the green, and I hoped to begin the new-year kindly. If you knew my real name, you would not easily forgive yourself for the way you have sometimes behaved."

Martha sprang to her feet, rushed back, pointing her long, lean arm towards him, and screamed—

"An imposther, an imposther! I know he was an imposther, none but an imposther could do it. I'll tell the masher, the masher shall know it!" and before Richard could prevent her, she rushed into the bookseller's little dingy sanctum, where he was calmly thinking of his messenger, and wondering if the stranger would keep his penny tryste.

It was, as I have said, the first day of the new year. Long before its arrival, the worthy bookseller had pondered, more than booksellers usually do, over Richard's poetry; he would have been well satisfied had it been plain, wholesome prose, or files of figures, problems, translations, anything but poetry; and yet, as he was a seller, not a publisher of books, and some poems sold in these days; he read such volumes as achieved popularity, and enjoyed them after his own fashion. And though he kept on shaking his head over Richard's poems, still he read them also, and turned them over and over, and wondered if sympathy could be enlisted for the young author, and if they could be got out by subscription—there was a great deal in them. "Patronage," the mildew of genius, had converted good farmer's boys and worthy peasants, gifted with small talents, into "popular poets;" wedded their verses to sweet sounds, led them ostentatiously forward as the "lions of a party," made them discontented with their cottage homes, showed them the gates of an inflated paradise, into which they could not enter, and, after a few show days and nights (during which they were treated as stalled oxen, rather than thinking, feeling men) voted them "bores;" and, having fostered their vanity, uprooted their self-respect, robbed them of the dignity of their peasant nature, cast them back to their homes rified of their simplicity, and tainted with all the bad of the "clique" which had dragged them from obscurity, to be with, though not of, their own particular class or coterie. Matthew Whitelock knew nothing of this; he saw in the papers that the "Northamptonshire peasant," or the "Farmer's boy," or the "Ettrick shepherd," had been at some Lady Bluebottle's conversazione; he saw the new volume with an overwhelming list of five shilling patrons, had frequently thought how beautiful Richard's head would look as a frontispiece to his poems—it was such a fine head—and he had more than once commenced a sort of fiddling calculation with his pencil, as to what would be the trade cost of a volume (supposing Richard did write a whole volume). It was just a pastime, to ascertain what it would cost, bound and lettered, with gilt edges, and a famous list of subscribers, and then Richard would be sure to be lionized; and he was so well bred, naturally, he would never be awkward, like the shepherd or farmer's boy. Mr. Whitelock was a worthy, honest man—a good man—who hated slavery and Smithfield, and would have given a large donation to the baths and wash-houses, if such things had been thought of then; but it was not given him to understand the inspirations of country life, he had a great idea that people must congregate together, and talk over their poetry to each other to make it good; and Richard never would talk of anything he had written. Mr. Whitelock knew nothing of the true dignity, and silence, and solitude of genius; he fancied country folk must be "dull;" he could not have comprehended the holy happiness of a peasant-poet on the mountain, watching the coming of the stars, as first alone, and then in countless multitudes, they glorified, with their beauty, the blue firmament of heaven; he knew nothing of the excursive soul, winging from star to planet, and pouring its inspirations into the warm and breathing clay, wherein for a season and a time, God had commanded it to dwell. He knew nothing of the whispering voices which breathe into the poet's ear from moss and harebell, from the leaping brook, and the mysterious cells of the butterfly and the ant. His cheek had never been brushed by the transparent wing of the wavering bat, nor did the grave moth ever sit upon his hand, as if it had been the sheltering leaf of the early primrose. He had never seen the sun rise, not even from Highgate, how could he tell what it was for the shepherd to see from his mountain throne the earth flooded in glory—while every insect and every leaf quivered with joy, and the lurk, all confiding and nothing daunted, his perfect love casting out fear, rose to meet the morning, while every other bird chorused his anthem—and he, poor town-bred man! would deem it a distinction for him, who had heard GOD in the thunder, and watched him in the whirlwind, yet knew that he would not smite the young lambs, and that the brood of the wild bird should continue in safety—he would consider that man, upon whom the sacred fire descended, and over whose dreams angels watched and wondered, a great, free, spiritual man, God-like, God-gifted, he would, in his own money-working way, think him honoured by an invitation, to be stared at by a sweltering multitude, or by his name being mingled with the time-serving, bought and sold paragraphs of a morning paper!

But the subscription list was, so to say, the coronet of Matthew Whitelock's hopes; yet, with it, to do him justice, came no one feeling of selfishness, it was all for Richard, and Richard's blind mother; and now mark the inconsistency, the worthy man's imagination had elevated Richard—the boy Richard—into a poet, a celebrated boy-poet. At all events, he had been invited and fêted, his beautiful head was engraved, the book was open in all the shop windows at the portrait; and with the money realized by the sale of the poems, Richard, forgetful of the glitter and celebrity of his fêted life, forgetful of sweet smiles and bright eyes, forgetful of his portrait, was to enter the murky, greasy, inky atmosphere of a printer's office, and become a second Benjamin Franklin—as if Benjamin Franklin had began life as a poet—with the millstone of a subscription list round his neck, to drag him into the mire of dependence.

Still Matthew Whitelock reasoned rather according to his knowledge than according to his ability, for he was a kind man, shrewd in some things, and seemingly simple in others—simple, because his ways and means of observation were limited. It was his new-year's-day, also, and he sat in his little parlour, absolutely making out the subscription list for his protégé, wondering if the gentleman would come to his penny "tryste," and also wondering if he should hear as good a sermon that new-year's-day, as he did the last; for he liked to begin the year well, and would not have "missed church" that day upon any consideration. He felt in a contented, happy mood; the world had gone well with him, and he had gone well with the world. Peter, too, looked as fat and as sleek as he had looked five years ago; and Martha, when she wished him "a happy new-year, and a great many of them," had not marred it with her heretofore observation, of "praise to the holies that you was not found dead in your bed this blessed new-year's morning, as you may be the next, who knows! and we all grow nearer death every year of our lives! Man's but a shadda' or woman either." In fact he was disappointed when Martha disappeared without an unpleasant observation of any kind, but his disappointment was not to continue. He had just counted up two-and-thirty names, when Martha rushed into the room—

"I thought I was right, sir!" she exclaimed, "indeed, I knew I was—an imposther—a regular town-built imposther! a false name, and an orange shawl on the back of a green one, think of that! insulted both ways—and he to say, if I knew who he was—"Ir!" I wonder is it Henry the Eighth, or the Pope of Rome, or the Lord Mayor of the City of London, he wants to be? Well, I'm sure! and here he is, hot foot after me; but I may be insulted! I'm nothing but an Irish woman, such as they put in the newspaper, "No Irish need apply;" orange and green! one on one shoulder, the other on the other; to live to see it, and hear it, and all of a new-year's-day! there's only one comfort—only one—here we are, three, one ould, one middle-aged, one young! and we may never see another!"

"I am so sorry, sir, Martha should misunderstand a little token of kindness I offered her," said Richard, apologetically, from behind the door. Now those who knew Matthew Whitelock best, never could say that he was given to jesting, but when the words, "she misunderstood a little token of kindness I offered her," were spoken, the quiet bookseller glanced up, and inquired in a voice sufficiently loud not to be mistaken—

"Was it a kiss?"

Martha answered by a scream, and tossing her arms wildly in the air, dived at once into the lower regions, declaring she would not remain in the house.

"A shawl, sir," replied Richard, blushing, "only it was unfortunately a green one, which I chose in compliment to her country, and when she objected to that, I offered to exchange it for an orange one, which seemed to make it worse. I lost my temper, I fear, a bit, which was very wrong, and said, that if she knew who I was, she would be sorry for her words."

The bookseller's face lit up, he knew, as the keeper of a circulating library, the value of a mystery, and that Richard should be a mystery was quite beyond his hopes. "And who are you?" inquired Matthew.

The clock broke into a little elick, to notify it was going to strike, which it did, ten times.

May I tell you when I return, sir? it is now something about the time I promised to meet the old gentleman at Covent-garden.

"A thing of beauty is a joy for ever."

● JOHN KEATS.

WE tore along with shriek and yell,
Through barren wastes of mounded sand;
Till, with a sweep, we came at once
Upon the level ocean strand.

Dark blue beneath the summer sky,
The windless waters stretched away,
And here and there the white-sailed ships,
Entranced with long, white shadows lay.

Still as a dream! But, as the breast
Of some sweet sleeper heaves and falls,
One long, bright surge along the beach,
Glittered and died at intervals.

Such was the hour, the scene, I said,
When Zephyr to the Paphian shore,
With Nereid song and sounding shell,
The naked, foam-born Virgin bore!

When, lo! as if the very words
 Had realized the poet's thought,
 My thirsting soul from Nature's breast
 Drank of the loveliness it sought.
 For there, upon the glimmering marge,
 Between the dusky, sea-worn rocks,
 Stood, mother-naked, in the sun,
 A little maid with golden locks.
 Sudden, as if 'twixt shame and fear,
 She turned half round with blushful grace,
 And, with a piteous smile, threw back
 The clustering tresses from her face.
 Then, with a joyous shriek, she tossed
 Her rosy, rounded arms in air,
 While, like a Mermaid's, backward streamed
 The dancing masses of her hair.
 With shout on shout, with bound on bound,
 Aloft she clapt her dimpled hands,
 And, swift as flash of living light,
 Fled gleaming seaward down the sands.
 Her white foot touched the chilly foam—
 One wild, exultant leap she gave,
 Like the winged fish of Indian seas,
 And plunged into the coming wave!
 I saw her glancing form emerge—
 I heard her breathless laughter ring
 One moment! Then once more away
 The steam-fiend rushed on murky wing!
 Away we flew—with pant and yell!
 Far from that still, secluded spot;
 But richer, purer, far that draught
 Of Beauty, ne'er to be forgot!
 —So, let us thank kind heaven, my friend,
 Who, if to us it hath refused
 That talisman, by knave and fool
 Possessed so oft—so oft abused—
 Yet, wielded by the wise and good,
 • That works such blessings in the land—
 Hath given the quick, perceptive eye,
 The thoughtful brain to understand—
 Despite the soul-corroding toil,
 And clangour of this iron age—
 The mysteries of God's finger writ
 On Nature's ever-open page;
 The chainless fancy that can track
 Creation to its fountain-springs,
 And read the lofty meanings hid,
 In what the world calls common things;
 The heart to feel the beauty shed
 O'er all—through all—from heaven above,
 And, like that heaven, to comprehend
 Creation in one clasp of love.

REMINISCENCES OF A CRUISE ON THE WESTERN COAST OF AFRICA.

DURING the month of November, 183—, I was serving as midshipman on board his Majesty's ten-gun brig, the —, then on her passage from the river Gambia to Sierra Leone; when off the Rio Pongo, the wind became very light, in fact, almost a calm.

His Majesty's brig was never at any time a good sailer; she had originally been built for blockading in the North Sea, during the late war; her draught of water was very light, thus enabling her to cruise near the shore, which, on the western coast of Africa, is a great advantage.

She was commanded by a lieutenant, with a complement of sixty officers and men; the commander, who had long served on the coast of Africa bitterly lamented her dull sailing, for he was well aware of the fast-sailing qualities of the greater part of the slavers; however, he promised us the chance of a capture, with the aid of the boats, should it fall calm off the entrances of the three rivers we were then near;—viz., the Rio Grande, Rio Nunez, and the Rio Pongo, all noted as the resort of slavers.

While in the latitude of the last named river, and just off the shoals to the westward of it, the wind entirely left us, and the sea became like a vast mirror; suddenly the look-out man at the masthead called out, "Sail right ahead." It being my watch, I was ordered up to see what I could make of the strange sail, with a telescope. After a long look, in which most of the officers joined, we came to the conclusion that she was a fore-topsail schooner, with only her upper sails visible above the horizon, evidently becalmed like ourselves; from her position she appeared to have either lately left the Rio Pongo, or was about to enter it. It being one o'clock, and the crew at dinner, nothing was done until their meal was over, when the boats, arms, and provisions were prepared, and the men told off for the cutting-out expedition, should the stranger prove suspicious and the weather remain calm. At last, it struck the officers from the masthead that the schooner appeared to near us; she was standing towards the brig, but as far as the eye could reach, not a ripple appeared on the horizon.

The schooner still neared us, until her hull was visible from the masthead. Various were the conjectures now amongst the officers and men as to what the strange vessel could be;

those who had previously been on the coast, said, it could not be a slaver, for slavers always keep a look-out man at the masthead, and generally see the cruisers as soon as they are seen themselves, and then make the best of their way off.

The schooner still approached fast; at last the look-out man at the masthead called out, that he now could see the hull, and also that the stranger was sweeping towards us—this accounted for the rapid approach. All hopes of promotion and prize-money were now at an end; no slaver, the commander said, would thus throw himself in the way of a man-of-war; it must be some vessel in distress.

I had now an excellent view of the stranger from the masthead, with a powerful telescope of the commander's; her snow-white canvas, large sails, and low, black hull, with the rapid movement of the sweeps on the smooth, glass-like surface of the sea, were all distinctly visible. The schooner being now in sight from the deck, and still nearing us, the commander ordered the master to take a boat, and see what was required. The whale-boat, a very fast-pulling one, was accordingly selected; moreover, from being painted white, it would not be noticed so easily as the others which were black. The master left with eight men, well armed, and pulled in the direction of the schooner, now not more than three miles distant, still sweeping towards us, the weather calm as before. Everything on board was ready for hoisting out the pinnace—men all prepared at a moment's notice. The schooner, which could now be plainly seen, was a beautiful vessel, with a very low, black hull, painted with a thin, white streak; her deck appeared crowded with men. The whale-boat rapidly neared her, when suddenly the schooner, about two miles distant, altered her course, and commenced sweeping away in the opposite direction, at the same time firing guns at the whale-boat. From the first manœuvre and wreath of smoke seen on board the schooner, all had been excitement with us; the pinnace was immediately hoisted out, and hastened to the assistance of the whale-boat, the schooner opening her fire on both boats, and sweeping away towards the shoals at the entrance of the Rio Pongo.

It was approaching sunset; there being little or no twilight in the tropics—and as there were indications of a light air from the westward, which would favour the schooner, without making much impression on our dull-sailing brig, the chances of success were very much against us. In the meantime the chase continued; the boats at first rapidly gaining on the schooner, and the latter firing with greater precision at them.

After sunset, a light air enabled the schooner to get away a little from the boats; but our men pulled away, cheering each other. It soon became quite dark; two men were seriously wounded in the pinnace, the schooner keeping up an incessant fire of great guns and musketry. The brig showed her position by occasionally burning blue lights and firing rockets, and the effect of the firing from the schooner and boats, in the dark, was very singular to those on board the brig. The boats now began to near the schooner, when the bows of the pinnace were pierced by three grape shot, and one of our best men, an old quarter-master, shot through both thighs; the whale-boat now pulled for the larboard side of the schooner, and the pinnace for the starboard, the marines picking off the crew of the schooner, when they became visible by the flashes of their musketry. Both boats now got close to the schooner, the shouts of the captain, urging his crew for a last effort, could be plainly heard; and just as the pinnace got alongside, three more of our men were laid in the bottom of the boat, seriously, but not mortally wounded, and on the whale-boat touching the other side, a marine was shot through the arm; as the men jumped up from the boats, a gun, that was pointed into the pinnace, missed fire, this was the last shot attempted to be fired from the schooner; the resistance of the crew was of short duration, they were soon overpowered, our men being exasperated by the long pull and the sight of their wounded messmates. A Frenchman, who had steered the vessel during the chase, made a most desperate resistance; he had been twice shot before the boats boarded, and was not overpowered until he had shown himself worthy of a better cause; he never left his station until he fell covered with wounds.

Several of the crew jumped overboard, the slaves below made a dreadful noise; one of the crew who had been cut down, fell across the grating of the slave-room, his blood dropping on the slaves below, roused them to madness. The crew were soon driven off the upper deck, many had thrown themselves into the sea, and were drowned, the remainder hid themselves below in the forepart of the vessel, sentries were immediately placed over the hatchways.

The light air having freshened into a breeze from the westward, the schooner, now our prize, was steered towards his Majesty's brig.

The master and one of my messmates were wounded, not seriously, seven of our men badly, and four slightly. The first care was to collect the crew of the slaver, several of whom remained on deck badly wounded; those who were in the forepart refused to come on deck, it was not until one had been wounded with a bayonet that they came up; they seemed a very villainous set of ruffians.

But where was the captain? at last he was found in his berth in the cabin, under two mattresses, entreating for quarter as our men dragged him from his hiding-place; he had urged his crew until our men boarded; it was he who attempted to fire the last gun, which, in the hurry, from the cartridge not being pricked, missed fire, then he had rushed below and hid himself. Had that gun gone off, the pinnace's fate would have soon been decided, for it was pointed right into the boat.

Upon being questioned, the captain, a Portuguese, said, his vessel had left the Rio Pongo the evening before, that he was bound for the island of Boa Vista, one of the Cape Verde Islands, with 180 slaves, which were to be shipped on board a large vessel bound to the Brazils, and after delivering the first cargo, he was to return to the river for another; his crew consisted of fifty-six men besides the officers, they were chiefly Spaniards and Portuguese; upon being asked why he swept his vessel towards us, he said, he thought we were one of the outward-bound English merchant vessels going to Sierra Leone for a cargo of timber, and that he wanted to purchase an anchor and cable; he had no idea we were a man-of-war, until he saw the boat pulling towards him. There is no doubt, from what was afterwards found in the vessel, that he committed piracy as well as slave dealing, whenever chance favoured him, and had he found us a trading vessel, ours would not have been an enviable position.

During the struggle on the schooner's deck, a Spaniard, who had jumped overboard, swam to the pinnace—which, with the whale-boat, was fastened to the schooner's stern, and contained all our wounded men who were unable to get up the vessel's side—his life was spared by the old quarter-master. A painful thing happened at the same time: a seaman, who had never seen a slaver, hearing the dreadful noise below, fired into the woman slave-room, and wounded a poor young woman with an infant at her breast, fortunately not a very severe wound. At eight o'clock, p.m., the schooner was alongside the brig, three hearty cheers were exchanged; the commander had been very anxious about the boats after the firing ceased, as it was a very dark night, and nothing could be seen of either schooner or boats. The wounded men and the schooner's crew were now brought on board the brig, the boats were hoisted in, and both vessels made sail for Sierra Leone, the schooner with a temporary prize crew on board for the night.

The senior mate, myself, and ten men were ordered to be ready to go on board the schooner at daylight, to navigate her to Sierra Leone; the senior mate was selected from having served on the coast of Africa before, he had also taken two prizes to Sierra Leone from the Bight of Benin. The poor young woman was the first attended to by the doctor; she bore the probing and dressing of her wound without a murmur—everything was done to make her comfortable. The prisoners were all placed on the after part of the quarter-deck, with sentries to guard them, except the wounded, who were all taken below, and attended to with our own men; two of them—the second mate, a Spaniard, and the Frenchman, mentioned before—were so dreadfully wounded, that the doctor had no hopes of their living through the night. I went to my hammock exhausted with the excitement of the day, but sleep was out of the question; beneath my hammock, on a mattress, was stretched the powerful frame of the Frenchman, he must have been upwards of six feet high, and stout in proportion, but was so disfigured as hardly to look like a human being, entreating every one that came near to give him a loaded pistol, or to put an end to his sufferings; everything that could possibly be done to relieve him was tried. I was obliged to go on deck again, for having lately left school in France, every word he uttered was painfully intelligible to me.

At daylight, the schooner was close to on our lee quarter, with hardly any sail set, and then with difficulty keeping her station, although we had all sail set. I thought her the most beautiful vessel I had ever seen, her masts raked very much, and she appeared to cut the water without throwing any ripple from her bows, the hull was very low, and the sides smooth and rounded. I afterwards found that many of the slavers on the coast of Africa were precisely the same style of vessel, chiefly built in America, and differing very little, except in the rig and interior arrangements, from the transatlantic yacht which has lately put so many of ours to the blush. The commander now came on deck, ordered sail to be shortened, and the brig hove-to; the prize crew were ordered up, a boat was lowered, and the prize-master having received his orders, we left for the schooner. On our arrival, the officers and men who had been in charge during the night, returned to the brig, when the Portuguese captain, the steward, and the cook of the slaver were sent to accompany us; sail was then made, and both vessels in company shaped their courses for Sierra Leone. The captain remained sitting abaft, in sullen silence, the cook cheerfully commenced preparing the slaves' morning meal, and the steward coffee for us; our men were busily employed in cleaning the decks, and removing the traces of the last evening's work.

The schooner on deck was a beautiful vessel, her width was very great near the centre, and gradually tapered away to a very sharp bow, giving her, on looking down from the mast-head on her deck, the form of a wedge; she was armed with a long brass twenty-four-pounder, on a sweep, between the foremast and mainmast; it could be pointed in almost any direction, and was a well-finished piece of ordnance; there was also a twenty-four-pounder carronade, which could be transported from side to side, it was still loaded, and on the charge being drawn, was found to contain, besides grape shot, two bagsful of rusty nails; the cartridge had not been pricked in the hurry, and being made of stouter material than is generally used, the gun missed fire, and saved the pinnace's crew; there was a complete set of small arms, cutlasses, and boarding pikes, all in good order.

The slaves' breakfast being now ready, the iron bars were removed from the hatchways, and they all came on deck; they were counted, and made to sit in circles of ten—the women and girls on the quarter-deck, and the men and boys before the mainmast—there were seventy of the former, and one hundred and ten of the latter, all in a complete state of nudity, except five of the best-looking women, who wore flaming-coloured scarfs round their waists, and from the place they selected on the quarter-deck, appeared to have been favourites of the captain and his officers. In the meantime the boiled rice was placed in tin pans, one in the centre of each circle, none daring to commence eating until the signal was given, which was done when all had been served; they appeared a fine, healthy, and muscular set of slaves, having suffered very little from confinement; they had only been shipped two days, and none of the men were put in irons—as is the case in most slavers—the captain, probably, thinking that the strength of his crew was sufficient protection; moreover, the slaves were always sent below after their meals, except a few of the most intelligent who were kept to work on deck, and attend to their fellow-captives.

At a later period, I witnessed much misery in captured slavers, from the negroes being sickly, and on the vessels being first taken, the greater part of the men were shackled two and two by the legs, in some instances, a living to a dead man. After the slaves had finished their meal, half were sent below, and the remainder allowed to stop on deck, which was a great boon to the poor creatures, for so closely packed were they on the lower deck, that it must have been awful; there was not room for a full-grown person to sit upright without touching the beams. The prize-master and myself lived as comfortably as could be expected under such circumstances, taking our meals and sleeping on deck, which was far preferable to the close cabin; the captain messed with us, but was not allowed to hold any communication with either his men or the slaves. In looking over the contents of the lockers in the cabin, we found English cheeses, bottled porter, pickles, and various articles that looked very much as if they had lately come out of an English merchant vessel; there was a good stock of champagne, claret, and preserves, the coops on deck were full of poultry, showing that the Portuguese captain and his officers were fond of good living, and to all of which we did ample justice. In one of the lockers was a quantity of loose powder, which was immediately thrown overboard, the steward, a Spaniard, who could speak a little French, told me, that during the chase, the captain kept him and the cook in the cabin filling cartridges; the locker was filled with loose powder from the magazine under the cabin. It is a mercy that, during the scuffle, the cabin was not fired into, otherwise all would have been blown up. In the afternoon, the slaves had another meal, and the half that had been on the lower deck in the morning were allowed to remain on deck, the others being sent below. During our dinner, the children used to come and sit on the deck, at a respectful distance, eagerly watching every mouthful that we took, and when we had finished, the steward would divide the remainder between them, not forgetting some of the ladies. In the evening, the slaves had their last meal, and then were all sent below, as their being on deck at night would have interfered with the working of the vessel.

The same daily routine was followed with the slaves; my messmate, the prize-master, from his previous knowledge, having managed everything so well that we had very little trouble. Nothing particular transpired until the morning of the fourth day, when we saw the high land of Sierra Leone; having a fine breeze from the westward, we rapidly neared the land; we were ordered to keep astern of the brig, and it was only by almost taking in all sail that we could keep our station. On looking for the schooner's colours, to hoist, we found English, French, Spanish, and American ensigns, besides the Portuguese, which we hoisted, as the captain's papers were of that nation, although he used the other flags when it suited his convenience.

It being the fine season, everything looked cheerful as we approached the anchorage; the red soil here and there covered with masses of large trees, looked very picturesque, and the houses, surrounded by large verandahs, had a pleasing effect. We were soon at anchor off the town, and visited by boats filled with sable washerwomen, dressed in the European style, with gay, many-coloured handkerchiefs tied round their heads, which set off to advantage their black, shining faces and snow-white teeth, all chattering together, soliciting our custom, and offering pine apples, bananas, oranges, guavas, and other choice fruit for sale; one of them, a fat jovial personage, after selling us some fruit, amused us by calling out, "I say, you small white officer, what for you no make de ladies dress: I 'apose dem clothes all packed for de wash." This was a common joke of her's, for she was a liberated African, and had arrived at Sierra Leone, some years before, in the same light-marching order, but by means of a happy disposition and industrious habits, in selling fruit and washing clothes, had secured a competency for herself. Washing here is a profitable trade, as so much white clothing is worn, and the charge, when I was there, was three shillings a dozen. The officers of the Mixed Commission Court now came on board, to examine the documents and the vessel; the Liberated African Department authorities also came to make preparations for the landing of the slaves, which took place after their dinner. They appeared to leave the schooner with regret, many of them kissing our hands as they went over the side into the boats sent for them: they were taken to a large building fitted for their reception by the Liberated African Department, clothing was given to them, and they were subsequently apprenticed to different trades in the colony.

I went on board the brig to see my messmates and hear the news: the wounded were progressing favourably, they were to be sent to the military hospital that day; I found that the Frenchman had died the morning we went on board the schooner, and the Spanish mate in the afternoon—both were buried at sea. On going to see the old quarter-master—who was a great favourite of mine, from being in the same watch—he told me that they were to be accompanied to the hospital by the commander's black cook, a loquacious West Indian, who not having quite got over the excitement of the capture, had the day before spoiled the commander's dinner, for which he was threatened to be flogged; and, during a violent altercation with the commander's steward, had upset a kettle of boiling water over his legs and feet, which confined him to his hammock.

When the men were carried up to the hospital in cots, through the town, the cook groaned lustily, and showing his woolly head occasionally above the cot, excited all the sympathy of the black population who crowded the streets to see the procession. On arriving at the hospital, and after the men were made comfortable in the wards, he cunningly told the black officials, that the severe scald was occasioned by his gallantry in trying to be the first to board the schooner; in the hurry, he had jumped into a large tub of boiling rice that had been prepared for the slaves, and left near the gangway; of course, his story was listened to with admiration by his hearers, to the great indignation of his shipmates, who would have made him a good hospital case, had they been able to get hold of him. The schooner was delivered over to the Mixed Commission Court to be condemned as a prize; the captain, his officers, and crew were landed, under a strong guard, and lodged in a jail to await their trial as pirates; the wounded were placed in the hospital attached to the prison. Having completed water and provisions, we sailed for the cruising ground allotted to us by the commodore. On our return to Sierra Leone, some months after, we received the news that the master had been promoted to the rank of lieutenant for his gallant conduct, a gratifying thing for him, as it is very unusual to promote officers from one line to the other; the Portuguese captain, and the two surviving officers, were to be imprisoned in their own country for life, and the remainder of the crew at Sierra Leone, for one year. The schooner was bought by a merchant and sent to England with a cargo, and on her passage out from Liverpool, heavily laden, is supposed to have foundered in the Bay of Biscay during a heavy gale, for she was never heard of again.

SEA-NYMPHS.

BY MISS PARDOE.

Bravely ride the Ocean-Daughters,
When tempests lash the bounding waters;
Their music then is the thunder's crash,
And their midnight torch the lightning flash;
They garland then their reeking locks
With waves that are torn from streaming rocks;
And as he sees them shine through the gloom,
The mariner deems them wreaths of foam,
And breathes a prayer that the next wild wave
May not prove his gallant vessel's grave.

Gracefully ride the Ocean-Daughters,
When moonlight floods the sleeping waters;
Then the lotus that opens at night
Is wreathed in their tresses soft and bright;
The breeze that kisses the swelling sea
Is their low but joyous minstrelsy;
And they snatch at the stars when they see them glow
In the liquid depths of the tide below;
Or chase the sword-fish in merry glee,
As they dart through the still waves wild and free.

But fairest far are the Ocean-Daughters,
When noontide sleeps on the quivering waters;
They cluster then like breathing flowers
On their watery couch in those dreamy hours;
Whispering soft tales 'mid the listening waves
Of the sea-gods who dwell in their coral caves—
Tales such as earthly maidens tell
Of those whom they love, and who love them well;

One to the other murmuring low,
What must not be heard in the depths below.

Crowned with pearls, and draped in mist,
Tenderly by the sunbeams kissed,
Just where the rainbow spans the sea,
A triad of these sisters see!
Naught reck they of the cark and care,
Of the toiling earth, or the fitful air;
Dreams of love, and forms of grace,
Fill up for them the realms of space:
And blithely o'er the heaving waters,
Swell out the song of the Ocean-Daughters.

BIRDS IN CAPTIVITY.*

THE GOLDEN ORIOLE.

(Oriolus Galbula.)

THIS is the only species of the genus ever seen in Europe. Arriving towards the end of spring, it visits Italy, Spain, France, and Germany. Individuals have been observed in England; and Mr. Thompson, in his work on the birds of Ireland, mentions the golden oriole to have been seen in the county Wexford, and at Dungarvan, male and female adults. It is imported to this country, for captivity, from America; yet I have never remarked the semblance of migratory impulse in the oriole.

There have been many disputes as to its classification: while the tarsi and broad toes approximate it to the rollers, the bill, more decidedly typical, ranks it with the shrikes and flycatchers. Most authorities agree in saying the crow tribe (coraces) appropriate it, while, assuredly, its habits and general aspect have alliance with the thrush family; in support of which it has been called "the golden thrush," and I have been credibly informed it is "the blackbird of America." Treating with becoming reverence all scientific disputes, I must truly assert the petted caged oriole to be at least first cousin to the jackdaw, as indicated by its predatory tendencies, and more than kin to the starling in his murderous propensities. His comical ways are his own, and "none can be his parallel."

The "o'er-true tale" of my own "Diavolo" will redeem the general character of a much calumniated and undervalued race. Cultivate his affections, and your reward will be commensurate. So intelligent is he, that I am inclined to believe his not using oral language is owing to neglect in his early days. Our transatlantic visitors never arriving until the autumn, their first winter in confinement is a season of suffering.

"Diavolo" was a bird comme il y en a peu! To the exclusive lovers of melody I cannot address myself, for my golden friend reminded me of "the flaxen-headed ploughboy, that whistled o'er the lea;" joyous in his cage, as if perched upon the forest tree; as mischievous and as loving as any biped, whether of the feathered kind, or "the cooking animal," he had all the curious gestures of the star; emancipated from his abode at breakfast-time, he amused himself by peeping into covered bowls and teapots; during these thievish invasions, he carefully tested the temperature of liquids, by spilling a few drops, and drinking thereof. A favourite amusement was hiding keys; the inconvenient result—when only "echo answered, where!"—induced me to adopt a covered basket, placing it on a bracket. Forthwith, "Diavolo" entered it, and ensconced himself therein, occasionally peeping forth, to see into the state of affairs, and to whistle. My pet delighted in dropping a silver thimble, and keys, into the milk-vessels that were hung in the aviary-cage, about the inhabitants of which he was dangerously curious, plucking at wings carelessly spread out by their owners towards the wires; his especial animosity being directed against a smaller bird of his own colour, another species, the Baltimore oriole.

On my approaching his cage, he uttered the most joyous cries, alighted on my hand, cat hempseed from my lips, yet, to strangers, he showed anger, and every inclination to do battle à l'outrance. He went about as he liked, bathed, and dried his black and yellow garment on the fender, turning his back to the fire. "Diavolo's" anger at any shining object was laughable; he showed intense dislike to boots, whereas he liked any other reflection, and had a looking-glass in his residence. A remarkable contraction of the eyes took place when he was excited, and he rolled out his notes rapidly, and with discordance.

I have seen a tame and beautiful oriole, in the possession of Sir Philip Crampton. It is only my genuine love for birds that I can adduce as an apology for an unpermitted mention of a name bearing a more than European reputation, also connected with the most important subjects of zoology. It added to my pleasure, during the interviews with which I was honoured, to see the attachment of this noble-looking bird: he flew to the writing-table for heath, and was perfectly familiar.

The golden oriole is decidedly omnivorous: his cage-treatment should assimilate to that of the soft-billed birds of the thrush and ouzel genera. I fed mine upon German paste and roll-crums, or plain bun and biscuit, upon which boiled milk had been poured. Occasionally, I gave a meal of soaked bread and crushed hempseed. Grated bullock's liver was sometimes added to the German paste preparation; but I found scraped raw beef, or sheep's heart, on every occasion, more suitable, the liver producing thirst. Raw meat is essential to this class of birds. Orioles eat hemp and canary-seed: they do not partake of prepared food with avidity, but seem to prefer picking at all provisions in turn. Fruits, especially cherries and oranges, are most welcome, also berries; to the ordinary green food, except grasses and heaths, they are indifferent. I was advised to add fine granite (called freestone) to the sand usually provided. "Diavolo" drank milk constantly, and seldom approached the water-vessel. He bathed with great apparent enjoyment. On one occasion, he opened, with some dexterity and trouble, a meal-worm jar, and devoured the contents—no small quantity. I was called too late to the rescue: he stood in bold defiance, crying loudly, with angry gestures, and a harsh scolding tone, which they adopt when thwarted. The day before my poor bird met with an accidental death, by falling from a window, we had a very angry altercation on the subject of figs! I brought a supply home next day; the draught from an open door caught the heavy cage—it fell—the sufferer was dead from fright before he reached the pavement. One drop of his heart's-blood fell on my hand; I thought his heart still beat—it was my own! His loss nearly cured me of keeping pets. He was my greatest favourite; and five years have not obliterated the pang of reproach and regret I then suffered.

I heard also of another well-nurtured oriole. He was allowed the range of the lawn, and was recalled by the voice of his mistress, and left the high trees in an avenue, allured home by mealworms. He affected to lie dead on the hand, and performed many tricks. It died suddenly, but was a fine young bird.

I have been induced to advocate the oriole's cause, because he is not sufficiently appreciated. He is reproached for not singing. "It is not given to every one to go to Corinth," is the Greek proverb. To the mere lover of songsters I cannot recommend him; but his joyous whistle is worth much that is called melody. To travestie Alexander's memorable compliment to Diogenes—if I were not a nightingale, I would be an oriole.

All the individuals of this species are not equally diverting: these birds require notice and great kindness, otherwise even their fa-rouche propensities lie dormant, and they exist in a state of fat contented ignorance. One imported with mine, lived and died uncultivated; year after year his plumage grew brighter—being orange at first; mine was bright yellow. Hence I conclude the change of colour to be the result of increasing age.

On inquiry in London, I have been surprised to find the number on sale so few. Liverpool is the mart for American birds, yet the demand is not great for orioles. Their price is at all seasons high, varying from fifty to sixty shillings; and the subject is incomprise, therefore the demand is not great.

The Baltimore oriole and the orchard oriole are of this genera: the former is a handsome specimen, often caged, is ornamental and gentle, without any decided characteristics; the latter is called "the bastard." And I here take the opportunity of introducing a correct and excellent observation of an ornithologist, as remarkable for refinement as for fidelity of narrative, that "specific names, to be perfect, ought to express some peculiarity not common to others of the genus, and should be consistent with truth." This word, like that of "goat-sucker," is ridiculous, and calculated to perpetuate the error from which it originated; and, I may add, is, like any other popular error, a gross absurdity.

"The African golden oriole" is a splendid yellow bird; "the small-billed oriole," and "the Cape black-capped oriole," complete the species.

THE NIGHTINGALE.

(Motucilla Luscinia.)

"Hark! 'tis the vesper hymn of some sweet bird,
Chanting his evening lay to yon bright star,
The while, the plaintive cadence soothes his mate."

THIS, the sweetest warbler of the feathered tribe, combining in his notes all that is pre-eminent in song, is unrivalled among British birds for the volume, compass, and quality of his voice. A native of the South, the nightingale visits England in April—the period of their arrival will vary by a fortnight in some localities—travelling by night, and appearing singly; the females follow about ten days later. On the eve of being mated, which takes place about a week after the point of destination has been attained, "sweet Philomel" pours forth his song of love and joy.

Nightingales are by no means generally distributed. Individuals settle in the southern counties of England, and as far north as York and Carlisle; are never seen in Cornwall, Wales, Scotland, or Ireland—while, on the Continent, they proceed farther north, even to Sweden and Russia.* Audobon, in one of his charming narratives of birds, makes this observation:—"There exists a singular arrangement of Nature relative to singing birds of all sorts—it is this: I have never met with birds truly migratory—by which I mean birds that visit countries, from which they retire as soon as their young are able to travel—that ever sing in confinement during winter in the countries to which they had migrated to breed, though they sing in the country to which they return to spend the winter." The nightingale bears out this observation, for it does not exhibit its vocal power in confinement until after the spring moult.

Mr. Thompson, in a late work, has enumerated at least twenty-four well-known specimens of birds that summer with us, and winter south of the Mediterranean. The nightingale takes his departure from the middle of September to the end of that month. This bird is heard in the greatest perfection towards the east; and his voice declines in sweetness as it migrates north and west: hence, London amateurs prefer the nightingales of Surrey to those of Middlesex. The Italian birds excel the French, and the latter surpass the English nightingale; whereas Persia and Greece can boast of an undoubted superiority over all other countries. In the East, nightingales are not migratory; but from all parts of Europe they retire to Asia and Africa.

I have, contrary to my usual practice, entered into the peculiarities of a bird in its wild state, and have done so advisedly, as all the facts detailed tend to its efficient management in a state of captivity. The migratory impulses (which have never yet been satisfactorily explained) are especially developed in "the various-voiced bird"—the theme of Hesiod, Virgil, and Pliny, of old—the admired of our own poets, Milton and Shakespeare. The nightingale, if I may so express myself, has more character than any other bird. No writer on the subject has succeeded in accounting for its choice of habitat; climate has no attraction, food no peculiar charm; attempt to acclimatize him, and he returns no more. The direct agency of God is here obvious: there are impulses given, independent of common causes, and through the aid of a higher intelligence. These impulses ought to point out that emigrants are unfit for domestication; that the cage is more than their prison—it is their mausoleum! The unsupported advocacy of a single reasoner on a subject where there is a traffic in opposition, would prove as useless a piece of labour as the task of Sisyphus. Let us proceed to incarceration. Virgil and other classic poets have characterized the strains of the "solemn bird" as a miserable carmen. Subsequent observations have more justly prized his excellent powers of song—lively, and full of vivacity, and with but a few notes of a melancholy tone, "he all night long his amorous descant sings." Proud and shy, he loves only his own wild airs; his song is Nature's masterpiece; he refuses instruction; certain of perfection, he bears no rivalry.

The management of this class of warblers is altogether a task of difficulty; simply that the food provided is of necessity unnatural, and that their impulses being under restraint, they grieve and suffer. As the time approaches for flight, their trouble, and that of their captors, increases. I heard from an amateur of strict veracity, and an enthusiast in his attachment to songsters, that on one occasion his nightingale rushed night and day through his cage, without taking any food for twelve days. On the thirteenth, he lay still, and apparently dead; his protector moistened the bird's beak, soaked Naples biscuit, and placed it in it crumb by crumb. After a time of watchful anxiety, he gave signs of life, raised his head for a mealworm, and was gradually restored. He lived some years afterwards. Yet, all this suffering, where instinct would fain burst the prison-bars, is but an evidence of man's selfishness.

The only chance for passing over the migratory period, is to have previously treated your bird judiciously, as to food and quietness. It is at roosting time that restlessness is most apparent: if a candle is taken suddenly into the room where the nightingale is, at the migratory seasons, it will cause great disturbance—the poor prisoner bends his neck backwards, beats his head against the cage-top, and looks anxiously upwards. By this and other signs, it is supposed that moonlight is the time chosen for flight. The dispositions of this bird vary much; none bear interruption to their habits, nor disturbance of any kind; yet some are more cheerful than others, liking to be hung in a window. Some like the society of man and their own species; others, sulky, affect the reverse. These tendencies demand indulgence for a subject so delicate.

I do not approve (except for newly-caught birds) of the system of trappings about the cage, to darken it—captivity is enough, "without poking fun at it." A good nightingale, judiciously treated, will not fail to sing, both early and late, but never at night, unless the moon is at its full, the weather and sky serene—indeed, it is most likely they will cease to sing in confinement an hour or two after sunset. The mode adopted for quieting this bird, when first caged, (and if taken after he has been mated he will surely die,) is to place him—previously tying the tips of his wings—in a cage, the top, sides, and back of which are made of wood; paste over the front a covering of tissue-paper, and feed the bird from a trough, or pan, placed on a level with the sand-drawer; also, the drinking-vessel to be so arranged as not to require to open the cage-door; feed the bird from the bottom, not looking at him, at the same hour daily. After the third day, he will go down at once to feed, and the paper may be torn away by degrees, by which time he will have become tame.

With reference to food, I furnish the formule found to be most successful, premising that the best is far removed from nature; and this observation holds good with regard to all artificial preparations for birds that are not granivorous. Press the yolk of a hard-boiled egg once through an iron sieve, pour on it a few drops of water, sufficient to form a paste, scrape an equal quantity of juicy raw beef, and mix all together; the consistence should not be heavy, or the bird will not feed freely, nor too light, or it will cause weakness. If your bird is not fat, the water may be omitted. In autumn, they fatten much, and should be given mealworms and spiders three times a week; when the swollen appearance declines, keep the bird warm; likewise, if inclined to leanness, give figs, chopped finely, and mixed with the ordinary food, but discontinue them when not needed.

The great difficulty in treating of food arises from the evils of confinement, causing indigestion to this bird especially. Those so fed I have heard sing gloriously, have moulted well, and at this writing have a plumage smooth as marble; one especially shows a bold front, advances towards his kind master, and distinguishes him, gazing at strangers with a shy aspect. It is a scandal to impugn the appearance of the nightingale: his dress is of sober brown; his shape elegant; his gait is proud and graceful; his eyes are full of inquiry and intelligence, not observable to careless persons, but in accordance with the true harmony of nature; his grave aspect protects him; with a bright coat, and throat of the most perfect music—what chance would he have? In confinement, his appearance varies with the care he may enjoy; smoky, close rooms will darken his plumage, and improper food destroy his elastic gait.

There is another kind of food sometimes adopted—German paste, and parboiled sheep's heart—the latter free from fat. It is my opinion, that the ingredients composing the paste are too rich for a bird so delicate as the present subject. Some birds (branchers, so called from the time they leave their nests until they migrate in autumn) are brought to thrive on this strong food; but it is doubtful if they are long-lived. The first-named food should be given fresh, twice a day—in summer, morning and mid-day, or the meat will have become tainted, and injure the feeder. Ants—their eggs—and ants' mould are desirable; mealworms allowed occasionally, principally when, as is frequently the case, their appetites fail, at the migratory season; as an article of daily food, they are hurtful, producing restlessness, and distaste for other food. The greatest cleanliness to be observed in scalding the feeding-vessels and scouring the sand-drawer; and the cages to be so constructed as not to require to disturb them from the wall during the process.

In summer, the drinking vessels should be renewed twice, daily; in winter, every day, and, if possible, the amateur should perform these attentions at a regular hour, noticing his captive all the time, who will become familiar or sulky, according to the modicum of attention proffered; not that the nightingale will permit the familiarities that a seed-eating bird would meet half-way, his dignity would be at fault.

The skin of this bird being porous and very tender, care must be taken with reference to bathing. In winter, he should not be allowed a greater supply of water than the drinking-vessel contains, and at no time should he be allowed to bathe if the temperature be below 70°, and the sun not shining; it is perhaps best on all occasions to take the chill off the water; an ardent desire common to migrants to wash himself will cause this bird to wash, and soak, and shiver, day after day, till he dies; paralysis is a frequent consequence of winter bathing to many of this species.

The nightingale is subject to loss of sight if the room is kept below temperate, a moderate heat is best suited to their constitution; many mistaken opinions have induced the adoption of a high artificial temperature, which has proved fatal. During moult, their digestion is temporarily impaired, give additional ants, ants' eggs, and mealworms, also a spider, and some iron or saffron water; if melancholy, dissolve sugar candy in the drinking vessel, and provide suitable food—this care will cheer and keep him healthy—of insects, these birds eat all but the hairy caterpillar; the young larvae in the combs of wasps and hornets, is his favorite food.*

Like the black-cap, robin, and thrush species, the nightingale feeds on juicy berries, especially towards the autumnal migratory season. This is but little noted by amateurs; by a trifling degree of trouble they might be preserved in summer, by drying the berries and fruits in the sun that have been previously threaded with a needle; in cold weather, dip them daily in tepid water, when they will swell, recover a portion of their colour, and be taken with avidity by your bird. The coleopterous insects may be also preserved; meal-worms can be purchased, or "raised," by the possessor of soft-billed birds. A clever writer made this pithy observation, that the nightingale, not being an egg-sucker, the provision of an hard-boiled egg is unnatural as staple food.

The scales must be removed once a year from the feet of the nightingale; for gout, use fresh butter; for cramps, hartshorn and oil.

Owing to carelessness in feeding, fibrous matter from meat will sometimes collect round the tongue, causing the appearance of choking, in such case, open the beak very gently with a flat stick, and remove the obstruction.

I have now given the fullest instruction for the treatment of this favourite songster, and conclude by advising no one to keep nightingales who has not sedentary occupations, with spare time and patience.

Abler pens than mine have vainly tried to describe the preparation of the nightingale for the hymn of nature—the soft breathings of love and joy—the strains poured forth amidst the solemn quiet of evening, and in welcoming in the approaching morn,

"Where silence yields
To the night-warbling bird, that now awake, Tunes sweetest his love-labor'd song."

Izaak Walton's eulogy runs thus:—"The nightingale breathes such sweet music out of her† little instrumental throat, that it might make mankind to think that miracles had not ceased. He, that at midnight, when the very labourer sleeps securely, should hear, as I have very often, the clear airs, the sweet descants, the natural rising and falling, the doubling and redoubling of her voice, might well be lifted above earth, and say, 'Lord, what music hast thou provided for the saints in heaven, when thou afforded to bad man such music on earth!'"

Some idea of the superiority of this songster will be afforded, when it is related that the Hon. Daines Barrington, in his table of the comparative merits of birds, with regard to their notes—twenty being the point of perfection—states the nightingale's to be nineteen in mellowness, nineteen in plaintiveness, nineteen in compass, nineteen in duration, and fourteen in sprightliness.

The Encyclopædia Britannica pronounces this bird to sing but ten weeks in the year in a wild state, and ten months in captivity; the error is evident, were it confirmed, the voices of birds would arise more from sorrow than from joy; authority and experience demonstrate that he sings from the time he is mated until the period when the young are hatched, his note then changes to a low hoarse note, expressive of anxiety: soon afterwards he departs.

MOSSFOOT, THE DEMON OF THE RED MAN.

[We extract this article from our able contemporary of New York—The Literary World. It occurs in the course of a series entitled Honae Sketches, and is from the pen of the author of The Yemassee. We so rarely meet a fairy tale of the New World, that our readers will, we are sure, thank us for transferring this to our pages.]

"THE car stops! what can be the matter? There is a screw loose somewhere."

* It is a great error to feed nightingales on flies, they disorganize the digestion of this bird; the consequences have been so suddenly fatal as to induce the supposition that the insects had partaken of poison. The sole remedy is to strew the sand-drawer with ant-mould and ants, scatter a little

Sure enough, there was a screw loose; and, our engineer, with his assistants, was soon busy hammering and tinkering at the wheels of the iron horse. The delay threatened to be a serious one; and the passengers were soon to be seen, white and black, tumbling out in all directions. Our party of four followed the general example, and strolled off to a little hillock, freshly strewn with the decaying leaves of the forest, where we cast ourselves down, waiting events. The woods were still clothed in a most glorious garniture. The trees immediately about us were scrubby oaks, each of which was caparisoned like a young prince in crimson, waiting to be crowned. In the back-ground rose up a pine thicket, solemnly dark in its uniform depth of green. We mused for awhile, and at length naturally resumed the subjects of previous conversation.

German paste on the surface of his food as usual (which he will shun), and continue the ants until he quite recovers.

"Woods and forests seem to be proper places to be haunted," was the remark of one of our companions. "But the spirits, or elves, or fairies, change their character according to the degree of civilization in a country. The English fairies were tricky and playful spirits, full of mischievous fun and fancy, but not malignant. The German elves were demons; and the Brownies of Scotland were scarcely less so—quite as rough, certainly, if less frightful and diabolical. The forest and wild are possessed by demons; the woods by fairies. This seems to be the difference."

"Necessarily; and yet, such as are recognised (were rather) by our early back-woodsmen, do not seem to have been particularly hostile or malicious. From all that I have heard, they belong to the Puck and Robin Goodfellow order of spirits, and are never spiteful, unless when neglected or ill-treated. Our Aborigines, it is true, tell us of darker and sterner beings, who occupied with them the forests. Of these they had greater terrors, and generally converted them into deities, whose wrath they deprecated by worship and sacrifices. The wilder kind of elves whom they knew, they adopted into the family, as it were, making them lares familiares, and naturally seeming to expect from them a sort of domestic service. These could be mischievous, like those of the English, and they sometimes ran away with the venison, and so charmed the bows and arrows, as to defeat for a time, and until the hunter made atonement for his neglect or his offences, his skill and enterprise. There is undoubtedly a strong family likeness running through the elves and demons of all nations, which shows the secret conviction of the soul, making its superstitions to have been derived, in all regions, from the same universal fountains of imagination and thought. The most curious feature in this history is, that a nation succeeds to the phantoms of the people whom it supersedes, even as the Hebrews and other races; the Romans, for example, occasionally borrowed their gods from their neighbours. Among the early settlers of the American forests, there was a clear belief that, though they dispossessed the Indians, their Dii Lares still remained in frequent cases in the old settlement, town, or hunting range, and were to be seen and felt upon occasion. They seemed to belong to the soil rather than the people; and a change in the tribe or nation, so long as the habits of the people remained the same, worked no change in their auspices. This, I suspect, was the true reason why they lingered behind the race by whom they were first recognised. Their offices and influences were the same, and equally essential, so long as there was no decided alteration in the character and civilization of the human family. Now, during the first thirty years after the English colonization of this region, the greater number of the settlers were a wild, rude, uneducated people, whose acquisitions as well as habits were of a sort to make them particularly accessible to superstitious influences. I need not tell you that, where there is no faith, there are no spectres;—we lose our capacity to perceive the supernatural, in due degree, as common reason opens to us, and satisfies us with the natural. But our early colonists had made few advances, and were nearly as rude, in most respects, as the Indians. They became hunters and graziers, and found themselves under the same influences through which the Indian had been made sensible of the spiritual in his forests. They also became acquainted, through tradition, with the elves and deities of the red man. These revived and strengthened the early superstitions of the European races, from which they sprang; and, in the lone depths of the forest, with the crash of winds among the trees, and the deep sighing of the midnight breeze, spectral images became necessary to supply the solitude with associations. The heart rather encourages such indications under such influences. Poverty and toil, in particular, perpetually crave a supernatural sympathy, as a substitute for that which wealth and society deny. Accordingly, the hermit, hunter, farmer, or grazier, remote from the world, in solemn, silent depths of the forest, becomes singularly susceptible of all the changes of the seasons, of the atmosphere, stars, and suns, and, through these, finds his sensibilities continually awakening to other and more occult influences. It is easy to find elves where we desire them. Our early peasantry had their familiars of the forest, with whom, in some cases, they lived on terms of singular intimacy. Ordinarily, what they knew of them was singularly vague and uncertain. They were conscious of strange noises, night and day, about them in the woods, particularly on the edges of the swamp and thicket; and sometimes they heard sounds of inscrutable character about the dwelling; occasionally, glimpses were had of strange forms flitting suddenly from sight; and occasionally, at dusk, the clown was startled by the rude outlines of a form—which could not be considered human, but which was too closely akin to it not to command human respect and sympathy—which rose up suddenly beside the path. Pursued, a strangely-distorted stump stood in place of the spectre. On one occasion, a woodman, thus startled and disappointed in this manner, is said to have struck the hatchet into the stump, and to have been terrified at an awful yell of pain and fury which instantly followed the blow. He took to his heels, and when, next day, he returned to the spot, he found no stump at all, but the earth was damp all around it, and the place was quickly covered with mushrooms. The story further relates, that the same woodman, using his axe upon a log, but a short time after, by some strange eccentricity of aim, struck off his left hand—a mishap only to be ascribed to the revengeful elf whom he had so wantonly smitten in the shape of a stump. The people seldom spoke freely in relation to these mysterious beings; they had an opinion that they did not like to be made subjects of conversation or scrutiny. They would show themselves to, and actually serve, the individual to whom they took a liking; haunting a particular household, and doing little offices where they were well treated. It was found, too, that they relished some varieties of human food, vegetable mostly, and were particularly fond of fruits. They ate Indian corn and peas, such as the Indians planted; but were better pleased with sweet potatoes and ground nuts (pindars or ground peas): of these latter they made great havoc, whenever they got a chance. A peck of them has disappeared in a night, nothing but the hulls (shells) remaining in proof of their dexterity and appetite. Of course, the house-keeper knew not whom to suspect; but they gave the quid for all that they got. They rendered useful service. They accumulated piles of wood for the fireplace when nobody saw; they drew water, and kept the bucket always full; and sometimes, when bear or wolf came about the habitation, they led the dogs out on the hunt at midnight. Bear and deer were said to have been found in the morning, with the hounds gorged, standing over them; the wounds upon the bear resembling those struck by a hatchet. As they were well treated by a family, their intimacy increased, and they have been occasionally known to sleep upon the threshold, of a night, looking for all the world like the stump of a pine sapling cased in bark, and wrapped up in moss and leaves. Shape they seemed to have none; a crude, unsightly mass, with short bodies, long arms, big heads, red complexions, and small eyes. They could laugh—a sort of yell and chuckle, hoarse, but shrill, and delivered spasmodically. But the glimpses had of them were always so brief as to baffle close observation. With faculties differing from those of the white man, and apparently inferior, (as they seemed in some degree dependent upon his favours,) they had yet a corresponding capacity to do him service, and to render him help in situations where he could do little for himself. The Indians in all the tribes knew this particular sort of household or domestic fairy, and valued his attentions properly. In some of the southern nations, he went by the name of Logoochie. What the word signifies, we have never been able to ascertain."

"A curious history, but nothing is seen of these beings now;—I mean, nobody now professes to assert or credit their existence?"

"Of that I cannot say! We hear nothing now-a-days, at least, and the region has undergone too great a change not to make us apprehend that our Indian elves are tolerated no longer. They have probably followed the tribes; or, if they linger still, are undiscernable in any way by the small faith of those who occupy the country. There are superstitions now, but of a different character. I fancy the revolutionary war put a full extinguisher upon the aboriginal legends. It suspended, by stronger characteristics, those of the fancy and imagination. But, very possibly, up to that period, the familiars of the red men continued to exercise their employments, and to maintain a certain reputation. There is a story of the olden time, when the settlements of the English colonists were chiefly confined to the rivers Ashley and Cooper, with a small group, here and there, on the Santee and Savannah, which I heard in my childhood, and which concerns this very neighbourhood, and relates to this very class of Indian goblins. The hero of it was a simple woodman, named Perkins or Larkins, I don't recollect which, but we will call him Larkins. He formed one of a class of whom we every now and then encounter a specimen still surviving—a tame, poor-spirited, good-natured, lazy creature,—who had not the proper energies of manhood, and, having neither the world's goods nor gear, yet never made the slightest effort to secure them. How he lived, people could not well say, but his reputed business was that of a woodcutter. He was occasionally employed by men of substance in the city, who owned lands along the Cooper and the Ashley, to cut and haul wood for them, either to the city, or to their boats upon the river. They allowed him to occupy a shanty whenever they employed him, upon the estate where he cut his wood. This was either fuel, or timber for shipping; at this occupation, chiefly, did he get his bread; but he was too indolent to make the labour profitable. He saved nothing, and a week or ten days' labour generally exhausted him; when he would lounge about the woods with an old gun, seeking squirrels or partridges, quite as much for sport as food. He was a listless, good-natured dog, with a small rheumatic sort of humour, and went about whistling or singing, when he had not a stiver in his pocket, or a potatoe in the ashes. In this region was he born; here he had lived all his life, and he never thought so greatly of improving his fortune, as at any time to meditate seeking it elsewhere. To roam the woods, to squat down at camp fires with the hunters or the waggoners, sing rude songs, and tell rough stories, and hear them, occasionally making a trip to the city, to lay in his small supplies of tobacco, sugar, coffee, and perhaps one bottle of Jamaica rum, never more at a time, for Larkins was temperate withal; these furnished the chief excitements of his life. Occasionally, he might be found making merry with his fiddle at some of the great plantations along the river, for he could draw a sharp bow, could Larkins, at Christmas, or other seasons of merry-making, when the young people happened to hear of his being in the neighbourhood. Though poor as Job's turkey, Larkins does not seem to have been much troubled with anxiety, and if not a rollocking blade, was at least not a desponding one. He felt assured that he could always make his daily bread, and he had a most religious disregard of what the morrow should bring forth. With slouched hat and homespun garments, he rambled in the woods, or hewed his timber, or fiddled for the young folks, or for himself in his lonely cabin, and gave himself but little concern about the improvement of his condition or his resources. He lived, something as a squatter, for a long period on the estates of a wealthy proprietor on Cooper river, in a spot very nearly parallel to that which we now occupy. His cabin was made of logs, and in one of the loneliest parts of the forest. This, as I said before, was a long while before the revolution, and when the condition of the country was very different from what it is at present. He was tolerated in his abode, as he was frequently employed by the proprietor of the lands upon which he squatted. Here he fiddled, or whistled, or sung, when the day was over, sitting beside a rousing fire, for which the surrounding woods afforded him fuel in abundance. Here, at length, he had reason to think that he was not wholly companionless. He could detect noises at his door at night, sometimes a hoarse chuckle as of laughter, and particularly when he had finished some of his merry tunes. Occasionally, he was startled to perceive the singular and sudden diminution in his sack of corn, or peas, or potatoes, or ground-nuts, for which he could never account. That he should be robbed was very surprising, for everybody regarded him with kindness. Among the negroes, who were the persons he at first suspected, he was quite a favourite, as well on account of his fiddle as his fun. To protect his property he at length got himself a padlock, for, hitherto, his cabin door had never known the security of bolt or bar. But his lock was broken the first night after it was put on, and Larkins never thought to provide another. His provisions still disappeared, and while he somewhat wondered at the circumstance, he never allowed it to give him much uneasiness. Indeed, whatever might be the extent of the loss, he was soon reconciled to it. He began to have suspicions that the robbery was effected by a trespasser against whom he could obtain no damages, and towards whom he felt no resentments. Larkins was not without his superstitions. He had heard old stories, along the river, about the Indian elf, Logoochie, and, in his solitary life, these stories grew into a faith. The need of a companion soon found him one. As the heart craves, will it pray, and as it prays will it find. He remembered to have wished that Logoochie would come about his cabin, as he was reported to have come about the cabins of the people, who had by no means given the intruder a gentle reception. For his part, he should be glad to welcome the red goblin. Larkins may not have said so much in words, or aloud, but he felt thus, and very soon after he became aware of his losses in grain, potatoes, and ground-nuts; while he grew conscious, at the same time, of corresponding benefits. The game grew plentiful about his wigwam. He could always tumble one or more fox or cat squirrels from his roost-trees. He stumbled over vast flocks of partridges, sometimes five hundred in a gang; and almost every afternoon, he happened upon a fat rabbit leaping along his pathway. This was all very well calculated to reconcile our woodman to his petty losses; and he unhesitatingly ascribed his good fortune to the weird influence of the Indian demon who was the depredator upon his stores. Even if he sometimes questioned this influence, he was not permitted to question other facts in his experience, which could be ascribed to no other cause. If his stores disappeared during his absence, he found himself supplied by the same mysterious visitor with things which seemed intended to compensate him for them. From this time he never had occasion to supply himself with wood and water. Huge piles of oak and lightwood were always to be found in the corner of his room, and his bucket of water was always full and fresh from the spring. He resigned himself gracefully enough to the wizard influence which thus provided for his comforts, and saw his stores of corn and peas diminish daily, in supplying the demands of two mouths instead of one; the Logoochie was evidently a great feeder. Besides, Larkins now had companionship. He was never lonesome. His violin, as we have said, found a listener nightly without his cabin, and an eldritch, but not disagreeable chuckle of satisfaction, acknowledged the excellence of his reels. As time advanced, Larkins sometimes found himself welcomed, on his return home, by strange creakings of his favourite instrument, which saluted his ears when within fifty or a hundred yards from his home; but he never found the goblin at the instrument, nor was it ever injured by his uncouth performances. Logoochie drew a severe bow, but never a musical one; and the tones from the violin, when in his hands, were uniformly monotonous—a mere sawing to and fro of the bow, as if drawn by exceedingly long and heavy arms. At length the woodman obtained glimpses of the creature. He was now conscious of a strange shape sidling into the wigwam, at the late hours of night; when lying in a state between sleep and waking, he saw the fire about to sink, and when the crimson shadows were growing faint upon the wall, he could see the strange visitor, a mere outline, short, thick, and seemingly wrapped in bark and moss, throw himself down beside the fire, and there lie till morning; stealing away with the first grey streaks of dawn. Larkins felt extremely happy in this sort of companionship. He had a sense of society, associated with a superior sense of safety. He lost nothing. He feared no enemies, and he had no wants. His petty affairs prospered as they had never done before; he worked more regularly, more successfully, and accumulated the means for more expensive luxuries. He soon found that he needed them. The goblin's wants increased also. Larkins soon found that he began to prey upon his coffee as he had preyed upon his grain; eating the parched berries with avidity, without requiring them to be ground, and dissolved into the purple beverage. It was necessary to check this penchant of Logoochie, and the good-natured woodman, after a good deal of cogitation, concluded that the only way to do this was to teach his companion the proper method of using it; in other words, to make a sufficient supply of the coffee nightly for the use of his eldritch guest, and inform him of his wishes. He did so one night, when, after a long flourish upon his violin, he was apprised, by the chuckling from without, that Logoochie was at his post. He laid down his fiddle, and brought out his calabash of ground coffee. He knew that the goblin was watching all his movements. He poured out a more than double portion of the grain, separating it at first into two parts. This done, he apostrophized the listener, to whom he had long since given the name of 'Old Moosfoot,' on account of his sly and stealthy movements.

"Moosfoot," says he, "old boy, coffee ain't to be eaten like peas or corn; it's to be drunk, jest as you drink water. Now, you see, here's more than enough to make two quarts of the liquor. This heap here would make a leetle under one quart, and, seeing as how that was always enough for me, of a night, I reckon, if I more than double it, the rest will be quite enough for you. Now, you see, I'll put both together, and give it a great b'iling. When it's done, I'll put mine in this mug, and put the bigger mug on the window for you. I'll sweeten it fair, and you must drink just as you see me drink. So, old boy, you'll understand. You mustn't eat any more of the coffee. Taint the nateral way to use it, no how."

A chuckle of approbation from without, followed his speech, by which he understood that the terms of compact were quite agreeable. Sure enough, the coffee was placed, according to arrangement, upon the sill of the open window, and very soon disappeared. Larkins quietly drank his share, never once looking up. But after awhile a good-natured grunt at the window caused him to turn his eyes in that direction, and there he beheld the pitcher. He suffered it to remain awhile, then took it in, without seeing anybody, and, filling his pipe, he proceeded to smoke, aware, from long experience, that the fumes of the tobacco was always grateful to the nostrils of his goblin, though he was never conscious of any disposition on the part of the latter to "blow a cloud" himself. He puffed for an hour by his fireside, in a condition of great content with the world around him, then played a few tunes upon his violin, and retired for the night to his mattress of "shuck and moss." For a while he lay awake, and, before he slept, he heard his door creak upon its hinges, and distinguished the rude outlines of his companion as he quietly entered, and stretched himself, a mere log, enveloped in bark and moss, in front of the decaying embers. The events of this one evening were of nightly recurrence, with little variation, for months afterwards. Still, Larkins prospered after a moderate fashion; increasing his profits in a small way, and multiplying his own comforts and those of Logoochie. At length he was invited by no less a person than the Landgrave, or Baron, upon whose estate he was a squatter. You know that, in Carolina, under the institutions ascribed to Locke and Shaftesbury, we had a provincial nobility: a Landgrave was one of the highest rank, next to that of Palatine, and by the laws of the province, was required to own at least twenty-four thousand acres of land. The title survived, by courtesy, the abolition of the legal distinction. The Landgrave in question, whose name is no longer remembered, was a North Briton, and a very avaricious and selfish person. He had driven up from the city, on the route to his stately residence on Cooper river, and had taken a somewhat circuitous progress, in order to see Larkins. His purpose was to set him to work as a woodcutter; one of many whom he employed to load a couple of schooners which he kept continually plying between his plantation and the city. He found no difficulty in engaging Larkins, at a very low price, paying him by the cord of wood for his labour. His waggons were to arrive weekly, at the clearing ground, to haul away to the river the wood as it was accumulated. The contract made, the Landgrave disappeared—a stately personage who terribly awed our simple woodman, by his pride and splendour; and, the next day, the labour was begun, in the immediate neighbourhood of Larkins's wigwam. The good fellow hewed all day with tolerable industry, and supposed himself to have cut up, perhaps, a couple of cords. But he did not measure it, and went to bed somewhat more tired than usual. For him, indeed, the day's work had been a hard one. In the night he did not see the goblin appear, as before; though the pot of coffee, placed on the window, had been drunk, and he had heard his chuckle one or twice without the wigwam. But it seemed to him that he could hear, in the pauses of the night, the sound of an axe in the wood; a notion, however, which he ascribed to his dreams, which might naturally be supposed to run upon the labours of the day. When, however, he went to work next morning, he was struck by the appearance of a greater pile than he had left the evening before. This might be a fancy also, so he congratulated himself on his own efficiency, and went to work with renewed vigour. Next night, he again fancied that he heard his axe, and the next day he was again impressed with the unexpected magnitude of his pile; and so it continued throughout the week. When he proceeded to cord his wood, it far exceeded all his calculations. The waggon was filled, and filled, and still there was much more wood. The Landgrave, who was profiting by the wants of the city, was compelled to send the waggon thrice a week, and, finally, every day. Larkins was making money. The amount paid to him was quite enormous, in his humble imagination. He felt where his gratitude was due. He increased his supplies of coffee and sugar, and doubled his allowance to his serviceable goblin, whose increased chucklings betrayed his increased satisfaction. Our Landgrave, not satisfied with his own gains, was now intent on diminishing those of the woodcutter. He paid him a second visit, in the same state as before; and the simple Larkins was persuaded to a new contract, in which, instead of being paid for the quantity cut—by the cord,—he was paid by the day for his labour. The Landgrave thus withdrew the stimulus to performance as well from Goblin as Woodman. His calculations were not based upon any just knowledge of human nature, or any proper consideration of the motives by which it was influenced. The consequence might have been foreseen. The supplies of wood fell prodigiously. Larkins was conscious, himself, of very far inferior results from his own labours; and he was now struck with the additional fact, that his piles, instead of increasing nightly, as before, now underwent a singular diminution. But his pay must nevertheless continue the same, and so he suffered from no serious annoyance. Not so with our Landgrave. Being really anxious for the wood, his purpose in making the new bargain with Larkins, was, not to lessen the supply, but to lessen the compensation. When he found that the quantity furnished from this quarter was so greatly diminished, he paid the woodman a third visit, in the same state as before, in a fine carriage drawn by four horses, and attended by outriders in a rich livery of gold and green. He found Larkins languidly at work in the forest. He alighted from his vehicle and approached him. He spoke to him sharply, as having defrauded him of his rightful labour—spoke to him, in short, as, in that day, nobility and wealth were but too apt to speak to poverty and dependence,—as one speaks to a worthless dog, or a lazy horse. In doing so, he leaned against a short stump, seemingly a very old tree, and was suddenly pierced as by a thorn. He started up with a slight cry, and turned to examine the stump, but he found no thorn, and ascribed the hurt to some sliver or splinter of the wood. The stump looked innocent enough. Larkins only smiled, looked affectionately at it, but said nothing. The result of the visit was favourable to our woodcutter. The Landgrave had to resume the old arrangement, paying Larkins by the cord, instead of by his day labour. Then followed the history, as before. The wood accumulated amazingly, beyond all previous experience. The night, to Larkins's eyes, seemed to double fully the showings of the day. His own prowess increased in like proportion; and, wondering at results so infinitely superior to those produced by the toils of any other of his employés, our Landgrave proceeded again to visit our woodcutter, as well in the hope to drive some better bargain, as to inquire into the secret of such great performance. As before, he found Larkins in the wood, and busy with the fate of his forest victims. Never did the stately visitor behold such rapid execution. The green heads of the great trees went down thundering in the twinkling of an eye. The havoc was very fearful. Great gaps of an acre were made daily in the thick woods. The measured cords rose like great batteries on every hand. The axe revolved like lightning around the head of the woodcutter, and every stroke seemed to bury itself fatally in the hearts of the most gigantic victims. Larkins seemed to require few pauses, and but little rest. At such periods, however, the Landgrave observed that he drew nigh to a short rugged stump of an ancient tree, that seemed a nondescript, on the top of which lay probably a dozen of the smaller gourds or calabashes, such as the farmers of the country used as drinking vessels. These might contain from two gills to a pint. The Landgrave saw that each of these was stopped with a cork made of the light wood called the tupelo. Our woodman emptied one of these at one draught. Then he renewed his toils with wonderful increase of strength. He scarcely seemed to flag after an hour's incessant chopping. He paused only to renew his draught. The Landgrave was curious. He drew nigh to the stump, took up one of the gourds, and had succeeded in drawing the stopper and testing the liquor—when he suddenly felt a heavy strike on the side of his head, as from one of the calabashes. His eyes flashed fire, and, furious as a wild beast, he lifted his whip, and, with a terrible oath, struck desperately at poor Larkins, to whom he ascribed the blow. But the lash was caught in an ungainly branch of a stunted tree, that had entirely escaped his sight before, and was thus jerked suddenly out of his hand. Bitter were the imprecations which he bestowed upon our wood-cutter, who found it difficult to persuade him that he had not administered the blow. Looking up, the secret seemed to explain itself. A dozen calabashes were hanging by their vines in the branches overhead. That one of them should have descended upon his scone, just at that moment, was something of a coincidence, but nothing more; and the humble assurances, and the submission and very regretful demeanour of our wood-cutter, served to mollify the wrath of the baron. When he became quieted, he remembered the taste of the liquor with which he had been allowed only to wet his throat, and was reminded that it was gratefully pleasant, of a nutty flavour, slightly sweet, and somewhat oleaginous. What could it be? He determined to taste again, and again resorted to the calabashes. This time, however, the result was not so satisfactory; and he dropped the calabash as soon as he had swallowed. The liquor was now of a nauseous bitter. Unfortunately, with the most pleasant recollections of his previous taste, and, resolved not again to be disappointed, he had eagerly gulped an entire mouthful. The result was such a spluttering and spitting, such a coughing, and such contortions, on the part of the nobleman, that Larkins was fain to lay down the axe, and yield himself up entirely to laughter. But he dared not. He was too greatly in awe of the dignitary. What, however, he dared not do, was done with impunity by his double. Such a chuckling ensued throughout the forest, seeming, in a sudden, to arise from every possible quarter, that the Landgrave recoiled in horror.

“What does it mean, Larkins?”

“Ah, Lord! your honour, there's no telling! These are mighty strange woods, I tell you! They're full of sperrits! I hear 'em pretty often, with all sorts of noises.”

The visit of the Landgrave was not much prolonged after this. He paid Larkins a sum of money in gold, and hurriedly took his leave. When he was gone, our woodman gravely addressed the stump at his left hand, while he indulged in a quiet chuckle also. "Ah! Moss-foot, but 'twas a sound whack you 'gin him, and the proud old Lucifer deserved it. He's no feeling for a poor fellow. I'd like to lick him myself, but that's impossible, and I'm not sorry you 'gin it to him!" The goblin chuckled in turn; both parties were well satisfied and that night the fiddle of Larkins sounded more lively in the ears of Logoochie than ever.

THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF HEINRICH HEINE.

(Translated from the "Revue des Deux Mondes.")

IN studying attentively the history of Germany from the time of Goethe and Hegel, the most obvious feature which arrests our attention is the feverish agitation manifested on various points by its intellectual and moral life. Goethe and Hegel—the one in the region of art, the other in the order of deep thought—represented, with a kind of majestic power, the course of the German mind during more than half a century. This course, originated by such a man as Lessing, and guided by the most daring minds, in an age of scepticism and innovation, was not accomplished without doing violence to many creeds, without destroying numerous customs, formerly the charm and honour of this country. Goethe's impassible serenity, Hegel's almost familiar tranquillity, concealed these changes in the national genius, and public feeling reassured by the calmness of its leaders appeared also determined to banish all thought of alarm. On their death, a sudden change took place: the generation which they had brought up soon protested impatiently against the cold and circumspect gravity of their fathers; the veil fell, the mists were dispelled, and it was soon discovered that a new Germany had sprung into existence.

What was to be the character of the new Germany? This was a question to which she herself could not give a very definite reply. It was evident to all that she was about to issue from the regions of abstraction, and step into the real world. A transformation of this nature required the aid of years, and could only produce its proper fruits and accomplish its work without destroying the essential traditions of a great people, by gradual and slow development. Yet the most legitimate revolutions are not those which most implicitly obey the dictates of reason. In this transformation, undertaken so hastily, how many were the precious treasures destroyed by ruthless hands! how numerous the venerable souvenirs insultingly consigned to oblivion!

Everything that impeded the march of the innovators was numbered among the antiquities of a bygone age, and these edifices of philosophy and art, these temples roared, as saith the Latin poet, by the noble science of sages, strewed the soil with their ruins. Hence the peculiar aspect of German literature during the last twenty years; hence the singular confusion in which the most opposite inspirations, the great and the mean, the serious and the frivolous, the true and the false, in vain aspire to impracticable harmony. The past illumines the present with its lustre; the loftiest poetry is frequently found united to the most ordinary thoughts; ideal reveries are associated with the most unblushing materiality;—in a word, the most singular and indelible marks of connection subsist between ancient Germany and the Germany of our own day, which so determinately renounces its ancestors. Treasures of olden times, although insultingly dissipated, or employed for ignoble purposes, are continually to be met with; and the atheist is heard speaking the language of the priest. Extraordinary collection of similarities and contrasts! One may reasonably expect to meet with remarkable peculiarities in such a period. If it cannot boast of unity, it will at least be distinguished by variety; in order to describe it, we must not only produce one or other of its poets, but we must instance the restless grief of some, the venomous satire of others, and the laborious efforts of all; we must summon, one by one, numerous characters which bear no resemblance one towards another.

"Edita doctrina sapientum templa serena,"

Nevertheless, there is a writer who appears to comprise in his own person the agitation of the last twenty years—in whom all dissimilarities appeared to be combined. He is gifted with the most fertile imagination, with singular talent for poetry and satire, and with a vigorous intellect 'peculiarly' qualified for the position which he occupies. Neither the philosophy nor poetry of the preceding age are unknown to him: he comprehends all the problems of science, he possesses all the treasures of art, and merrily bears the artillery of ancient Germany in the midst of the revolutionary expeditions of an emancipated generation. None but himself could thus smile in the midst of ruins. With infantine cruelty, with sadness mingled with indifference, he appears to delight in raising flowers on the field of death—flowers lovely, yet poisoned! Perfumes of every species there meet, and are united, and it is impossible to inhale them without experiencing at once pleasure and sorrow. Is he sad? Is he joyous? Is it the triumph of the free-thinker that sparkles in his gaiety? Is it the melancholy of the disappointed poet that lies concealed under the mask of irony? Doubt on this point is indeed permissible—or rather, we may affirm, that these two opposite sentiments form in him an union which composes the very originality of his works. It is assuredly the free-thinker who makes the haughty declaration:—"I have never considered poetry as aught but a sacred toy, a means consecrated to a divine end. Whether my songs are praised or blamed, it matters little to me; place a sword on my grave after my decease—yes, a sword! for I have ever been a good soldier in the war of deliverance for the human race." But the poet is no less sincere when he exclaims:—"My poem is the dream of a summer's night; it has no object, like life, like love!" Or, again:—"I am the last songster in the boundless and vernal forests of romance." Unite these two opposite ideas; picture the harmony which these contrasts, when blended, will produce; form a complete being of this valiant free-thinker and this poet enamoured of his fancy, and you will have the representative of the period that succeeded Goethe and Hegel; you will have the author of the Reisebilder and the Book of Songs, the author of Atta-Troll and the Romancero—the brilliant, the fanciful, the incomprehensible Heinrich Heine.

We have now an opportunity of appreciating the complete works of Herr Heine. Formerly, amidst the brilliant productions of an inexhaustible imagination, and the various parts acted by the humorist, criticism naturally hesitated in passing an opinion; it could but follow the rapid flight of his imagination, mark the phases of his evolutions, and indicate the connection of the poet's writings with the times in which they were composed, and the influence he designed them to exercise. Henrich Heine has now completed the circle of his poetry, his entire works are before us, and we can, as it were, cause his whole life to pass in review before our eyes. His life has been one continued act of homage to fancy; it will end as it commenced, with the charming gaiety and poetic aspirations of youth. In vain have years succeeded years—in vain has agonising and relentless suffering placed her leaden hands on his winged fancy—imagination has triumphed and soared "to the heights that overlook creation." Behold him on his sick couch; admire his pensive and intelligent countenance, which testifies at once to physical suffering and mental tranquillity! The delicate and interesting features, the faint smile of the lips, the half-closed eyes, bear undeniable marks of impassable calmness, of the triumph of humour over the most cruel sufferings that fall to the lot of man.

The scholastic terms, sensuality and spirituality, appear to be incorrectly applied in connection with him. The soul of his poetry is, strictly, neither ideal enthusiasm, nor love of material beauty, but humour—humour! that literary mysticism peculiar to the north; fanciful garb of intelligence, concealing grief beneath joy, and tenderness beneath jest; delicate irony, establishing itself on the highest pinnacles of thought, and clothing the universe in its all comprehensive soft veil; sporting playfully with heaven and earth, with the real as well as the ideal.

As we found Heinrich Heine five-and-twenty years ago, when writing the satirical pages of the Reisebilder—young, fearless, at once joyous and sad—the very same do we now find him, triumphing over grief by poetry, and inditing the brilliant stanzas of the Romancero.

Heinrich Heine was born on the banks of the Rhine, in the city of Düsseldorf. The date of his birth has not hitherto been rightly ascertained by his biographers: they almost all assign it to 1800; the real date is 1799. The following lines which he has given to satisfy our curiosity, will furnish not only the definitive solution of a doubtful question, but also additional information respecting the mind of the poet:—

"My health is too delicate at present to permit me to furnish you with notes; I can merely inform you that the date of my birth has not been correctly stated in the biographies you may have seen of me. This inaccuracy, I confess, between ourselves, arises from an error voluntarily committed in my favour, at the time of the Prussian invasion, to withdraw me from the service of his Majesty the King of Prussia. Since that period, all our family archives have been destroyed in various conflagrations, at Hamburg. On consulting the register of my baptism, I find indicated as the date of my birth, December 12, 1799. The most important part is that I was bred and born on the banks of the Rhine, where, at the age of sixteen, I composed a poem on Napoleon. You will find it in the Buch der Lieder, under the title of Les Deux Grenadiers. It will show you how ardently I then worshipped the Emperor. My ancestors belonged to the Jewish faith; I was never proud of this origin, neither have I ever boasted of being a Lutheran, although I belong to the evangelical faith as sincerely as the most devout among my enemies at Berlin, who always censure me for want of religion. I was humiliated at being compelled to acknowledge myself a mere human being; for Hegel's philosophy had made me think myself a god. How proud was I of my divinity! What an exalted idea I had of my greatness! That was a glorious period. Alas! it is long since passed, and I cannot think of it without sadness, now that I am miserably stretched on my couch, and my disease is making fearful progress."

This melancholy cheerfulness and innocent playfulness, which even on his death-bed, have not forsaken him, have been from childhood the peculiar characteristics of Heinrich Heine. Add to these a brilliant imagination, which he has ever most implicitly obeyed, and you will have a picture of this charming poet. His irony, whenever he does not do violence to his nature, is not that injurious sarcasm which infects and withers everything; it is a sympathetic irony, if we may be permitted to associate two such words. He collects a thousand different ideas; he yields to opposite sentiments; then he confronts and satirizes them—but how delicate is his satire! or, if it be irritated and bitter, how much of tenderness and compassion for mankind does it conceal! When, in his childhood, he was reading the adventures of Don Quixote, he frequently wept from anger at finding the valiant knight's heroism so pitifully rewarded. Forget not this childish anger, and, despite the opinion of the world, despite even the lamentable faults of the author, believe that there is often much Don Quixotism in his wildest flights. He also relates, that at the Franciscan convent of Dusseldorf, where he passed his earliest years, he used to gaze with pious awe upon a large wooden figure of Christ, the mournful features of whose countenance filled his heart with anguish. From that time, to the period of the philosophic conferences at Berlin, when he adopted Hegel's opinions, he opened his heart to numerous conflicting influences; and, strange as it may appear, it was precisely this open and generous disposition of his mind that fed his gaiety. What would have been to others a source of serious reflection, became to him the aliment of ceaseless irony. We may imagine what such irony comprises, and how painfully the ideas, emotions, and systems of the most agitated of ages are blended in his joyous satires. He is suffering himself, but humour alleviates his pain. In the midst of the cruelty for which we censure him—in the midst of the temerity which has contributed in so large a measure to alienate him from his country, an attentive observer will always discover in his work evidences of natural tenderness. He possesses sympathies which he seeks in vain to conceal; he comprehends the peculiar genius of every age. Antiquity and the middle ages—Jews, Greeks, Christians—he loves them all, and satirizes them all equally. In the midst of the accents of his ironical voice, listen attentively and you will be surprised by tones of singular sweetness, these are caused by the recollections of childhood recurring to the mind when least anticipated. When he ridicules the ancient customs of his native land, he does it with infantine grace, by repeating the songs of his nurse; and when he ventures to attack, under the name of Hegel's philosophy, the most sacred of all creeds, he will yet remember the crucifix of the Franciscan convent, and the tearful eyes which were so earnestly fixed on him.

On leaving the Franciscan convent of Dusseldorf, where he had been instructed during his childhood, he entered the public school of that town, and a few years after, in 1819, commenced the study of jurisprudence, at the university of Bonn. After remaining two years in that city, he proceeded to Goettingue and thence to Berlin, where, under the tuition of Hegel, he devoted himself especially to philosophical science. When scarcely twenty-two years of age, he was associated with all those men of Berlin who were renowned for literary labours. Hegel, the juriconsult Edward Gans, the talented writer Varnhagen d'Ense and his celebrated wife Rahel, the great philologist Franz Bopp and the poet Chamisso, were the patrons of this young man, who had already distinguished himself by his resolute independence and sparkling humour.

At Berlin, H. Heine also met with a writer well known in Germany, both by his curious dramas and the eccentricity of his life—namely, Grabbe. H. Heine lived in intimate friendship with the unhappy poet, whose wild fancy formed so striking a contrast to the phlegmatic temperament of the inhabitants of Berlin.

Louis Boerne, the talented civilian, like Heine, enjoyed the friendship of the littérati of Berlin; but all that he remarked in this choice circle was the operation of the intellectual powers, the victories of the mind; as to philosophy itself, he was indifferent. Thus, of these two remarkable men, the most serious and most rigid in his principles has ever entertained an aversion to those systems of metaphysics so dear to the German nation; whilst he, on the contrary, who has been censured for the frivolity of his caprices, was once hopelessly buried in the abstruse problems of moral philosophy. Marks of these studies are frequently to be found in his writings—even in the most brilliant and lively. Thus the irony of Heinrich Heine is much more bold and comprehensive than that of Louis Boerne, thus he can sport with the universe, and thus the alarming doctrines of his master have furnished an inexhaustible provision for his imagination. Think not that even all the formulas of Hegel's philosophy had power to chain his fancy; for whilst the master was introducing his pupil to his arcana, the poet forgot not his work. The pupil of Berlin's great philosopher had just published his first verses, those which, under the title of Junge Leiden, form the commencement of the Book of Songs. Two years later, in 1823, appeared another collection containing two dramas—Almanzor and Rutcliff—which were acted on the stage and received very unfavourably. A lyric poem, under the title of Intermezzo, was inserted between these two dramatic pieces, which, notwithstanding their ill-success, are far from contemptible.

In 1825, appeared the first volume of the Reisebilder, (Pictures of Journeys,) which signalized the young poet as the leader in a literary revolution.

The Buch der Lieder and the Reisebilder, are, both in poetry and prose, the commencement of a new era in German letters. These two works lead the van, and complete each other; they are inseparable. In the Reisebilder appeared, for the first time, many of the most beautiful pieces with which the Buch der Lieder is enriched; and in the Buch der Lieder the author sings the brilliant and humorous poem on which the Reisebilder forms so admirable a commentary.

How magnificent a poem is this! What exquisite rhythm! What power of language does it contain! At times it is plaintive as the voice of a suffering child; at others it is sonorous as the clarion of war; and again it resembles a voice from the infernal regions. The book commences with the sorrows of a young heart tried, at the age of twenty years, by the bitterest grief. He loved, and believed himself loved; but she to whose charms he had surrendered his heart became the bride of another. "Do you know the old song?" asks the poet, "do you know the old song which so many hearts have sung?" Thus he commences; and the old song, the monotonous lament, becomes animated and vigorous in his stanzas, so full of pathos. At a later period, he will avenge himself by satire; at present, he seeks not to conceal his sorrow, and his grief is so sincere, his style so pure, and the imagery he employs so touching and suitable, it is impossible not to be affected.

The following ballads—Don Ramiro, Les Deux Frères, and Les Grenadiers—are earnest of the future greatness of the poet; they are bold sketches made during the intervals of suffering. After these, he again returns to the melancholy subject by which he commenced, and in a series of poems, entitled Intermezzo, he continues the description of his grief. This inimitable composition consists of sighs, tears, mournful dreams, and, at times, even of cries realized, if we may so speak. It is truly an extraordinary production—a diamond of the first water—nothing more perfect in the whole range of poetry can be conceived. There is nothing harsh or dissonant in the accuracy of his measures; for accuracy is united with the most touching sweetness, and the most melodious tones. It would be impossible even for the most talented interpreter to clothe these powerful and lovely images in any other idiom: the Lieder of Schubert alone can convey the same idea of utter desolation and misery by a few rapid passages. Instead of launching forth into invectives, instead of reproaching her who has broken his heart, he seeks only to tranquillize his grief. He nurses it tenderly, with singular care; he sings to himself; he relates dreams, and summons before his mind's eye countless images of unparalleled loveliness. What mother could invent more soothing language to comfort her newly-born, weeping babe? Yet, under the infantine harmony of this lament, his grief is still perceptible; and the contrast between the words and sentiments is painfully touching. Nevertheless, the beauty of the poem is triumphant; we follow the writer throughout his reverie; we do not refuse the bitterness so poetically veiled; when suddenly we are awakened by the piercing cry:—

"How can'st thou sleep in tranquillity, knowing that I am yet alive! My dormant anger will shortly awake, and I will cast off my fetters.

"Knowest thou the old song of the young man who, after death, comes at midnight to seek his beloved one, and drags her to the bottom of the grave!

"Believe me, oh, beauteous child! oh, wondrously lovely child! I am yet living, and am more powerful than all the dead united."

It is no longer the author of the Intermezzo who thus speaks; it is the author of a new series, entitled Heimkehr (The Return). The poet, after his journeys, returns to the scenes of his former sufferings; he is still sad, still broken-hearted, but on the present occasion he attempts not to calm his feelings. The universe has lost the beauty whose praises he once sung; broken vows, wounded affections have, by their dull glimmer, revealed to his disenchanted eyes all the miseries of human kind. He plunges himself in the deepest abyss of melancholy and exults in the mournful images then presented to his mind. No order, no law can he discover; but everywhere evil, everywhere impotence or contradiction, everywhere "the irony which God has placed in his universe, and which the great poet of Don Quixote has imitated in his."

This series of bitter stanzas forms the centre of the Buch der Lieder; it is like a volcanic eruption taking place between the confiding youth of the author and the experience which is on the eve of avenging itself. The union of sadness and anger, of departing serenity and awakening irony, is truly remarkable. The subdued lament of the Intermezzo is succeeded by indignant words and gloomy images, united at intervals to humour, although as yet it is but melancholy humour.

In the second part of the Buch der Lieder, the poet appears to be employed only in refuting the first; having been deceived himself, he delights in endeavouring to prevent others from believing and trusting. Heavenly joy no longer gladdens his heart, therefore will he sing the calamities of nature, the dark night of the world. How frightful is the inspiration by which he is possessed, when he represents the gods of the heathen world devastating the Christian paradise! Irrational deities, like a horde of Huns, fall upon the guests of the divine city hymned by Dante. The tents of Jehovah are now destroyed; the stars are but dust driven by the wind; the satellites of the god Thor, the deformed dwarfs, and hideous kobolds fall upon the holy angels and tear off their silken wings. "My good angel!" exclaims the poet; "alas! I saw my good angel destroyed by a kobold, then all was over; heaven and earth formed but one immense ruin, and chaos reappeared." These wild effusions are succeeded by several charming ballads, some of which are little dramatic scenes illumined, as it were, by meridian brightness, such as Dona Clara and Almanzor; others are Catholic legends which we might almost believe to have been borrowed from the collection of Wunderhorn, as Le Pèlerinage de Kevlaar; others again are magnificent poems inspired by the mountains of the Harz, or by the glorious spectacles of the northern seas. Yet be not deceived, this new inspiration will grow bolder every minute. Whether he is singing the praises of the proud Dona Clara whom the son of the rabbi of Salamanca seduced; whether, in the extraordinary ballad of Almanzor, he is casting down the thousand columns of the mosque of Cordova, which he represents as indignant at having been converted into a cathedral, and having been so long used for the "odious worship of the Christians;" or whether, at last, enveloped in the mists of the Baltic, he suddenly remembers "the gods of Greece," and taking their cause in hand, being annoyed by their defeat, he defies Jehovah and Christ; his rebel spirit is ever adding new fuel to its vehemence; his imagination is still loosening its fetters with warlike impiety. He does not employ invectives, but makes use of an union of anger and tenderness. Even when he appears to lead all the vanquished systems of religion to the assault of Christianity, when, like the dark companions of the gods of the Edda, he seeks to disperse the tents of the Almighty, some latent sentiment is still in operation tempering the violence of his words. Unexpected changes are sometimes to be found in his writings; thus, in the series entitled Nordsee (the north sea) immediately after the poetically wild stanzas of which we have been speaking, he writes those fine verses entitled Peace.

"The sun surrounded by clouds was shining in the heavens. The sea was calm, I was seated by the rudder of the bark, lost in thought and in dreams. As I sat there, half awake and half sleeping, I saw Christ, the Saviour of the world, clothed in a white, flowing garment; of colossal stature, he was walking on the sea and land. He extended his hands in the attitude of blessing over earth and ocean, whilst his head reached unto the heavens. Like a heart in his bosom he wore the sun, the red, flaming sun; and this flaming sun poured forth the rays of his grace, his lovely, blessed light, which illumined and renewed the universe.

Sounds of bells, sounds of mirth and festivity, echoed from all parts; soft sounds which, like the swans harnessed with garlands of roses, appeared to lead the vessel gliding on the waves; yes, they joyfully led the bark to the verdant bank, where man dwells in the vast town of noble towers.

"O miraculous peace! How calm was the town! No longer was heard the confused murmur of the busy and tumultuous crowd. In the beautiful streets walked men, clothed in white garments, and bearing palms in their hands. Whenever two of them met, they regarded each other with looks of sympathetic joy. Influenced by love, and having their hearts filled with tenderness and generosity, they kissed each other on the forehead, then turned their eyes towards the flaming heart of Christ, whose red blood fell upon the earth in rays of reconciliation and grace, and thrice happy, they exclaimed, Blessed be Jesus Christ !”

But it may be asked, is not this majestic and lovely picture merely produced in order to bring out in stronger relief the poem consecrated to the gods of Greece? Although this mode of proceeding is by no means unusual with H. Heine, we cannot think he has employed it in the present instance. Every species of emotion found a place in his heart. Sincere when he wrote Almanzor and The Gods of Greece he doubtless was, and not less so is he when he sings of the heart of our Saviour enveloping the world in its rays, and reconciling mankind to God. Forget not that his irony possesses a sympathizing character, especially before it became habitual to him, during the period in which it was merely the voice of youthful grief. These noble verses on Peace are like a pause in his delirium; and then the delirium recommences in a loftier strain, and not only the worship of Christians, but all religions, all systems of philosophy, all doctrines fall under the lash of the pitiless satirist, when, in the cave of the Rathskeller of Bremen, he shows to us the whole universe staggering from inebriety, and the “great spirit,” by the light of his red face which bears undeniable marks of intemperance, illumining this merry chaos.

It is difficult to describe the impression produced in Germany by this extraordinary composition. Everything was comprised in the Buch der Lieder; tenderness and fury, submission and revolt, the sublime and the ludicrous. At first we believed we were listening only to the tender confessions of a young heart, and soon the most sacred things, the topics most revered by mankind, became the plaything of this irritated child. His voice increased in force, his anger rose by degrees, like the waves of the north sea, and irony attained unto formidable proportions. No author since the time of Goethe had displayed so much vigour and beauty in the lyric art. To the childlike sweetness of Novalis and the irresistible power of Goethe, he united the boldness of an age that had broken its last fetters. The connecting link of all these things was the passion of the poet, that agitated, uncontrolled passion, which produced tears or smiles, which either enraptured or irritated. Not a man, from the dogmatizing philosopher on the rostrum, to the dreamer wandering in the glades of the forest, could remain indifferent to poetry of this nature.

The Reisebilder created no less sensation. Here the author abandons the visionary world; it is no longer in the realms of the ideal that he wields his revolutionary sword, but in the very heart of the real world. Germany was, at that time, the victim of a species of languor; the patriotic excitement of 1813, betrayed by the sovereigns who had reaped benefit from it, had given place to the deepest dejection. Everything languished, literature and politics, poetry and prose. The great Goethe still ruled the world of art; but he was no longer the representative of his age. The school of romance, whence issued so many delightful poets, was then doing penance in the cloister; Clement of Brentano had retired into concealment, and the aged Goerres was expiating the temerity of his youth in Munich. Ceremonious gravity, pedantic learning, want of intellect, this was all that Germany could boast at the period of the restoration. A young man issues from Berlin, where he has been living in intimacy with the great men who still remain in Germany; he wanders over hills and valleys, visits the mountains of the Harz, traverses the German countries, and resides for a time in Tuscany; at every step he meets with subjects for meditation, and his thoughts travel far more quickly than the boat or vetturino in which he is journeying. They are not confined to Goettingue, Munich, or Florence; the whole human race, the middle ages, the revolution, the present and the past, the present in particular, are included in the satire of the hostile humorist. A race on the summits of the Brocken, an evening passed in conviviality with a party of students, the meeting with some English tourists, a cemetery, a museum, a passing cloud, a newspaper lying on a table in the hotel, the most trivial incident escapes not his irony. In his native land, questions relating to public affairs are always treated seriously and diffusely; but he invests the few words he employs with greater vigour than whole volumes that have been previously written. Woe, to grave Germany, under her doctor's cap and gown! Woe, to the ignorant clergy, the infatuated aristocracy, the abstruse philosophers, when under the lash of his satire.

The remarkable feature in Heine's writings, that which imparts the truly original character to all his works, is the union of infantine delicacy with bold thoughts. He speaks after the manner of the old popular legends, at the very time he is shaking the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and causing innocent Germany to taste the bitter fruit thereof.

The Reisebilder owe their existence chiefly to a warm attachment to France, and the most exalted opinion of the grandeurs of the consulate and empire. This sentiment, which dates from a very early period in H. Heine's life, gives evidence of singular liberty of mind. In the midst of the legitimate revolt of the German nation against the Emperor Napoleon, and the attractions thus presented to youth, at the very time when Fichte was summoning his pupils to the war, when the lyre joined hand in hand with the sword, when Ruckert, Arndt, and Schenkendorf, ranged their verses in martial array; when Theodore Koerner died while singing la Chasse de Lutzen, the youthful Heine was cherishing the warmest affection to France and its great emperor, and all the allurements of the revolution originated by the universities, had not power for one moment to change his sentiments. From 1813 to 1815 national enthusiasm continued to increase, and when Napoleon was defeated at Waterloo, Germany resounded with shouts of joy. In 1815 also, at the very time of the triumph of the allied armies, the poet, at the age of sixteen only, produced his admirable piece, entitled Les deux Grenadiers. Two grenadiers are returning from Russia, they hear the mournful tidings that the "grande armée" is defeated, and the emperor taken prisoner. The one is about to proceed on his journey in order to visit his wife and children, the other finds his end approaching, and thus addresses his companion: "If I die, take my body to France; place the cross and the red riband on my breast, lay me with my gun in my hand and my sword by my side; thus I shall wait in the tomb until I hear the roar of the cannon and the pawing of the war-horse. Then, when my emperor passes over my grave, I shall rise in full armour to defend the emperor, the emperor, the emperor!"

Thus sang the young poet of Dusseldorf before Béranger had written le Vieux Drapeau, le Vieux Sergent, le Cinq Mai, and les Souvenirs du Peuple. He was, probably, at that time, the only being in Germany who entertained such sentiments; ten years later, when he published the Reisebilder, his boldness was not less great. The Teutonic feelings of 1813, so successfully exerted against French influence, were encouraged by authors of every school. The author of the Reisebilder attacked this blind patriotism, and these superannuated feelings of hostility. Read L'histoire du Tambour Legrand; listen to the brave man instructing the poet in the barracks of Dusseldorf. He describes the revolution to him merely by playing on the drum: by means of the drum he introduces him to the battles of the consulate, to the triumphs of the empire. How vividly is everything presented to the child's mind by the sound of the drum! He had never clearly understood the taking of the Bastille: the drum is beaten, and he perceives the unanimous rising of France, and the abolition of ancient social abuses. He could not understand the part that Germany had acted with regard to Napoleon; the drum sounds: "dumm dumm!" (foolish! foolish!) and every thing is made clear to him. The drum sounds again; the scene is Jena, now it is Austerlitz! Thus the child sees history unfolded by these magic little sticks. He, himself, like the drummer Legrand, sounded the charge in Germany. At the voice of his cheerful drum, the principles of '89 extended to literature, the ghosts of the middle ages took flight, and the emperor, who had before been daily abused by the "national party," was now regarded by the Germans as the precursor of modern times.

The success of the Reisebilder was extraordinary. Whilst enthusiasm and anger were criticising the works of the humorist, whilst the literary world was panic-stricken, and great changes were taking place in it, the young poet was travelling in various parts of the continent, as well as in England; between the years 1826 and 1830, he visited Great Britain and Italy, and added some curious chapters to his book, amongst others, The Baths of Lucca and Nights at Florence. During the intervals of his journeys, he resided at Luneburg, Hamburg, Magdeburg, at which place he became intimate with Charles Immermann, and at Munich, where, with his friend Lindner, he published a newspaper, well known at the period, entitled Political Annals. The French revolution of July produced the same impression upon the satirical poet, as on the ardent mind of Louis Boerne; it had charms for both. When Louis Boerne crossed the bridge of Kehl, and entered France, he launched forth into wild effusions which his Letters have but too faithfully transmitted to us. He beheld the tricoloured flag on the frontier, and the red banner waving on the German territory. "We will have but one colour," exclaimed he, "red! blood! blood! oh! that I could one day write with blood-red ink!" We quickly perceived the difference between these two warlike spirits. H. Heine is also infected by the fever of the moment, but his sentiments are clothed in poetic images.

It may naturally be expected that this revolutionary delirium will, on more than one occasion, impede the flight of his imagination; but we may feel equally certain that the fetters will be broken. "I am wild," writes he; "daring hopes are rising within me, like a tree bearing golden fruit, whose branches shoot forth in every direction, and reach even to the clouds. Adieu, projects of rest! I know now what I wish to do, what I can do, and what I ought to do. I am the son of the revolution, and I will wear the arms my mother has blessed. Give me some flowers, I want to crown my head for a mortal combat! my lyre, also; give me my lyre, that I may sing a battle-song! I know words that resemble flaming stars, words that would burn castles and illumine cottages. I know words that are like poisoned arrows; they will reach the seventh heaven, and transfix the hypocrites who conceal themselves under the holiest of holies." How singular a medley of words! This confusion, which is already a characteristic feature of H. Heine's writing, will be found daily to increase. Generous hopes and impious expressions, enthusiasm and blasphemy will be curiously interwoven in all his productions, and the thoughtless will be fascinated. Let us henceforth be mistrustful, and beware lest we be deceived: hitherto the most lively sallies of the poet have borne their corrective within them; now, the artless charm seems to have disappeared, his irony is no longer the sudden flight of a careless idea, sent forth by chance, and returning again to the point from which it started; there is something constrained and premeditated in it; the poet whets it in anger. Let us exercise patience nevertheless, this delirium will last but for a time; when the stormy period is passed, the demagogue will again become a poet, and once more enjoy his former tranquillity of mind.

THE CAPTIVE CHIEFS OF MOUNT LEBANON;*

WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF

MY MISSION TO EGYPT IN 1841.

(By the Author of "Reminiscences in Syria," &c. &c.)

THE PLAGUE SHIP.

"True, I talk of dreams,
Which are the children of an idle brain,
Begot of nothing but vain fantasy,
Which is as thin of substance as the air."
SHAKESPEARE.

HAVING arrived at Alexandria, and brought the mountain Chieftains of Lebanon thus far towards their native land, I now considered all further difficulties at an end; in anticipation, therefore, of shortly embarking with my charges, and making a speedy and pleasant voyage to Beyrout, I now quietly "smoked the chibouque of satisfaction on the carpet of repose." It so happened, however, that I had reckoned without my host.

Commodore Napier—whom I informed of the shameful treatment experienced by the captive Sheikhs and Emirs, on their way from Sennaar—had taken precautions to insure them every comfort on their arrival at Alexandria, where they were—through his provident intercession—lodged and fed, in a manner more suitable to their rank and misfortunes than had previously been the case, during their late residence at Cairo; whilst, through the medium of the same channel, they were liberally supplied with clothes and other requisites, and had even a considerable sum of money placed at their command.

It has been justly remarked, that there is no diplomatist equal to a British man-of-war; and whilst some of these eloquent and persuasive negotiators were at hand, everything had a promising appearance, and the preparations for our departure went on, as the sailors say, "with a will."

One of the Pasha's steamers was to be placed at my disposal, and the Commodore having seen, as he imagined, everything made square, departed with his squadron for Marmorice Bay. No sooner, however, was the British "negotiator" out of sight, than all preparation for our departure appeared at once to come to a stand-still. The engines of the Egyptian steamer were suddenly found to be quite out of order, and it was stated it would require several days to effect the requisite repairs. I patiently waited the specified time, when it was next discovered that the vessel had sprung a leak; and I discovered, when too late, that French intrigue had been at work to thwart my proposed undertaking, and delay, or endeavour entirely to prevent, my conveying back the mountain Chieftains to their respective homes.

It may be asked: what could possibly have been the object of this unlooked-for interference with the Commodore's design? a design in itself, which—although partly dictated by policy—was, undoubtedly most charitable and humane.

The reason of the opposition I then met with, although perhaps a mystery to the uninitiated, was palpable to all such as happened to be versed in the politics of the East; and its cause may be traced back as far as Bonaparte's expedition to Syria, in 1799.

Napoleon, whose prescient and eagle glance had, from the moment he turned his arms in this direction, embraced at once the Caucasus, the southern frontier of Russia, and even our remotest possessions in the East: that glance had at once fixed the Taurus and the Lebanon to be—the one a natural barrier against the encroachments of the Czar, the other the gateway opening, through Persia, a pathway to the golden regions of Hindostan. Alexander the Great had, with a handful of Macedonians, conquered all the intervening countries, crossed the Indus, and next defeated the most powerful monarch of the East. Why, therefore, should Napoleon Bonaparte, with—as was then supposed—the finest troops in the world, not be able to carry a similar project into effect? The conqueror of Italy pronounced his "Open sesame" before the gates of Acre; but our gallant countryman, Sir Sidney Smith, was there, told him there was no "thoroughfare" that way, and Napoleon was thus unexpectedly checked in his first great stride towards the East.

The successful defence of Acre, and the consequent retreat of the French army, arrested Napoleon's ambitious projects in the East; but the French have, nevertheless, from that period, been unceasing in their endeavours to establish and maintain their influence amongst the mountain tribes of the Lebanon—a design which has been greatly facilitated from the circumstance of the greater part of the population being Christians, and acknowledging the sway of Rome; a circumstance which the pious Bourbon successors of Bonaparte had never failed likewise to turn to good account.

Such was the state of the "Mountain"—as the Lebanon is called par excellence—when the conquests of Ibrahim Pasha turned the eyes of the European powers towards the East, and caused the presence of those powerful French and English fleets, which, during the summer of 1839, were anchored in Busseekah Bay, at the entrance of the Dardanelles.

Meanwhile the victorious Ibrahim continued to advance on the capital of the Turks; the "integrity" of the Ottoman empire was considered to be in danger, and those decisive steps were then taken by the united powers, which led to hostilities against Egypt; in which the French not only declined to take a part, but, for a moment, appeared irresolute whether or no they would side with Mehemet Ali, and desolate the world with all the horrors of a European war. The whole of Syria had, after the capture of Acre by the Egyptians, in 1832, fallen under the sway of Ibrahim Pasha, and his administration of the regions of the Lebanon, had in particular, been cruel and tyrannical in the extreme. The mountain tribes of every sect—Maronites and Druses, Christians and idolaters—were, one and all, most eager to be rid of their oppressors; and when Commodore Napier landed at Djouni Bay, and advanced with an Anglo-Turkish force into their country, the hardy mountaineers eagerly flocked around his standard, and followed him to the heights of Boharsef, where he defeated the Egyptians, drove Ibrahim Pasha from what was considered an impregnable position, obliged him to retreat on Damascus, and thus added tenfold, to the great popularity he had already acquired. The name of the "Komodor-el-Kibir"* was enthusiastically re-echoed amidst the rocks and crags of the Lebanon; and that of England became "exalted" in the "Mountain," to the serious detriment of the previous influence of France, which had hitherto passively contemplated the oppression to which the mountaineers had so long been helplessly exposed.

The events then in occurrence were, of themselves, sufficient to show the precarious nature of our overland communication with India, whilst the channel of that communication was confined to Egypt, and liable at every moment to be occupied by the French. Commodore Napier, spite of the charge of "want of discretion," which has subsequently been laid to his door, was quite "discreet" enough to be fully aware of the importance of taking advantage of this opportunity to supplant French influence in these rocky strongholds—destined, perhaps, to be at some future period the keystone of our power in the East; nor did he leave any expedient untried in order to effect this object; and so successful was he in his efforts to establish a popular feeling in favour of England, that he was not only adored by both Druses and Maronites, but had, strange to say, likewise managed to turn to account some of those Roman Catholic religious establishments which swarm in the Lebanon, and whose inmates possess great influence over the rude and ignorant mountaineers.*

* The Arabic for "Great."

It were perhaps well, and might perchance be turned to the future advantage of England, if our "discreet" rulers would, in their relations with Syria, adopt some of the precepts of the Commodore, and only bear in mind that the Turkish empire may one of these days be dismembered, Constantinople and the Caucasus in the power of Russia, Egypt occupied by the French—and that Syria, the Lebanon, and the Euphrates may then possibly become the stepping-stones to our possessions in the East.

Be this, however, as it may, such were the reasons—combined with the real interest he felt in behalf of his late gallant companions in arms—which gave rise to my mission to Egypt in quest of the captive mountain Chiefs: hence the cause of French intrigue, and their endeavour to throw every difficulty in my way, in order that England might, if possible, be prevented from having the credit of performing an act which would still further enhance her lately-acquired popularity in the Lebanon; and hence the unexpected prolongation of my stay at Alexandria after the departure of the Commodore.

This delay, sufficiently vexatious in itself, was rendered still more annoying by other concomitant circumstances, peculiar to the locality where I was so provokingly detained.

Hitherto, from my first arrival in Egypt, at the commencement of the year, the climate had been delightful—in fact, one of the most delicious I had ever experienced in all my numerous wanderings, far and wide; but, as the season advanced, the Simoon, or Desert wind, known there as the "Khamseen," next cast its burning and noxious breath upon Egypt's "palmy land," engendering, and apparently bringing forth from the regions over which it swept, the still more deadly and terrific "Demon of the PLAGUE."

"————— which soon east,
From its hot wing a deadlier blast,
More mortal far, than ever came
From the red desert's sands of flame,
So quick, that every living thing
Of human shape, touched by his wing,
Like plants, where the 'Khamseen' hath past,
At once falls black and withering."

The "Hot Winds" of India, the "Levanter" of Gibraltar, the "Sirocco" at Naples and Malta, are all sufficiently unpleasant, but none of these are to be compared, in their disagreeable and deleterious effects, to the much-dreaded "Khamseen," which periodically sweeps over the land of the Pharaohs, and derives its name from the circumstance of being supposed to last for the period of fifty days.

When the "Khamseen" blows, body and mind appear to be equally prostrated in the dust—or, more correctly speaking in the fine and almost invisible particles of sand—which, wafted from the interminable desert, on the "wings of the Simoon," pervade every object, however carefully secured. Shut doors and windows, close up every crevice you can see, notwithstanding all the precaution you may take, furniture, tables, and flooring, in short, every tangible object, will nevertheless, be completely covered with a fine, impalpable sand, which penetrates into your boxes and wardrobes, and will even find its way into the works of your chronometer or your watch.

This—as may well be imagined—is disagreeable; but the "Khamseen" is a minor evil, and one unthought of, when—as is often the case—it is the forerunner of, and ushers in the mysterious and dreaded visitation of the PLAGUE.

I shall say nothing on the origin and supposed causes of this fearful scourge—suffice it to observe, that on the occasion to which I now allude, its presence was first discovered shortly after my return to Alexandria with the exiled mountain Chiefs; nor shall I ever forget the sensation I experienced of stupefaction, of horror, and of awe, when the fearful tidings were confirmed, announcing that the destroying demon actually soared above us and around, with the knowledge that a miserable death unavoidably awaited those on whom might fall the mysterious shadow of his poisonous wing!

* Amongst these may be mentioned the Jesuit establishment at Bhekfai, whose superior, l'adro Ryllo, was so successful in stirring up the "Mountain" in our favour, incurring thereby to such a degree the displeasure of France, that Louis Philippe obtained from the court of Rome his deposition as superior of the Jesuits on Mount Lebanon; and he was consequently banished to Malta. Ryllo was by birth a Pole: he had fought gallantly against Russian oppression in his country's cause; and when that cause was lost, he retired in disgust from the world, and became a disciple of Ignatius Loyola. The author of these pages, again, subsequently, met l'adro Ryllo, at the Propaganda in Rome: his spirit was, however, of too ardent a nature to submit to the ordinary routine of a priestly life: he volunteered to carry the precepts of Christianity into the far interior of Africa, where he ended his career, being murdered by the barbarous natives of those distant and unknown regions bordering the "White Nile."

So much are we, in most instances, the children of custom and habit, that this rule will apply even to our relations with that grim visitant called Death, to whom all must—in whatever form he may appear—sooner or later be introduced. The soldier and the sailor will sometimes view respectively, with comparative indifference, his approach, when borne towards them on the field of battle, or in the whirlwind of the storm; the Turk and the Egyptian, accustomed to the periodical appearance of the plague, armed, moreover, with their belief in a predestined fate—a firm reliance on their “Khismut”—can witness its approach with much more philosophy and resignation than most Europeans—I speak for myself as one—nor will I attempt to conceal that I heard of the actual presence of this fearful scourge with mingled feelings of horror, fear, and mental depression, which I cannot well describe, and could not then controul.

Nor were the surrounding objects calculated to dissipate the unpleasant sensations, suggested by the announcement of the actual appearance of the plague.

The lower class of the inhabitants of Alexandria are all crowded together in confined, loathsome, and filthy hovels, amongst which the pestilence soon raged with a fearful violence, which no precautionary measures could restrain; and from amidst these Golgothas, accounts of horrors were sometimes wafted, which were far from agreeable to “ears polite,” and ill-calculated to reconcile us (the small European portion of the community) to the unpleasant position in which we were then placed.

I must, in justice to the officials of Alexandria, say, that notwithstanding the passive reliance which all good Muhometans are supposed to place in their “Nussceb,” or predestined fate, no precautions were left untried to arrest the destroying evil in its fatal course. The Arab huts I have alluded to, were periodically examined, and cleared of the infected, the dying, and the dead; for it will scarcely be credited, that, to conceal the latter, (in order not to be themselves subject to the stringent rules enacted in such cases,) the survivors would often bury them around, even in their hovels, and under their very beds; whilst from these shallow graves, human remains, in every state of decomposition and decay, would not unfrequently be torn out, and exposed to sight, by those lean, gaunt, and hungry troops of dogs, which act as scavengers, and infest the streets and purlieus of every eastern city.

I had taken up my residence in a large French hotel, situated in a fine, airy, open square, in the eastern, or European quarter of the town; the windows of the apartment I occupied commanded an unlimited view of the bright blue expanse of the Mediterranean Sea; and here—when the official business of the day was at an end, did I generally seclude myself, in order to escape the unpleasant sights and sounds of death, which, even in this “Belgravia” of Alexandria, would occasionally offend the ear and eye. Nor was it possible, with every precaution I could adopt, to exclude unmistakable evidence of the fearful pestilence which raged around; sounds of lamentation and of woe would often, even in this seclusion, obtrude themselves upon the ear, as the “wil-wah,” or piercing cries of grief, shrilly uttered by the closely-veiled and phantom-like-looking figures of the female mourners following every successive corpse, but too plainly announced that “Azrael,” the grim angel of death, continued still busily to ply his trade!

Anxious in every way to divert my thoughts from such constantly-recurring and painful scenes, I asked mine host, if he had, or could procure me any books, wherewith to while away the dull and dreary hours, I then found to hang so heavily on hand.

My worthy Boniface was not himself a reading man, but, having successfully applied in my behalf to an Italian adventurer, who happened at the time to be his guest, he brought me for perusal a copy of Boccaccio's Decameron, which, by a strange coincidence, I opened at the very passage descriptive of the Florence plague. With a morbid feeling, for which it is difficult to assign a cause, I continued to pore over this vividly horrible account, and which appeared to me so applicable to what I then myself beheld, that I may perhaps be forgiven, if I here transcribe a few appropriate passages from this celebrated work.

“In the year 1348, a deadly pestilence—whether brought on by any particular revolution of the celestial bodies, or in consequence of the anger of the Almighty, aroused by the iniquities of men—which had appeared some years previously in the East, and, after causing unheard-of ravages in those parts, had gradually progressed towards the West, and at last showed itself in Florence, that most beautiful and perfect of all the cities of the Italian states.

“In spite of every precaution—such as cleansing the city from all filth and impurity, preventing the admission therein of any diseased person, with many other precautionary measures of health—notwithstanding also the numerous religious processions, and humble supplications offered up to the Almighty by revered and holy persons—notwithstanding all this, from the commencement of the spring in the aforesaid year, did this fearful affliction exercise its influence in the most fearful and miraculous way.

"In the East, one of the mortal symptoms of this plague was a rush of blood from the nose of the person who was attacked; but, here, the evidence of the disease first manifested itself by certain swellings, which appeared both in the male and female sex, about the groin, and under the arm-pits, of the persons so attacked.

"These swellings assumed in some the size and shape of a common apple, in others that of an egg; some were larger, and others smaller; and the swellings were generally known by the name of 'gavoccioli.' The disease would next assume the character of black or livid spots, showing themselves sometimes on the arms, thighs, and other parts of the body; in some cases large, and small in number, in others quite the reverse; but always, like the 'gavoccioli,' prognosticating certain death.

"No precautions or medical treatment appeared to be of the least avail, for, whether it be that the nature of the disease admitted of no cure, or that the doctors (of whom, besides regular practitioners, the number had become very great, by many quacks, both men and women, having then undertaken the healing art) were ignorant of what that cure should be, few patients ever recovered; generally speaking, about three days after the above-mentioned signs, falling victims to the disease, without fever or any other accident."

The Florentine author continues most largely to descant on the horrors he then witnessed himself—details which it would be here unpleasant to repeat, but the account of which corresponds most exactly with the appearance and symptoms of the plague at the present day.

One circumstance which he mentions is worthy of remark—namely, the liability to which even animals were exposed of being infected by the deadly contagion which then raged abroad. Boccaccio gives examples, in point, which he states to have himself beheld, and his assertions are corroborated by what other authors have advanced to the same effect; in short, the pestilence which prevailed in Florence in the year 1348 appears—save in being more intense—to vary in no respect from that which I witnessed at Alexandria a very few years ago.

It may well be imagined that my anxiety to quit so unenviable a residence, to bid adieu to the "land of the Pharaohs," and to fulfil without further delay the object of my mission, was not a little increased by the existing state of affairs. I had no idea—if I could possibly avoid it—of becoming a martyr to what I considered far worse than all the united "plagues" which desolated this land of bondage in the "good olden times;" in short, I began to entertain the greatest aversion to take through this medium my departure from the world—a medium which I considered to be at once quite out of both the regular military and diplomatic line; nor will I attempt to deny, that, whilst thus provokingly delayed in the midst of this city of the dying and the dead, I felt all the time in a most confounded stew. All my most strenuous efforts to accelerate our departure appeared, however, to be of no avail: the steamers—of which the viceroy had two or three—were still reported to be unfit for sea; one was leaky, and the engines of the other had suddenly got out of repair. I had seen Mehemet Ali on the subject, and had had endless audiences with his prime minister, Boghos Bey, whose kind regard for my welfare would not suffer me on any account to expose my valuable life in an unseaworthy craft.

The Pasha listened to my representations with coolness, and replied to them, as I thought, with some little want of civility: Boghos Bey—a plausible, oily, old Armenian, who spoke French like a Parisian, and appeared to follow Macchiavelli's precept, that language was meant only to conceal our thoughts—old Boghos Bey was always affable in the extreme; he granted me daily interviews; sent his carriage to convey me to his residence; always placed me in the seat of honour, on an ottoman, by his side; his sherbet was delicious; his coffee, pure Mocha; from a splendid amber-mouthed chibouque I inhaled the aroma of undeniable "Latakia;"* but, amidst all this hospitality, he ever managed, with some fresh excuse, to delay the period when we should embark;—fill, at last, losing all patience, I plainly told him I would stand no more humbug, and that if a vessel of some sort were not immediately got ready for the conveyance of my party to Beyrout, I would start for Malta, by the steamer, which was to carry thither the expected Indian mail; and thence report the whole transaction to my government, and likewise "tell the Commadore."

Next day I received a communication from "Monsieur le Ministre"—as old Boghos was always styled—stating, that as it was found the repairs required by the steamers would take a considerable time to effect, his Highness the Pasha had placed one of the corvettes of his fleet at my disposal, for the purpose of conveying back the Syrian chieftains to Beyrout; and that this vessel would be ready to depart whenever I might please. As may readily be imagined, I lost no time in getting the whole of my precious charges conveyed on board. Fortunately, they and their attendants had hitherto all escaped contagion from the "prevailing epidemic;" and were, therefore, enabled—as far as we were ourselves concerned—to obtain a clean bill of health, immediately weighed anchor, and soon got out to sea.

The vessel which bore the "Emirs and their fortunes" was a fine corvette, called the Tanta, (from the name of a town in the Delta,) carrying 24 guns, with a crew of 146 men; and, as my party consisted altogether of no less than 66, we had consequently upwards of 200 souls on board. The commander, a Circassian, was a sharp fellow in his way, but evidently knew little of his trade, as his first step was to consult me relative to our proposed course of navigation; and in short, he appeared to consider me as de facto in command of the ship; in which novel position, my scanty knowledge of nautical affairs was soon put to rather a severe and unpleasant test.

Favoured by the "Khamseen"—which, as it swept over the "world of waters," appeared gradually, as we increased our distance from Egypt's low and sandy shores, to lose its fiery characteristics, and to become a cool and pleasant breeze—we crowded on a press of sail.

The white buildings of Alexandria—the few date-trees scattered along the line of unbroken and level coast—the host of windmills to the westward of the town—Cleopatra's Needle—the tall Pharos—Pompey's Pillar—all classic relics of ancient times—these, and other familiar objects, were fast sinking behind the watery horizon; and under such favourable auspices we had every prospect of a pleasant and a speedy voyage.

Fatigued with the unavoidable exertions I had had to undergo, under a broiling sun, during the earlier part of the day, I had retired below to my cabin, to obtain a little repose, when an unusual noise upon deck, and the sudden and violent heeling over of our craft, plainly announced that something had gone wrong. I made instantly for the companion-ladder, but was nearly knocked down in my ascent, by the skipper, who was rushing down, post-haste, to tell me that we were overtaken by a violent squall, and to receive my directions as to what was to be done.

Fearful that in another minute we should be on our beam-ends, the only thing I could think of was to sing out lustily to "cut everything away." This order was obeyed, and the vessel immediately righted, as the clouds of canvas she had been carrying, now streamed away to leeward, and fluttered wildly in the gale, which turned out to be only what is called by sailors a "white squall." In less than five minutes it was all over, leaving me, no doubt, in the eyes of our Egyptian crew, the credit of being the most expert of seamen, whose skill had saved the vessel, which now lay, heavily rolling in the trough of a short bubbling sea, quite powerless and becalmed.

Although the corvette was flush-decked, the after-part of her was covered in, and on a platform, slightly raised above the deck, were placed, in oriental fashion, ottomans and cushions, on which, during the fine weather which ensued, it was pleasant to recline. Here, either plying the bubbling calceoun,* or inhaling the aroma of Latakia "tumbec," through the medium of a long cherry-stick pipe, would I sit for hours and hours, surrounded by my mountain friends; and the thought would sometimes occur, what a capital venture it would be, to turn free rover of the seas—to become the "Conrad" of such a tight, well-armed, little craft—had we only been manned by real seamen, instead of a set of lubberly Egyptian Fellahs.

The crew, however, gave me no trouble, but far otherwise was the case with the "passengers" on board: the Sheikhs and Emirs, with their still more refractory attendants; whose propensity to be constantly smoking, both day and night, between the decks, caused constant apprehensions of accidents by fire, and kept me perpetually on the qui vive.

Troublesome as I found them all, more or less, in this and other respects, I must, however, make an exception in favour of the old Druse chieftain, Sheikh Hamoud-el-Neked, whom I have before had occasion to allude to.

At the commencement of the voyage, when all his companions in exile were suffering the miseries of sea-sickness (which, by the bye, they bore with aught save heroic fortitude), when, during the squall which I have described, they all evinced most unmistakable symptoms of trepidation and alarm; the old Sheikh alone appeared unmoved and unmovable, both in body and in mind.

On first going on board, he had, pipe in hand, taken up his position on the above-mentioned raised and covered-in divan, as being placed in the aftermost part of the corvette; here, apparently unshaken by either mental or bodily discomforts, he sat quietly smoking his "narghil," or calceoun, during the whole period of the voyage; for I do not remember to have seen him leave, for a single instant, his first selected post. An attendant regularly replenished his pipe, brought him his daily meals, and the noble-looking old warrior, with his piercing black eye—if I rightly remember, he had but one—and peaked, falcion nose, (the only feature of his countenance visible, between an enormous turban and a profusion of beard, whiskers, and moustache, white as the driven snow,) looked for all the world like one of those large owls, whose solemn, grave, and majestic appearance, often fixes our attention in a "menagerie."

* A small description of hookah, or water-pipe, much used in the Levant.

The old Sheikh and myself became great allies, and between the respective puffs of his calceoun, and of my Turkish pipe, would we unreservedly discuss the eastern politics of the day, the causes and the origin of the war, the state of the "Dgebcl," or mountain, (as the Lebanon is usually called,) the former oppression of the Turks, and the still more grinding tyranny of the Egyptians.

Of Ibrahim Pasha, the old warrior could not speak without a curse, and the atrocities he related as having been perpetrated by him, would, if true—nor had I reason to doubt the veracity of the old Sheikh—pass all belief: according to him no enemy ever escaped from his relentless spirit of revenge—no man from his hardened cruelty—no woman from his insatiable lust; and his unrestrained appetites were described as being so depraved, that I cannot here defile my page with an account of them.

Would that all my "charges" had given as little trouble as this venerable old chief! Their inveterate propensity to be constantly smoking in their confined berths, between decks, amidst heaps of baggage—together with the knowledge I had of the careless manner in which the gunpowder on board was secured—caused me continual uneasiness, obliged me to be ever on the alert, and to be repeatedly visiting their "quarters" at all hours, both by night and day.

Whilst thus going my rounds one night, during the middle watch—after having, amongst the attendants of the Emirs, discovered two delinquents and secured their lighted pipes, which were immediately thrown overboard, and confiscated, as an offering to a cooler element than that which they had previously contained—as I was next prying about with a lantern, in search of further prey, a low, plaintive, and indistinct groan suddenly assailed my ear. It proceeded from behind a heap of baggage, around which were sleeping some attendants of the chiefs, and on peering further into the darkness beyond, I beheld in a corner, stretched on the bare deck, in the midst of a collection of nauseous filth, a poor little negro, apparently in the last agonies of death.

"It was," said a servant of the Emir Hyder, looking up and rubbing his eyes, "only his master's little Ethiopian slave, who had been some time ailing, whom he had believed to be already dead, and whom he meant next morning to throw overboard into the sea." So saying, my informant turned round, and was immediately in the enjoyment of his resumed repose.

Meanwhile I ordered the Egyptian seaman who accompanied me, to take up the poor child, and as its powerless head fell back over his encircling arm, and became exposed to the glare of the lantern, which I had taken from the sailor's hand, by the peculiar "tattooing," or rather ornamental cicatrices, which seared the little fellow's now emaciated cheeks—by his white teeth, filed, as if for cannibal purposes, like the indentations of a saw—by these unmistakable tokens, I recognised the youthful negro slave whom I had noticed in the caravanserai at Cairo, when the Emirs first arrived.

I immediately caused the poor little creature to be carried to my cabin, determined to see what I could do in his behalf.

Under ordinary circumstances—setting aside the dictates of humanity—the death of a negro child might have been considered as an occurrence of little import; but the peculiar position in which we happened to be placed, imparted a frightful degree of significance to such an event.

Although we carried with us a clean bill of health, it was from a locality over which a dreadful disease had been stalking with the most fearful strides; and should this happen to be a case of plague, where was the contagion now to stop? Crowded up as we were in an infected vessel—bearing along with us the rankling seeds of death—debarred from all assistance, even from access to any port, might not the plague-stricken vessel in which I then found myself shut up, be—like the fabled phantom-ship of old—condemned to wander on the waste of waters, perhaps long after it had ceased to contain a living soul on board!

On the other hand, even should a case of death occur amongst us from any other than this dreaded cause, we had the horrors of a protracted quarantine next staring us in the face. All these facts flashed at the same moment suddenly and spontaneously across my mind, and never did greater inducement exist to the performance of a charitable and philanthropic act.

The surgeon of the vessel was immediately, by my directions, roused up, and summoned to attend. I communicated to him my fears, that if already a corpse, the little negro had died of "Kouba," or the dreaded plague, but that possibly existence had not yet departed, and in which case there might still be some chance of life.

This worthy disciple of Avicenna, with all the stoical indifference of a true Mussulman, and apparently relying implicitly on his belief in predestination, took up the poor infant, as a butcher would handle a slaughtered lamb, and feeling for the dreaded "gavoccio," pronounced that the boy had certainly not died from the effects of plague, but that apparently severe dysentery, aggravated by neglect, had been the cause of his decease—for that the child was evidently dead.

"But," continued the learned "hakeem," "to prove this to the 'Sanita,' or Board of Health, at Beyrout, the corpse must be kept; and if favoured by the wind, we may yet arrive at our destination before it is decomposed, and thus save our forty-days quarantine."

Notwithstanding the doctor's assurances, I retired to my berth in none of the most pleasant moods of mind, and when sleep at last scaled down my eyelids, "nature's soft nurse," brought with it no repose; for my haunted imagination was then assailed by dreamy visions, more frightful even than those suggested by previous waking fears..

Methought I was in a well-appointed, gallant, English craft, the bright sunshine beamed gladly on the white, expanded sails, and unspotted, polished decks, as we glided smoothly along the clear blue waters of a summer sea: suddenly arose a black, portentous-looking cloud, followed by a fierce, threatening, and scorching blast, which furiously lashed the now dark and crested waters into mountain waves. Staggering, as we were, under a heavy press of sail, our masts were soon carried by the board and we next broached-to, a powerless and disabled wreck. Gathering still nearer, this ominous leaden-coloured cloud appeared, as it approached, to envelope us in its embrace, assuming at the same time the shape of a huge, unearthly vampire, whose wings then fanned with deadly blast the crowded decks, striking down by scores our gallant crew, now scattered about in heaps, consisting of the dying and the dead—whilst those whose swollen and blackening tongues still retained the power of utterance and of speech, vainly shrieked out for water, wherewith to cool the burning torments of the "PLAGUE."

VOL. I. N. 8.

I next found myself the sole surviving occupant of this erst gallant bark: I placed myself at the helm; a mountain sea soon struck the vessel's side, curled over the quivering bulwarks, and precipitated me to leeward, amongst the now rotting heaps of foul corruption, which lay strewn about the deck. Unable to regain my feet, stunned, helpless, and prostrate, I rolled powerlessly to and fro, amidst these loathsome relics, so thickly scattered o'er the dismantled wreck, then painfully labouring in the deep trough of the surrounding mountain seas: to steady myself by seizing upon some object, I threw out my hands to the right and left; masses of tangled hair and putrid flesh—the only tangible substances I could lay hold of—then filled, and appeared to mock my grasp.

Succeeding horrors—"horrors!—horrors! horrors! more than tongue can tell, or ear can listen to"—at length aroused me from a most disturbed and troubled sleep, with cold, drops of perspiration starting from my clammy brow. The flickering rays of the expiring cabin lamp, swayed to and fro by the rolling motion of the ship, appeared to be struggling with the approaching dawn of day, which now glimmered faintly through the skylight overhead; and both combined to throw a dubious and fitful light on the features of the poor negro child, who, extended on a low ottoman, or settee, slowly rocked with the heavy rolling motion of the ship—which, by the complaining timbers, and from the creaking of bulkheads, masts, and spars, I concluded to be then becalmed; which was indeed the case.

Whilst contemplating this painful sight, I fancied that a low and scarcely audible moan, responded to a slightly perceptible, heaving movement of the poor little Ethiopian's breast. I listened more attentively, it was certainly no illusive sound. I arose and felt the poor child's pulse and heart, but life and motion appeared to be there completely gone. I next placed a small mirror before his lips, and this last test proved my first supposition to be no mistake, that some few but faint remains of life were left; for the hitherto bright surface of the glass became tinged and deadened, though in the smallest possible degree.

Whilst there is life there is hope—I felt an unusual interest in the fate of this poor, abandoned little wretch, cast thus friendless and unprotected, from the far regions of central Africa, upon a wide and unfeeling world.

The ship's doctor had given him up. I resolved now to try what the ship's cook could do; recalling may-be to mind, that Mehemet Ali had once—as the reward of genius and science—promoted to the exalted post of his own “chef de cuisine,” the best scholar in the recently established mathematical college at Boulac: hence, reasoning from analogy, I perhaps concluded that a man of science might fill the same responsible situation on board one of the vessels belonging to the fleet of so discriminating a man as the Pasha had thus proved himself to be.

Nor was I mistaken, as appeared by the result of what ensued: for proceeding immediately on deck, I found the lord of the caboose, even at that early hour, at his post. The coppers were already alight, to prepare the matutinal repast of beans and lentils, for the frugal Egyptian crew. I consequently had no difficulty in obtaining from the man of saucepans, a can of boiling water, in which I next infused a little tea, with the slightest dash of good French cognac; both these ingredients forming part of the few private stores I had taken the precaution of bringing with me on board.

With the assistance of my new ally the cook, I poured some of this cordial mixture down my patient's throat, and the experiment was attended with the most instantaneous and successful effects; for the poor little fellow first heaved a deep-drawn sigh, then breathed heavily, and at last languidly opened the lids of his half-closed, and apparently fast-glazing eyes. A repetition at intervals, of the dose, was continued with the same beneficial results; next, my friend Achmet the cook, slaughtered, at my suggestion, one of the small number of fowls constituting part of the live stock we had on board; and this being converted into broth, effected wonders in the recovery of our little patient, who—to make short of a long story—was thus, by the creative genius of the Egyptian cook, enabled in a day or two to make his appearance upon deck.

Ere this, however, took place, I must pause to relate what had previously passed between myself and Emir Hyder, the quondam master of the little negro slave.

The Emir hearing that I had undertaken the doctoring or “cooking” of his “nigger,” had—under the conviction that he could not possibly survive—most generously begged my acceptance of him as a gift. When, however, the little fellow, on his appearance on deck, showed every sign of convalescence, and of a speedy return to health, scruples seemed suddenly to beset the conscience of the worthy Chief, on the score of the religious education my new “protégé” was likely to receive at my hands. The Emir—who was a Christian Maronite, and a good Catholic, acknowledging the supremacy of the successor of St. Peter at Rome—told me he understood that although a Christian, I did not exactly profess his own particular creed; that on attentively and maturely considering over the case, it had occurred to him that the eternal welfare of the little negro, whom he had rescued from heathenism and perdition, might be compromised, if his spiritual education were left to my care, and that, under these circumstances, he begged I would allow him to recal his gift.

“Oh! Highness,” was my reply, “it is to me a cause of great grief that it should be out of my power to comply with your request: the little Ethiopian was your slave: but by the laws of my country, from the very moment that, in the height of your generosity, your Highness presented him to me, and that I accepted of so munificent a gift—from that instant the boy became free; he is now under the protection of my sovereign, and it would be contrary to our laws, were I to replace him in the state of bondage from whence he has just emerged.”

“I am sure,” continued I, “your Highness would not wish me to incur the displeasure of my most gracious Queen, and the consequent and inevitable disgrace which would ensue from the infringement of our customs and our laws; in such a case, however, your Highness' conscience may be at rest, for on the first opportunity the child shall be baptized—he shall bear the name of ‘Tanta,’ in commemoration of your Highness' generosity on board this vessel—and in order to testify how fully I appreciate your Highness' most liberal act, I beg the acceptance of this little ‘souvenir,’ which I brought with me from Frangistan.”

So saying, I presented the worthy Emir with a brace of pistols, which he required but little pressing to accept, and I heard no more of any objections or religious scruples, as to the spiritual welfare of his former slave.

Little Tanta became my “Chibouquejee,” (pipe-bearer,) and page: we arrived shortly afterwards safely at Beyrout, where I had the satisfaction of restoring the exiled Syrian Chieftains to their families and their mountain homes.

LE GLACIER DES BOIS.

"A wintry waste in dire commotion all."

THOMSON.

WE know of nothing better calculated to impress the mind with the solemn feelings which certain aspects of nature never fail to call forth, or to convince man of his utter inability to stand against her "terrible majesty," when she reigns supreme in desolation, than to place him in the midst of one of those icy valleys, which constitute a portion of the Alpine glaciers. Let his foot be standing wherever it may, upon any part of the green earth, wild, dreary, and trackless as it may be, he can have no such sense of his own individual weakness to escape from its horrors, as when surrounded on all sides by the everlasting snows of these mountainous regions. Their very height above the habitable world seems to shut him out from all communication with his fellows, while the absence of everything that betokens life and vitality produces a sense of want, in addition to that of solitude; and if he happen to find himself in these pathless deserts when the tempest is brooding,

"Sudden and sad, with all its rising train, Vapours, and clouds, and storms," it requires no other element of disquietude to fill up the measure of his fear and evil forebodings, and to lay prostrate his pride and self-sufficiency.

But there is a bright side to the picture, which, as just presented, shows only its dark and appalling features. Every traveller, who has visited the Glacier domains, speaks in most rapturous terms of their magnificence and beauty, when viewed under the influence of a clear, bright morning sun, or at its setting: the level plains of ice reflect its rays like a sea of glass, the spiral and conical shaped masses of frozen snow rise up, like the pinnacles of some vast cathedral with crockets and projecting ornamental work formed by successive driftings and showers, glitter and sparkle in the sun-beams, as if covered with the most dazzling gems; while the tops and the slopes of the mountains catch every tint of glory which the day, in its varied radiance, flings upon them. The dangers and difficulties of an Alpine ascent are amply compensated for by the scenes of beauty it reveals to the traveller. The glaciers of the Arctic regions must surpass those of more southern countries, in extent and sublimity; but their immensity, and the extreme rigour of the climate, altogether preclude the voyager from obtaining such a view of them as to form a just estimate of their grandeur, and to enjoy it even if he could bring them within the range of his vision.

Saussure, a French writer, has, perhaps, given the best detailed description of the glaciers of the Alps; he says, that if a person could be placed at such a height as to take in at one view the range of mountain scenery extending through Switzerland and Dauphiné, he would see a huge mass of lofty elevations, intersected by numerous valleys, and composed of parallel chains, the highest in the middle, and the others decreasing gradually as they recede. The central and highest chain would appear bristled with craggy rocks, covered, even in summer, with snow and ice, in all those parts that are not absolutely vertical; but on both sides of the chain, he would also discern deep and verdant valleys, well watered and covered with villages. Examining still more in detail, he would remark that the central range is composed of lofty peaks and smaller chains, covered with snow on their tops, but having all their slopes, that are not very much inclined, coated with ice, while the intervals between them form elevated valleys, filled with immense masses of ice, extending down into the deep and inhabited valleys which border on the great chain. M. Saussure seems to recognize two kinds of glaciers, quite distinct from each other, and to which all their varieties may be referred. The first are contained in the valleys more or less deep, and which, though at great elevations, are yet commanded on all sides by mountains still higher; while the second are not contained in the valleys, but are spread out on the slopes of the higher peaks. The distinction which this writer here makes, is not confirmed by the opinions of others, who consider that what he describes as two kinds, arises from the different situation of each, and is dependent upon it.

One of the most singular phenomena which the traveller may chance to see in these regions is the descent of the glaciers, when the warmth of the sun has disengaged them from the sides of the mountains, and they are impelled downwards by their own enormous weight. The natural heat of the earth loosens first the under surface of the masses; and when the sun's rays have penetrated into the surrounding soil, the edges of the glaciers become thawed, and they rapidly glide down,—frequently rush down—into the valleys beneath, presenting the strange spectacle of a field of ice in close proximity to green pastures and wide acres of waving corn.

The Alpine glaciers are of very considerable extent: from Mount Blanc to the borders of the Tyrol, about four hundred are reckoned, ranging from three miles to fifteen miles in length, and from one to two and a quarter miles in breadth; the ice varies, generally, from one hundred feet to six hundred in thickness.

How much of wonder and admiration is elicited by such a scene as is presented in the charming little engraving which has suggested these few brief remarks upon "the glaciers." How impressively are the thoughts borne upward to Him who "giveth snow like wool, and scattereth the hoar-frost like ashes: who casteth forth his ice like morsels." And how, almost involuntarily, we are forced to exclaim "Who can stand before His cold?"

A LETTER FROM IRELAND, IN SEPTEMBER, 1852.*

I WAS obliged to break off abruptly, the day after I complained of having no time for thought in Ireland. I was compelled, as you know, by an accident, to relinquish "sight-seeing," and be content to listen, and think, and suffer. As a portion of our route from the house of one friend to the house of another, lay out of the regular line, we posted, and the further south we advanced, the more numerous became the ruined or deserted huts; with acres upon acres of uncultivated land, basking their crops of gigantic weeds beneath a fertilizing sky, passed over even by the rooks, as yielding nothing for their support; telling with mute eloquence, the oft repeated tale, of famine, death—or emigration. The failure of the potato crop this year has struck a panic into those who thought they would bide by the old country a little longer; so the tide of emigration flows more freshly and freely than ever; every living creature who can "rise" the price of a passage, "is determined to leave the old world for the new;" this is, therefore, now a fertile subject for beggary. "Ah, thin sure you won't refuse us the little sixpence, towards the price of the passage to Americkay—give it, and God bless you—sure it's there we'll be out of your way intirely." And I was, in every instance where I conversed with those who were "fitting," most forcibly struck with the feeling expressed by the painter, Barry—"Ireland gave me birth, but she would never have given me bread"—which seemed to have taken possession of every mind; the love of "the sod" is gone—patriotism is starved out; their affection for their kindred is as warm as ever; and the sums of money sent from the new world, to bring out even aged parents, so that "they may live and not die," is positively astounding. Whatever be the faults of the Irish peasant, selfishness is not among the number; the last thing he thinks of is his own personal comfort or ease; he was the perfection of a sort of busy activity, which prompted him to make great efforts for others, little as he did for himself; and for a sudden burst of enthusiastic devotion to a person or a cause, he had no equal. But all this has changed; the starvation he has either suffered from or witnessed, has taken the spirit out of him; and he is fully impressed with the belief that there never will be any luck for him or his on "Ireland's ground." It was painful to me, to hear the poor speak as they did in a tone of heartlessness or contempt of the land of their birth.

"I have nothing to leave behind," said a young man, "but the bones of my people who died—part of the sickness, part of starvation—and it's not likely I'd go on starving in a country that can't keep its own. My only brother's in Sidney, and it shows what a fine place that is, when 'e sent me the price of my passage, and he only in it five months."

"Anyway," said another, "we can't be worse where we're going than we've been here; it's not the country, but food, we want."

Stern, gaunt starvation had clutched them in its iron grasp, and they panted for escape.

"I had no downright fear of starvation for myself," said a stout farmer, who had thrown up his farm, and with his family looked Irish-comfortable, and were packing for emigration, "but it's not pleasant to feel that you've no real interest in the bit of land, nor no Christian right to the bit of food, and so many hungry eyes on it; and that some plague or another rises from the very thing you and your people before you, trusted in—if we are to eat the yellow meal, we may as well eat it where its grown."

Some ten years ago, I saw the departure of an emigrant ship from Cork, and then the regrets were quite as much for the country, as for the "friends." I have seen them throw themselves on the ground and kiss it; I have known them gather the grass from off "their people's" graves, and fold it, as a sacred relic, in their bosoms; I have seen the stern man, as well as the young maiden, take the leaves of a tree, or even a handful of the thatch of their cabin, as mementoes of the land they loved; but this was before the visitation of the famine and pestilence. The advantages of emigration were questioned, and doubted, and debated; "there was plenty of land in their own country to emigrate to, if by any amount of law or labour they could make it their own;" they would "try" what could be done in the fur west, and, please God, return with a "handful of money to oul'd Ireland, God bless it." They did not go away then with a fixed determination never to return, they did not loathe the soil they left; now they fly from that green and beautiful land, as in old times the people fled to their tents from the plague-stricken City of London. The penal laws, the fire and sword, the sucking and pillaging of the old policy, failed to depopulate the country. Now, emigration toils for the Saxon. It is no longer Ireland for the Irish, but Ireland for the stranger. Ireland, that is to say, the land—the earth—of that uninhabited country, will improve; when the English and the Scotch settle down upon its hills and valleys, and infuse their gold into its soil, circulate their wealth and intelligence amongst each other, and the emigrants will better themselves by removing to where their industry would yield them subsistence; but Ireland and the Irish are no longer one and the same thing, and to my simplicity, it seems that the policy which has induced and permitted this, to its present extent, is, to say the least of it, doubtful. The emigrants take with them a host of unkindly feelings towards the fatherland, and it is a question how these feelings may be employed in the "hereafter," which these rushing-on-times forces on so rapidly.

Certainly, the emigration movement I have observed since we came here, is so different from what I remember, that I scarcely recognize the people under its influence; the only "travellers" you meet on the high roads, are emigrants; they crowd the quays of Dublin and Cork and Limerick. The mistress of this beautifully situated hotel, which, when I was last at Killarney, was the residence of one of the old gentry, complained to me bitterly this morning, that she could not get a good female servant, they were all gone to Australia; and when we inquired why, at this late season, the harvests were not gathered in, the reply was, we cannot get hands, they have emigrated! An eye-witness described to me a little scene which he saw at Limerick, bearing out the carelessness of country, which struck me as a new reading of Irish character. A little group of friends and relatives had gathered round a young man and woman, the former was about to leave Ireland, the latter was to receive money from her betrothed, to take her to him in the spring; the girl's mother, a remnant of the old school, was remonstrating with him. "Ah thin sure, can't ye make the money and come to her, and take the place ye'r people had before you, sure its your own country, dear; the Son, darling, and you'll be happy in it, and not take from me the little girl that's the light of my eyes, and the joy of the poor widdy's heart!"

The young man replied to this with a bitter laugh; but a stern, strong man, who had been looking-on silently for some time, laid his hand on the old woman's shoulder, and, turning her, commanded she should "listen to him."

"Hear him," "he's a fine man," "has fine learning," "poor craythur! he's gone through a dale of trouble," "whisht now, listen to him," exclaimed the little crowd.

"Whisht all of you," he said, "for you all ought to hear it, and to some of ye I've tould it more than once. What's to be got by staying in Ireland? tell me that; if there's nothing to be got by staying in it, what's to be got by returning to it?" True for ye, my poor man, nothing sure enough; its gone the miserablest country under the sun. "Its improving," suggested a voice. "Not for us," he replied, bitterly; "I hear of it, but I don't see it, I don't feel it. Its been promising that same a long time; we never got the repale ~~HE~~ promised, who's in his grave long enough now. Hasn't cholera, and fever, and the black blight of the potatoe been with us ever since that time? Havn't they rack-rented and ejected every soul belonging to me, and yet can find no one to roof the walls I left? Aint the heart's blood of the old gentry gone? Wouldn't their sons thank God they knew a trade, and their daughters be glad they had never been born? Isn't the Saxon riding on his iron horses through the country, and laughing, ay laugh- ing at the hills and fields? Doesn't he know they'll all be his, without more murderers than plague and famine clearing the way before him? The back of my hand to you, Ireland, for ever more," and he held his huge hand aloft, the palm turned towards the ship—"the back of my hand to you for ever more—but there's a worse curse than mine over you, the famine and the cholera again and again, until the dead must bury their dead; never look to bring any one back you have any call to," he repeated, and turned away.

"He was a fine man once," said the widow, "but his head's gone, that's it, dear!"

I am sure it would have been impossible for any Irish peasant to have used these words ten years ago; but suppose it possible, he would have been stoned where he stood; and it is not only amongst "the poor and friendless" that this feeling exists; a very respectable servant, in a friend's service, who, with her husband, had accumulated enough to purchase houses which brought them in thirty pounds a-year, told me, that after awhile they thought of going to America.

"But why should you go?" I questioned, "you are exceedingly comfortable, all your wants cared for, you are not over-worked, you have good wages, and property to the amount thirty pounds a-year." "But what is to become of our children?" was the reply of this most un-Irish Irishwoman, "the country is going every year more and more to the bad, and no one will stay in it that can help themselves out of it. We are in no hurry, but we don't mean to leave our bones in Ireland."

"But you are surely attached to the family with whom you have lived so long?"

"God bless them, I am, and so is my husband, and a good right we have; but they can't save the country, and so, when the children are not as soft (young) as they are now, why I suppose we must leave ill-luck and old Ireland behind us!"

I can understand both the charity and policy of clearing the "unions" of the young and the able-bodied, and shipping them to the colonies, but to suffer the better class of the population to pour away as they are doing, and have done, without an effort being made to induce them to remain, looks as if it was thought desirable the country should be cleared of the aborigines—no matter what they were, or what they might become. In the county Limerick, we saw several cows labouring under an epidemic, which has prevailed in a fearful degree—a sort of foot-rot. At Lord M——'s we went to a field where five were lying down, quite unable to stand, and fed from the cow-boy's hand. The local veterinary surgeon confessed he did not know what to make of it; it was piteous to see the melancholy expression of these patient animals, laying on the swad, and evidently trying to prevent their poor hoofs touching the ground.

"Another curse on the country, that's what it is, your honour," was the observation.

There seems less of this presentiment of evil to the country, at Killarney, than in other parts of "the south," here the unprecedented crowd of visitors has caused the pulses of the people to beat with something akin to hope—they all say they never had such a season.

The hotels have benefitted largely from this influx of "foreigners," and the lodging houses in the dirty and neglected town of Killarney, must have realized little fortunes, and certainly there is more hope of these "fortunes" being laid out to advantage, than there was ten years ago; the people have imbibed not only a value for money, but some idea that cleanliness is a good speculation. "How could the gentleman take you for a guide, and you so dirty," I heard one man say to another. I do not think that I ever heard "dirt" put in that light before, by one of "the people." If "the pledge"—that holy compact between labour and prosperity—has been broken by some, it has been the temporal salvation of others; I can recall the time when boatmen, who now bend to their oars in clean white flannel jackets and smart hats, and look the "picture" of cleanliness and health, were poor, squalid, worn-out drunkards, whom I trembled to trust myself with on the Lake. Time has reversed the order of things; and but for the greeting, which an Irish peasant never forgets recalling to your mind a former meeting, by a sly compliment or a jest—I should not have believed it possible that even temperance could have brought such health and prosperity to the poor boatman.

You remember Spillane, who in your day, was the only "bugler," as Gandsey was the only piper of the lakes—they still maintain their superiority. The echoes of "the gap," and of the "eagle's nest," obey Spillane's bugle with redoubled vigour, to what they bestow on other bugles; and "gay, old Gandsey" has no rival near his throne, though we heard a piper at Glenna, who, were he a younger man, we should say might one day claim his crown and sceptre, but both in humour and pathos, Gandsey is still unrivalled. You will be glad to hear that, in the "dead season," the young Spillanes, who are so exceedingly and deservedly popular as guides and buglers, turn their time to good account, having established a sort of trade of their own with England, in Kerry cows and mountain poneys. "Killarney, by which I mean the town itself, seemed to be more disgusting than ever; I suppose the problem could be explained, of why Lord Kenmore, who does so much to clothe and educate, and beautify certain portions of his property, leaves this doomed town to its original misery and wretchedness. The beggars will not remain in "the union;" during the "season," but they are not permitted to swarm over the country, as they used to do, before there was a "union," or before the hotel regulations, and the consideration of the gentry for the stranger, restricted their wanderings at "their own sweet will," and destroying the effect of the scenery by their rags and impurity.

The town, too, has its schools, and charities, and one or two buildings—the new lunatic asylum especially—which serve only to render it still more hideous by the power of contrast. The railway proprietors are about to build an hotel at the terminus, which on dit says, is to contain a hundred bed-rooms, and a salon on a magnificent scale, where dinners, on the continental table d'hôte plan, are to be served at stated hours; this will be a temptation, because of its accommodation to gentlemen tourists, and it is to be hoped that the regeneration of the town will follow; for some time, the four-wheeled "Bianconi" has taken the place of the old jumping car, which, often as it has been "snubbed," is still a delightful mode of travelling: there are absolute omnibuses attached to some of the hotels—only imagine a genuine London omnibus—and ten times more noisy and fussy than the usual lumbering conveyance—oversetting cubs and elderly gentlemen, all the windows rattling, and with half-a-dozen "conductors" hurrying on to the step! isn't that another Saxon stride in the country? "All for the good of the Irish," you will say. "All for the good of Ireland," I reply, "we shall soon have to seek for a Celt at noon-day with a lantern, unless, indeed, we visit America, or take a peep at Australia." I have seen so entire a change in the aspect of the country, and missed so many persons, rich and poor, and been so astounded by the extent of the emigration, and more than astounded by the little impression it seemed to make upon the gentry, who took it as a thing of course, that everybody was to "go," and that then all kinds of prosperity was to follow, not seeming to comprehend the vastness of the change and its consequences—that I hardly dare open my eyes upon the Lakes. We arrived late at night in the town, and stopping to make some inquiry, were surrounded by the touters from the town hotels. "Sorrah a use in driving to the 'Lake,' or the 'Victoria,' or 'Mucross,' or the 'Toro' itself; it isn't half a bed they have at the hotels, nor won't for a week—better stop here, where there's illigant accommodation for man and beast." "Welcome to Killarney, me lady; if we knew you wur coming, it isn't the rags we'd have on." "Kindly welcome; and God bless you for the sixpence you're going to give me—just sixpence, to help me to go to my poor boys in Americkey, who have sent me almost the price of me passage—a pound more 'll do it. Ah! then, may-be the Lord would open yer heart, and you'd give me the pound."

This sort of begging continued amid the accumulating crowd; but there was no sparkle, no flash—the wit is certainly gone out, or away, like the will-o'-the-wisp, to spring up where least expected. But there are signs and tokens of a more industrious spirit than possessed the people some eight or ten years ago, in Killarney, as elsewhere. I must repeat, that then it was all positive, decided, helpless, hopeless beggary; now, the children try to sell you bits of amethyst and Irish diamond "from the mountains;" and the girls importune you with hair chains, and sometimes with inferior specimens of the needlework which is brought to such exquisite perfection in the "schools."*

*The Irish needlework is certainly extraordinary—not only when you consider by whom it is done, but in itself. The crochet, made by the poor pupils of the late lamented Lady Deane; the embroidery of Mrs. Sainthill's Cork school; the "Valenciennes" lace, produced at beautiful Woodstock, under the untiring superintendence of Lady Louisa Tighe; and the guipure, made at Lady Bath's schools, which were first established under the able superintendence of Tristram Kennedy, Esq., M.P. These schools are all sending workers into the world, able, as they are willing, to earn their bread and radiate their knowledge. We have particularised these "schools," because they have been more immediately under our eyes; but what shall we say of the Belfast schools, of the Limerick schools, of the zealous organization which has set forth working embroidery schools in Connought. And it is not only the work, but the habits of industry and cleanliness begotten and cherished by it, that are of priceless value. A friend of mine asked a young girl who was emigrating, what she had to support her when she reached Port Philip? and instead of the "ten-years-ago" answer, "Musha, I don't know," the reply was—"My needle; and I hope, please God, not to be idle on the passage. I was one of the best hands at Mrs. Sainthill's." Here is confidence—born of industry.

When driving to the Gap of Dunloe, we paused to look at the old church of Aghadoe (where, notwithstanding the thousands of bones that have been buried, even within our memory, there are still many bleaching in the sun and wind). Children came to us, with tastefully-arranged bouquets of wild flowers—"heather and harebells." You may say this was begging. No; it was bartering—they sold their flowers; and this is the germ of a higher feeling than begging or giving—it is a little bit of scrambling industry. And when, after our pass through "the Gap," the embarkation at Lord Brandon's cottage, shooting the old Weir, and thinking the lakes and their mountain encampments far more beautiful than anything we had seen since we were last bewildered by their varied and gorgeous scenery—when, I say, we arrived at the Eagle's Nest, and, after listening to the echoes, as in days long past, and thinking the Eagle's Rock the finest "bit" of close mountain scenery on the lake, we were greeted by the "strawberry girls" from the shore, with their arbutus berries, and mountain dew, there, again, were symptoms of improvement; they were not the ragged, half-dressed girls of our first acquaintance with the lake. No—we heard that "the most of them" died in the hard years of fever and famine, and some were gone to America (oh, that everlasting America!); but neut-handed lasses were plying their fingers busily at hair chains, while the elders "knit;" and if one or two of the ancien régime remained amongst them, they were so "improved," that we could not have recognized them. Yes; there are many signs and tokens of an improvement, which will be perfected in other lands. Those who have been labouring at "the schools," both literary and industrial, have been educating an intelligent race of people for the New World, who are gone in the first strength of youthhood, to seek what landlordism and intrigue, social and religious, and an utterly faulty system—false, too, as it was faulty, for centuries—forbade them achieving in their once-loved country.

I am thinking apart from the North. Oh! there is no fear of the North! that will go on weaving, and bleaching, and building—thinking, and watching, and acting—prospering in all things. But though the North is in Ireland, it is not Irish: look at the faces of the people; you might, with no great stretch of imagination, fancy yourself in the High-street of Edinburgh. Look at their manners: short, and blunt, and business-like—a people of great earnestness, and truth, and activity—sparing but little time to the graces, though much to the kindliness of life.

Did the Educator, when he pleased to educate the peasant—to withdraw him from the depths of ignorance and superstition—imagine that the educated would be content to live on like the brutes that perish, and derote his children to the like destiny?

When the legislature planted "national schools" in the valleys, and on the hills, and in the noisome villages, why did they not provide some "tenant-right," or prepare some industrial system, in which the young, up-springing people might exercise their new-found strength?

In the old ignorant days, these peasants knew nothing of the world's resources, or the world's wealth; their mental serfdom was heavier than their physical slavery; and I am convinced that, had not the Educator been busied with them—had not a great fermenting power stirred up their minds—they would have died on, and died off, in the old way. Now, they have made their past the teacher of their future; they have looked upon maps, and seen the extent of the world—new and old—and cried out—the whole country—in one great human cry, "Why should we stay here, and perish?" True; and why have they been suffered to come to this?

A. M. HALL.

THE LAST OF THE MAGICIANS.

(By the Author of the "Battle Cross," &c.)

In early summer, when the leaves were in all their delicious freshness, Laurentius, after the toils of the day, quitted the city of Haerlem, and wandered forth into the neighbouring fields. As he sauntered on, the sounds of the distant populace grew fainter on his ears, and the beauty of nature beneath the setting sun awakened a train of thoughts connected with the passing glories of the scene before him, and the instability and changes that seem combined with the very nature of all that is fair and beautiful.

There came over him saddening reflections, recalling the languor of his own little Lotchen, and he thought how gradually her smile, like the light of a twilight sky, grew fainter and fainter. Much he feared all would be dark soon—dark to him; that his child herself would be a shadow; her voice but a fairy song, an echo fleeting farther off in his memory, till it mingled, and was lost for ever, in the murmurs of the infinite Past.

He had striven to minister to her comforts and amusements, yet toys, and even flowers, were neglected now, or yielded but a momentary pleasure; and so the gloom deepened upon him—upon all; for this was not his only grief; ever, as the child drooped more and more, there came anguish over the countenance of another, whom he loved dearer than life itself.

Laurentius had begun to instruct his Lotchen in the rudiments of reading. She had learned with avidity, at least in days of health and vigour, and even that morning, reminding him of some manuscript which he had shown her, with its illuminations and large initial letters; she had besought him to design for her some of its words, that she might keep them by her, and look at them, and learn them—when she was well again.

In his walk, he heard a bird singing in a wood close by: it was a merry strain, but it made him sadder, if possible, for it reminded him of a time, not long ago, on that very spot, when, with a fair companion on his arm, he momentarily led her aside, and pointed out to her in living letters her own gentle name, carved on the bark of a young tree.

Now, thinking also to gratify his child, stepping out of the path, he engraved some letters on the rind of a beech-tree.

He would have carved her name too—"Lotchen"—but his hand slipped at the second letter, so he made it another word. Then, cutting a square of bark from the tree, he folded it in a piece of paper, and returned home.

Pleased was the little girl when she heard her father's step, and she stretched out her hand to take his present. But, even as he told her of the carved letters, her eyes became dim, and she said she was "a-weary;" and then, as she saw her mother turn away, and her father look strangely at her, she put out her hand feebly for the letters, and, placing them beneath her pillow, said, "she would look at them by-and-bye:" and no doubt she did so, for she had become during her illness an angel in truth and gentleness; but it must have been in heaven that she read them, for she died that night!

Laurentius bowed down with grief; but, after a time, he arose, and went to his usual occupation; and, one day, casting his eyes upon the cover in which he had wrapped the beech-rind, he perceived that the cut edges of the letters had stained the outlines of a word upon the paper. That word was "Light"—the talisman that led to a mighty discovery—the "Open sesame" of an infinite store-room of Thought and of Intelligence.

Thus ran the tale—for it is an old one, and in telling it we have indulged in a few particulars—thus was printing invented.

But not to Haerlem only, but to Mentz and to Strasburg has been assigned the honour of this discovery. Very earnest at one time was the controversy, and each locality had certain pretensions to enforce.

Laurentius, sometimes called "Coster," from his office in the cathedral at Haerlem, has the prior claim. From the rude hints he had now obtained, he perfected a sort of press, or rather wooden stamp, on which he cut his letters. He impressed one side of his sheets only, pasting the unlettered surfaces together, to render their appearance more sightly. The earliest of his essays was long considered to be a work entitled, Speculum Nostræ Salutis, subsequently, however, a book was discovered, supposed to be the first specimen of printing. It was an Hiorarium, impressed on parchment, of eight pages only, containing the Alphabet, the Lord's Prayer, the Apostle's Creed, and three other prayers. It was the rudest thing in the world—such as the first specimen in a new discovery might indicate—as primitive almost as the first steam-engine. It had no numbers to the leaves—no distinctive marks or points; the lines were uneven, and of various lengths; nay, the very shape of the pages differed, some being rhomboidal, some square, some angular. This might be about A.D. 1430.

Previous to this era, wood engraving, a sister art, had been invented. In connection with it, a curious circumstance has lately come to light. The earliest supposed specimen, bearing date A.D. 1423, was a representation of St. Christopher, carrying the infant Jesus. However, about seven years since, an ancient print was discovered at Malines, on the lid of an old chest, of a religious subject, dated A.D. 1118. It was purchased for twenty pounds, by the conservator of the Royal Library, in Brussels, and is a far more curious and better-finished specimen than that of St. Christopher, which is, we believe, in the possession of Earl Spencer.

Playing cards are said to be of an earlier date—first painted, they were supposed to be printed, towards the end of the fourteenth century. Hence sprang the engraving of the images of saints on wood.

Haerlem was not long permitted to boast the undisputed possession of so valuable an art as printing. The invention, in spite of all attempts to conceal its nature, was pirated. It is generally supposed that a workman of Laurentius fled to Strasburg. At all events, Geinsfleisch, alleged to be the elder brother of Guttenberg, set up a printing machine, in connection with the latter, in this town. This undertaking, however, appears to have been fruitless nay, utterly failed for there is no proof of any book being printed at Strasburg till after A.D. 1462, the date of the general dispersion of the printers.

Guttenberg shortly afterwards made his appearance at Mentz. This city was undoubtedly the scene of that improvement in the art which amounted to a second invention, and ended it with a vitality which may be said to have rendered it immortal. It was the application of moveable metal types, instead of the old, fixed wooden ones—an improvement still further enhanced by the use of cast, instead of cut letters; and here for the first time appears on the scene John Fust, or Faust.

Faust, or Faustus, is a name memorable alike in truth or fable. Marlow and Goethe, in undying verse, have immortalized their hero; but the Faust of history is no less famous, and stands forth, in connection with the superstition and fears of an age that saw in his perfection of a wonderful art, something ominous of an alliance with the Enemy of Mankind.

With John Guttenberg did Faust, an eminent and enterprising citizen of Mentz, associate himself as partner in the first printing press; while his own energies and pecuniary resources, combined with the skill and practical knowledge of his coadjutor, soon gave that significance to the discovery that immediately rendered it famous throughout the world.

Wonderful as was the power of Thought, it might be said to have now acquired an omnipresent and all-pervading vitality. Hitherto, the discoveries of science, and the experience of the profoundest minds, were but indented upon sand, which every deluge of barbarism was certain to efface; now, a security was given to man—a sort of ark—which should securely float down the tide of Time to the remotest ages; not only preserving within it all that was most precious in intellectual acquisition, but containing a talisman which should stay, or at least divide, the stormiest waters, so that the good and the true should henceforth pass dry-shod and unharmed among them!

John Faust, citizen of Mentz, having amassed considerable wealth, by commercial pursuits, became stimulated by a nobler ambition than that of mere acquisition, and was desirous of devoting his fortune and his energies to some system which, though it might benefit him in a pecuniary view, should also conduce to the intellectual and physical advantages of his fellow-men. Long, however, did he muse in his search for an efficient mode of carrying his project into effect.

One evening, as the shades of twilight were descending, and he sat alone, deeply absorbed in thought, upon looking up, he beheld a tall, dark form before him. There was an ominous light in the eyes, and a wild intelligence on the dusky brow of the stranger, but on his sunken cheeks were Care, and unrequited Toil, and Famine.

With scarcely a word of apology for his intrusion; with some muttered exclamation, "that he had at length found the man he had long been in quest of," Guttenberg—for he it was—unfolded a small packet, and spread upon the table some pieces of metal. Faust looked, rather than asked, for an explanation. The stranger placed the dies in a kind of stamp, painted the surfaces of the letters—for such they were, with a dark fluid, produced a piece of vellum, and impressed upon it a short sentence. He repeated the operation several times, on each occasion comparing the results. He then displayed a printed page—nay, several printed pages—identical in form, words, and points, such as no scribe could imitate or repeat—such as only could be perfected by some new and wonderful art, or by magic. When Faust had sufficiently admired the production, he exclaimed, "That such a beautiful invention must bring its own reward, and that its authors must speedily become independent of the wealthy and of the great." The stranger made no reply. He took a small lamp from his vest, of a construction that seemed to combine the excellencies of all the latest improvements; he touched the wick with a match, it lighted up, streaming through the apartment, now darkened by the shades of evening, then instantly went out.

"It wants oil—it has none," said Faust.

"Behold the lamp!" replied Guttenberg, again spreading the metal types before Faust. "It wants oil—will you supply it?"

"I will."

That night the bargain was struck—the compact signed—the Lamp was Lighted!

That lamp had the power of infinite multiplication. From a little star, it became to the world a sun; it pierced through the thickest clouds of moral and mental darkness; it was soon reflected by other lamps, of more or less intensity, throughout all the cities of the civilized world.

For some years Faust and Guttenberg laboured together. Though not the inventors, they stamped this art with a utility that rendered it universal. It was in many senses a fearful innovation; it swept away whole centuries of conventional rights and monopolies. Soon, however, it directed itself to mightier and to loftier objects.

These were the magicians! and at one time it appeared they would have experienced the fate of all supposed confederates with the powers of darkness.

Our Faust did not shut himself up with Wagner, to discourse of "dry philosophy;" nor roam the world at large with Mephistopheles, to indulge in luxury, or share the witches' banquet; but he had leagued himself with the unknown, mysterious Guttenberg, and that was nearly as bad. He wielded a power which shook the conventional world to its foundations.

When the first productions of the two printers came out, we are told they created a vast sensation. Men could not sufficiently admire and wonder at the new art; the most accurate scribes, and the best judges of chirography, were astonished at the exact similitude of each copy of an impression; they had no idea of the means—at least, the greater portion of them—by which this identity of character was produced, for the operations of the printing press were guarded and watched over with jealous and mysterious solicitude.

If Faust eschewed magic, we cannot deny but that he loved mystery. Thus, in a most splendid edition of Tully's Offices, which issued from his establishment, he declared, in an appendix, "That the book was not executed by means of ink, nor a quill, nor a brazen pen, but by a wonderfully beautiful art!"

Books, and editions of books, were now published from the press at Mentz, comprising hundreds of volumes, identical in every respect—nay, even to the slightest error, or smallest typographical mark. Gradually, the admiration of the public yielded to a sort of superstitious wonder; then, to fear—to hate. Many, too, were personally interested in denouncing the new art. Fanaticism and ignorance set earnestly to work; the passions of an uneducated populace were speedily aroused; neither witches nor wizards had ceased to be believed in, nor persecuted; and there was in the legends of the people many a wild tale of supernatural agency.

It had been the custom of the scribes to illuminate and embellish some of the ancient manuscripts. Faust, to enhance the value of his impressions, had in some degree followed their example; he had introduced coloured inks; in many of his books the red hue predominated.

This was conclusive; little further proof was required by his enemies; for here was displayed the very signs by which he had contracted his compact with the Evil One. The populace of Mentz rose in tumult. In vain he addressed the municipality; his house was invaded, his presses were destroyed, his business suspended—nay, it is even said he was obliged for a time to shelter himself in concealment from the fury of the rioters.

But Truth prevailed again; the violence of the populace subsided as quickly as it had risen, and the printing press resumed with increased vigour its operations. But Faust and Guttenberg had quarrelled; they were no longer to be associates. The man of genius and the man of enterprise separated; each betook himself to his own path; the mighty secret was divulged, and the press, the deadliest enemy of monopoly, whether scientific or political, became patent to all mankind.

Faust, in union with other partners, issued many works from his establishment. There is a love story, too, connected with this art, with his daughter, the gentle Christina; but we will not tell it now, lest we be accused of romancing.

Faust lived to witness many of the mighty effects of the science which he had so materially promoted. He was undoubtedly a man of energy—a master spirit in his time—one of, if not the last of, the magicians; for the night clouds were breaking up, and the mighty revelations of new truths, as they rose, shone with the clear light of stars, and startled not, with the same fears and superstitions as they did of old!

Last year, during the course of a summer's day, we ascended the Rhine from Bonn to Mentz. Deeply impressed with the scenery around us, the associations connected with the rent walls and gleaming fortresses on either hand—with Drachenfels, and Liebenstein, and Rolandseck, and all the memories of that Past, which their ruins or their strength arrayed before us; warmed, too, by the exclamations of surprise and of delight which escaped the lips of those who, like ourselves, for the first time contemplated this strange region, as it were, of castellated romance.—We, nevertheless, were pilgrims to another shrine, one which, if it offered less of the wonderful to the imagination, was of far deeper significance in the destinies of man. That shrine was the old house at Mentz, where Faust and Gutenberg set up the printing press.

It is preserved, perhaps, too well; there are certain signs of renovation about it, which we could have dispensed with. Nevertheless, much yet survives—the strange old gables, the solid masonry, the curious style of building, for architecture we could hardly call it—to connect it with the mysterious agents who once inhabited it. It should be religiously kept from innovation.

The house—"Zun Jungen"—is likewise shown. It was tenanted by Peter Schoeffer, who supplied Gutenberg's place in Faust's establishment, and married his only daughter, the fair Christina.

On the evening of our arrival at Mentz, we crossed the Grand Square. Through the dim and almost, lampless obscurity, we saw a colossal statue rise before us; we had consulted no guide-book, and it was too dark to form any accurate judgment; however, we deemed it some conqueror—some hero in those physical wars whose fame men so delight to celebrate.

We visited the spot at an early hour the next morning; we saw at a distance, from the style, the attitude, the designs on the compartments of the pedestal,* that it was no mere physical hero; we read the inscription with a flush of triumph—

"Joannes Gutenberg—Primus Typographus." *

Not Mentz, nor any other city, could have claimed a prouder distinction.

At Frankfort, in its principal square, we saw the bronze statue of Goethe, the pedestal of the figure being illustrated with reliefs of the most touching episodes in his works.

Over the Grande Place, at Antwerp, presides the noble figure of Rubens; but, there, every spot connected with art, or literature, or religion—the Gallery, the Museum, the Cathedral, the Churches—is consecrated to his fame.

When shall England, in the centres of her mighty cities, cease only to worship war, or rank, or power?—putting these things ever before the eyes of her population as the highest examples of emulation and of national pride; passing over with a disdainful neglect the conquerors in the intellectual world—the mighty magicians of thought, of poetry, and of art!

* On one side of the pedestal of Gutenberg's statue is this inscription:—

*Johannem Gensfleisch de Gutenberg, Patrocinium Moguntinum,
Ære per totane Europæe collatare Posuerunt Cives, MCCCXXXVII.*

The reverse has these verses:—

*Artem que Græci, latini que Latinos,
Germani solers extudit ingenium,
Nunc quidquid sapiunt, sapiunt que recentes,
Non sibi sed populus, omnibus id sapiunt.*

The other sides exhibit, in relief, Gutenberg reading his first proof to Faust, and a representation of the working of the printing press.

BOOKS AND THEIR AUTHORS.

Our excellent friend, ROBERT CHAMBERS—one of "The Brothers Twain"—who were the means of diffusing so much knowledge by their pure and excellent "Cheap Literature," before cheap literature became the fashion, has finished his publication of a life—Another Life!—of ROBERT BURNS. It has been a labour of love, and yet Mr. Chambers, aided by industry and perseverance which have never been surpassed, has added little of value or interest to the poet's biography, although he has so arranged and completed it as to render it the standard life of the great Scottish poet; history, with its strong lights and heavy shadows, remains the same. There are those who talk of the "warnings" such biographies give to men of genius: we never knew an instance where the fate of one poet deterred another from pursuing exactly the same course. Experience must be bought; all the great teachers fail in bequeathing it to their descendants. Did Jamie Hogg take warning by the fate of Robert Burns? We do not for a moment mean to compare their genius—only their positions and their fates. Poets can be no more taught prudence than pedants can be taught poetry. This may be unphilosophic, but it is true, though it is hardly à propos of these volumes. Robert Chambers, however, rescues the memory of Robert Burns from much connected with it that was intensely painful. He proves that he was neither steeped in the worldly degradation of poverty, nor the besotting habits of intoxication, which overshadowed his memory; neither were his family of a low grade in their native world. We remember well the BURNS' FESTIVAL; never can we think of the Scotch as a "cold-hearted people," after witnessing the enthusiasm of the meeting that hailed the return of the poet's sons to their native land—sons who had won for themselves a position in society, which was elevated by the knowledge that, though the Earl of Panmure (to his honour be it spoken) settled a pension of £50 a year on the poet's widow, her son James, in one year and a half after the deed of gift, "relieved his mother from the necessity of being beholden to a stranger's generosity." When the excitement and fever of this very remarkable gathering had subsided, and we had visited the cottage in which the poet breathed his first breath, and the monument, so exquisitely preserved, which "repentant Scotland" gave to his memory, we were invited by one of the poet's sons, whom we had known in London, to pass an evening in the cottage of Mrs. Begg, the poet's sister. She was a slight, venerable-looking woman—of a mild, rather than an intelligent face—and with that calm, self-possessed manner, which prevents even the humbler Scotch from appearing embarrassed in any society. We were presented to the old lady in duo form, to her two daughters, and her son. The daughters, especially one of them, were quick and intelligent, and did the "honours" of hospitality with genuine kindness, and without the least levelling of affection. There were also the poet's three sons—two of them officers of rank in the Queen's service—and they sat at the cottage board, and enjoyed the meeting with their aunt and cousins earnestly and happily. One of the brothers sang two of his father's songs with a taste and feeling never to be forgotten; and, as a memento of this meeting, inscribed their names in our "album,"—which we have cherished much and long. They stand thus:—

Robert Burns,
W. N. Burns,
J. G. Burns,
Isabella Begg,
Agnes Begg,
Isabella Begg,
Robert Burns Begg.

Ayr, 8th of August, 1844.

Mrs. Begg was, perhaps, the most interesting of the little party. The sons spoke of their father with a veneration which the remarkable scene of the past day might well have increased; but she spoke of her brother—the playmate of her childhood—with affection, blended, we thought, with something like astonishment that the world should make such a wonder about his "bit sangs." We remained at Ayr a day longer than we had intended, that we might pass an evening with the family of Robert Burns; and we feel, after the lapse of eight years, that we enjoy this fresh and earnest biography all the more for having done pilgrimage to his shrine, and passed a few hours in the society of a family who hardly dared hope to be assembled together again on this side of the grave. We wish that all biographers would study the arrangement of these volumes. The plan is admirable. The letters and poems are given chronologically; and the life, as a connecting narrative. No living writer could have performed the task so well. It is by far the most perfect and the most valuable work that has yet been given to the world by Mr. R. Chambers.

MR. JUSTICE TALFOURD has written a memoir to accompany a posthumous tale by Mr. WILLIAM FREDERICK DEACON. To many, this will be a new name in literature—destined to become famous only when the ear is deaf to the voice of the charmer. We knew Mr. Deacon for some years, as the sub-editor of the Sun newspaper; he led a life of hard and earnest, but useful labour, from which he derived small income and no fame. His work, from day to day, in the close and confined atmosphere of the Strand, must have undermined his health. We have rarely seen any one who gave us more completely, or more painfully, the idea of the pale earnest student, the oil of whose lamp was wasting gradually, but surely down to death. He died early, but little known, although much respected by his small circle of friends; and it has been a good work, worthy of the estimable gentleman who has undertaken it, to preserve his memory green, by explaining something of the debt the world owes him. We allude to this case, however, chiefly to lay stress upon a plain, although seldom considered, truth—that many of the most practically useful of our public writers are not known, even by name, to the thousands or tens of thousands whose opinions they daily sway, or it may be, control. Take up any newspaper, and the chances are, you will find in it at least one article equal to the best of those that have given an author fame; now-a-days, the very humblest of our London journals contains matter better by far than the boasted "Classic" of the past century. Who will hesitate to say, that at least once a day, he will find in the Times newspaper articles as full of vigour, point, and eloquence—as pure examples of the "well of English"—as the volumes of Junius can supply, which startled our fathers into wonder approaching to idolatry! Yet not one out of one hundred of the readers of this journal knows, or cares to know, the name of the person who makes his political creed, and gives him mind as well as tongue. It is to be regretted that we must wait until "death, a necessary end," makes us aware of our obligation.

The Photographic Album—As the first fruits of the liberation of the art of photography from the restrictions which the patent laws have so long imposed upon it, we have the above publication, issued by Mr. BOGUE, of Fleet-street. We stated in our last that Mr. FOX TALBOT had resigned his claims as patentee in the calotype, and some other processes of his invention, to the public, still reserving his claim upon the production of portraits by those processes. Mr. ROGER FENTON has immediately availed himself of this, and executed the series now published. The pictures are obtained in the first place on waxed paper, prepared according to the directions of M. LE GRAY. From the original, any number of copies, such as are published, can be obtained. We admire the spirit of the producer and the publisher; at the same time, we cannot but think that some of the views given are of too common and insignificant a character. "The Old Barn," and "The Well Walk," for examples, have no peculiar pictorial merit to recommend them; and, as every photograph involves no small amount of trouble, it appears unfortunate that, in a publication of this kind, the views selected should not have been of spots rendered sacred by the memories clinging to them. The French have done this better than we have: the tombs of Nubian kings—the relics of Egyptian temples—fragments of ancient art—and the sites of heroic or sacred deeds, have been selected by their photographers; and the result of a speculation in photographic views of this character has been most satisfactory. We have no desire to discourage either Mr. Bogue or Mr. Fenton in their spirited undertaking, but we cannot avoid thinking it will prove to their advantage to select for the photographic artists historical scenes and shrines, telling the tales of the earnest devotion of our forefathers. These, or such as these, every one would desire to possess. "Time's effacing fingers" are passing over some hundreds of buildings which we would wish to preserve; photography might be made the means of securing in all truthfulness their present states, and of thus handing down to future historians a history such as no pen could write.

"Another child's book!" Yes; and one of the best, the very best, we have seen for years. Louis' School Days professes to be a story for boys; but it is in every way worthy of a prominent place wherever there are young people. The characters are well drawn—the incidents arise out of circumstances which seem to be inevitable—and the moral and religious lessons which pervade the whole, are so admirably given, that they never seem to teach. A spirit of truth and Christian honour hallows the little volume; we are almost ashamed to confess that we know not who E. J. MAY is, though Louis' School Days has arrived at the distinction of a second edition. If such a book did not find a grateful home in every mother's heart, we should fear that the "women of England" were not worthy of the jewels of which Cornelia was so proud.

Messrs. W. and R. CHAMBERS, of Edinburgh, to whom every part of the world, where the English language prevails, owes a large debt of gratitude, announce a new work; it cannot fail to be good and valuable; we may readily take upon trust any production of theirs, inasmuch as there is no one of their many publications against which objections have ever been urged. The announcement contains a singular fact: the title of the work is to be Chambers' Repository of Instructive and Amusing Tracts. It is to be precisely similar in form, price, and literary character, to that Miscellany of Tracts formerly issued by them, and which, as they inform the public, although it reached a sale of 80,000 a number, they were obliged to discontinue, "because it proved more remunerative to the State, through the channel of the paper duties, than to the Editors, with whom lay the risk and labour." Why then commence once more a similar enterprise? Messrs. Chambers are consequently obliged to explain that they only are enabled to commence a similar work by a very small reduction in the manufacturer's charges for paper, and in some other expenses." We see it asserted in a contemporary (the Critic) that there was originally "a slight miscalculation on the part of Messrs. Chambers." This, however, is an error on the part of the Critic; various circumstances have combined to enable Messrs. Chambers to issue their publication at the price stated, and yet to clear a profit, where two or three years ago no profit could have been. Let it be remembered, that upon each number issued, a very small fraction of a farthing only would be required "to pay;" but that fraction multiplied 80,000 times, may yield a sufficient recompense to justify the undertaking. We earnestly hope that, ere long, a removal of the tax on paper will supply a salutary aid to such wholesale enterers for the public as Messrs. Chambers; for we very strongly suspect that the competition among paper-makers has brought their prices, and consequently profits, so low, as to leave them little more than a nominal advantage upon the issue of the 80,000 sheets.

The Cloud with the Silver Lining, is a pretty little story, by the author of A Trap to catch a Sunbeam, and the immortal brochure of Old Joliffe. This tale is constructed on the same plan as these two favourites, and breathes the same spirit of fragrant cheerfulness. The idea is by no means a new one, Milton says—

"Did a sable cloud Turn forth its silver lining on the night," and Mrs. S. C. HALL adopted the idea from an old Irish proverb, in her novel of Marian, whose nurse, Katty Mackane, talks a great deal about there being "a silver lining to every cloud." Mrs. MacKinlay also, wrote a song, which we remember to have heard Catherine Hayes sing, There's light behind a Cloud, and we have now on our table a poem, by COLONEL BLACKER, with the same refrain, and the last test of the popularity of this favourite sentence, was seeing a box of adhesive wafers from

Mr. Dolby, stamped with "Katty's saying," as a motto; it is one of those simple and exquisite truths, which cannot be too frequently illustrated, which extracts sweets from bitter, and light from darkness. The author of The Cloud with the Silver Lining understands this happy art, and her tales are always welcome, coming as they do, to cheer our firesides—

"Like the sweet bird, we can both remember,
Who left us when summer shone round,
But when chilled by bleak December,
Upon our threshold a welcome still found."

Some time ago, the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge published a book by a lady of the name of KING, (whether Mrs. or Miss, we know not,) but it was called The Mother's Help, and a very "helping" book it is; we have just received another carefully written volume, with a rather unpronounceable title, Catechetical Readings on the Pentateuch, but it is valuable "help" to parents and teachers, in the school-room and out of it. The catechetical form is certainly peculiarly useful in recalling the attention and arousing the reasoning faculties of young persons, where the one might be apt to wander, and the other supinely to acquiesce; but it does not woo the young student to study, appealing rather to reason than to feeling; it is too like the manual of a teacher: thus the book is really what its title professes it to be, an excellent Bible class-book; but we should like to see the matter put into a more readable form, convinced that it would be the means of making it more generally useful, as it shows knowledge of its subject, and breathes pure Christian doctrine in every line.

Pilgrimages to English Shrines. The second series of this work, from the pen of Mrs. S. G. HILL, is announced for publication during the present month. It consists of pilgrimages to the graves of Izaak Walton, William Penn, Lady Rachel Russell, and Sir Richard Lovelace: to the monument of Wren, the garden of Sir Thomas More, the dwelling of Edmund Burke, to Flaxman's monument, and to the time-honoured vicinage of Chertsey. The volume will derive much of its interest, however, from the visits it records to the houses of some of the writer's personal friends. Maria Edgeworth, Mrs. Hoffman, Jane Porter, and Grace Aguilar. The work is dedicated to the writer's friend, Madame Goldschmidt (Jenny Lind). It is very satisfactorily illustrated, by Mr. F. W. Fairholt, who has, moreover, added largely to the value of the volume by the many useful historical and explanatory "notes," which accompany the letter-press.

BOHN'S SCIENTIFIC LIBRARY.—The Bridgewater Treatises have been, until the present time, in a great measure unknown to a very large proportion of a reading public, in consequence of the cost of the volumes forming the series; and when it is remembered that, as science and its laws have become "familiar as household words," the immense debt of gratitude due to the spirited exertions of the publisher of the Scientific Library will be understood and appreciated. It may not be generally known from what cause arose the writing of the Bridgewater Treatises, penned by some of the leading spirits of the day. The Right Hon. and Rev.

Francis Henry, Earl of Bridgewater, by his last will and testament, directed certain trustees to invest in the public funds the sum of £8,000; this sum, with the accruing dividends thereon, to be held at the disposal of the President (for the time being) of the Royal Society of London, to be paid to the person or persons nominated by him. The testator further directing, that the persons so selected should write, print, and publish one thousand copies of a work "On the power, wisdom, and goodness of God, as manifested in the creation; illustrating each work by all reasonable arguments—as, for instance, the variety and formation of God's creatures in the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms; in the construction of the hand of man, and an infinite variety of other arguments; also by discoveries, ancient and modern, in arts, sciences, and the whole extent of literature." The profits from the sale of the works so published to be paid to the authors of the works. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London were requested, by the late President of the Royal Society, Davies Gilbert, Esq., to afford their assistance in determining on the best mode of carrying into effect the intentions of the testator. Acting upon the advice of their lordships, and with the concurrence of a nobleman connected with the deceased, Mr. Gilbert appointed the following eight gentlemen to write separate treatises on the different branches of the subject, as herewith stated:

"On the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God, as Manifested in the Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man." By the Rev. Thomas Chalmers, D.D.

"On the Adaptation of External Nature to the Physical Condition of Man." By John Kidd, M.D., F.R.S.

"Astronomy and General Physics considered with reference to Natural Theology." By the Rev. W. Whewell, M.A., F.R.S.

"The Hand, its Mechanics and Vital Endowments, as Evincing Design." By Sir C. Bell, K.H., F.R.S.

"On Animal and Vegetable Physiology." By Peter Mark Roget, M.D.

"On Geology and Mineralogy." By the Rev. W. Buckland, D.D., F.R.S.

"On the History, Habits, and Instincts of Animals." By the Rev. W. Kirby, M.A., F.R.S.

"On Chemistry, Meteorology, and the Function of Digestion, considered with reference to Natural Theology." By W. Prout, M.D., F.R.S.

Of the above subjects, the two volumes before us contain "The Adaptation of External Nature to the Physical Condition of Man," and "Astronomy and General Physics." The re-issue of these celebrated treatises in so cheap a form, with every attractive combination of good type and paper, is a boon for which to be thankful, affording opportunities and advantages seldom realised.

Two parts of Grimm's Household Stories, illustrated by WERNER, are before us. At a period when the enjoyments and the pleasures of children are subjects of just consideration, it is of immense importance that the literature devoted to their service should be free from serious objection. When this is the case, it would be unjust to quarrel with the fact, that fairy tales are only amusing, and not improving: it is an uncontroverted opinion, that much injury has been done to the tastes and inclinations of young persons, through their having had "strong food" too early forced upon them; expecting pleasure, they found but grave disquisitions, ill-digested, badly understood. The consequence is obvious—a dislike to seek a resource in reading. The fairy feast has many charms, and little beating hearts will look with pleasure on the "Golden Bird," and "Jorinde and Joringel." "The Almond-tree" will be asked for again and again—"Do tell me once more about the little bird that sung—"

"My mother killed me,
My father grieved for me,
My sister, little Marline,
Wept under the almond-tree;
Kywitt, kywitt, what a beautiful bird am I!"

The illustrations and the letter press of Grimm's Stories are worthy of high praise. This edition is published by ANDREY and Co., Old Bond-street. "The Soaring Lark" forms the third part of the series, and will cause to little folk equal delight with the preceding portions.

The Charm.—Children! "these are happy days," when magazines are written for your use; boys and girls are offered, as the motto points out,

"The smiles of nature, and the charms of art."

Tales, poetry, narratives, and illustrations abound in the five parts already issued by ANDREY and Co. Let each little reader tell his playmates of the woodcuts, and of the knowledge of historical facts and anecdotes he acquired, while apparently seeking out a charm.

Home Days; or, The Scrap Book.—This little book, published in Exeter, by HOLMES, is less regular in its construction than is common to others dedicated to young persons; the variation from a beaten track will, at first, cause perplexity, which a little attention to the details will remove. A family party, with individual traits, intermixed with some charming passages, the offsprings of a poetical temperament, and some pleasing tales, constitute the matériel of the Juvenile Scrap-Book.

Nut and Dhuon in Mounslund. By the same publishers.—"Nut" and "Dhuon" are two fine dogs, and "Tee," "To," and little "Tum" are three lovely young hines; and of their voracious history this pretty book speaketh. The adventures of the former will cause us to exclaim, with "Tommy," the cat, "Very glad to see you back again." Both these little books are very neatly "got up," and do much credit to the taste of a provincial publisher.

Ersted's Soul in Nature is a work which has attracted a considerable amount of attention in Denmark and in Germany. It is a series of essays and lectures, directed to carrying out one main idea—the existence of a spiritual beauty in all the works of nature. This work has lately been published by Mr. BONN, the translation having been made by the Misses HORNEM. English readers will now have an opportunity of judging of the merits of the book. To Ersted we owe all the advantages which we derive from the electrical telegraph, he having first discovered the temporary magnetism given to a bar of iron while an electric current is circulating around it. This publication has a peculiar value at the present time, as counteracting the mere material philosophy of our age. The tendency of many of our scientific thinkers appears to be to refer every function to material agencies; here we have the great Danish philosopher beautifully showing us that behind the veil of external nature there is hidden a spiritual nature—the soul in nature—to which we owe all the pleasures derivable from the phenomena of life and the development of beauty.

We have heard with feelings of sincere pleasure that £120 have been collected towards the erection of a monument to the memory of THOMAS HOOD—one of the purest poets, and worthiest men of our century—the Duke of Devonshire has given £25 towards this object. Compelled "to be funny," from an idea which the hydra-headed "public" took up for a time, that he could be nothing else; it was only during the poet's struggles against death that his pathetic, or playful poetry, began to be justly appreciated, and warmed the world into enthusiasm. It is curious to read, just now, of the thousands collected, here and there and everywhere, to erect monuments to the great "CAPTAIN OF THE AGE," who, we declare earnestly and truly, deserves all honour and all homage—but the "crumbs which fall from the rich man's table," would serve to show the world, if properly gathered up, that we also honour those whose lyrics were turned to elevate and embellish life—to hymn freedom—and show us the path where glory waits us. Let us hope that we shall yet lay fitting offerings on the graves of Thomas Moore and Thomas Hood.

GOLD.—It is curious to observe how rapidly books are multiplying on this subject. We have, first, the Lectures which were delivered at the request of the Society of Arts, by the professors of the Government School of Mines; then we have a Manual, by Mr. J. A. PHILLIPS, published by GRIFFIN and Co.; The Chemistry of Gold, by Dr. SCOFFERN; The Australian Gold-field, by Mr. LEPPEL, of the Polytechnic. All these have their several orders of merit, and will be found more or less useful to the gold-seeker.

WE are not in the habit of noticing music, but a rare little moreau of HANDEL's has been brought to light in Ireland: it is called Forest Music. The first movement, in common time, is in his own unmistakable style—a bright réveille, as if for hunters going out in the morning. In the second movement, which is in 6-8 time, there is a singular blending of the character of Irish music with the peculiar style of Handel. "It would seem," says Mr. Townsend, "as if, by interweaving the national music of Ireland with his own, he meant to pay a graceful compliment to the country where he was receiving a very cordial welcome." It is well arranged for the piano-forte, by Dr. SMITH, without any attempt to spoil it by the innovations of modern musical display. Messrs. ROBINSON have also published, for a charitable purpose, a pretty song, by Mr. STEWART BLACKER, wedded to music by a fair composer, who has done justice to the melodious words.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

CHAP. VII.

"NED," who, be it remembered, had received one of the "trysting" pennies from the old gentleman, on the first of January that commenced our tale, was shuffling his way to the appointed corner, among the market baskets and decayed vegetables which always crowd about Covent-garden; it was the new-year's-day, and Ned had improved astonishingly in rags and laziness since that day twelve months.

"Still on the batther, chicken," said an old Irish woman to him; "but where's your come-a-rade?"

"You know"—was the curt reply.

"Ay! IN JAIL! where you ought to be your own self, you spalpeen, if right was right; why couldn't you take pattern by the other—he's a credit to look at, and no ways proud—he helped me up with a basket last week, and that in the public street—and you! You've looked at me slaving at this for ever so long, and never offered me a hand."

"Its too bad," grumbled the boy, without heeding her hint; "here am I, a poor lad, poorer than I was last year; and there's he, grow'd stout and tall, and with an air!—I hate them getting up ways! 'Crabs' and 'Jim Crows' ain't what they was—I'm too big for them—or standing on my head either. If mother know'd I'd have grown out o' that, she'd have given me more gin than she did, to keep me little!"

"God help you!" said the poor woman—whose withered, wrinkled face beamed with good nature—"God help you, and such as you—who are cast, not born, into the world. And sure this is the first of the blessed new-year, and may-be the Lord would look down upon you, and put some light or sense into you—it's too much trouble I have of my own, to be bothered with other peoples. And yet, it's the troubles of the world that bother me most, so it is! God help me, and every poor sinner, this blessed new-year's-day!"

"I wonder," muttered the boy, while the brisk, little woman, her load on her head, trotted off, "I wonder what makes the days be blessed to little Molly—she's always talking of blessed days—she is"—and he lounged on, so degraded as to be hardly ashamed of his rags, or conscious of his having descended lower and lower in the scale of humanity—"them that promise me pennies for holding their horses," he continued, "I never sees them again; but the old gentleman promised me nothin', so I suppose he'll come back." He lounged to the corner, close to the basket shop, and stared in at the window, but soon turned away in disgust; there was nothing available there; but a sharp, keen, sleet was descending—cutting and cold. The boy slunk away, and took shelter under the portico of St. Paul's, just as the brothers Oldham came up Tavistock-street: Mr. Francis looking purpled, pinched, and frozen; his double-breasted coat buttoned up to his throat; his narrow shoulders shrugged to his ears; his long withered hands encased in warm rough gloves; his step, still firm and rapid; he carried an umbrella open; nothing could suggest a more perfect picture of sour discontent, of a man at odds with the world—as much from bitterness as eccentricity—than did his face, and figure, and general bearing; not the pinching misery of want and hunger, but the still poorer misery a man entails upon himself; the working of a powerful but self-harrowed mind, soured rather by wilfulness than circumstances. Mr. Francis seemed gathered together against the world; he was condensed into a human icicle. John walked beside him, the hail beating and melting against his jovial, ruddy face; and he met it, with jovial good humour—he might be said to welcome the hail as an old friend, so earnestly was his face upturned to meet it; his strong muscular figure was enveloped in a sort of roquelaure, lined with a still more foreign-looking fur, or it might be feathers; for men (and women too) come home with such strange "tiring" from the far east, that it is quite impossible for an untraveller citizen of London to define their dresses or draperies; one thing was certain, he carried a pink silk umbrella in his hand, which he sometimes whirled round like the sails of a windmill; at others, thrust out before him, as a sort of pioneer. When he passed a woman, young or old, rich or poor, he made instant and immediate way; but he walked in general in that free and easy manner, as if the street and "the houses," right and left, were his own, and he was attached to them all: he looked even at the bricks and mortar with loving eyes—dogs peered up into his face and wagged their tails—children gazed into his eyes and smiled.

Mr. Frank was sullen and out of humour, and he was particularly so, because his brother—despite the weather, the hail, rain, and wind—persisted in being so happy. He did not quite believe in his happiness, and every now and then he glanced at him in a sideway, uncomfortable manner. If Mr. John saw it, he did not heed it. The sleet was so sharp and bitter, that the street was almost deserted; it glittered in round shining globules upon the pavement, one running a race with the other, and hopping fiercely against the shop windows—old women said the new-year was coming in like a lion, and would go out like a lamb.

"Brother!" said Mr. John, still more to his brother's disgust, "I can't tell you how this sleet revives me! I have not felt anything half so invigorating for twenty years! it puts me in mind of a hail storm once on Snow-hill, when we were little starvelings!—Ah! I meet it differently now, thank God!" he added, reverently, wrapping his warm cloak more closely round him, "thank God for that, and all other mercies!"

"I can't think," muttered his brother, calling to mind his try-ste, "how I could have been such a fool, or in such a humour—one of my speculations in human nature, fond of delving and diving—but having promised, I must come—never broke my word in my life! that's something to say—never! Ah! here's one of the boys! but no—it can't be!" We need not say that it was Mr. Francis Oldham who had invested the sum of threepence in an experiment on the three boys, with whom we also at the same time made acquaintance. Richard Dolland knew Mr. Francis at once; but his quick eye rested for more than a moment upon his brother, even while he took off his hat to Mr. Francis. Richard never appeared to so much advantage as at that moment; his features had grown in beauty and intelligence—his fair, white brow gleamed beneath the rich masses of his folded hair, and his uplooking eyes were filled with the triumph of success.

"Put on your hat," exclaimed Mr. John—"Stay!" said Mr. Francis, with his usual suspicion—"What brought you here?"

"You gave me a penny, sir, this day twelve months, for holding your horse; you may remember there were three boys, you gave each of us a penny—and—"

"Ay—ay!—but where are the other two?"

"I have not seen either of them to-day, sir."

"That's not true," said Mr. Francis, rudely, while he backed into the basket shop for shelter, "you boys always herd together—herd together."

"And is that all you have got to say to him?" inquired Mr. John. Mr. Francis shook the sleet from his coat, and, while doing so, Ned, having crept up to the door, shivering in his rags, made a sort of harlequin pirouette—a half-starved approximation to hilarity. "Here am I!" he exclaimed, while Richard stood back to make room for him.

"Hunt in couples, eh!" said Mr. Francis, his eye gleaming and glittering from one to the other, while the sight of the rags and wretchedness seemed to do him good.

"Hunt in couples," repeated Mr. John, in a tone of voice conveying dissent, "Hunt in couples!" Richard had been changing from red to pale. It was a singular group.

"Well, and what did you do with your penny?" inquired Mr. Francis, addressing Ned.

"Why, ye'r honor, I made more of it?"

"Good," said Mr. Francis, "but how?"

"I had a run of luck, and turned it into four brownies, and would have traded it, only mother spent it all in lush, and beat me afterwards; he knows the sort she is," he added, "it's all along of his having a tidy mother, he's such a swell."

"So you have a good mother, have you?" inquired Mr. John of Richard.

"Thank God, I have, sir!"

Richard's warmth and confidence returned under the influence of Mr. John's genial smile—"and the penny the gentleman gave me was 'the lucky penny' of my life!"

"It had a hole in it?" interrupted Ned (pointing with his thumb), "he always got the luck."

Mr. Francis chuckled; the evident rascality and starvation of Ned, seasoned by his quaint, coarse humour, had attracted him; the boy upheld his theory as to the wretchedness of humanity—it was pleasant to find all as vile as he argued they must be; it was pleasant to know that, though the penny multiplied, the canker was at the root, and it did not prosper.

"But tell me, how was it?" said Mr. John, whose sympathies went with Richard. Before the youth could reply, Mr. John espied a somewhat discontented expression in the eyes of the good-natured shop woman.

"Ah!" he said, smiling at her, "so many damp strangers: has your mother a dog?"

"No, sir."

"A cat?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then here's a house for the cat, and a basket for your mother." Having thus gained the good graces of the shopwoman, who was not very clear as to the sanity of either of the old gentlemen, yet offered a chair to Mr. John, as seemingly the most sane of the two, she withdrew to the communicating door of the second shop, keeping her attention fixed on "Ned," and wondering how any one could notice such a "rubbish!"

"Now, my lad, what of your 'lucky penny'?" inquired Mr. John, of Richard.

"I had long desired to read the life of Benjamin Franklin, sir—and I went to a bookseller's where I had seen it, and offered the penny for the privilege. He wanted an errand boy, and took me into his service!"

"Without a character?"

"No, sir," replied Richard; and he drew himself up a little—"I was never without that."

"Oh! oh! proud I see!—good—and why did you want to read the life of Benjamin Franklin?"

"Because, sir, long ago, when my poor father was alive, he used to set me copies—sentences composed by Benjamin Franklin—and I wanted to read the life of a man who was so wise and so useful, and who did so much for himself as well as for mankind."

"Good! and were you quite satisfied with the book?"

"There is a great deal in it I should like to do, and much I should like to be. My mother objected to some things; but she would have me to read only one book—the Bible, sir."

"And you?"

"Oh, sir, I should like to read all the books in the world."

"Ah! youngster, did you ever read men?"

The boy looked down; and, after a moment or two, said, "It is perhaps pleasanter to read books."

"Complimentary! you try, then."

"I do, sir; every face is a book—is it not, sir?"

"Ah! well, I suppose so—the young are the pleasures of hope—now I, what should I be?"

"The pleasures of memory, sir, I should think, you look so happy."

Mr. Francis had dismissed his "boy," and was watching the progress of the acquaintance between his brother and Richard.

"A flatterer!" said he.

"Oh, sir, truth is not flattery: I only thought so."

"You said you were an errand boy," observed Mr. Francis, advancing.

"Yes, sir, at first, quite; but my master is very kind to me, very; he lends me books, and of late I sometimes sit with him and read to him, and might do so every evening if I liked; but my mother, sir, she is quite a young woman, but she is blind."

Mr. John spoke to Mr. Francis apart; while they did so, Richard went to the door, and looked out into the sleet which was thickening into snow. "And why did you make the appointment with the boys, if you did not mean to help the deserving?" said Mr. John. "I am delighted with this lad: the penny, brother, can be made as lucky to you as it has been to him, if you only take advantage of it; his voice has a strain of music in it which recalls—"

"Nothing!" interrupted Mr. Francis, "what should it recall? You are still given to seeing visions and dreaming dreams. Now, boy," he added sharply, "where does your master live?"

Richard told him. "And your name?"

"My father changed his name some time before his death; but I am called Richard Dolland!"

"And what was your father's real name?" inquired Mr. John.

"What have we to do with that?" said Mr. Francis.

"I have," replied Mr. John; "I do not like changed names."

"Ah! if he had one I dare say he had forty," said Mr. Francis, with a bitter sneer.

"No, sir," answered the lad, while an indignant flush overspread his face. "No, sir, he changed his name because of the cruelty of his father; his real name was Richard Oldham."

Francis Oldham sprang at the lad's throat, as a tiger would spring upon a fawn.

"It is false!" he screamed, "It is false!—false!—false!—he left no child; and if he did?" His grasp relaxed, he fixed his strong eyes upon the panting boy, who returned his gaze with more indignation than terror—there was something, to the looker-on, positively fearful in the expression of both; one so blighting, so cruel; the other so defying; the very look which youth should never wear to age.

"Come!" said the old man to his brother, in a deep, hoarse voice, so deep that it seemed a voice from the grave, hard and untrembling as from a tongue of stone. "Come, come! I say, why do you look at him? there might be twenty Richard Oldhams. Come, John, brother—if you touch him, or hold any communion with him, I will never grasp your hand in mine. Never, do you hear; I will never, never give my thoughts back for yours; never rest (if there are spirits) in a grave near yours: touch him not, brother; brother, if you touch him I will curse you both! Do not speak to me," he added passionately, not the frail flickering passion of an old man, feeble even in its violence, but with deep, concentrated, ungovernable rage; his eyes flashing, his thin lips quivering, his long, blue fingers impotent in strength, grappling the air convulsively—"do not speak to me, but follow me, idiot though I have been, what had I to do with new readings of human nature—follow me, brother!"

Mr. John saw that the present was no time to combat his brother's will; and so, without another word, he followed him out of the shop, much to the relief of the basket-seller, who told Richard he would have a good action against that awful old gentleman, who was the biggest Turk she had ever seen; beginning the new-year after that fashion, and at his age too, when every additional day was an especial mercy.

"There he goes, tearing down the street?" she continued, "the wind has carried off his hat, but he does not heed it; the hail mingles with his grey hair, and streams over his shoulders; yet he feels nothing but his own passion: his strong, hearty brother can hardly keep pace with him. I judge he hasn't the same devil within to urge him on. Why don't you follow, and find out who they are? it may be worth your while."

Richard did not tarry either to hear or answer the question; he had disappeared through the other door. "Well, I declare," continued the woman, "this is as strange a new-year's prank as ever I saw played; and as I live, the boy hasn't taken the baskets!"

Heedless of the knobby snow, and the pitiless wind which drifted it against his bare head, Mr. Francis rushed on. The few passengers who sheltered beneath their umbrellas, or bent half blindly to the blast, felt something pass them on the pavement so rapidly that visions of accidents or death troubled their minds; others stepped from beneath the shelter of door-ways, or hooded lanes, and thought the old man just escaped from a lunatic asylum, and that his keeper was following. More than one policeman asked Mr. John if he wanted help; but he waved them back, and they looked half perplexed and half offended at their assistance being thus declined. Mr. Francis's knock made the old door shudder again; though the servant did not know that her master inflicted this loudness on the quiet of Harley-street, his little dog was aware of his presence, and flew to meet him; but his savage mood permitted of no tenderness, no sympathy, even from his dog. He kicked it madly from his path; the little creature howled piteously; but the moment after it limped to the door, which was banged and bolted against all the world, stretched out its half broken limb, and with that look of patient agony which a dog's face so well expresses, resolved to watch and wait for the returning love, which was all the heaven it ever knew or hoped for.

Mr. John could hear his brother pacing up and down the room, and when his step came near the door the dog's ears moved, and it uttered its little whine of recognition and entreaty. "How much love," thought Mr. John, "we cast to the winds and waves, which if garnered and nurtured, if even received and suffered to enter into the recesses where it would be content to dwell and fructify, would multiply the sweetest and tenderest blessings of existence around our hearths and homes. The sympathy we give to the small demands of others returns four-fold into our own bosoms." And then, again and again, he murmured—"Her grandchild, her grandchild—such an unaccountable sympathy drawing me towards him!" He tried to read; the letters escaped from their position, and resolved themselves into silhouettes and outlines of the face and figure of the youth he had seen—he looked up at the ceiling—out of the window—shadows, and visions, and memories were all about him. The present and palpable world was the dream—the shadows, the reality. He repeated over and over again to himself the youth's address, as if it could by any possibility be forgotten; his eagerness to go to his master could scarcely be restrained, and yet he must wait—he must not go ALONE. How his long life in the Indian world seemed but a day, an hour, so forcibly did the time previous to his leaving England return to him; how he recalled it, and reviewed it, and what strong claims did nature assert within his bosom to enable him to remember, during those feverish hours, that Francis was his brother, born of his own mother—that mother whose image, beautified by the lapse of years, was so often present in his dreams—and how mysterious it was that Richard mingled with his thoughts, few as they were, of the future. The boy had suddenly given him a new interest in life. His thankful, righteous spirit was more than once lifted up in gratitude to God, not because of any certain good, but of the promise which he felt had been given him since the morning, that his old age would not be childless. "Childless!" had it ever been so?—never! He had taken to his bosom, during his long life, orphans and deserted little ones, children who would at all events have morally perished but for the strong hand which gathered them into a home, and the warm heart which opened to receive them; fed, and clothed, and educated, he had placed out many such in the world. He had a perpetuity of children, and children's children, whose prayers daily and nightly rose to the throne of the Almighty for his good; no wonder that his ways prospered, that his sleep was sweet, and his blithe old heart happy. Some who did not profit by their blessing, he tried either to hope for or forget; the wild and the wayward, he suffered for a time to be scourged by their own whips, and the whips of the world; and when satisfied that their chastisement had been sufficient, he made a way for them to escape. He had engraved on brass, over the door of the school he had founded and endowed, a motto which should be engraved on every Christian heart—

"While there is life there is hope!"

He had even scoffed at the idea of "natural affection," instance the love borne to him by, and the love he bore to many of, these adopted children, as a love which could not be surpassed; but the lad Richard tugged so strongly at his heart, that he might have doubted his favourite theory, though he would have answered, "kindred has nought to do with it, but Richard's father was my child!" Oh, deep and priceless love! bearing the toiler company through the rugged years of a rugged life; living after the life which gave it life has perished; a memory, yet strengthening the strong manly heart, to conquer in the battle with the world; a fragrance shedding perfume all along that world's thorny ways; a presence in the toilsome day and silent night—an active, earnest influence rising from a little mound of daisy-covered earth—a faith strengthening the faith by which eternal happiness is gained. Oh, matchless love! the joy and theme of angels, when purged of earthly passion, it lives,

"Bright as a star, when only one
Is shining in the sky."

• Blessed are they whose hearts by thy power become altars! Even so it was with Mr. John Oldham; and those who observed his refinement and his benevolence, little wot of how it came, and wondered how it was that he did not marry, that his own children might inherit the wealth he lavished (so always prate the thoughtless) upon those who were not kith nor kin to him.

At last his brother's door was opened, and the little dog permitted to enter, which it did with a joyous bark, looping up its poor leg the while, but not heeding its suffering, in delight at the murmured words which crept into its little palpitating heart; and he was sorry—Mr. Francis was both sorry and ashamed that he had injured the faithful brute, who had imbibed from him whatever of ill-temper disfigured its canine nature. In a short time the dinner was served, and Mr. Francis, self-conquered, met his brother with a firm step. Two hectic spots, as if dashed on by a fire-brand, burned beneath his eyes; they were the only vestiges of his recent emotion. "I bade two of our old friends to meet you," he said, "but they were engaged." Mr. John made no reply—he could not speak—his brother helped him and himself; nor did Mr. Francis seem to observe that John's plate was removed untouched. The brothers had changed natures. Mr. Francis was terribly gay and grim—it was the flashing, fearful attempt at mirth of an evil spirit—the death's head crowned with a upas branch. When John spoke at all it was in monosyllables, dropped by accident; once he attempted to caress the little, limping dog, but the creature would have bitten him. Mr. Francis laughed. There was something terribly desolate, worse a hundred times than lonely, in this new-year's feast—for in Mr. Francis's frugal housekeeping it was a feast. The cloth was removed, wine and dessert were placed upon the table; the servant vanished.

"I did not forget even your monkey, brother John," said Mr. Francis, "here are some nuts for him; but let us drink to this happy new-year, brother—happy new-year—ah! ah! Come, happy new-year."

John sprang to his feet, and pushed back the wine; "as I am a living man," he exclaimed, "I will neither break bread, nor taste wine, until we—mind, brother, I said we—it is my duty as well as yours—before we render justice! Food would suffocate me, wine would poison me, until this is done. I followed your footsteps; waited till your feelings subsided; acted like a child, instead of a man, at your command. But now I call upon you—put that wine from your lips—put down the wine, brother Francis—let us out through the night; find the lad's master, and if it be that his character is clear, let us render justice; let us receive him as a new-year's gift from God!"

"Perjury!" said Francis, "I swore no child of my child should ever touch coin of mine."

"He has touched it: the 'Lucky Penny' was given by you to him; but away with so poor a subterfuge. Shall man swear to the author of all evil to do evil, and may not God set the compact aside, and teach him to repent, and do well? We are commanded not to do evil that good may come of it; how much stronger is the command not to let evil become the parent of evil."

"There is somewhere," replied Francis, with scorn and calmness, "mention made of a deaf adder, that will not hear the voice of the charmer."

"Ay, because he is deaf, but you are not so; nay, you shall not purry me. Look at it as you will, I see that a fearful wrong has been done; nay, more than one, a succession of wrongs—leaving you, the inflictor, a greater sufferer than those upon whom you inflicted punishment. I know it is the time and the hour to see to this; if, indeed, the lad would accept retribution from your hands."

"If—if—he would accept retribution from my hands," repeated Mr. Francis, bitterly, "if!—if!—you know he has been taught (should he be the boy) to curse his grandfather; and yet were I to advance a step—were I to advance hand or foot towards him—were I to look upon him as I would upon a thing I loathe (he knowing who I was, and what I have), the young serpent would coil, and cringe, and smile, and flatter, and hulk, and fawn;—the old man's gold—see if he would not plunge his soul into perdition to grasp it—do I not know the world?—do I not know the mammon worship of old and young?"

"Test him, try him," rejoined Mr. John: "brother, that is all I ask, try if he be the thing you say—if he be, I will absolve you;" Mr. Francis rose from his seat, "I will do more, I will not consider him our kin."

Mr. Francis rang the bell. "My coat, and hat, and stick."

"It rains, and blows, and snows, from all points of the compass, sir," said the astonished servant; "shall I call a coach?"

"No! now, brother John"—he cast a look of such exultation towards him—such a look as Satan cast at our first parents when they departed from Eden. Going down the steps, Mr. Francis turned round, and laid his hand upon Mr. John's arm—"if he accepts, you do not give him any claim on me!"

"No," was the curt reply. They proceeded silently, those two old men, battering on against the blast, trembling both—the one secure in his belief of the predominance of that cringing evil which would lick the dust for gold; the other hoping in the good, and confiding with most unworldly wisdom in the independence of a young boy, whose loving and beloved mother was blind and helpless, and who, with high aspirations, had suffered from the bleakest poverty.

An empty coach hailed them—they entered. Mr. John heard through the blast, and amid the rattling of the once courtly carriage, the low, chuckling laugh of his brother—he enjoyed the infiction he suffered because of its anticipated fruitage. They drew up at the bookseller's door, and knocked. By degrees the light vanished from the area window, and ascended the stairs, standing still in the hall; again they knocked, and Martha slowly undid the door to the length of the chain, and poking her face out, asked what they wanted.

"Woman! undo the door," commanded Mr. Francis—it needed no second word—the chain fell, and Martha, shading her candle from the wind and rain with her hand, stood open-mouthed gazing at the old man.

"Ask, ask," he repeated, to Mr. John.

Mr. John did so: "Was this Matthew Whitelock's?"

"People generally, even when they come by daylight, say Mr. Matthew," was the reply to him, though her gaze was rivetted on Mr. Francis: "but he was not at home, he was gone out—gone to Richard Dolland's; why shouldn't he, if he liked it, go to his messenger—Dick Dolland's, who had grown into Richard, and might into Mr. Richard, who could tell?" She gave the widow's address, and away lumbered the carriage, stopping at the entrance to the little court. The two old men prepared to cross the threshold of the widow's lodging; they saw from the shadows, as they passed the window, that there were three in the little room. Mr. Francis knocked, Richard opened the door, and turning suddenly round, exclaimed, as people do at the sudden fulfilment of a dream—"They are here!"

CHAP. VIII.

THE widow was seated in her usual corner; her Bible lay in her lap, for though she had ceased to be able to read its word, it was her inexpressible comfort; it strengthened her feebleness, nay, it restored her sight—it was her friend, her faith, her love, her devotion—the fountain of living waters, the rock of ages; her fingers knew all her favourite chapters, and could trace them verse by verse—never did she sit down that her Bible was not in her lap; never did she lie down, that it did not companion her pillow. Matthew Whitelock sat at the table, upon which he had placed the rough-looking book in which he had made calculations as to the probable success of Richard's poems. Oh! fallacious HOPE, that could cause a bookseller to miscalculate, and believe in the profits of poetry! yet it is a positive fact, that Matthew Whitelock was telling off, bit by bit, the expected "trade profits." The widow's early bloom and beauty was, of course, gone; there was no trace of that remaining; but there was something so sweet, and calm, and patient, in the expression of her face; so lovely, in the hot-house delicacy of her complexion; so fragile and helpless in the transparency of her hands, which, since the brothers' entrance, trembled upon her Bible; something so appealing, not to man, but to God, in those upturned eyes, that John felt as if the presence of an angel filled that small room. Francis looked and wondered, and mentally cursed all beauty, but he could not speak. Mr. John briefly explained to Mr. Whitelock why they had sought him, and how much they desired to know if Richard's tale was true. Gradually during the brief and (to Mr. John) most satisfactory conversation, the widow rose from her seat, and passing one arm round Richard, drew him towards her. As word after word of praise passed from the bookseller's lips, the mother became more and more erect. "I have only learned this evening," said the worthy man, "that, for reasons rather to be felt than understood, his mother bore the name her husband chose, and the lad seems to think that one of you gentlemen knows more about his family than they themselves have been able to ascertain."

"No, sir," said the widow, "not able to ascertain—because we never inquired; never, since my poor husband's death, did we wish to know aught about the cruel parent who abandoned him on his death-bed. Sir, I offered to leave my husband—I knew it would have killed me—if that could have tempted his father to forgive him—forgive him the crime of marrying me. No: we have starved since, and laboured until those eyes wept and worked themselves into darkness, but we never, in our bitterest days of want or weakness, desired to hear the name of Mr. Francis Oldham."

Mr. John feared to look at his brother, nor did he see the door partially open, or the strong profile of the bookseller's Irish servant resting against its frame.

"And yet," said Mr. Francis, "I believe I am the grandfather of that boy, whose father's perverse will displaced him from my heart."

Richard felt his mother press heavily against him; it seemed as if she felt, by strong instinct, her husband's spirit rising within her son. "Keep still," she whispered, "keep still; hear him to the end! it may be he repents; we must forgive him if he repents." The boy was swelling into a giant.

"I will now acknowledge him, take him from his low associates, and place him properly in the world," continued Mr. Francis.

"Don't think of me, Richard, don't, dear," again whispered the mother, "perhaps he repents."

The lad pressed closely to her. "I have no low associates, sir," he said, "and having work, I am already well placed in the world."

A pang shot through Mr. Francis; could it be that he was wrong, that the boy would not accept the golden bribe he offered? He now became more anxious to succeed. "But I am rich, boy, very rich; instead of carrying parcels, you shall ride your own horse, you shall go to college, and become (if you are clever, as this good man says,) celebrated; think of it, this narrow room, these poor clothes will pass away; you have a rich grandfather who can't live long—you have but to obey him—to love him."

"Love him!" repeated Richard, and the torrent of his feelings broke forth. "Love him! sir, I could not love you, I could not for an hundred times your wealth; obey you, I could not—you, sir, you, who might have saved my father's life and would not; whose unforgiving neglect has sealed my mother's eyes in blindness—love you! Can I not now recall my father's wasted form—and the words of patience under affliction, and of praise to God, the breathings of memory mingled together, and how he spoke of his mother, and the cruelties she received at your hands—love you!"

"The lad," interposed the bookseller, "has a highly poetic temperament, and no knowledge whatever of the world, as you may observe, sir; you have taken him unawares—he will see his advantage soon; he cannot help seeing it."

"I see," said Richard, "the advantage you gave me: I feel that, and am grateful for it. I see how I can work my way. I do not fear for myself or for my mother, now."

"You are excited; do you not know that your grandfather has a right to your duty and obedience; do you not see the hand of God in bringing you together?" said Mr. White-lock.

"I see!" replied Richard, "my dying father, my starving mother—I see her now—I remember what I was myself."

"But also remember the hand which gave you the 'lucky penny,'" interrupted the bookseller.

Richard covered his face.

"Battery and brutality," muttered Matty to herself, "I thought I knew the old tyrant through the hoary shroud of age; and good right I have. Didn't I nurse his wife through her dying; and to think of our Richard being her grandchild—no wonder my heart went to him so tenderly—oh the deceitfulness, murdering, and dreadfulness of the world; day and night, day and night—God help us all! we are all bad together!"

"Were my father's father poor," said Richard, after a long pause, "were he poor and I rich, I would help him: he should not starve, nor work himself to blindness; but I will never put my neck into a yoke I cannot carry. I could not love him—I could not obey him. His help would be to me a millstone. I will not even bear his name."

"Speak to him," said the bookseller, addressing the widow. "If all be real that I have heard, he is thrusting fortune from him."

The widow drew herself up, grasping her Bible more firmly than ever.

"Let it be," she said, "according to the texts—HE loved. When great trouble came upon HIM, particularly in his latter days, when his hours were numbered, and he would still try to teach the child; then, when in most need of comfort, he would open his Bible, asking God, according to his want, for a text of patience, or faith, or hope, or charity, and it would come; just where he opened, there would be the balm and the teaching. And, according to the words God calls to my memory, let the lad decide." She paused as if waiting, and then quoted, in a low tone,

"It saith—'the chief thing for life is water, bread, and clothing, and a house to cover shame.' Thank God, we have all these in an humble way. And it says again, 'Better is the life of a poor man in a mean cottage, than delicate fare in another man's house;' and it saith, 'understanding is a well-spring of life.' My child has understanding, and his father thought it for good, and it was sanctified by hope, and the hope hath been fulfilled." She paused, and shook her head mournfully; "they will not come to me, as they used to HIM. I am not worthy as HE was; and I told HIS father

I was not worthy, and that if he would forgive him, and nurture him, I would give him back his son!"—again she paused.

"This is cruel," said Mr. John; "it is too much for her; see how she trembles!"

"Mother! blessed, mother!" exclaimed Richard, clasping her in his arms, "my own dear, darling mother!"

"And what," she said, "did Jesus in the Temple? did he not overthrow the tables of the money-changers? You are right, my child—you do not want his wealth, let him go forth; his presence troubles me, I have the right text now, my child—it is for YOU—"

"And thou shalt eat of the labour of thy hands. Oh, well is thee, and happy shalt thou be!"

"Happy shalt thou be, my child," she repeated, exultingly, "his wealth has not made him happy; there is no HOPE in his voice; and if he came to make the offer, it was because of the unquietness of his own spirit; he has said naught of the sorrow, naught of the repentance, that would sanctify the gift. Oh, poor, old gentleman, how I do pity him; his cruelty killed the sweetest lady that ever loved a tyrant, and that was one desolation; and then, when his son loved me, that was another! I do pity the poor old gentleman whom even we desire to depart."

The bookseller was pulling at Mr. John's arm—"He has such talent, sir, poetic talent," he whispered, "a wonderful lad, sir; I saw it from the first, sir; he is proud and wilful. Ask the gentleman to give him time; you know it is sheer madness—quite the spirit of a gentleman." This eloquence was lost on Mr. John, whose feelings had been, and were, too strong for words; he had altogether lost sight of the actual motive why his brother had accompanied him there. He took the widow's hand—"You mistake—you both mistake," he said, gently, "we came here to render justice, and I—I ought to have long since inquired concerning my nephew."

"Then," said the widow, "you are Mr. John, ah! my poor husband always said, you ought to have been his father!"

A fearful groan burst from the lips of Mr. Francis, the straightforward and simple avowal stuck like a spear into his heart: the widow heard the groan.

"The poor gentleman is ill," she said, adding, with her usual simplicity, "Richard, though we will not have his money, nor his help, we must pay him respect; he has nothing to love him—nothing—no one—in the wide, wide world."

Hardened and cynical, avaricious, cold, and calculating, as Mr. Francis had been for years, labouring to stifle all human emotion, that scene was more than he could bear; a victim of the contending and stormy passions which for years had rendered him the terror of his household, and a mystery to the world; disappointed by an independence which, while he could not comprehend, he was forced to reverence; he was so suddenly struck by the widow's observation to his brother that, as the room felt whirling round, he grasped the door, falling literally into the arms of the woman, who had watched with deep devotion, the fading away of his gentle wife. Matty was silenced by both the terror of that moment, and the memory of the past. She flung off his cravat—loosened his throat and chest; and while he lay in a fearfully prolonged state of insensibility, they saw, resting upon the shrivelled skin that barely shrouded the bones and muscles of his frame, the miniature of his wife.

No one but Matty knew why, when his eyes rested upon that picture, poor Mr. John sunk upon his knees, close by his brother's side, or why tears—large tears—streamed through his fingers. That night Mr. Francis was carried home to his cold and stately house, a stricken man; a sluggish attack of paralysis had seized upon him, not fiercely, but fatally, withdrawing motion and feeling gradually, bit by bit, from the worn-out frame, but leaving the brain, after a time, clear and active, although the heavy tongue could not give words to his thoughts or his desires; when, after that fearful interview, consciousness fully returned, it was evident, that this stubborn spirit rose in rebellion against the MERCY, which had borne so long with his caprices and his misdeeds—his angry looks and stammering words were ever rushing against those who ministered to his wants—sleepless and restless, he wearied even Mr. John by his thankless and turbulent spirit—he would get up, and when his feet refused to do their office, curse in broken accents, the poor limbs that could neither move nor support his frail weight. Gradually his speech returned, and long did Mr. John, with the patient, loving kindness of the tenderest woman, minister to his wants. How he prayed for that brother, how daily and hourly, he wearied heaven with prayers, how he entreated that grace might be given even at the eleventh hour; that he might but call upon that name, in spirit and in truth, of which only cometh salvation; how, sometimes in the night watches, sometimes in the grey morning light, he fancied that a murmured petition—an entreaty for peace, and pardon, trembled on those adamant lips. Oh, how his old heart beat with joy and thankfulness, when Mr. Francis asked him, to finish the Lord's prayer; he knew, he said, as far as the petition for daily bread, and was "curious" (so his pride masked his desire), to hear the remainder; how fervently it was repeated, though in a trembling voice—earnest and trembling—is recorded in heaven—hope twinkled like a star, flickering and wavering at first—obscured by clouds, but still ascending in the firmament. It was not often that John slept upon his watch, but one particular night, he was awakened from the slumber, which in age is frequently as light as in childhood—"Brother, brother;" it was Mr. Francis; he asked him to pray for him, and wondered if the boy and his mother would come to his bed side.

Many weeks had passed, and Mr. John knew that Richard continued earnestly at his work, more brave because of his independence, and, perhaps, a thought more erect in his carriage, but steady and firm; thinking sometimes of what he might have been, but resolved to BE, by his own exertions; it was well to see that though the poet's dream was strong upon him—though he was in the toils, he worked manfully in his vocation; his blind, patient mother, pondering now and then, if the old gentleman lived, but turning from his proffered gifts, into the poor, but happy haven, where hope was growing into certainty.

Mr. John did but wait; he lingered in the trust that his brother might be permitted to perform his duty; and thus it was, mother and son stood beside his bed, and then the hard bitter man, grown feeble as a little child—tears welling from that stern heart, gushing from those blood-shot eyes—asked for the pardon he had refused to grant; the blind woman, standing still beside him, until her limbs refused to do their office, and she sank upon her knees, bound to pray for him "who had despitely used her," which she did weepingly, and with the earnestness of a Christian. After that, the old man could not bear that Richard should be away from his bed-side; in this new love, he seemed to have forgotten altogether Mr. John, he would follow Richard's movements with his eyes, listen to his reading until the coming shadows of the GREAT CHANGE dulled his senses—and mutter, "The Lucky Penny, The Lucky Penny!" The lad's voice soothed him—the lad's hand smoothed his pillow—the lad's step fell like a feather on the floor, and yet, as the old man's face whitened, and assumed, strange to say, even a peaceful expression, that of the youth became anxious and distressed. Mr. Francis lingered long on the threshold of the grave, and yet to his brother all seemed soon over; but his was that happy nature which renews its youth by sympathy with the young.

Matthew Whitelock flourished greatly in a new shop, and had the satisfaction, after the lapse of a few years, of publishing (not by subscription) a beautifully illustrated volume of poems, by an Oxford graduate, who might have played a distinguished part in fashionable society, but for a home-keeping and somewhat distant manner—loving the companionship of a very jovial old uncle better than the society of Freshmen or Fellows—and watching the footsteps of a blind mother with the tenderness and affection of a girl.

It may seem no less strange than true, but Richard Oldham always believed he would have preferred the fortune he might have achieved for himself, to that which he inherited; though in a glass case in his library, containing many coins of rare value, is deposited an old copy of the Life of Benjamin Franklin, and a common penny piece—the “Lucky Penny.”

BIRDS IN CAPTIVITY.*

THE PAINTED BUNTING.

(Emberiza Ciris.)

THE characteristics of the bunting family do not vary materially from the grosbeaks (loxias) and the finches (fringilla); the buntings are gregarious, with a strong bill, the sides of the mandibles bending inwards, having in the upper one a knob (or tooth) for the purpose of bruising food.

The painted bunting is one of the most pleasing of cage birds; its form, loving habits, and gentle sweet song, combine to make it an especial favourite. I have been the possessor of several, and found all equally docile, fond of leaving their cages for the breakfast-table, and eating and bathing close by me, in the most familiar way. I had some trouble in enticing them back to captivity, and a chase ensued; they run along the ground like mice, and skim noiselessly from place to place. With their own species they are as quarrelsome as our own robins, but quite gentle with other birds. In the pairing season they have, during the night, a loud but melodious cry, or call-note, beyond which they do not betray the migratory impulses. Their resentments and love of practical jokes are admitted by every one who gives room for their exhibition. In one instance, in my large cage, I had found it necessary to divide two of these birds, their quarrel being à l'outrance, the stronger being condemned to solitary confinement, he constantly watched the approach of his opponent to the seed drawer, and through the bars attacked an unfortunate bunch of newly-grown feathers on the head of his enemy; this freak he repaid with interest, the lex talionis was suggestive of a shower bath. The Rev. Gilbert White, in his charming work on the Natural History of Selborne, gives the following passage, illustrative of this peculiarity:—“I have a nonpareil which often sits demurely upon a perch behind the other birds, and from thence makes excursions to pull their tails, poising itself upon the wing, like a kestrel, underneath another bird, while it pulls its tail, and almost drags it from the perch, regaining its own post before the other can steady itself or look round. It is very fond of molesting, in this manner, a beautiful red-bird, which had lost a foot before it reached this country, and to whom the joke is on this account particularly inconvenient; and I have been amused at observing, when the nonpareil went down afterwards to feed, the red-bird look down upon it with an aspect that spoke, as plain as words could tell, ‘you are the fellow who dared to pull my tail.’” It is singular that these birds, like the genus sylvia (warblers), are very troublesome to each other, in plucking out feathers from their companions, and swallowing the small ones. The nonpareil being a foreign bird, it is not possible to ascertain if the analogy holds good throughout, the sylvia division not showing this mischievous propensity, except when reared from the nest.

The painted bunting—better known as the “nonpareil,” and also called the “pope”—suffers greatly during the season of moult; he therefore requires warmth, an unequal temperature causing much irregularity and deficiency of plumage—the supervention of cold weather stopping its progress. It requires four years to bring to perfection the varied colours of this beautiful and gentle little creature, and the assistance afforded to nature will depend upon a warm room at the moulting season, a sunny aspect (without draughts of air) in summer, and suitable food. The healthiest and the highest coloured nonpareil I ever saw, was one the property of an invalid lady; I attribute its beauty to an increased temperature, and the fact that it was fed all day upon bread and milk, and towards evening the seed vessel was returned to the cage, and left with the bird until morning; fed on seed only, the brilliant colouring could not have been found. The nonpareil is not one of those birds directly subject to mutation of colour (which in every case may be attributed to climate or artificial heat, and to the quality of food), but he approaches near to it, for elderberries and soft pears cause a deeper red upon his breast, while the seed-eater, exposed to variable degrees of cold, will only attain to the yellow colour, and probably have a bald head. It is possible that the absence of the sun's rays has much to do with colour. The Rev. W. Herbert says that he once saw an English white water lily blow of a pale rose-colour, after a week of unusual heat in July; besides, a feather that has three colours will have three distinct glands, a vessel attached to each gland for conveying the colouring matter to the feather—may not weakness lessen the vitality necessary to the supply?

The proper food is millet, canary, chicory, and lettuce seeds, with poppy-seed and figs occasionally; the soft food already prescribed, such as milk, bread and milk, and meat; of green food, lettuce, chickweed and cress, and occasionally mealworms; a spider when ailing, and flies ad libitum. I do not, under other circumstances than an invalid's chamber, advise the adoption of the alternate meals, for an obvious cause; there the bird was under surveillance, and the food not allowed to sour, or fall short.

I found these birds subject to diarrhoea and wasting fever; the former I cured in a manner which will be found in a future chapter, on the diseases of birds; when the malady proceeded to the second stage, I failed, and the sufferings of several days' duration ended in death. I advise that all remedies be accompanied by great quiet to the bird.

The silence of M. Boestien and other writers on the subject of the habits of this most interesting of the buntings would surprise any one who had been so fortunate as to make one familiar, the emberiza ciris being decidedly one of our best foreign cage birds.

It is a native of Mexico, Guiana, and Lower Canada, a few specimens to be seen in North Carolina, more numerous in South Carolina, and still more abundant in Georgia. It is described by Wilson—"As one of the little summer birds of Louisiana, with gay dress and docile manners; arriving there from the south in the middle of April, and building in May, making its nest in orange trees, and only perfecting its plumage in four years; its favourite food is flies, which it greedily devours, even on the passage; as a captive, it watches for some friendly hand to offer them; they are extremely susceptible of cold."

THE SONG THRUSH.

(Turdus Musicus.)

"'Tis thine, as through the copses rude
Some passive wanderer sighs along,
To soothe him with a cheerful song,
And tell of hope and fortitude."

I NEED not tell my readers that this is a delightful cage bird, and in consequence of the facility of its capture, is a common bird with persons who are content with the chance of its turning out well; nevertheless, there are few native birds so uncertain. In the first place, it is difficult to distinguish the female (and she sings the first year), unless to those accustomed to observe trifling distinctive marks, one of which is that the breast of the hen bird is not so yellow as in the males; also it is considered that the spring and autumnal brood differ in quality of song in cities. The adult bird is captured in preference to nestlings—of the former many die from hunger, refusing to feed—others remain sulky, while some become so tame as to sing on the hand; consistently with this variety of temperament will be found an equal diversity of song. A good bird is worth, in London, from one pound sterling to fifty shillings, while another may not be valued at a few pence.

The best food for thrushes and their allies is German paste, and of bread crumbs, sweet bun, or French roll crumbs, one-third, with occasionally a little raw beef—it creates blood, and gives health and song. They also like bread and butter, a spider, when ill, and mealworms occasionally. Some persons use beanmeal and potato; it is unobjectionable as a variety, but I have not found it very advantageous to make much alteration in the food of this order: indeed, they will not allow of it. "Fig-dust," moistened with water into a stiff paste, to which add an equal quantity of bruised hemp-seed, is the most wholesome food for young thrushes and blackbirds, tending to cleanliness and brilliant plumage. Thrushes like grated cheese, but I quite object, through recent experience, to the scalded bread and hemp-seed, recommended by Mr. Sweet and the Rev. Mr. Herbert.

I have seen this class eat fresh lettuce, and it is good for them, also fruit of all kinds. I need not repeat these directions, under the head of blackbirds, and others of the same species, for the food should be alike.

Thrushes and blackbirds are usually given snails in their cages, which they break by hitting them against a stone provided for the purpose. They get on, however, where some amateurs object to slow torture, without them, but I think the birds are in better health if given ants' mould; sand and fresh water required. I have stated my objection to mealworms as a dietary supply—some writers advise barley-meal and milk; I have not found milk to answer given constantly. The thrush loves bathing; in England he frequents wet meadows, especially in the winter season—in Scotland he shows himself as a hardy mountaineer. He is not migratory, except in France, but with us they have their seasons for being gregarious. Their tenderness for their young, even for the nestlings of other birds is quite remarkable. The thrush, in a wild state, breeds early in spring, frequently the nests of this species are constructed in March, and has from two to three broods in the year—this is the case with most birds that continue in song till after midsummer. It is one of our earliest songsters, beginning its sweet notes in January, when all nature is waiting the approach of spring; it continues its song until August, and resumes it in autumn.

Like all the soft-billed species, the thrush does not breed in confinement—the period of its song is about the same duration in captivity as in the wild state. Many have been taught to whistle, but the natural notes of a good thrush are to be preferred.

The thrush and blackbird species are generally hardy, and will live in a cage with varied food from seven to ten years. The diseases to which they are most subject are constipation and consumption, to be treated as directed for nightingales and others of the soft-billed kind; for cramps, to which they are subject, apply oil, with a small preparation of hartshorn to the legs, and lay the bird gently on flannel, which should, for the time being, cover the sand-drawer and perches, and keep the sufferer warm, clean, and dry. This disease is frequently fatal to warblers, any degree of cold or damp affecting the digestion of birds necessarily fed artificially. The nostrils of thrushes and blackbirds frequently become clogged; instead of adopting the cruel and uncertain operation of "passing a feather through them," use vinegar and water outwardly. In all cases of illness to this genera, increase, (or rather provide, if not previously allowed), the use of insects, giving the present subject a spider occasionally, wood-lice, earwigs, flies, and mealworms.

There is one trait observable in all the thrush genus—they are jealous birds, and they exhibit this failing by preserving a total silence in the company of a rival. It is a remarkable fact that perhaps the better songster will choose to show his indignation by not uttering a single note for months—may be for life—whereas, when separated, perhaps given away in disgust, he has "come out" to astonish his little world.

A friend of mine, who is compassionate and abounding in kindness, rescued, by the means of a small bribe, a nest of thrushes from a diminutive Nero; this lady lost her rest, and, with care brought on her callow nestlings; in course of time, to the surprise of every one, one of the birds had the perfect song of the Virginia nightingale or red-bird, an inmate of the room; the peculiar "roll" of the American grosbeak was imitated so well, that, when not looking at the birds, the owner of the voice could not be distinguished. The other nestlings never sung, and moulted so badly that a proposal was made to clothe the naked in flannel jackets. It is this tendency to imitating sounds that makes it necessary to take thrushes by a process called by bird-fanciers bat-folding, and not from the nest. These birds batted at night, and I believe all thrushes would do so if afforded the opportunity.

There is no qualification required in a pet bird that a thrush has not—he is friendly, docile, easily pleased, saucy, and hardy—according to the kind treatment he receives he will repay. His voice when at the height of the season is best mellowed by distance, it then steals softly on the ear, and is truly delightful; placed outside a window (provided the top and sides of his cage are protected from harsh winds or draughts of air) it will be found more agreeable than when he is the inmate of a room.

The effect, in one instance I am about to record, of thoughtful care and of its reward, will interest all lovers of birds. I have the anecdote from the possessor of "Tom Thrush," and have been introduced to the hero of my "o'er true tale," who looks down so contentedly from his gilded apartment, as if he would fain say, "Hero I am a happy pensioner!" One day this favoured bird had been allowed as usual to leave his cage for a bath; after he had washed himself in the very effective manner natural to his species, he flew into the fire—the rest I give in the words of his fond mistress. "When I returned to the room I did not know what had occurred, and called him as usual; he did not come, and when I found him, he looked to me as if wet; on taking him up, his feathers crumbled in my hands—I was so distressed! I found, however, upon examination, that although his feathers were fizzled off, that only his feet were burnt; we were removing here (a distance of twenty miles from London), and were to leave on the day following this accident. I put my poor toasted bird in a cage, covered the perches and sand-drawer with oiled cambric, took him on my lap in the carriage, and brought him here; he sung during a part of the journey. I renewed the oiled cambric as it dried, he lost the front toe of each foot, and the first joint of two others, but he continues well and saucy." This bird is now eight years old, feeds well, and sings well, even in this present month, illustrating the fact of the pleasure to be derived from the exercise of feeling and kindly care, directed towards our poor defenceless prisoners. I do not remember to have heard, during my long experience of the feathered tribe, a more beautiful instance of thoughtful and tender treatment than poor "Tom" received. It is supposed that animals in a domestic state are longer lived than those in a wild. Man's "threescore years and ten" are prolonged by constitutional strength, and by the cares, the loves, the charities of human nature.

I conclude with the indulgence of quoting a passage from Mac Gillivray laudatory of the "throatsle":—"There may be wilder, louder, and more marvellous songs, and the mocking-bird may be singing the requiem of the Red Indian of the Ohio, or charming the heart of his ruthless oppressor, the white man of many inventions; but to me, it is all sufficient, for it enters into the soul, melts the heart into tenderness, diffuses a holy calm, and connects the peace of earth with the transcendent happiness of heaven."

THE BLACKBIRD.

(Turdus Merula.)

Of all our thrushes this ought to be the favourite in confinement; its docility, loveliness, and aptitude, are all desirable qualities, its natural note is good, but more fitted to a large space than in a room, and it can be taught like a bullfinch, and with more certain results.

The treatment to be the same as for the thrush; it only sings six months in the year; in a wild state they frequent marshy meadows, and have, like the thrush, the water-call. It is supposed that, in Britain, blackbirds stay with us all the year round; they sing on the wing, also (it is asserted, but I do not know it to be so) at night; they breed in March. The blackbird is unfit for the aviary, being as pugnacious as the starling, destroying not only small birds, but, without hesitation, he will attack poultry. I have been told of a determined fight with a duck, which was assailed by his enemy under the disadvantage of perching on his back. This organ of "destructiveness" would not be suspected by an ordinary observer, so graceful and gentle are his movements in a cage, so loving is his eye directed towards his master.

Their fondness for baked pears may be turned to amusing account. In my family, a blackbird was taken from Dublin to London, and in remembrance of his nativity was called "Paddy." Like the Mungo o celebrity, Paddy "was here and there and everywhere;" he had all the vivacity and savoir faire justly attributed to Irishmen, and I fear I must add pugnacity also; one day he observed from his cage (for he was a favoured inmate of the dining-room) a dish that roused his epicureanism; he alighted in the midst of his coveted feast, and devoured to his heart's content—who could resist so decided a compliment to the providore? The supply was frequently repeated by his kind mistress, till Paddy's favourite plat became an understood attention on the part of the chef; to try the bird, the cage door was sometimes closed, and then his anger and his cries procured him liberty, when, without hesitation, he darted onwards to the feast. It was said, that "Paddy" held London birds to be inferior to him in fun and frolic; poor bird, he paid the penalty of having been fed on hempseed and soaked bread. Over the manner of his death, and his previous long and painful illness, I must drop a veil.

THE MIGRATORY RED-BREASTED THRUSH.

OR ROBIN.

(Turdus Migratorius.)

This beautiful bird is, as are all the transatlantic thrushes, migratory, but more especially restless, roving from one region to another during fall and winter. The great American ornithologist, Wilson, writes of this species as "well known;" in Europe it is a scarce bird, even through importation, and not indigenous to Britain. I must, therefore, treat of it according to its habitat. It is called in America the robin, and is treated with all the veneration paid with us to the red-breast; he is one of the earliest songsters, pairs in April, and sings with earnestness, and is welcomed as forming the prelude to the general spring concert. Hearn says that the migratory thrush or robin is also called at Hudson's Bay "the red-bird"—"the American field-fare;" that of "red-bird," must be an error, that name being invariably given to the Virginia nightingale.

It has been asserted that this bird cannot brook the confinement of the cage. Wilson contradicts the supposition, adding, that except the mocking-bird, there is none more frequently domesticated. I have one of them, it is docile, tame, sings melodiously, but with the interrupted note of the thrush tribe, and is especially unwilling to leave his abode. The only difficulty I found, was to discover the most suitable food; he had become, before he came into my hands, thin and relaxed, on bread and milk, meal, and the ordinary treatment. I succeeded in strengthening him by the following diet: German paste and bread crumbs, with raw scraped beef, which I varied by the dry food made of German paste, bread crumbs, and grated bullock's liver; I intend, when in better condition, to try "fig-dust" and crushed hemp; at present he feeds best on the first-named treatment. I found meal-worms put him off his food, and gave him ants and their mould, which he greatly relished. I observed he sought eagerly for the ants in the mould; a spider often made him lively when drooping; he eats grapes, cherries, salad, and chickweed, berries, and all insects offered him. I found it advisable, about once a week, or when I saw him too still, or look "shaky," to vary his food by a day's supply of bread and milk prepared as directed, the choice of which preparation must depend upon observation, and at other times, scalded hemp and bread. This bird has to be carefully kept from cold during moult, when he suffers much, but is long lived, if attended to with any degree of attention; he sings very little when not in the open air, or his cage at an open window, and his best notes are to be heard morning and night; he bathes daily, and requires a roomy cage high and long, as he is easily startled and breaks his feathers. I have not tested his temper, but consider among small birds he would be destructive, from his answering the Virginian nightingale's note, when in separate windows, but trying to attack him when he alights on the cage. His breast, in confinement, takes a darker hue than in a wild state. The migratory thrush partakes more of the blackbird than of the song-thrush, the latter is a more gentle bird. At Mr. Nolan's, in Dublin, I have seen it among small birds in an aviary cage, and more singular, at a season when most birds are restless and quarrelsome, at the breeding time: one of the birds was laying, but the eggs were not fertile. While on this subject, I wish to mention a statement of Mr. Forster's, for the truth of which I cannot vouch, that the migratory thrush or American robin, at Moose Fort, builds, lays, and hatches, in fourteen days; but that at Hudson's Bay, four degrees north, they take twenty-six days!

In the depth of winter their plumage is in the best order, and they are subject to changes of colour on the breast, according to food and locality.

THE RED-BREAST.

(Motacilla Rubecula.)

"To hearts that fancy fairy things,
In plaintive prelude sweetly sings
The requiem of the dying year."

THE robin, sacred to the household gods, is known to and loved by all, from the infant who hears in his nursery of "the babes in the wood," to the aged being who associates with his sweet note and lively greeting, "the old familiar friend," who now—

"Half afraid, he first Against the window beats, then brisk alights
On the warm hearth, then hopping o'er th' floor,
Eyes all the smiling family askew,
And pecks, and starts, and wonders where he is,
Till more familiar grown the table crumbs Attract his tender feet."

No bird has given rise to more frequent arguments on the subject of migration;* but it is generally allowed that this bird, unsocial with his kind, seeks in the season of scarcity for man (from whom, the enemy of his order, his confidence has purchased an immunity in his favour—the veriest murderer of "small deer")

* Buffon is of opinion the robin migrates singly. Many remain with us all the winter, principally males; but in Sweden and Germany they are considered to be migrants. MacGillivray and Montagu incline to the side of migration to a partial extent. Robins are, above all others, the least gregarious.

would blush to say he had killed cock robin); and without leaving us, he lays in summer his tax on nature. No red-breast out of Great Britain is familiar with man.

I do not like to see these birds caged, nor do I think they thrive in confinement after the pairing time sets in, and it is therefore advisable to give them their liberty in the spring season; when their plumage looks ruffled you may be certain they will no longer repay your care; but if the place where they are emancipated affords shelter, they will, in gratitude, sing their song of liberty close by your window. To return to plain prose, their food should be varied—scraped meat, egg, and moistened bread is the best; German paste and crumbs also agree. It is customary to give grated liver added to the latter, but I prefer boiled veal grated, it is used as a substitute for mealworms in some cases; ants' mould pleases them on the sand-drawer; a totally dry diet will give robins paralysis. In sickness, and they show it by drooping rapidly, and looking anxious, give mealworms in castor oil; the objection to them as food is the dislike which insectivorous birds take afterwards to artificial preparations, and producing a craving for them; they bathe daily, and take the water so plentifully as to look black. I have never seen them eat green food or fruit.

So much has been written on the pugnacity of robins, that I am unwilling to add an additional stone to the cairn of its misdemeanours. That the subject is an old one, is proven by an old Latin proverb, signifying that "one bush does not hold two robins"—"num arbutum non alit duos erithacos." Erithacos, that prettiest of generic names marked by the most scientific of writers! no, we would take thee in thy peaceful mood, associate you with the earliest recollections of happy childhood, and invest you with piety and love, and hail you as that sweet bird

"——— who, by some name or other,
All men who know thee call thee brother."

In this spirit, I transfer to these pages an idea truly beautiful. It is the legend of the robin. "It was on the day when the Lord Jesus felt his pain upon the bitter cross of wood, that a small and tender bird, which had hovered awhile around, drew nigh, about the seventh hour, and nestled upon a wreath of Syrian thorns. And when the gentle creature of the air beheld those cruel spikes, the thirty and three which pierced that bleeding brow, she was moved with grief, and compassion, and the piety of birds; and she sought to turn aside, if but one of those thorns, with her fluttering wings and lifted feet! It was in vain! She did but rend her own soft breast, until blood flowed over her feathers from the wound! Then said a voice from among the angels, 'Thou hast done well, sweet daughter of the boughs! Yea, and I bring thee tidings of reward. Henceforth, from this very hour, and because of this deed of thine, it shall be that in many a land thy race and kind shall bear upon their bosoms the hue and banner of thy faithful blood; and the children of every house shall yearn with a natural love towards the birds of the ruddy breast, and shall greet their presence in its season with a voice of thanksgiving!'"

THE INTERCEPTED LETTER.

WERE we skilled in the art and mystery of novel-writing, or of inditing an amusing story, here is a subject that might tempt us to lead our readers into a labyrinth of plots as intricate as the web of Penelope, and as changing in their operations upon the characters mixed up with them, as the lights and shadows that play upon the landscape in an April day. It is true that, a letter "intercepted" in the way we find it in Mr. Wood's picture, suggests but one idea of its contents, for the often quoted line of our great dramatist,

"The course of true love never did run smooth," seems truthfully exemplified in the two figures composing the work; in the downcast look of the charming girl, the story of whose heart undoubtedly is laid bare in those unfolded pages; and in the earnest, affectionate look of her mother. But then, who wrote the letter—and how came it to be written—and how happened it to fall into the old lady's hands—and what did it actually say—and who is the young creature who has had the imprudence to fall in love, and the misfortune to have the secret thus prematurely discovered? These, and many other questions we should be compelled to answer, if we once made an attempt to unravel the mysteries of this "Intercepted Letter." One thing, however, we may affirm, and it is forced upon us by the gentle, loving expression of the matron's countenance, that it was no idle curiosity that induced her to break that seal, but a mother's solicitude for the peace and happiness of her child. That there is a probability of these being compromised by what the epistle reveals seems not unlikely; or it may be the daughter is, after all, only receiving a just, but kindly reproof, for having kept back her secret from one who has a parent's right to know it, and a parent's heart gently to admonish, if unworthy, and to rejoice with, if deserving of sympathy. But a truce to fancy, and now for a few words about the class of art to which the subject belongs.

As a general rule, it must be admitted we English are not a poetical people, or in other words, that the physical constitution of our minds sympathises little with the purely ideal. Now it seems singular that this absence of, or rather disregard for, imaginative feeling, should exist in a country that produced Shakespeare and Milton, with a host of lesser luminaries, whose individual and united powers have transcended those of any single state, ancient or modern, in the whole world. But this does not alter the fact, which might be easily proved by inquiry among a miscellaneous company of some twenty men of ordinary education, how many have read the entire plays of Shakespeare, and the Paradise Lost of Milton; we might safely affirm that not one in five would acknowledge to have done so. It may, however, be argued, that this is only a negative proof of our indifference to ideal composition, for it is possible to love the poetry of nature, yet not the poet's description of it; we may wander in an imaginary world of our own, but care not for one another creates for us. Here, again, we hold to our former position, by asserting that the appreciation and love of beauty depend upon the effect it has upon us apart from the accidental circumstance of production.

But to turn from books to pictures; what is the class of art most popular with us? We speak not of landscape, for all delight in that with more or less intensity, but of that class which comes under the denomination of history, public or domestic. Religious art, in its ordinary acceptation, is little esteemed among us; we have not been educated to a love of it, nor had it brought before us so prominently as to influence our feelings and judgment; while the legendary Christian art, that yet forms no unimportant part of sacred worship in other countries, has never found a habitation in Protestant Britain. Historical painting, on a grand and comprehensive scale, finds abundance of admirers, but few patrons, and is consequently but little practised: had we more public galleries, our deficiencies in this branch of art would probably be better supplied; but so long as public aid is withheld from it, we must submit to the reproach that foreigners are pleased to cast at us—of being a nation indifferent to high art. Benjamin West found a patron in George III., and painted some excellent pictures, though not of the highest order; Hayden persevered in it and perished; Hilton also clung to it with the enthusiasm of a great mind, though he left most of his works unsold behind him; and Barry could scarcely earn a decent maintenance for himself, though he was a man of unquestionable genius; so, indeed, were the others, but, excepting West, they acquired a reputation and little else. It is, however, only right to express an opinion, that the historical painter is now in a fairer way of being recognised and appreciated than he was a quarter of a century since, though there is yet but little encouragement for him to launch out boldly on its wide arena.

It is the ordinary incidents of life which, as pictures, commend themselves most favourably to the English people: crowds gather round a "Dame's School," by Webster; the "Selection of a Wedding Gown," by Mulready; and a "Court Yard," full of dogs and horses, by Landseer, who glance only at a more elevated class of pictures, from the pencils of Eastlake, Cope, and Herbert. They can enter into the spirit and reality of what they know to be nature in its common aspects; but they cannot feel when the artist comes out from the usual haunts of the world, and would carry others with him into a nobler and more elevated region. We must have more of what the French term le spirituel in our mental composition, ere we shake off our attachment to the actuel.

THE MARRYING MAN.*

A TALE FOUNDED ON FACT.

(By the Author of "Frank Fairleigh," &c. &c.)

CHAPTER III.

MY extreme surprise, or, I may almost say, my consternation, on hearing the announcement with which the former chapter concluded, was so evident that I was naturally obliged to enter into an explanation, which was almost as painful to my feelings to make, as it must have been to those of my auditor to receive. For some time he could not bring himself to believe that I was not mistaken; but each fresh question served only to render the identity of Burrell with that of his English son-in-law more certain. Age, height, appearance, manner, all coincided; the time at which he had quitted England, the name of the London agent, (a person with whom I knew my Burrell to have some business connexion,) even a peculiar ring which he was in the habit of wearing, all tallied—the fact was indisputable. Charley Burrell, rescued, not a fortnight since, from the Turkish bowstring—Charley Burrell, the run-away husband of little Mary, daughter of the Crown Inn, at Portsmouth, had been and gone and committed bigamy, by espousing the lovely and accomplished Zoe! The discovery was a most unpleasant one. My poor friend, the merchant, was in a frightful state of mind, nor was I in a much more comfortable one; and I mentally cursed my evil fortune, which had first brought me in contact with so great a scoundrel as Burrell, and then forced upon me the ungrateful task of appearing as his accuser.

It was above an hour before my host became sufficiently composed for me to venture to leave him. When at length I did so, it was with a promise that I would revisit him before the ship sailed, and afford him any further counsel and assistance which it might be in my power to offer him. And so I took my departure, leaving the poor old man to explain to his daughter her uncomfortable position of widow-bewitched-hood, as best he might.

The following day, I again called on him, bringing Captain Flexmore with me, to relate his own version of the bowstring story, and so confirm what I could not but feel must have appeared a somewhat incredible narration.

If any hope had lingered in the mind of the unfortunate father-in-law, my production of a slip of paper, containing a song which Charley had written out for me, must have effectually destroyed it. He even remembered to have heard his rascally son-in-law (as he not untruly termed him) sing the identical song. And so, having done our best (which in this case was about equivalent to doing nothing) to console him, we left him, breathing vengeance against the scoundrel who had thus cruelly deceived him, and wronged his unfortunate daughter.

At that time, Captain Flexmore and I fully intended, the moment we reached England, to follow up the affair vigorously, find out Master Charley, and in some way bring him to account for his misdeeds, even if we should be reduced to the unpleasant resource of horsewhipping him, with the almost certainty of getting shot by him afterwards, as a reward for our chivalry. But the "Best laid schemes o' mice and men Gang aft a-glee,"

and this one proved no exception to the rule. The Atalanta was ordered to the West Indies, where she remained a year. Towards the end of that period, by the exertions of my friends, I obtained an appointment in Calcutta, so infinitely more lucrative than a first lieutenant's pay, that for an empty-pocketed Harrington to refuse it, would have been an act of folly too great even for me to commit. Accordingly, I did not hesitate to accept it, although to do so involved my proceeding thither direct, without a chance of revisiting my native land for more years than were at all agreeable to contemplate. But I could not afford to be sentimental, so I went, and thus my good intentions in regard to Charley Burrell assisted to repair the pavement of a certain place reported to be warmer even than Calcutta. Why Captain Flexmore did not execute those which he had formed I cannot say, except that, perhaps, as he was never able either to make up his mind, or to adhere to his decision when arrived at, for ten consecutive minutes, without my assistance, the same cause which prevented my astonishing Charley Burrell may have influenced him also.

Although the Harringtons are too poor to indulge in sentiment and such like luxuries, the prohibition does not unfortunately extend to liver complaints, and a residence of five years in Calcutta sent me back to England the proprietor of (what the rubric designates) "a notoriously evil liver." Slightly revived by the voyage, I patiently awaited in London the decision of the faculty, whether I was "to be, or not to be," a confirmed invalid for the rest of my days.

On an unkind morning, in the severe month of May, about which poets have written more lies than on any other subject—though that is a bold assertion—I was taking a constitutional down the sunny side of Piccadilly, buttoned up in a great coat, and inwardly anathematizing the east wind, when who should I meet, and almost run against, but my ci-devant commander, the Honourable Captain Flexmore. Although it must have been nearly six years since we had met, I recognised him immediately. He was considerably changed; the delicate, puppyish young exquisite having improved into a stout, manly, bronze-visaged sailor; but the expression of irresolution, which was the distinguishing characteristic of his features, was the same as ever, and by it I knew him instantly. Broiling for five years under a tropical sun, with liver complaint consequences, had, however, altered my outward man to a degree which rendered my identity much more doubtful; and it was not until I pronounced his name, that my old associate recognised me.

"Why, Harrington! bless my soul; to think of meeting you just at this minute. Gad, I wish I'd happened to run against you half an hour sooner! Well, to be sure, what an extraordinary thing; how dreadfully thin and yellow you look. Well, this really is the most singular—'pon my honour!"

"Singular, that after I have been broiling for five years in a, if not the, black-hole in Calcutta, I should come home done brown, or, more properly, yellow, and should appear rather a concentrated essence of Tom Harrington, than the veritable Thomas you knew on board the old Atalanta? Really, considering the circumstances, the great fact that 'the Tom of other days has faded,' strikes me as melancholy, rather than singular."

"No, by Jove, it wasn't that—you certainly have got somewhat of a mummyish cut about you—the mulligatawny beginning to show through a little, as it does with all you old Indians; but that's not what has—" Here, whilst I was shivering, he stopped to wipe his brow; then added: "Gad, it's quite upset me."

Of course, I again asked to what he referred; but so thoroughly confused, astonished, and, as he termed it, "upset" did he appear, that it was not until several minutes had elapsed, during the whole of which time he continued to apostrophize, in broken ejaculations, some mysterious abstraction, which never attained to the substantial dignity of a nominative case, that he was able to give me the following account:—

"You must know that I've only been ashore a week, after a cruise of a year and a half; and this morning finding, on inspection, that my shore-going toggery was in a sadly dilapidated condition, I paid a visit to my tailor, who hangs out in Hanover-street. Having given my orders to the sapient schneider, I was making my way back to the club, when, at the door of St. George's, Hanover-square, I encountered a long array of carriages, containing the dramatis personee of a fashionable wedding. As I happened to have an idle half-hour on my hands, which I did not know very well how to dispose of, I thought I'd just stroll in and see the victims turned off. One might pick up some hints how to behave when one's own fate might arrive. So, watching my opportunity, I slipped in unnoticed, and esconcing myself in a pew with high curtains around it, arranged a peep-hole through which, myself invisible, I might observe the proceedings. As the company assembled, it was easy to see they were all tremendous swells—splendidly dressed women, and thorough-bred looking men. I soon contrived to get a look at the bride's features: she was quite a girl, scarcely above eighteen or nineteen apparently, but a sweet, graceful, interesting creature, that any man might have been proud to call his own. The bridegroom was a tall, gentlemanly-looking fellow, but, from the position in which he stood, I could not manage to obtain a glimpse of his features. Well, the ceremony began, and progressed rapidly, till the time when the bridegroom has to repeat some of the responses. As he did so, his voice sounded so familiar to my ear, that I felt certain I had heard it before, and was cudgelling my brains to remember where, when suddenly he turned his face towards me. Imagine my astonishment, when at the first glance I recognised Charles Burrell, the man we saved from strangulation (which he richly deserved), when we were stationed, in the old Atalanta, off the mouth of the Dardanelles."

"Impossible!" exclaimed I, aghast; "why, to my certain knowledge, he has already two wives living."

"He has three by this time, then," was the reply; "for, as sure as I stand here, I saw him married this morning to a lovely young female, at St. George's, Hanover-square."

"Well, but man, if you are sure it was Burrell, why did you not interfere to prevent the ceremony from being completed?" asked I.

"Why, I did think of doing so, answered Flexmore, hesitatingly; "but you see its a ticklish thing interfering with other people's affairs. I should have been called upon to prove that he was Charles Burrell, and, if so, that he had two wives living; and I did not know you were in England, or else, I believe, I really should have jumped up, and stopped the proceedings. I'd have done it directly, if I had but been sure I was all right; for my heart bled for that poor young creature. However, while I was thinking about it, the parson went on, and before I had arrived at any decision they were spliced hard and fast; and Master Charley marched the young lady out of church, and popped her into a splendid travelling-carriage, drawn by four of Newman's greys, and with a lady's maid and a gentleman's gentleman ready packed in the rumble. So I expect they're on their way to the Continent by this time."

"What an unparalleled scoundrel!" was my indignant exclamation, as Flexmore concluded his recital; "but are you quite certain of the man's identity?"

"He looked a good deal more like his former self than you do like the Tom Harrington who floored three pirates with as many sabre strokes, in that little affair off Cuba," was the reply; "but Charley Burrell is a fellow not easily to be mistaken—he's a deuced deal too good-looking for that. He was by long odds the handsomest man there to-day, though there were several very spiccy, not to say interesting, specimens of male humanity. Besides," he continued, "if you remember, one of the bullets that went through his hat, in that night escape, shaved a bit of the bark off his forehead. Well, I examined him closely this morning, to be sure that I was not making a fool of myself; and there, though he had brushed his hair well forward to hide it, I discovered the scar, plainly and unmistakably."

Flexmore walked home with me, the strange occurrence he had witnessed furnishing us with an inexhaustible topic for conversation. One point which considerably perplexed us was, whether it was incumbent on us to take any, and, if so, what steps in the matter. Here, to our certain knowledge, had this scoundrel married three wives, all of whom were still breathing this vital air, (Mary I had accidentally met at Portsmouth, on landing from India, and the fair and forsaken Zoo was, as a letter from a friend of mine travelling in Greece informed me, residing in her father's house, looking prettier than ever, and not apparently too disconsolate to flirt with any eligible individual who might come in her way). How many more victims to his handsome face and insinuating manners might be languishing after him in other quarters of the globe, it was impossible to say—he might, for aught we knew to the contrary, possess as many wives as Solomon. The question was, were we called upon to interfere, and, by exposing his rascality, at all events prevent his adding to his catalogue of treacheries for the time to come. I thought we were; Flexmore, on the other hand, considered it was no business of ours, and that Mary and her father were the proper people to check his career.

On reaching my lodgings, we parted, agreeing to meet next day, and come to a final decision on the subject. But the meeting was destined never to take place, for, at the time appointed, I was above 200 miles from London, having received a summons to attend the death-bed of a near and dear relative.

A chain of events, which would possess no interest for the reader, prevented so much as my recollecting the existence of Charles Burrell for many months; nor was it until my return from Madeira, about two years from the time of my meeting Flexmore, whither I had been sent for my health's sake, that I again heard of him.

Landing at Portsmouth, I, as usual, put up at the Crown Inn; but time had not neglected its office of destroyer-general here, more than elsewhere. My worthy host was gathered to his forefathers, and an intelligent young fellow (young no longer), whom I remembered as waiter, reigned in his stead. As he brought me a bottle of old port wine, when I had dined, I detained him, to inquire after Mary. At her father's death, having inherited a considerable sum of money, she had left Portsmouth, and was residing in the neighbourhood of London.

"And her good-for-nothing husband?" inquired I.

"Was here two hours ago, Mr. Harrington; he could hardly have been out of the street before you arrived," was the answer.

"I'm very glad I did not encounter him," returned I; "for the meeting would not have been a pleasant one for either of us."

"Oh, he would not have cared: he takes things very easily sir," continued the innkeeper. "He certainly has the the devil's own impudence: he marched in here, with his head up in the air, this morning, and ordered dinner, and a bottle of the old Burgundy, as coolly as if he didn't know that I'd heard of his goings-on for the last fifteen years."

"How did he look?" inquired I; "in pretty good condition?"

My companion shook his head. "He's going down hill," he replied, "a going down hill fast. He was dressed like a swell, as usual; but his coat was almost threadbare, and his hat had been brushed till there was more felt than nap left. The life he's led begins to tell upon him; he looks worn and haggard—more of the blackguard, and less of the gentleman; his head is a regular bush of black hair and whiskers. He is precious hard-up, too," he continued, sinking his voice. "When he'd finished his dinner, he sent for me—Here, landlord, take this note, pay yourself, and bring me the change." The note was for £50. Knowing my customer, I looked at it as I shouldn't at any other man's money, and soon made up my mind that it was a flash note, not worth a sixpence; so I handed it back to him. 'I tell you what it is, Mr. Burrell,' said I, 'we're old acquaintances, and it don't become you to give me a thing like that. Now, listen to me: I know more about you than you're aware of; pay me for the dinner you've eaten, in honest money, and then take yourself off as soon as you can; for I swear to you, if you're found in this town to-morrow morning, I'll give you into custody, as sure as you're a living man, and you best know how that will suit you.'

"How did he like that?" inquired I.

"Well, he didn't seem particularly to relish it," replied the innkeeper; "he turned first red, then pale, forked out a guinea, and, when I had given him the change, pulled his hat over his brows, and left the house without another word. One of the helpers tells me he saw him leave Portsmouth by the next coach."

"And a good thing, too," was my answer; "the town is well rid of such a scoundrel."

To which assertion mine host responded by a secular equivalent for "Amen;" and so the conversation ended.

Reader, from that moment up to the present time, I have neither seen nor heard tidings of Charles Burrell; but as this history of The Marrying Man is a fact, not a fiction; as I am certainly alive, and have no reason to suppose Burrell otherwise, if I ever encounter him again, upon the honour of a gentleman, the readers of "SHARPE" shall hear of it.

ITALY AND HER FOREMOST MEN.*

WE have seen the disgraceful and tyrannical mode of prison administration in the Eternal City, and the Papal States in general, under their priestly governors, and we are glad to turn from so painful a subject of consideration; but, before we quit it, we must be allowed to express our abhorrence of the extreme severity—nay, the unjustifiable cruelty—of most of the sentences passed upon the unfortunate subjects of Pio Nono, by his clerical agents, in the form of lengthened incarceration, inhuman bastinadoes, condemnation to the galleys, and even to death; often for offences of so trivial a nature, that a slight fine, or short imprisonment, would be deemed ample expiation for them by any tribunal that had no other object in view than the upholding of the law, and the just and reasonable punishment of the transgressor of it, in a degree not exceeding the nature of the transgression. We will not load our pages with the number of revolting instances we might give in illustration of our remarks: one or two will suffice to vindicate us in them, and to excite the sympathy of our readers.

In the spring of last year, many of the inhabitants of the Lombard-Venetian kingdom, justly incensed against the despotism of Austrian sway, resolved to show their indignation, by renouncing their favourite enjoyment of smoking, or using tobacco in any form whatever; in order that their sentiments might be made manifest in the diminution of that part of the revenue which is derived from the monopoly, by government, of the sale of "the fragrant weed." So rapidly did this self-denial spread throughout the Lombard States, and thence to Tuscany and the Roman States, that, at Bologna alone, there was soon found a deficit of six thousand dollars on the average sale of tobacco; in consequence of which, the Austrian marshal, Count Nobile, published a notice, wherein he stated that some persons in the provinces occupied by the imperial troops, had dared to offer violence to peaceable citizens, by hindering them from using tobacco; but he, being resolved not to tolerate this infraction of personal liberty! was resolved to suppress it by every means in his power; and, accordingly, he subjected to corporal punishment, and afterwards to trial by court-martial, all such persons as should be accused of having used argument or intimidation towards those who were inclined to follow their wonted habit of inhaling the article in question.

Many respectable inhabitants of Bologna were actually bastinadoed, and thrown into prison, after this proclamation, on the information of hired spies, or malicious enemies. Nevertheless, the manifestation of political opinion went forth, wider and wider; it was taken up by Romagna, and La Marca, and finally by the capital itself, exceedingly to the annoyance of Prince Torlonia, who, being the farmer of the monopoly of tobacco, quickly found a diminution in his revenue from it, proportionate to the reduction in the consumption, which was soon less by two-thirds than the usual quantity.

At first, the government sought to revive the fashion, by liberally supplying with cigars not only the soldiers, but also the police and the spies, in short, the very dregs of the population; but in this they rather overshot their mark, as many of the moderates, and even of the ultra oscuranti, threw away their own cigars in consequence, in order not to be mixed up with such a disreputable throng; till, at last, scarcely a cigar was to be seen in the streets or cafés, save in the mouths of the classes we have mentioned, or of some stray foreigners.

More and more irritated, the government had recourse to more and more stringent measures. Informers were multiplied, and many an unjust imprisonment took place in consequence. One day, Pietro Ereoli, a young man of respectable connections, and blameless character, was dining socially, at a trattoria, with a friend, who, at the conclusion of the repast, proceeded, as in days of old, to light his cigar. Ereoli remonstrated with him, playfully, as it appeared to the landlord—certainly without any attempt to constrain him—and the young man laid it aside; but the dissuasive words had been caught up, the relinquishment of the cigar observed, by one of the base spies, who at once embitter and corrupt Italian society, and Ereoli was arrested on the spot, and dragged to prison; but was so brutally beaten over the head, on the way, by the sbirri, that it was thought he could not survive, and extreme unction was administered to him in his cell. As soon as he was sufficiently recovered to be tried, he was so, by the tribunal of the Sacra Consulta, and sentenced, by the five reverend prelates who compose it, after they had solemnly, as the form of their proceeding requires and specifies, “invoked the most holy name of God,” to twenty years of the galleys!—the same term as was awarded to a wretch, a short time before, who had murdered his wife in the very arms of her father.

The master of the trattoria in vain gave his honest testimony, that no force was used by Ereoli towards his companion, and no arguments beyond those of rillery: he only brought upon himself an action for perjury, by the government procureur-general, with the threat of the galleys for life, and the unfortunate Ereoli died of despair, in the dungeons of Narni, in the flower of his age, shortly after his removal thither.

Many instances not less tragical we might adduce; but, even where these did not occur, the barbarous injustice of the sentences for venial transgressions, and frequently upon accusations not proved, are not less odious. Four young Romans were condemned to twenty years' imprisonment, for burning Bengal lights, on the anniversary of the proclamation of the republic at the Capitol; and it was made a great favour that the punishment was commuted into perpetual banishment. A poor wheelwright, who had purchased from some person of his own rank in life, a few iron tires, which had been taken off Cardinal Barberini's carriage during the republic, waited upon his Eminence, on his return to Rome, in order to restore the tires, leaving it to the cardinal's generosity to repay or not, as he pleased, the sum paid for them. The cardinal, in return for this respectful submission, immediately denounced the unfortunate wheelwright to the police, by whom he was dragged to prison, where he will languish until his final sentence may be pronounced.

Dr. Pio, an army surgeon, an elderly man, delicate in constitution, was sentenced to thirty months' imprisonment, for the crime of sleeping in the Pamphili Palace, in the Piazza Navona, the residence of Cardinal Brignole, on a mattress, in the ante-chamber appropriated to the domestics, after the battle of the 30th of April; his regiment bivouacking in the piazza, and he himself being desirous, on account of the state of his health, to avoid passing the night in the open air. He was sent to prison by a man of the name of Neri, of notoriously profligate character, a priest in his Eminence's train, and who was well known for the malignity and falsehood of his accusations of any of the liberal party whose ruin he might hope to effect.

The suborning of evidence, indeed, and the utter worthlessness, and known depravity of persons whose testimony is often received in matters touching the life or death of the parties accused, though it would have been rejected at once in any case of doubt in a pecuniary transaction, even though only a few baiocchi might be concerned, is one of the most dreadful evils that any one who has ever advocated the cause of liberty has to contend with in the Papal States. At Fabriano, towards the close of the last year, three young men, of good family in that city—one a student in medicine, the other two in the law—were beheaded, on the oath of a reprobate wretch, who swore that, during the revolution, they had hired him to assassinate a priest and his brother. He stated that, when he fell in with his intended victims, he fired, but, purposely, in the air. It was, however, proved, that he had only one pistol and one bullet; therefore how he intended to "kill two birds with one stone," it would have been difficult for him to explain to the satisfaction of an English jury. Nevertheless, on the single, unsupported assertion of a villain like this, the young men were publicly executed, to the heart-rending grief of their parents, and the horror and indignation of their fellow-citizens; whilst their real murderer, the pretended conscience-stricken bravo, walked the streets of Fabriano arm-in-arm with his friend the priest, exulting in the success of their infernal plot to get rid of three young men of principles opposite to their own.

How many instances, alas! would the last three years' annals of Rome furnish us with of similar victims sacrificed by falsehood and despotism; whilst, on the other hand, almost as many might be adduced of the most misplaced lenity and unjust connivance, with respect to parties who, whatever other enormities they might have been guilty of, had avoided the imprudence of questioning the authority of Holy Mother Church, particularly as far as her power of pardoning other sins might be concerned. Of this we will give only one example, which shall be of a somewhat lighter nature, in order to relieve the darker feelings with which the instance of unjust condemnation to death we have cited above must be contemplated.

Shortly after the restoration of the clerical régime, a profound and painful sensation was produced in the learned and archaeological world, by the discovery that the Vatican had been plundered of a great number of gold coins, many of them of the utmost rarity, and unappreciable value; and also of gems, scarabei, and other articles of vertu, to an enormous amount. Of course the guilt of the transaction was immediately laid to the charge of the republican authorities; but, fortunately for the vindication of their honour, and for the cause of truth, the real delinquent was discovered, by a judicial inquiry, the result of which could not be hushed up, to be a certain Signor Diamilla, a devoted slave to the Neri party, and a favoured protégé of Cardinal Lambruschini, to whose influence he owed the official and confidential situation he held as under-keeper in the library of the Vatican. Among the few benefits which Popes have conferred upon society at large, must always be reckoned as one of the chiefest, if not the chief, the treasures in learning and the arts, accumulated, by their taste and generosity, beneath that one vast roof which shelters so many wonders of the world, for the benefit of the world at large. Just and laudable is the pride with which each Pope that ascends the apostolic chair contemplates the exertions made by his predecessors towards the increasing the wealth of this unrivalled collection; and noble the ambition which prompts him to equal, if not to excel them. Hence, a crime against the Vatican is felt by the pontiff as a crime against his own person; and Diamilla, fully convicted of one of so deep and disgraceful a dye, was condemned, notwithstanding the protection of the purple, to twenty years of the galleys—a punishment incurred, as we have already shown, for the most trifling offences, by those who had no such protection to boast.

Diamilla, however, was not disheartened at the prospect before him, for his father is chief bussolante, or usher, at the Papal court, and expressed his belief that, as his son was not accused of any political or religious offence, every other might be got over, with time and proper influence.

Meanwhile, Monsignor Laureani, the head librarian, and a man of acknowledged merit, died of grief for the loss the Vatican had sustained; that grief heightened by the charge of negligence brought against him, and of which, perhaps, he could not entirely acquit himself, in not having kept a more vigilant look-out upon his assistants. The father's confidence proved his knowledge of those with whom he had to deal. Diamilla, probably acting from parental instruction, devoted himself, from the first day of his imprisonment in the castle of St. Angelo, to such measures as might restore him to the favour he had so justly forfeited: and he succeeded. He began by turning spy upon his fellow-prisoners, eliciting their sentiments, and reporting their conversations. He then proceeded to eulogise the Papacy, in certain articles which he contrived to get inserted in the government journals. Need anything more be said? He was pardoned, set at liberty, provided with a passport to Paris, and not only had his arrears of salary, amounting to four hundred scudi, paid up to him, but was also presented with six hundred more, in order to enable him to travel with comfort. At that very time, the poor postilions, and others who lived upon their individual earnings, could not get from the government the arrears due to them.

The police, and custom-house officers, sympathizing, no doubt, in the compassionate feelings thus evincing in the highest quarters towards the delinquent, were likewise seized with such feelings of delicacy, as to forbear any scrutinizing search into his baggage, which might have interfered with his carrying off with him, as he did, the great remaining portion of his plunder; which success, however, ultimately brought upon him the very punishment he had before evaded; for, being imprudent, and, we may add, impudent enough, on his arrival in Paris, to offer some very rare scarabei to the director of the National Museum, for sale, he very naturally mentioned the occurrence to the Papal nuncio, who as naturally coupled it in his own mind with the disappearance of said scarabei from the Vatican; and, he and the director laying their conclusions together, they finally resolved to hand the curiosity-seller over to the care of the police, by whom he was transferred to the "durnee vile" he so justly deserved, and to his continuance in which we could very easily reconcile ourselves.

We must be allowed yet another word as to the hardships under which the subjects of his Holiness labour. The administration of the interior is entirely in the hands of Savelli, of whose eminent disqualifications we have already made honourable mention, and weighs so heavily upon the citizens as to destroy entirely all freedom of action—nay, too often, all freedom of thought! A Papal subject cannot travel from one part of the States to another without a passport, and numerous signatures. Should his affairs call him abroad, he is obliged to obtain the consent of his wife, that of the curate of the parish, who grants it or not, according as the applicant may have been punctual, or otherwise, in presenting himself at the confessional, at Easter; and that of the president, or magistrate of the parish, who requires him to bring a certificate from two citizens, stating that he conducted himself properly during the past revolution. Then comes the prefect of police, then the minister of the interior, then the secretary of state, all to be supplicated, propitiated, and often bribed, before an honest man finds himself at liberty to go where his business may require him. It may be easily imagined what endless annoyance and hindrance all these obstacles create to the industry and commerce of the country. Frequently a passport is refused on the most trifling and unjust pretences. One of the most respectable tradesmen in Rome, as well known to the English visitors and residents there as to his own townsmen, but whose name we will not mention, for fear of exposing him to further persecution, has just now, after having made all the arrangements for his journey, been refused a passport to this country, on a matter connected with his business, and which would have been very desirable to the public, because it was suddenly recollected that he had had copies of the Diodati Bible in his possession, during that brief period when men, under the liberty of the republic, were allowed to inquire into sacred things, and form their own opinions, according to the dictates of their conscience. Perhaps, however, it was better for this person that his passport should have been at once openly refused, than treacherously granted, as has frequently been the case, in order to withhold permission to return. Nor is it only with respect to liberty to go from one place to another, that the Roman subject is fettered: the most laudable pursuits, the most innocent recreations, are equally liable to arbitrary and inconsistent control. No scientific meetings are allowed to take place without leave from government; no social ones can be held without exposing the parties that constitute them to suspicion and espionage. It is unlawful to bear arms, even for self-defence; to go out shooting; to receive newspapers, save those that are the tools of government; to do anything, in short, without so many previous forms to go through, and permissions to obtain, that the laws and their executors are equally detested and execrated.

The restored government has sedulously given out that it has supplied the place of central liberty by extended municipal privileges; but with that government, where its assertions will no more stand the test of inquiry, than its actions will that of scrutiny. The municipalities of Italy, of Central Italy more especially, have always been very powerful, as springing, more or less, from comparatively free and liberal elections. The strength and life of these communes, as they might be termed, bearing in themselves a strong family likeness to the infant republic of Switzerland, in some degree counteracted the horrible yoke of the clerical administration, with its hundred and eighty officers, valets, and servants enrolled, under one title or another, in the personal service and waiting upon the person of the representative of St. Peter; and its thousand officers annexed to the Datary, or office where the titles of the ecclesiastical benefits are conferred; to say nothing of the violet and sable population, the ecclesiastical multitude immediately below the pontifical and sacred college, gradually descending from the head, the prelacy, and the monsignori, to the humblest depths of the sacristy; swarming like an ant-hill, and everywhere revealing the same passions of ambition, avarice, corruption, and cunning; whether under the purple or the serge, the tiara or the cowl; the aube or the surplice, the episcopal chape or the coarser sottana, the scarlet hat or the black hood.

"All is false and hollow,"

In fact, before 1796, the Roman States were simply communes, united, under the Roman Pontificate, which, on some occasions, held treaties with them, and on others, as at Bologna, acknowledged common sovereignty with the municipality. After that time the French revolution, by its system of centralization, aimed a mortal blow at these beneficent institutions. It is, however, only just to acknowledge that Cardinal Gonsalvi, in 1816, whilst adhering to the French arrangements, still kept alive a certain degree of vitality in the municipalities, and an organization of things sufficiently creditable to his administration, considering the times in which he was called upon to exercise it. But under the destructive reign of Gregory XVI. everything deteriorated, among the rest, the liberties and independence of the municipalities, which have been entirely crushed under the restored government, the first step of which was to dissolve the Municipal Councils elected during the republic, though many of the members of them were of principles strictly conservative. Instead of recalling the councils previously existing under Gregory XVI., the central power named municipal commissions, composed solely of its own creatures; and if any among them happened to be attacked with such "compunctious visitings" as might impel them to breathe, however sotto voce, an accent of disapprobation of the proceedings of the clerical government, they were expelled as arbitrarily as they had been appointed. It is thus that the devotion of the municipalities (subject, by the bye, as they are to military occupations and martial law, with the additional advantages of hired spies, and a brutal police, paid by government officials) has been vaunted of throughout Europe, as a decided proof of the attachment of the Italian people to the restoration of the clerical régime, or in other words, to absolute despotism.

In 1850 a new law was passed, without date, which even the French allowed to be less liberal than any preceding one, by which law the government assumed to itself the right of naming all the authorities; thus, of course, excluding every man of talent and integrity who had been elected, by the voice of his fellow-citizens, deputy to the Parliament of Pio Nono; even those who were called by himself to the Consulta, but who are now considered as ineligible, from being suspected as advocates of reform. Instead of this faithful representation of their sentiments, the municipalities at this moment see themselves crippled in action, gagged in speech, suffocated even in thought—as far as the open expression of it may be concerned—the slaves of a government they despise and distrust, and to whom they only feel they belong by the burdens its debts inflict upon them, and the disgrace of seeing themselves represented by its tools.

These remarks naturally lead us to the consideration of the financial state of Rome at the present moment. Money is well denominated "the sinews of war," but it is no less the sinews of peace, if judiciously regarded and applied—of worldly comfort, benevolence, refinement, and, in fact, of every social good. Hence the real prosperity of all countries, that prosperity in which the people have their proportionate share, according to the fitness of their claim and enjoyment, is to be ascertained by the state of its finances, and by that state alone it can be known whether the machinery of a government works well internally, and produces honest and profitable results.

It is not to be expected that, in a country like the Papal States, where everything else exhibits the features of mismanagement and ruin, that the finances alone should be in a healthy and flourishing condition. The government of the kingdom of Italy, left to the Papal administration a surplus of upwards of a million of scudi (£200,000), which continued, even under the increased expenses introduced by Cardinal Gonsalvi. It was in the time of Leo XII. that the deficiency began. It increased, together with the national debt, under Pius VIII., and so much more under the reign, so fruitful of evils, of Gregory XVI., that the national debt was nearly doubled. In the beginning of the reign of Pio Nono, the deficit, amounting to one million of scudi, upon a revenue of little more than nine millions, was supplied by treasury bills, for which the church property was mortgaged, and measures for reforming and regulating the finances were beginning to be taken into consideration by the parliament; but they were suspended by the rapidly-increasing political troubles; and, under the republic, the debt increased by nearly four millions of scudi, reckoning, according to the reduction subsequently made in the value of the paper; nor can this be wondered at, when we consider the vast expenses necessarily incurred in that short but eventful period, not only for the maintenance of defensive warfare, but also for other objects closely connected with internal order and improvement, and the amelioration of the condition of the people. One item of public expense during the republic—an item never alluded to by those who sit in judgment upon the proceedings of that time—consisted in regularly paying the Pope, during his luxurious retreat at Gaeta, whence he returned to St. Peter's chair in an amiable state of bloom and obesity, his salary of fifty thousand scudi per month; the sum fixed by the statute of his Holiness himself, as requisite for the maintenance of the sovereign, his court, cardinals, congregations, and nuncios. His Holiness did not forget in his flight to take away with him all the gold he could lay his hands upon; and the cardinals and princes who followed in his train, not only copied his example in that respect, but actually left their servants to be supported out of the public money; whilst his Holiness, with all his expenses at Gaeta defrayed out of the purse of the King of Naples, a present of a million of scudi from that monarch and the Queen of Spain, and the entire funds of the propaganda, the dateria, and the briefs, at his disposal, actually allowed a begging perambulation in Paris—overwhelmed with distressed workmen and artisans—and in Ireland, struggling with famine, as if he himself had positively before him the prospect of coming to want bread.

To supply the deficit left by the decreased value of the paper money, the restored government has increased the debt to nearly nine millions of scudi; leaving, moreover, three millions of paper money still in circulation—thus it has swallowed up seven millions of scudi, without filling up the deficit, besides arbitrarily imposing a contribution of one million, and levying new taxes to the amount of another—and this in the present distressed state of Rome, too; where, at this moment, seven hundred respectable families are in utter destitution; those who formerly maintained them in comfort, now languishing in prison, and they themselves not tasting meat more than once a week!

We are aware that, perhaps throughout all Europe, there is not a country that can honestly say its finances are perfectly in order, but in none, should we imagine, is to be found the disorder, corruption, and robbery daily carried on at Rome. The prelates are not responsible for their administration, and the treasurers have never yet been called upon for their accounts, neither have any estimates been made. How, indeed, can any satisfactory ones be drawn up in a country where the sovereign can authorize any outlay whatever, without further reason than a "most holy" rescript, exaudientia sanctissimi! In former days, when the church was rich, she occasionally assisted the State, but the contrary is now the case; and Papal subjects, cramped and restrained as they are by their arbitrary government, in all their endeavours to get a living for themselves, are obliged, much to their distress and discontent, to supply the court expenses of the Catholic Church, for the spiritual advantage and welfare of the world at large. Perhaps, in looking at the total of the Papal budget, the taxation might appear, to a cursory observer, not very heavy, as compared with that of other countries; but it must be borne in mind that, in other countries, many public expenses are paid by their respective governments, which, in the Papal States, the provinces and municipalities are compelled to pay; so that taking this and the poverty of the country into consideration, we may safely affirm that at this moment the Roman States are taxed, in proportion to their means, more than twice as much as any other country. We might fill many pages with accounts of the frauds, peculations, embezzlements, and falsehoods of the Roman finance, in which all sorts of contracts and monopolies are allowed, and all branches of government to have an interest in them, either direct, or in the form of bribes, for the allowing of them —but the subject is distasteful to us. A clever writer has observed that the commerce of the ancient Romans was to rob other nations; that of the modern, is to rob one another. Leaving them to the exercise of the vices fostered in them by their bad governors and bad tutors—the priests—we will direct our attention to the actual state of education in Italy, and to the hopes that may be entertained of seeing the Italian character, under the purifying influence of true religion, and the strengthening support of enlightened liberty, shine forth in all the brilliancy of the qualities with which it is so eminently gifted by nature, who has not been less beneficent to the sons of Italy than to her soil. Great as are the actual deficiencies of public education in Italy, and erroneous as are various points of the plan on which it is founded, we are yet inclined to think that its deficiencies and defects are greatly exaggerated by foreigners in general, and more particularly by the English. The incorrect ideas entertained by other nations of the ignorance of the lower classes, and the imperfect education of the higher ones, throughout Italy, are to be lamented as being contrary to truth, and very prejudicial, as forming a powerful weapon in the hands of the enemies of progress in that country. To hold up an entire people as ignorant, prejudiced, priest-ridden, superstitious, and benighted, is at once to proclaim them incapable and unworthy of liberal institutions. But the real fact is, that there are in Italy two antagonistic classes of causes, which bear in opposite senses upon the state of general education. In one of these classes is to be found priestcraft, despotism, and national habits; in the other, the fine organization and quick perception of the people; their fond remembrance of the former glories and greatness of their country, both in arts and arms; their intercourse with other nations, and particularly the vivifying influence of the French, to whose eighteen years' residence in the country, when its destinies were swayed by Napoleon, much of its release from spiritual bondage, and its aspirations after an enlightened field of action, may be justly considered to be owing.

That priestly influence, when improperly exercised, including, as it does, the most absolute dominion over the mind, is one of the deadliest foes to the progress of general knowledge, cannot be denied; still the power of this influence must not be exaggerated, nor has it always been wielded unworthily. As long as the priests thought they had nothing to fear from the diffusion of letters and science, so far from wishing to obstruct it, they were its most active and useful promoters. It is only since the days of Luther, and more especially since the epoch of the irreligious philosophy of the last century, that they have become afraid of the advances of civilization, and the extension of the privilege of men, as rational and accountable beings, to form and maintain their own opinions. And even now, it is only with the higher grades of education that they are waging war openly or secretly; elementary institutions, which, after all are the most important, on account of the universality of their application, they have not yet had the courage, perhaps not the desire, to oppose; so far from it, indeed, that a great proportion, perhaps one half, of their members are actually engaged in teaching the lower classes. Now, although even elementary instruction, given principally by Catholic priests, cannot be considered the best of all, yet it would be absurd and most unfair to deny, that it is not much better than no instruction whatever; scarcely the most bigoted sectarianism would maintain the contrary. The powers to whose divided sway it has been Italy's unhappy lot to be parcelled out, though they did not perform, with respect to general education, any more than with respect to many other things, what their duty and the interests of those submitted to their sway required, still they could not be said absolutely to neglect this important branch of government; on the contrary, they not only kept up the ancient institutions devoted to educational purposes, but even founded, or, to speak more correctly, did not oppose the foundation, under the name and sanction of their authority, of new universities, lyceums, and elementary schools. Our next remarks will, we trust, throw such light upon the objects and bearing of these institutions, and also upon domestic and female education in Italy, as may enable our readers to form their own opinion as to the causes that have made the Italians what they are, and what, under more enlightened guidance, and loftier principles of action, it may be justly hoped they will become.

PASSAGES FROM THE LIFE OF A GERMAN SINGER OF THE LAST CENTURY

WHILE listening to the magic strains of the Swedish nightingale, we could but reflect that she and those dowered with the like gifts in the same high degree, must frequently mourn over their evanescence. The warrior's laurel and the poet's bay are immortal; while the wreaths which fall at the feet of a far-famed singer scarcely perish sooner than her renown. The faded beauty can point out to her friends, and bequeath to her grandchildren her fair, fresh charms on the "undying canvas;" but what echo remains of voices which have thrilled the hearts of half the world? Surely it is a clarity to consecrate one poor half-hour to the memory of a German singer, whose name, now utterly forgotten, was, at the close of the last century, familiar as a household word to the lips of all the beauty and fashion of Christendom; while, in private life, her virtues, her unselfishness, and sweetness of disposition, bore a strong resemblance to our favourite Jenny Lind, who was, however, born under a more fortunate star, and we rejoice to think that the gentle heart of Madame Goldschmidt will never be wrung as was that of the no less gifted, but less happy, Madame Mara.

In 1749, that year so signalized by the birth of Goethe, Elizabeth Schmähling, the wife of a poor music teacher, in Cassel, died in childbirth, leaving her husband a sickly infant, the child of his old age. Contrary to all expectations, the little creature struggled through its early infancy, almost to the disappointment of her remaining parent, whose paternal feelings were deadened by poverty, and the reflection that this little worthless life had been purchased by that of his beloved companion. As her father was too poor to command attendance of any kind, the neglected child passed the long hours of his absence in perfect solitude, locked in an almost unfurnished apartment, and her poor little feet fastened to a great chair. One evening, just after she had completed her fourth year, as Schmähling was returning, weary and heavy of heart, to his humble abode, his step was arrested on the stairs by the sound of a scale in music, distinctly and perfectly played, proceeding from the prison-room of his little ailing daughter!

He listened again. Yes! he was not mistaken—he had the key of the door—no one could be there but the sickly child, whose existence he had felt to be so sore a burden. A new happiness, that of a father's pride and joy, visited the desolate heart of the poor old man, and entering softly, he found that the little Elizabeth had managed to reach an old violin, whence she drew the sounds which had so unexpectedly greeted her father's ears.

Now began a new life for these two human beings—a life of happy companionship. It would have been a fine study for a painter to watch the young musician, still almost an infant, propped up on her high chair; her features, to which even the common beauty of childhood had been denied, lighted up with the spirit of harmony, as the violin obeyed the little trembling fingers, and sent forth its sweetest sounds; close by, on the only other seat the room could boast, sat the now happy father, urging on and encouraging the little one: at a very difficult passage producing from his capacious pocket a rosy-cheeked apple, a rare dainty for Elizabeth, with which her exertions were to be rewarded.

After a short time, under the high patronage of the child's godfather, a rich tailor, and the sacristan, Schmähling and his daughter gave little concerts at the houses of their neighbours, an employment at once pleasant and profitable. They were enabled to make two additions to their household—a servant and a large dog—both accompanied them on their musical expeditions. The little procession always delighted Elizabeth; as her weak limbs would not support her weight, she was carried by her father; then came the maid-servant, carrying the violin, and lastly, the dog, who was entrusted with a little basket filled with violin strings, &c. Sometimes their auditors required ballads, or country songs, and then the servant joined her rustic voice; but this always displeased the old man, who was nevertheless compelled to obey the wishes of his audience.

Gradually, however, Elizabeth's fame spread among the richer citizens, the houses of the wealthy tradesmen were opened to the child-musician, and at length a rich merchant, who was going to the great fair at Frankfort, offered to convey Schmähling and his daughter there. The poor child, then hardly eight years old, could scarcely bear the jolting of the carrier's waggon in which she travelled, but she rested her aching head on her father's shoulder, and although her limbs were nearly frozen with the cold, he kept her hands warm, by placing them under his coat, upon his heart. But her cold and weariness were forgotten completely when her father, at length, showed Elizabeth the city of Frankfort—then full of the life and bustle of the great fair—and told her that there she would play before the rich and great, and earn not only money, but fame.

Schmähling and his daughter lived for two years at Frankfort, succeeding so well as to be in comfortable circumstances, while every day seemed to develop the wonderful powers of the child; her health, too, improved, and she could walk, though with difficulty. The old man, whom poverty had bound for so many years to Cassel, loved a wandering life, and went from Frankfort to Vienna, where his success prompted him to take what was then an arduous journey, and the little German child appeared in London in 1760. But here she was not well received; her extreme plainness, the awkwardness of her movements, and the frightful grimaces she made while playing, gave a most unfavourable impression. The disappointed father prepared to leave England as quickly as possible, but one of the first singers of the day had made an important discovery, that nature had given Elizabeth a most magnificent voice. She urged Schmähling no longer to waste the powers of the child on violin playing, but to return to Germany with all speed, and place her under the care of the best masters, and this counsel, backed as it was by funds for the purpose, was followed.

The old Capellmeister, at Leipsic, Father Hiller as he was always called, heard Elizabeth Schmähling sing, and, struck with her wonderful but ill-cultivated powers, adopted the young singer rather as his daughter than his pupil.* Hiller was one of the first musicians of his age, and eminently qualified to fulfil the charge he had undertaken. Elizabeth now entered with heart and soul upon her musical education, which proceeded as an education seldom does; the master unwearied in his teaching, the scholar never satisfied with learning.

* The portrait of Father Hiller is given at full length in his pupil's life, and it is a somewhat grotesque picture. A real old German face, full of kindness and wrinkles, a red cap drawn down over his ears, and a large pair of spectacles in pinch-beak frames, on which almost every student in Leipsic, including Goethe himself, had written an epigram.

He told her that she had not the beauty nor grace so necessary for the theatre, but that her education must prepare her for the envied post of private singer to the king.

Hiller had the satisfaction of watching his pupil's dawning fame. The first token of princely favour she received was a summons from the director of the royal private theatre, at Dresden; for the Electress Dowager, Marie Antonie had heard of the rising star, and wished to judge of her merits herself. Hassse's fine opera of "Semiramis" was chosen, and the principal part assigned to Elizabeth.

Father Hiller was almost in an agony of fear. "My child!" he exclaimed, "it will never do; you cannot—you must not be a queen; every one will laugh at us both."

Elizabeth herself gives a full account of the affair. She says:—"I suffered patiently all that they liked to do with me. They painted my face red and white, and put a great patch on my chin. As this operation was being performed, in came the director, who, I saw, could hardly help laughing at my appearance. He said, he was commissioned to conduct me to her Highness, who wished to see me before I went upon the stage. I hastily threw my purple mantle round me, and followed the director through some dark passages, to a little cabinet hung with crimson velvet. Here stood the electress, and behind her some young ladies, who looked anxiously at me, as I stood in my splendour, like a doll under a Christmas tree. I held my sceptre behind me, to hide my red, coarse arms. 'What have you there at your back?' asked the royal lady. At this question, I produced my sceptre, and in doing so, unfortunately hit the director a violent blow on the nose, which made it bleed. 'You must not carry your sceptre so,' said her Serene Highness, with an involuntary smile; 'it should always be held before you; but I would advise you to lay it down—a queen does not always carry her sceptre.' After this little lecture, I had permission to leave, which, you may be sure, I did very speedily. As soon as I reached the stage, the instruments struck up, and I had to commence my recitative immediately; so that, fortunately for me, I could think of nothing but the music. I forgot my false hair, my crown, my purple mantle, and crimson velvet train, that I was Queen Semiramis, and only remembered that I was a singer."

A few months after this adventure, Frederick the Great was told of the young German singer, and commanded that she should be brought before him. She was conducted into that famous little concert-room, at Sans-Souci, where Frederick was lying, in ill-health, and out of humour, on a sofa. He asked her, roughly, "They tell me you can sing; is it true?"

"If it please your Majesty, I can try."

"Very well then, sing."

When Elizabeth had finished the piece assigned her, the king, without any token either of satisfaction or displeasure, took up a music-sheet, containing a very difficult bravura of Graun, which he knew she could never have seen. "Sing this, if you can," again commanded the imperious monarch. The young singer obeyed, and then withdrew, the king only remarking, "Yes, you can sing." But this interview decided Elizabeth's fate. A proposal was made to her to become the king's private singer, with an annuity of three thousand dollars secured to her for life.

In 1772, Elizabeth's evil fate brought her into contact with one of the most fascinating and most unprincipled men of his time—Mara, the violoncellist to Prince Henry of Prussia. In vain did her friends warn her; in vain were anonymous letters sent from every part to expose the true character of her pretended lover; she listened only to the protestations of her handsome fiancé. On her twenty-fourth birthday, Elizabeth laid a petition for the royal assent to her marriage before Frederick. The answer, which she found written in pencil upon the margin, was more characteristic than courteous; it was—"You are a fool, and must be more reasonable. You shall not make that fellow your husband." After repeated entreaties, and the delay of half a year, Frederick was brought to give a most unwilling permission. The marriage was solemnized, and now, in the midst of her success and honour, began the secret sorrows and shame of the unhappy Elizabeth Mara.

She soon discovered how fatal a step she had taken; her husband lavished her earnings on the lowest, both of his sex and her own; he was almost always in a disgraceful state of intoxication; and, not content with keeping every neglect on his patient wife, he openly reproached her with her want of beauty.

Now, too, she began to experience that her position at court was only a gilded slavery; for the king, who hated the worthless husband, made the innocent wife feel his anger. A request she made, to be allowed, on account of her health, to visit the Bohemian baths, was refused; and on the edge of a petition her husband compelled her to present for leave to accompany him on a tour, she found written in pencil by the king:—"Let him go, but you shall remain."

Mara was furious against the king, and behaved most brutally to his wife, who persuaded him in vain to keep a prudent silence; he complained loudly of Frederick's tyranny, and even wrote ridiculous pamphlets upon his wrongs.

This was, perhaps, the most miserable period of Madame Mara's unhappy married life. The king showed his displeasure openly against her, and she shared the odium with which her husband was universally regarded; anxiety, grief, and distress, threw her into a dangerous fever. Just at this juncture, the Grand Duke Paul of Russia, a great admirer, almost a worshipper, of the "Colossus of the century," as he styled Frederick, arrived at Berlin. Among the festivities arranged for the occasion was a great opera, by Tomelli, in which Madame Mara was to sing the principal part. On the morning of the day on which it was to be performed, it was announced that Mara was very ill. The king sent her a message, to the effect that she could be well if she pleased, and it was his pleasure that she should be. She returned a respectful answer, saying, that she was really very ill. All Berlin was in commotion, and eagerly watched the result of a battle between Frederick the Great and his first singer. No other entertainment was arranged for the evening; the king commanded the preparations to be completed. Evening approached; the director, in despair, hastily donned his court dress, and repaired to the king, to whom he represented that he had seen Mara; that she was really ill, and could not be induced to leave her bed. Frederick, who either really thought, or affected to believe, the indisposition feigned, merely said, "Do not disturb yourself, she will be present;" and, half an hour afterwards, one of the royal carriages, accompanied by eight dragoons, stopped before Madame Mara's door, and the officer announced to the terrified servants, that he had orders to bring their sick mistress by force to the theatre. We will detail the story in Madame Mara's own words to Goethe. She says:—

"I rose from my sick-bed, and dressed, with the soldiers standing at the door of my apartment. Ill as I was, only thoughts of the direct revenge filled my soul. As I placed the dagger of Armida in my girdle, I wished with all my heart that I could slay my pitiless tyrant with it. 'Yes,' I said to myself, as the heavy diadem was pressed on my poor aching head, 'yes, I will obey the tyrant; I will sing, but in such accents as he has never heard before; he shall listen to the terrible reproaches I dare not utter in words.' In this mood I went to the opera: the common people showed their sympathy, when they saw my guard of dragoons, my face wet with tears, and wan with sickness. Some even rushed forward to rescue me, but they were driven back by the soldiers. The officer had orders to accompany me to the side-scene, and stand there until I was called upon the stage to sing my part. I felt sick unto death as I stood waiting, and my physician, who accompanied me, has since said, that he feared the worst. I looked on the stage once, as the ballet-dancers swept past; it seemed to me as if they were dancing on my grave. Now, I had to appear; I sang the bravours in a weak, trembling voice; but I felt very much vexed that I could only sing so feebly, for ambition awoke in me. When, in the second act, I had to sing the "Mi serame," I poured out the whole sorrow and oppression of my heart. I glanced at the king, and my looks and tones said, 'Tyrant I am here to obey your will, but you shall listen only to the voice of my agony.' As the last piteous tones died on my lips, I looked round; all was still as death. Not a sound escaped the audience; they seemed as if they were witnessing some execution. I saw my power, even in my weakness; this gave me strength; I felt my illness yield for the time to the power of melody within me. Vanity, too, came to my assistance: she whispered that it would be an eternal disgrace if I allowed the grand duke, who had heard of my fame in a foreign land, to suppose that I was not equal to my renown. Then came that magnificent duet, in which I had to address Rinaldo, 'Dove corri, O Rinaldo?' and then I raised my voice, but did not put forth all my power, until I had to sing those burning words, 'Vivi felice? Indegno, perfido, traditore!' My audience seemed overpowered; the grand duke leaned over his box, and testified his delight in the most evident manner. For some moments after I had finished, there was a breathless silence, and then came the full thunder of applause. I was sent for to appear again, and receive the plaudits; but no sooner had I got behind the scenes, than I fell into a fainting fit. I was carried home, and for many days my life was despaired of."

Such was Madame Mara's account of this singular act of despotism—one worthy of Nero himself. "The Colossus of the age" certainly behaved like a petty tyrant to his principal singer. In vain she pleaded ill-health, and begged to be allowed to resign her honourable post; the answer was always the same—"You are to remain here." At length, urged by her husband, and heart-sick of her slavery, she attempted to fly with him; but the fugitives were discovered, and brought back as state prisoners.

Frederick, who desired nothing more than praise from the French press, had been rather mortified at the view taken by the Parisian journals of his barbarous violation of Mara's sick-room; they expressed, in the strongest terms, the deepest indignation at his conduct, and the most heartfelt pity for the sufferer. The voice of public opinion, added to a secret consciousness that he had gone too far, determined the king to inflict no punishment on Madame Mara herself; but he indemnified himself for this forbearance, by making her husband feel the whole weight of his anger. The luxurious, pampered, royal musician was forthwith ordered to repair to Kustrin, in the capacity of drummer to a fusilier regiment! Forgetful of her many wrongs, the faithful wife wished to throw herself at the king's feet, and beg that the sentence might be revoked. He would not see her; and sent her a large portfolio of music, with the following note:—"Study these, and forget your good-for-nothing husband: that is the best thing you can do."

The unhappy drummer wrote the most piteous letters to his wife; touching her heart by complaints of absence from her, which he professed to find unspeakably bitter; and vowing that he had never felt his love for her till now, that absence taught him how dear she was. Poor Mara, unaccustomed to words of affection, and willing to be deceived, made the most urgent efforts to obtain his recall, and succeeded at last, when all appeals to Frederick's generosity, honour, and clemency had failed, by an appeal of a different nature, which was far more likely to weigh with the parsimonious monarch. She offered to purchase her husband's freedom with the resignation of half her annual salary; and the great hero of the eighteenth century, was nothing loth to comply on these terms.

This sacrifice, for so unworthy an object, was the wonder and admiration of Berlin. It happened that the first time Mara appeared afterwards was in a little opera, called "The Galley Slave." The audience applied a scene, in which the singer, unbinding the chains of the galley slave, was addressed by him in these words:—"Amo tendre et généreuse, tu brisas mes fers," to their favourite herself. In spite of the royal prohibition, garlands, bouquets, and even costly jewellery, fell at her feet, as these words were pronounced. One of the fairest trophies of her public life was a fine engraving of this scene, from a sketch taken on the spot, by Chodowiecki. Madame Mara preserved it carefully, and loved to contemplate the picture even to her dying day.

At length, in 1779, after having resided at the Prussian court, as first singer, for nearly ten years, Elizabeth Mara obtained her most welcome dismissal. "Now," she wrote to her friends, "the imprisoned bird is let loose, and can fly everywhere." She went to Vienna, where an incident occurred, of which she always spoke as the most gratifying and exciting she had ever known. We will give the full particulars of an example of the power of harmony, only equalled by the story in Holy Writ, of that sweet singer of Israel, who charmed by his melody the gloomy demon from his royal master.

Count S——, a powerful Hungarian noble, had lost, under the most distressing circumstances, his only child, a beautiful girl, who was on the eve of marriage. Although two years had elapsed since this bereavement, the unhappy father remained in the most melancholy condition. From the hour when he had looked his last on the dead body of his child, he had remained in the same room, shedding no tears, and uttering no complaints, but in a speechless melancholy and despair. The most celebrated physicians had been consulted, and every means which could be thought of used, to awaken Count S—— from his lethargy of grief; but all was in vain; and his medical attendants at length despaired of his recovery. Most fortunately, a member of the sufferer's family had heard Mara sing, and entertained a firm belief, that if any sound on earth could reach the heart which was already buried in his daughter's grave; that voice, which seemed more like that of an angel than a human being, would have power. The other relatives, though hoping little from the experiment, yielded to the solicitations of this sanguine friend, and every arrangement was made to give full effect to the singer. An ante-room, opening into that where the count sat, was prepared. The choir for an oratorio was placed in a concealed gallery; Mara alone stood in the foreground, yet in such a position that she could not be seen in the next room, which was hung with black, and a faint shadowy twilight only admitted, excepting a few golden rays from a small lamp, which burned in a niche before a beautiful Madonna. Suddenly, upon the solitude and silence of that sick-room, there broke a wonderful harmony. Elizabeth had chosen Handel's "Messiah," and took her place, deeply moved with the singular circumstances under which she was to exert her talents. At first, the music and that heavenly voice all seemed to be unheeded; but, by degrees, the desolate parent raised himself on his couch, and glanced with earnest longing towards the spot whence those soul-moving sounds proceeded. At length, when Mara sang those words—"Look and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow," she appeared inspired by the sympathy she felt; and the relatives of the count, who listened with beating hearts, could not restrain their tears. Nor did these alone bear witness to the singer's power: heavy sighs escaped the sufferer—large tears stood in those eyes which the very extremity of grief itself had long forbidden to weep. Crossing the room with feeble steps, he prostrated himself before the image of that Heavenly One, who "bore all our griefs;" and when the full choir joined in the hallelujah chorus, his voice of praise and thanksgiving mingled with those strains. The recovery was not only complete, but lasting, and was at the time the marvel of Germany.

In 1784, she again visited England, where she had not been since, as an ugly sickly child, she was despised for her excessive plainness. Now, however, full justice was done her, and she was welcomed as the queen of song. George III. and his graceless son were at least agreed in their admiration of Mara's voice. During her stay in England, those bonds which she had, twelve years before so eagerly embraced, and found such galling fetters, were broken, and she separated from her worthless husband, pensioning him off so amply as to satisfy the selfish debauchee.

After this separation, her days were calm, if not happy. She retired early from public life, and settled at Reval, where, on her eighty-third birthday, she received a copy of verses from Goethe, who, on the same day sixty years before, had, as a student at Leipzig, sung her praises as Mademoiselle Schmähling.

Madame Mara died at Reval, on the 20th of January, 1833, having nearly completed her eighty-fifth year.

THE EMIGRATION CRY.

EMIGRATION is not exactly a social evil, but it is the consequence of one, and that a great one—viz., our inability to keep our people at home. It is a medicine that may do a great deal of good, and which, at the same time, must be administered with as much caution as any drug which poisons by gradually debilitating. Our people are our life's blood, and yet we appear to be dangerously easy on the subject of losing them.

Does one son ever depart from the bosom of his family without leaving tears, hopes, and misgivings behind him? Does not even the marriage of a daughter inspire a thousand anxieties, not only as to her future welfare, but as to whether there is any remaining who will so well supply her place? Are not the people of England her sons and daughters?

Serious are the facts which these simple questions bring to light. What is the almost universal cry of the sons and daughters of England? Emigration. What is the advice that England gives to her distressed children? Emigrate. How does England apologise for her neglect of health, light, air, and wholesome food for body and soul? Let them emigrate, and they will fare better. What is England's recompense to the forlorn sister of her own shame, Ireland? Emigrate, again. That one word rings on the platforms of public assemblies, echoes through the walls of literary institutions, stares one in the face in colossal placards, thrusts itself into one's hand in the form of tailors' outfitting advertisements. It is the consolation of the idle, the refuge of the unhappy and industrious, the watchword alike of the agitator and the philanthropist. It takes away the father and the children—often, alas! from the children; it is a haven of refuge for the dissolute son, flying from the silent reproaches and outspoken tenderness of his too indulgent sire; it is our scapegoat for everything that vice, folly, or public mismanagement has brought upon us—an Albatra for rogues of our own creation—a Slough of Despond, into which England may cast a little too much.

But no one is alarmed. Hundreds of thousands leave our shores, and Ireland is quietly approaching a state of depopulation, which will leave the priests and the pigs in calm and undisputed possession of the "ould country." Still, it is not violent enough to frighten us.

It does not touch our pockets at present; although, when we are driven to import labourers from the northern countries, we shall, perhaps, find that we might as well have kept a few at home, and that England's prosperity is as vitally connected with the well-being and home-association of her labouring classes, as the heart is with the life of the body.

No; we are not panic-stricken. We cannot perceive, and therefore cannot be frightened at a gradually increasing evil. If it could only take place all at once! What splendid efforts, what bursts of eloquence, what acute reasonings would be spent in accounting for the evil; one-tenth of all which might have prevented it!

Suppose, for the sake of illustration, the districts adjacent to the somewhat extensive parish of St. Pancras, were to awake one morning, and find the streets in a universal state of confusion, horror, and unpaid landlords running about in a state of frenzy? What can have happened? "Gone to California,"—"Off to Australia,"—is in everybody's mouth. Would the whole eight pages of the Times, with its supplement included, hold half the alarm of the people, or contain one-tenth of the remedies proposed by government, now that the evil was over?

But people don't make such violent moves; they decamp quietly and gradually. They don't empty St. Pancras; St. Pancras only sends its proportion. So does St. George's, so does St. Ann's, and so do all the parishes throughout the kingdom. They don't bleed the arm till it aches, nor the shoulder till the head drops listless; they quietly puncture the body all over, and draw little drops from all quarters, combining continual excitement with gradual depletion.

Such is, briefly to speak, the appearance of affairs at the present day. We are not an English people, for we may be all gone to-morrow. We have no right to say where we live, for our address may be changed for Port Philip, or Kangaroo Island, in the space of three months.

We are all in movement. Those who have not already started are grumbling at having to remain at home; but even at home the excitement is not wanting. Between neglect of work, in order to hunt up the means of leaving, railing at home-employers, magnifying the liberality of wages abroad, and contrasting the unpleasantness of a police system in England with the more enlarged license of a Lynch law in California, the mind of an intelligent working-man need not remain stagnant.

There is a certain secret charm which unfortunately enlists our sympathies with certain matters—to wit, our knowing nothing about them. Of the utter uselessness of knowledge in ripening or expanding the imaginative faculties we have long been convinced, and, had we needed any further evidence on the subject, the present rage for emigration would have been proof paramount.

There are a number of married people, who, if asked their reasons for entering the matrimonial state, would be at an utter loss to give any other reason than that they were single. In like manner, too, many who emigrate do so, because they have hitherto staid at home; they have lived in England, but have suddenly discovered that they cannot live there any longer.

If the reader has known half-a-dozen families in middle life, he has probably known one in which there was a wayward, never-do-well, never-take-to-anything boy, whom no entreaties, no anxiety of parents or friends could ever persuade to stick to his books. They have known that boy grow up, and, as manhood began to come upon him, and as he found himself unfit for anything, they have heard him talk about "going to sea." They have remonstrated. All the precarious uncertainty of the profession, its dangers, its slender chances of reward or remuneration, its utter incompatibility with a settled state of life and prospects, have been described with all the warmth and clearness that parental tenderness, experience, and understanding can develope. But our young gentleman has made up his mind; the sea is the grand solution of the riddle of what is to become of him; he is tired of a home for which he has rendered himself unfit; and, without calculating whether he is a whit better calculated for the "life on the ocean wave," he either runs heroically away from home, and vagabondizes in the lowest capacity, or, if his friends have means or interest, gets a position one or two steps higher. The sea is the haven of hope for the idle and the dissolute; there is something heroically independent in the idea of being no longer bored with the advice or anxiety of those around one; it is an idle life, but replete with the excitement of a storm or shipwreck, or with the milder enjoyments of chewing tobacco and talking ribaldry. God forbid that we should seek to depreciate the character of the British tar, or that we should deny our hearty sympathy with his rough simplicity and open-heartedness; but take the motives which send half the boys to sea—those, at least, who have enjoyed some opportunities of education—and a love of idleness, or a taste for a spurious kind of adventure, will be found the main motive that led to their choice of life.

Emigration is open to the same evil. Discontent with one's present circumstances, and an ill-feeling towards employers, are fomented in all directions by exaggerated, or, at all events, highly-coloured descriptions of the El Dorados of the New World. To jump at fortune at a single spring is constantly the aim of the idle and profligate; to find a royal road to wealth is a temptation hung before the greedy eyes of those who have neither energy nor will to work steadily onward. In a word, the story of Dick Whittington's good fortune is eagerly read and appreciated by thousands who have not one spark of Dick Whittington's honesty and perseverance. Thousands yearly start out in search of the gold-paved streets, without troubling themselves as to whether they possess a single qualification to deserve success.

It would be madness to attempt to deny the advantages with which emigration is fraught; and Quixotism itself would scarcely venture upon attempting to prove that many have not found means of support or comfort, if not of wealth and independency, in the New World, which they might have looked for at home in vain. But the old saying—"exceptio probat regulam"—must not be urged too far. Many who have done well in our colonies might have done fairly at home, had their dispositions been sufficiently energetic to meet the competition around them. Much of the enterprise displayed at the "diggings," and elsewhere, is rather due to the exciting stimulus of novelty than to the healthy and temperate industry, which alone can make its way in England. There is—although it may seem a paradox to say so—a certain kind of lazy industry—a spirit to work under strong excitement, and to perform prodigies of labour, and brave almost incredible adventures, but which, if required to be exercised in the quiet, ordinary course of things, is dull and inefficient. It is true, that the stronger the motive the greater the exertions made to achieve its purpose; but motives may be very different in their character, though nearly equal in their influence for the time. Both the speculatist and the plodding trader have the same motives—sustenance for the time, and future independence; both may be equally urgent in the pursuit of those objects, and both ultimately successful. But the difference consists in the comparative insecurity of the speculatist. His motives are all stretched into one effort; the whole system of his finances is changed by one exciting cause; and even success may produce so great a reaction, that, in despair at the absence of something to do, the newly-made fortune is put to the same stretch as its humbler predecessor, and our speculator, perhaps, finds himself a ruined man.

Violent and exciting motives always form the basis of a popular cry. Whether the object be to string up an employé of the German government to a lamp-post, to tear up the pews of a Roman Catholic chapel, or to make a fortune in a hurry, there is seldom much substantial consideration given to the matter beforehand. Again, the principle of imitation is so natural to the English, that a man follows his neighbour as readily to Australia or Van Diemen's Land, as one publisher pirates an American publication, because half a dozen others have done the same. If we talk to a dozen persons who have emigration in view, we shall find that, between discontent, (more or less reasonable,) imitation of their neighbours, and excitement fed by the press, we have arrived at pretty nearly the sum total of their motives. A few there are, indeed, who have really calculated their fitness for the undertaking, and who have measured their chances of success by a right estimate of their capital. When I speak of capital, I would be understood to mean all that a man possesses capable of being turned to account in a new settlement, whether it be money, the strength of his arm, or the tact and readiness of his mind.

This brings us to the most important question—viz., who are fit to emigrate? A late writer* on the subject, whose information appears generally accurate, and whose judgment on the emigration question is more moderate and reasonable than that of many of his contemporaries, observes that emigration is calculated to benefit three classes—"1st, the really poor; 2ndly, the struggling middle classes, whose small capital dwindles away year by year, till they fall into the ranks of the first-named class; 3rdly, the apparently rich, but in reality poor, portion of the aristocratic class, who, at home, are struggling with the thankless difficulty of maintaining station and appearance, in defiance of the want of means, which their struggles only serve to render the more apparent, displaying shabby in place of real gentility."

With regard to the first of these three classes, it is quite evident that the really poor are the most proper subjects for emigration, and that they have fewer ties to bind them to the mother country, and more attractions to entice them to a foreign land, than either of the others. But these are just the people who, by emigration, show our social weakness. Their wants are smallest, and our inability to supply them does little credit, in the eyes of the world, to our assumption of prosperity. Are we not, by our neglect of our poor, and by the consequent stimulus we are giving to emigration, daily robbing ourselves of thousands who might have worked for our own prosperity? Has not this penny-wise system of drafting away our working classes a gradual tendency to produce a dangerous increase in foreign competition, against which we shall have to oppose weakened means of production, if not to struggle against a ruinous demand for higher wages at home? If we cannot compete with our own colonies—if our resources are so overworked, that we cannot afford to tempt our labourer to stay at home by an honest and fair appreciation of his toil, and a just attention to his comforts—there is some screw loose in our social economy, some latent disease which may consume us by degrees, but which gives no vivid indication of its devouring progress. Every employer who enables his clerks to spend one hour in the reading-room which would have been spent in the wearisome and unprofitably avaricious toil, after dark, in Oxford-street—every landholder who makes his cottages more air-tight, and his pastures better drained—every master who bestows one more thought than he did upon the well being and happiness of those he employs—does something towards keeping England's children true to her, and at home. Would that the like disposition may increase!

England will never know the value of her poor, till she has lost too many of them; nor will she appreciate the danger of the loss of those who, although occupying a higher position, as far as education is concerned, are almost equally helpless, and to whom emigration consequently presents no small temptations.

I have myself witnessed some almost pathetic instances of perseverance in obtaining the means of emigrating; and, on such occasions, a painful feeling has arisen, on reflecting that such determination should not have met with better encouragement at home. I will mention one case. I lately knew a medical assistant,

* The Gold Colonies of Australia, by G. Butler Esq. London: G. Routledge and Co.

who, after writing treatises for homœopathic practitioners—of which, both as to the authorship and the profits, he might have said with Virgil—was at length driven to the resolution to emigrate. But where were the means to come from? Toil, night and day, and that literary toil, besides the ordinary duties of a shop—a dinner seldom consisting of aught but a plain biscuit or penny loaf, and a like diet to wife and children—and a few contributions from those whose claims on the literary world were perhaps likely to derive benefit from his absence; such was the course of preparation through which this emigrative zealot toiled. Such a man, although by profession belonging to the middle class, and moreover a gentleman by birth, fairly comes under the head of the "extreme poor." And such a man was likely to succeed. His indomitable energy had been so well tried by a continual and steadfast motive, that his powers of appliance would be tenfold those of the mere day-labourer. Education had not refined his nature sufficiently to incapacitate it for drudgery; stern habits of economy—we might say asceticism amounting almost to deprivation of common necessaries—had prepared him to undergo the fatigues and privations of the most uninviting settlement; while a matured knowledge of the world, derived from a daily experience of its unkindest influences, had made him fit to grapple with all the dishonest and selfish schemes incidental to a race of adventurers. Such a man was almost certain of success. Indeed, there were many traits in his character which rendered him unfit for the quiet regularity of English society. Avowedly a free-thinker, his disposition was unfortunately better suited to the licence of a yet but half-formed society than to the quiet conservatism of home. Perhaps the best advice to restless spirits of this description—who are not born heirs to a seat in parliament—is, "Emigrate."

"Hos ego versiculos feci, tulit alter honores."

But the success of thousands who emigrate is highly questionable. We are too negligent of our poor at home to render them very fit to make their way abroad. Indeed, with the education, or rather the want of it, bestowed upon so many of our lower classes, it may be doubted whether the kindness of many followers of Mrs. Chisholm's example is not likely to prove at once inefficient in its purpose, and baleful to the country at large.

It is too popular a mistake to suppose that a total incapability to do anything in this country is a fair excuse, if not a reason, for going elsewhere. Boys who have been allowed to spend their time in "turning wheels" by the side of omnibuses, and who have earned precarious halfpence thereby—boys, whose experience of nature and art has been confined to catching snakes in the Hampstead field-ditches, or drawing mackerel on the pavement—such characters, we maintain, are not likely to benefit by emigration. The fact is, we want a home education to qualify youths for our colonies. To expatriate youths, merely because we have made them vagabonds by our neglect, and then feel dissatisfied with our own work, is only to place our El-Dorado on the footing of a mild penal settlement. As far as the getting rid of them goes, we may be the gainers, only don't let us, in the name of common sense, connect philanthropy with emigration.

There is another class of persons who are equally unfit for Australia, viz., those whose time has been devoted to the acquisition, and whose skill lies in the practice, of those arts which conduce to the refinement of life, rather than to the relief of its immediate wants. Australia is, perhaps, a little less infantine in its condition than California; still, it is even now in a state nearer to nature than to civilization. No doubt, an artist or two may pick up something by remitting their sketches to a weekly paper; a daguerreotypist may set up his glass house, and strike off people's countenances, at a price which the most sanguine denizen of the Strand, or King William-street, would sigh after in vain. But there cannot be enough employ for many persons of such professions. An artist who has not talent enough to earn a living in this country, would equally fail in the colonies of the New World. As to the American States—although art has there made but few steps towards perfection—there is still a plausible amount of talent, sufficient, at all events, to make them discontented with inferiority, when it has not a native stamp to render it tolerable. It has well been observed, in another recent pamphlet,* that even "the artisan who goes to America with the expectation of being employed in his own trade, should be a first-rate workman," that "a good skilled artisan is valuable here as well as in America," and that, "before he leaves the old country, he will do well to consider his trade, for if it be a failing one here on this side of the Atlantic, it may be utterly useless on the other."

* Chambers' Emigrant's Manual to British America and the United States of America, p. 131.

If this be the case with trades, it must hold doubly good with professions, especially in a country so recent and so imperfect in its social condition as the present centre of attraction—the district surrounding the “diggings.”

But, it will be said, artists do not go out with the view of following their own profession, but of embarking in every-day life occupation. A case of this description came under our notice a few years' since; an artist, who had acquired a competency in this country by the exercise of his own profession, went to America in quest of a fortune by farming, and lost every farthing.

It is a common mistake for individuals, when unsuccessful in one profession, to express their certainty that they would have made fortunes, had they only been brought up to something else. That much real talent is lost, many aspirations of real genius stifled, by the want of proper, or the application of unsuitable, culture, we are the last to think of denying; but that failure in one thing is a guarantee for the probability of success in another, is oftentimes paradoxical. There are a certain class of employments, any one of which may be compatible with one and the same disposition, but it is not always easy to perceive which are those employments. To a man of great physical energy, for instance, farming, sheep-squatting, or even gold-digging, may be almost natural employments, and yet not prevent his being a good artist or a finished dancer; but few people would urge the fitness, vice versa. If a man, besides being a good artist, possesses a calculating mind, his speculative capacities may turn to account in a new settlement; if he be a good horseman—a rare thing with those following so sedentary a pursuit as painting—he may rival a Bushman in rallying his stray flocks and herds. If his constitution be little impaired by the consequences of long-sitting, exerting the eyes by night-work, rare or irregular exercise, he may hope to struggle with the difficulties of even a sub-divo bed-chamber, and may become as hardy as the hardest “navvy” that ever procured a public passport to the land of Fortunatus. But these advantages are possessed by few. Only fancy an Oxford dignitary, divested of cap and gown, without a single undergraduate to do him homage, and his nerves unruffled even by the complacent dullness of an hebdomadal board, plunged suddenly into this atmosphere. Would his double-first be thought anything of, and would even his irreproachable orthodoxy find many hearers? Great mental qualifications, and great accomplishments of a refinéd character, are of little use in an early, and therefore mainly physical state of society. The “rough” and the “ready” are the only standard, where things are reckoned, not for what they are in themselves, but for what is the demand for them. Jewellers, if they had the skill of a Cellini, would be little wanted in a place where gold in a raw state was the main attraction; and we don't whether, if Messrs. Hunt and Roskell contemplated transplanting their vast treasures to Australia, they would not first convert it into corrugated iron warehouses, spades, and clasp knives, of elaborate ingenuity and forbidding appearance.

Too many persons fall into this mistake of supposing that they have only to change their clime, and that they will be welcomed like the apocryphal humanizers of Peru. Not long since, one of those unfortunate beings who are just sufficiently poets to make them too lazy for any practical calling in life, left England for Australia. Poor man, he had lived respectably and comfortably in England, but he left in solemn disgust of his non-appreciation. Ago had fast set in upon him, yet he, who, with thought enough to write sensible prose on sensible subjects, had lived, and might have lived, honoured and respected, must start off in quest of—we don't know what. If he sought for gold, his bodily frame was far against his chances of success. If he thought that Australia would weave the chaplets of the united muses to grace his arrival, his mind was indeed “in a frenzy rolling.”

But poets are not the only educated people whose discontent and imprudences, rather than their sober desires of bettering themselves, transport to the lands of gold and Lynch-law. Shocking it is to see the son of a man high in the church—capable, both by attainments and influence, of making that son heir to his emoluments and honours—making Australia or America the asylum from his creditors, the place of refuge from the consequences of his mispent university life. Could we find a few university men returning with honourable independence, and, with the hard-earned results of industry, redeeming the consequences, and wiping out the taint of their past career of folly—we would hail Australia as the Alsatia of ricketty Oxonians and Cantabs, and would certainly recommend rustication to the diggings as a salutary university punishment. But such a delicate sense of error, such a refined and genuine desire to amend it, is not learned in a place where quick aggrandizement is the main object. Nor are the industrial habits of such young gentlemen trained in a school likely to succeed in the colonies. A small quantity of Greek, and a larger proportion of pale ale and cigars, relieved by the occasional excitement of breaking a dog-cart to pieces against the post, as you enter Abingdon, or an inglorious ducking near Itfley lock; such a course of education may give substantial reasons for escaping to Australia, but will not suggest many resources for getting a livelihood when you have got there.

But there is a more serious social evil connected with what may be called the emigration mania, which affects us more closely, and which bids fair to work serious mischief in our social condition—I mean the diminution of motives for wholesome and persevering exertions at home. Many as are the unhappy results which render emigration necessary, we must still be sensible that the colonies are too frequently looked upon as a pis aller for those who have little determination to labour at home, and that a morbid enterprise will often arouse those who have no spirit to seek for employment. It will be said that this is an advantage, and, morally speaking, it doubtless is so; but its influence upon England, in a social light, must be baleful. We have known parents remove a boy from school because he did not “get on.” Another school was tried, and another; and when the boy grew up into a stupid, perverse, and ignorant man, people began to think that the boy, and not the school, was really in fault, and that steady discipline, enforced in his first place of training, might have done more for his intellectual attainments and character than had resulted from a lenient indulgence of his discontent. Many who leave this country, leave it under very similar circumstances. They are at issue with England, and have not the wisdom to perceive that the quarrel is of their own making. It never occurs to them that they have been standing still while the rest of the world has been walking onwards; that they have been waiting for employment and profit to come to them, instead of seeking both with all their might. High rents are complained of, but many who complain, also forget that they are but benefitting by the advantages of situation which high rents ensure, and which ought to bring commensurate returns. “Out of work,” is the painful cry of many, and a true and sad complaint; yet many of those who suffer, lack the energy to seek for employ, or the judgment to direct their research to the proper direction. The mother-country stands charged with all the errors, deficiencies, and mismanagement which the listlessness or un-adaptable dispositions of individuals can accumulate.

To hear some people talk of emigration, one would suppose that unfitness and incompetency were the grand qualifications for a candidate for Australia, and, till late years, for America likewise. Indifferent actors, for example, have made money in the United States; and now we have small histrionics, who were perhaps two ranks above the supernumeraries in a London theatre, taking farewell benefits, “previous to their departure for the United States.” In like manner, a tailor, who never made a suit of clothes capable of fitting a human being—a radical barber, who lived upon vestry meetings and the Sunday Times—a whiskerless City clerk, deep upon the Derby to the extent of his last month’s salary—or a schoolmaster, guiltless of learning and honesty—all look to Australia, or the United States, as the golden haven in which their invaluable career is to find its recompence. Men—especially idle men—are too fond of reasoning in this style. “So and so is a mere fool;” “so and so couldn’t turn out a piece of work as I can,” and yet “so and so is better off in Australia;” “so and so has made a fortune.” Instead of a moral stimulus to well-directed exertion, the emigration system becomes a substitute for it; “the state of the country,” “the times,” “the season,” or any other form of excuse, form the apology for want of success; and a shoal of persons, who have learnt nothing in the Old World, start out for the New, to trade with their experience.

This is no exaggerated picture—nay, it is perhaps the more readily recognised, as we find the same false reasoning, and the same love of change, without fair consideration of circumstances, prevailing even in minor matters. Discontent with one’s present position is, undoubtedly, the first step to amendment; but it must be supported by some better and more powerful feelings, if it is to work any good, and ameliorate the condition of the discontented.

As our object is to describe the mistakes made by persons in supposing themselves fit subjects for emigration, who are really the last people in the world who should entertain any such notions, we have no small pleasure in bringing forward the following remarkable instances, from the pen of the well-known emigrant, Mr. Samuel Sidney,* whose work on the Australian colonies is the most complete that has yet come into our hands.

* The Three Colonies of Australia, their pastures, copper mines, and gold-fields. 8vo. Ingram, Cooke, and Co., 227, Strand.

"Emigration," says this clever-author, "except to half-starved paupers, is not a luxury, as some ignorantly suspect, but a severe remedy which may be adopted, not without due consideration, for certain severe afflictions It is a gross deception to represent to an intending emigrant that there is some other country more pleasant to live in than his own. The soil, the sun, the fruit, the flowers, the corn, whether it be of Norway or Naples, are good enough for a native, if he can get enough of them; but if he cannot, if he finds himself slipping down the hill of fortune, or struggling against some intolerable personal or local association, it is ridiculous for him to be over-much in making a transplantation—he must be content with a balance of advantages. The climate of Southern New Zealand is brilliant and exhilarating, peaches are cheap and delicious in Australia; but sensible people do not emigrate to enjoy light skies or eat ice-cold peaches. When we dwell upon the genial climate, the fruitful soil, the rich crops, the countless cattle, the mineral wealth, in gold, copper, and precious stones of Australia, we cite them not to induce men to emigrate who have snug estates, or incomes from the five per cents., or promising openings in professions or trades, but to show what compensations may be expected for the want of convenient shops, morning papers, good roads, gas and water companies, agreeable society, and all the luxuries created in Europe by centuries of progressive civilization. A bush-hut is not to be compared to the Euston Hotel; but to enter the latter, a man must have a well-filled purse, while the former is generally open to gentle or simple, with thanks for coming and gossiping the latest news. A man who has fasted and ridden hard for twelve hours, enjoys the plainest dinner; a tramp over deep, heath-covered moors, on a hot August day, gives an amazing relish to a cup of cold water; and so a hard landlord, a grinding creditor, a chancery suit, a bankrupt executor, a false sweetheart, or any other real calamity, prepares the colonist for passing through the ordeal, mental or physical, which must be endured before he can be contentedly and successfully rooted in a colonial soil."

After some very just and good-natured remarks of a similar character, Mr. Sidney observes, that the chances for "gentlefolks" benefiting by emigration are very small, and that with regard to popular notions of colonial cheapness, "people may be as foolish, as extravagant, and as miserable in Sidney, Melbourne, and Adelaide, as in Paris, Bath, or Cheltenham." He also justly animadvertes upon the paltry conduct of persons of a better class, who, having been sent out to the colonies by private subscription, have spent the greater part of the money in extravagant outfits, have refused to mess and associate with their fellow-passengers, and made enemies of colonists who might have befriended them advantageously. At the same time, we cannot but be impressed with the amusing, lively, and yet painful account which he gives of the impoverished condition of our middle classes, or fail to see that, could this class of English lay aside a few of their aristocratic predilections, the colonies might present a most profitable field for their exertions and advancement to opulence.

But, with equal justice, he views the other side of the question. "It is right," he continues, "to warn young gentlemen of education and refined tastes, large or moderate fortunes, from being induced to settle in any colony by the romantic reasoning of the crimps of systematic colonization, who conjure up a phantasmagoria of Greek colonies and sacred fires, 'model farms,' 'churches,' 'schools,' 'cheap labour,' 'respectable tenants,' 'parks,' 'manors,' 'vast estates secured for a mere trifle,' and take advantage of the excitement to sell their dupes lots of wild land, unseen and inaccessible, at the antipodes."

And are such visionary attractions wanting in this country? are there no Mr. Seadders? and are Martin Chuzzlewits grown only in America? Let us consider one of the really serious evils that have arisen out of the emigration excitement—I mean the Emigration Gambling Societies.

"Now ready, the first number of the Who'd Stay at Home? Journal, price one penny, with the chance of winning

A FREE PASSAGE TO AUSTRALIA!"

Such is one style of advertising a new journal, the emigration chances depending upon the number of pence swindled out of the pockets of the same worthies who oscillate between betting shops and the petty sessions.

Sometimes the gambling style takes the equally philanthropic embodiment of a society.

"EMIGRATION !!!"

"Who of the hard-working and ill-paid labourers of England, would not, by subscribing to this grand undertaking, procure, either for himself or his distressed neighbour, a free passage and outfit, value

TWENTY-ONE POUNDS, by joining the great emigration lottery; tickets to be had within,

FOR ONE SHILLING."

Be it remembered, our emigration betting-office (we cannot separate the two ideas) must have its proper staff of officers and hangers-on, and must go through the trifling ceremonies of paying rent and taxes; nor are newspapers, however philanthropic, in the habit of advertising for nothing; and even yellow "posters" come to something. Then there is the interest (say some twenty or thirty per cent.) to the party who advances the money necessary to start the concern; there are the odd guineas to chartist lecturers, and the rent and gas-light of the Puddleton or Bunbury lecture-room, and there are the incidental deficits arising from the sudden departure of proprietors or officials. At the same time, it is not fair to lay the blame of these impositions upon emigration itself. The better a principle is, the more likely it is to be abused, and the more serious will be the consequences of such abuse. If people have a taste for betting, bet they will; and whether Lord Threadneedle bets upon the relative speed of two blackbeetles, while the Right Hon. Fred. Chiffinch looks on with admiring eyes, and the delight of an imagination satisfactorily employed; or two dustmen exchange money and bad language over Claverhouse or California, the same mischief is equally at work. But it is a proof that a popular mania is abroad, when it is thought a fit and competent subject for gambling. Nothing proves the looseness of a screw in the healthy composition of society, more than the prevalence of a belief in the magical powers of chance, and the morbid passion for a short road to wealth. It is all very well to say that the end sanctifies the means, and that these emigrative gambling societies, (even supposing they ever pay any premiums except to money-lenders and the proprietors,) may give a chance to a deserving man to obtain the means of emigration, while, if he loses, the loss is not such as can occasion him any distress. Both postulates are wrong. Your enterprising better (and it is to such that any lottery society must look for profit) will scarcely content himself with a shilling's worth of emigration, but will lose as much as he can come by honestly—perhaps a little more. On the other hand, the winner will find himself as badly off. For instance, will any respectable emigrant ships, in which there is a reason to expect decency and safety during a voyage, be likely to associate themselves in such an undertaking.

Nor are such the only allurements which may turn sober heads wild with speculation, and lead unfit people to fall, popularly speaking, out of the frying-pan into the fire. Some of our own clergy, without knowing more on the subject than might be suggested by the somewhat natural desire to rid their rich, overpaid, and ill-administered livings from pauperism—which they might have largely prevented have talked and written plenty of highly-spiced rodomontade on the beauties and advantages of a colonial life. Politicians have purchased cheap popularity by the same clever use of a popular subject; every publisher has thought himself bound to produce a book telling people how to get away from England; popular musicians have turned emigration into a subject for an entertainment; and, sooth to say, so totally has the position of England and her welfare been forgotten in the question, that the wonder is how we have any inhabitants left. To say the truth, the press has acted, generally speaking, with more honesty than any other of the advocates of emigration; and among the mass of publications on the subject which have partly suggested the present article, few are wholly one-sided; few fail to point out that there are important limits to be borne in mind, and that the prevailing indiscriminate-ness with which the people emigrate is a serious social evil, not only to themselves, but as regards the well-being of the colonies, and the conservation of the principle to its fitting purpose. As Mr. Sydney observes, with regard to emigration, there is no better motto than Sam Slick's—"First be sure you're right—then go ahead."

I cannot help, in the words of the same writer, giving the following spirited summary of "colonial failures, who return to England to abuse the colony, the colonists, and everything connected with colonization."

"Fast men; younger sons of noble families, for whom no permanent place can be found in army, navy or public offices; elder sons of wealthy manufacturers, ashamed of their fathers; men expelled from the universities, billiard-playing barristers, sporting surgeons—in a word, a per centage of the best-dressed frequenters of night-houses in the London season, who are sent out by their friends as a last resource, in hopes of getting rid of them, with capitals varying from £100 to £3,000. These stars of fashion renew, in Australian cities, the dissipations of London and Paris, and either die of delaureum tremens, or return home beggared. Some never quit the hotel they honour on landing until they have spent their last shilling; others purchase large sheep establishments, and leave everything to hired servants, while they run a short race of extravagance with the colonial plutocracy—the men of four thousand a-year."

Did our limits permit, we could fill out these details with examples quite equalling those we have already instanced. But, before we have done with Mr. Sidney's book, we must make a few extracts highly illustrative of the self-reliance which is the great qualification indispensable to getting on in the colonies.

We have already noticed the vagabond class of street boys, and have pointed out the little probability of their achieving a respectable success in a foreign land. Mr. Sidney gives a more favourable view of their emigrative capabilities. While we still adhere to the opinions we have expressed, we feel that, as a matter of correct judgment, founded on physical con-parison, the following passage merits our best attention :—

"Let any one notice, in walking through the streets of London, the ragged urchins, from seven to nine years old, who are to be found congregated on door-steps, in charge of babies almost as large as themselves, and hanging about corner-posts, ready for anything. Talk to one of these Flibbertigibbets, and you will find that, although, perhaps, he can neither read nor write—(more shame to our country that it should be so!)—he can thread his way through the crowded streets without the slightest of fear for himself or his living burden. He knows when to run, when to stand still, and make cab or dray wait for him; he is well acquainted with the price current of provisions, from baked potatoes to red herrings; he is not to be done out of a single nut less than the twarf of the day for his penny; he is ready, at the shortest notice, to convey a message, to the most distant part of the metropolis, understands an answer, and can give as graphic a description of the sender as any Australian black fellow. When rewarded with an unaccustomed half-crown, he knows where to invest it to the greatest advantage in some article of second-hand clothing; he has a sharp eye for bits of brass, iron, or other gutter waste and stray; he is always game to take his own part with any fellow of his inches, has a slang answer ready for a 'Peeler,' and does not mind a cut behind when he wants a ride—in a word, he has the perfect use of his natural faculties.

"Compare this self-educated young vagabond with your own nice, clean, quiet little gentleman, who can read, repeat pretty poems by rote, and write a letter in round hand to his rich uncle. He runs to his nurse, if the old clothesman looks at him; bel-lows, if he finds himself round a corner, out of sight for two minutes of his little brothers and sisters; and, as to the value of money, only knows that six-pence will buy something sweet.

"The one is an infant, the other is a little man; the one is only fit for a nursery, the other is worth his salt in a colony. Seven years later, your nice little gentleman will require to be clothed and fed, and taken care of."

Leaving our "off-to-Australia" reader to digest these remarks, and many other equally good ones, in Mr. Sidney's book, I will offer a few observations on another matter of no less importance than what has been already brought forward—viz., how far emigration is likely to prejudice our own condition at home.

Were I to bring forward Rome, dying of over-emigration and colonization—Corinth, sending out a rival that was to play the part of a classic Jonathan to the mother country—I should be accused of pedantry, and told, in the language of a contemporary, that "the classics can teach us nothing." Without elaborately refuting a position which, probably, originated in an unwillingness or incapacity to learn "how to be taught," I will merely observe that the political and social history of the world is, at all times, essentially identical, although it may, and does, differ in the details and circumstances. Emigration has ruined countries before now, and its corrosive powers are no ways blunted. To be sure, it is not actively baleful—it has none of the cut-and-thrust development of an acute fever. Quite the contrary; it only exhausts a country by degrees, and its pleasing excitement keeps up a hectic that makes consumption itself interesting.

We are not alarmists; indeed, we are utterly sceptical at the possibility of a "crisis," a "revolution," a "great change," or any other of the mighty movements, which dim the imagination of our friend Herr von Kirchwasser, who has been thirteen times in prison, and has made Austria too hot to hold him, simply by writing something which would, in this country, have been refused in a threepenny Sunday newspaper. We feel quite comfortable even about "the French," and shall be equally fearless beneath the roof of the new Crystal Palace. But, while we have no dread of England being driven to seek for inhabitants through the excess of emigration, we cannot be blind to the obvious tendency of this excess to check exertion at home, to bring us hereafter into ruinous competition with our own colonies, and to destroy that nationality which, while it has undoubtedly led us into many bigoted and mistaken proceedings, has also been the only feeling that has held England together, and made her the centre around which the whole world of art and commerce has revolved.

Emigration is not so great a mischief as the necessity for emigration. The fact that we cannot find employment for our own inhabitants is an implied confession of social bankruptcy—an acknowledgment that we either lack the means, or the will, or both, of making our own people useful to us. Why not emigrate to Ireland? The passage is cheap—so cheap, that a man might raise the means to go thither without resorting to philanthropy or gambling. The climate, soil, scenery—everything that can fill a guide-book—all is fine; but it is too near home. And, again, Ireland is a sore that we cannot contemplate with satisfaction. It has committed a sin that never can be pardoned—viz., it has been treated worse by us, and has borne our ill-treatment better, in proportion, than any other place under the sun. If we are to treat Ireland as a conquered country, let us place it on the footing, at least, of some of the savage localities we have subdued to our use; let us elevate its inhabitants to the belief in some other food than potatoes, in some other chemistry than the concoction of illicit "poth'een;" and, if possible, let us learn the fact that a "bog oak" bracelet, or set of studs, is not the highest attainment of which Irish artisans are capable. Make Ireland what Ireland can be made, and we shall know where to send plenty of our surplus population.

Nor is this the only way in which the necessity for unlimited emigration may be prevented. Every social improvement—every attempt to make air and light common property—every struggle against dirt and ignorance—makes us richer in our means of retaining population, and ought to make us more anxious to employ than to expatriate.

We cannot prevent people leaving England, unless we give them a reason to stay. There are, doubtless, many, whose absence is more conducive to our advantage than their presence—whose "room is better than their company;" but there are also many thousand stout, honest hearts daily leaving us, whom England can as ill spare as estimate. If there is not room in England for such, we would say "Make room."

IN THE NIGHT-TIME.

I think of thee alway :—it is
The only happiness I crave,
The only solace, now, I have.

Thou—thou would'st smile at such small bliss,
For what is joy enough for me,
Would be but a poor fate for thee.

I pray it may be ever so :—
That such content as is my all,
Thy blythe heart may reject as small :—

And that thy soul may never know
A soul's blank dreariness, when—hope gone—
It lives in memory alone,

As mine doth now. O pityingly
Look on me, Heaven ! subdue this pain,
And make my weak heart strong again !

Ah ! I was happy once—e'en I ;
Sometimes I think 'twas in my dreams,
That blessed time so shadowy seems.

We were companions—darling friends—
I have a pride in that, at least ;
Then thou did'st love me all the best.

The love of a true heart ne'er ends,
And thine is true, most true ; and so
That thou still lovest me, I know.

With this, why am I not content ?
O, jealous heart, why wilt thou crave,
And yearn for that thou can'st not have !

Alas ! my all of love was spent
And lavished on thee—only thee :—
Thou giv'st a wave—and tak'st a sea !

Thou travellest thy separate way,
And 'tis a smooth one—if my prayers
Have power to spare thee pains and cares.

I can do naught for thee but pray.—
O bitterness ! if woe should come,
How impotent is love 'gainst doom !

I, who for thee all things would strive,
May then behold thee in despair,
Without the right thy grief to share :

I, who for thee would pray to live,
As once I humbly prayed to die,
Must stand in helpless silence by ;

And, while a tempest rends my heart,
I must be calm, and guard my eyes,
Lest that wild heart to them uprise.

'Tis hard to have in thee no part,
Who once used all my own to be,
Who now art all—on earth—to me.

On Earth ! ah ! Father—Helper—Friend !
To Thee my bruised heart I turn,
Thou wilt give peace for which I yearn.

I know my sorrow shall not end ;
The anguish of crushed love is strong ;
Ah me ! and life is long—so long !

But thy deep peace doth on me fall,
The frenzy of my love is gone—
The holy love remains alone.

There comes a solemn calm o'er all,
The storm is hushed within my breast—
Beneath the quiet stars I rest !

THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF HEINRICH HEINE.*

(Translated from the "Revue des Deux Mondes.")

In May, 1831, Heinrich Heine went to reside in Paris, and from that period he has not changed his abode. We must remember the political agitation which followed the revolution of 1830, in order to comprehend the part that H. Heine performed at that period. Whilst Jacobinism was agitating in secret numberless wild schemes were openly formed and executed. The secret societies organised in France and Germany did not absorb the whole of the attention of the restless demagogues; revolution was everywhere to be found, in Utopias, in systems, in plans of new religions and in so-called philosophy. There is a mysterious communication between nations. At the very time when France knew but little of what was taking place beyond the Rhine, the sensualism which, under the name of "the young Hegelian School," was defacing and destroying the fruits of the learning of half-a-century in Germany, appeared also in France, and gave birth to "Saint-Simonisme." H. Heinrich Heine has frequently been accused of having, as he expressed it, donned the Saint-Simonian cassock; but he chooses rather to ridicule all systems than to adopt any. The accusation, nevertheless, appears to be not unfounded. When H. Heine proclaimed the rehabilitation of the flesh, when he ventured to exclaim that Christianity was the "morbid period of the human race," when he contrasted his religion of pleasure and joy with "the melancholy religion that withers the flowers of life and peoples the world with spectres," it might well be imagined that there was much resemblance to the disciples of Saint Simon in the author of the Reisbilder, and their costume was naturally assigned to him also. The Memoirs of M. de Schnabelewopski belong to this period of H. Heine's life: for the sake of morals, as well as of poetry, it is our duty unhesitatingly to condemn this cynic production. It will one day be difficult to believe that so brilliant and talented an author could have written anything so coarse. To those who examine the work attentively, the cause of it is but too evident; having once become engaged in political disturbances, he was led on by degrees to the wildest revolutionary proceedings in the regions of philosophy and morality.

Attribute not to other causes the contradictions in his work on "France." This equivocal situation is the secret of all his faults. During the first two years after the revolution of July, H. Heine narrated, in the Augsburg Gazette, the events that were taking place in Paris, and the contests of the various factions. Although favourable to a free and rational government, and opposed to the violence and follies of democracy, he appears still imbued with a spirit of revolution. Vainly does he call himself a supporter of monarchy, his language is that of a demagogue. If he has a few words of sympathy for Louis Philippe and Casimir Périer, in a few pages after he will be found as the champion of the populace. It is difficult to ascertain from his writings what he admires and what he disapproves. Praise and blame are treacherous in these satirical pages, everything bears a suspicious aspect; be on your guard, the praise is ironical, the censure borders on enthusiasm. It is true, we must not seek from a humorist a faithful narration of events or calm judgment upon political proceedings. Yet it appears but too plainly in these writings that irony is the studied artifice of an author wanting courage to acknowledge his real sentiments. Notwithstanding this, we find many remarkably sound opinions, many singularly excellent portraits, and many descriptions of the world in which the history of these tumultuous times is faithfully recorded. Republicans, Buonapartists, legitimists, and those in favour of the juste milieu, are all portrayed with their theories and passions. The great idol of H. Heine, the Emperor, stands in the centre of the picture, in medio mihi Cæsar erit; but it is the emperor as transformed in the hearts of the people and the imagination of the poet—the almost mystic emperor whose portrait hangs on the wall of the peasant's cottage, by the side of the crucifix—the Saint-Simonian emperor, adds H. Heine, jestingly.

Thus runs the book, full of sense and folly, full of reticence and fearlessness, ill-concealing the embarrassment of the civilian under the irony of the humorist, declaiming against hypocrites when flaring to attack the demagogues; alternately liberal, Saint-Simonian, juste-milieu, and always extremely entertaining; and had the author but retained throughout his accustomed freedom of mind, it would have been worthy of preservation as an instructive work.

H. Heine is more at home in the purely literary world, when furnishing France with the history and progress of German poetry and philosophy. This is the theatre in which he can well perform the part of a revolutionary leader, which he so much covets. Among his prose writings, two volumes on "Germany," undoubtedly controvertible in many points, may be mentioned as one of his best works. The author of the Reisebilder here reappears; he is no longer journeying from Munich to Genoa, he is not visiting either the baths of Tuscany or the summits of the Brocken: the voyage in which he is now engaged is through the flowery gardens of the imagination, through the forests and the brambles of science. If the philosophic opinions of this work are reprehensible, how many charming details are there to be found, capable of rectifying the false doctrines inculcated by the system! The poet, the artist, the ingenious critic, has interspersed in these pages many remarks that illumine with sudden light numerous literary monuments hitherto but little known. Whenever H. Heine remains true to his nature, he is full of sympathy, even under the garb of satire, and his writings profit by this kindly feeling. When he espouses any particular party and becomes imbued with the spirit thereof, his sight grows indistinct, his irony frozen, and his mind, although deeming itself unfettered by the slightest chain, becomes only the slave of a narrow philosophy. Once again it is the artist, and not the theorist, we must seek in these pages. What then is the intention of the theorist? Let us glance rapidly at this subject, that we may not be obliged to return to it again. At the period Madame de Staël visited Germany, scepticism and other causes had exhausted the sources of inspiration in France, and her chief object in travelling in the native land of Schiller, was the search after those ideal creeds for which many then began to thirst. Hence the generous enthusiasm that animates her book, hence also the inaccuracy of her criticism; dazzled by the mysticism of the north, she has not appreciated its bold revolutionary deeds. H. Heine wished to write the counterpart of Madame de Staël's book, hence it is that his work bears the same title, that of Germany. Now, if we are to believe H. Heine, the intellectual agitation in Germany, from the time of Lessing and Kant, has been one continued and deadly combat with deism. This combat he describes forcibly, we might almost imagine that he was conducting it in person; he ranges his army in battle array, gives the signal, and marches the Titans against heaven, Kant, Fichte and Hegel, those master spirits whose every thought is a triumph, whose every tenet suffices to overthrow a world. Around these, before and behind, are grouped a multitude of writers, theologians and poets, novelists and literati. If one of the combatants stands still, like Schelling, he loads him with reproach. If a timid and poetic band of dreamers, such as Tieck, Novalis, Brentano and Arnim attempt to lead the fiery nation back to the tame poetry of the middle ages, he falls upon them and disperses them, like the "Kobolds" in the Buch der Lieder, who rushed upon the angels of paradise. At length, when the philosophic contest is ended, he predicts the consequences of it with a species of wild ecstasy.

"Christianity has in a certain degree calmed the brutal, martial spirit of the Germans, but it has been unable to destroy it; and when the Cross, that powerful talisman which now enchains it, shall be broken, then will the ferocity of the ancient combatants again break forth with the frantic spirit of the berserkers, which the poets of the north celebrate even at the present day. At that time—and the time will come—shall the divine warriors rise from their fabulous tombs, and remove the dust of this world from their eyes; Thor shall rise with his gigantic hammer and destroy the gothic cathedrals. When you hear the noise and tumult, be on your guard. Beloved French neighbours, interfere not with what we are doing at home; lest you suffer for it. Beware of fanning the flame; beware of extinguishing it; you may easily burn your fingers. Laugh not at these counsels, although they come from a dreamer; laugh not at the poet, who anticipates in the real world the same revolution that has already been effected in the domain of the mind. Thought precedes action as lightning precedes thunder. The thunder of Germany is truly German in its character; it moves slowly, but it will come; and when you hear a peal such as the world has never before heard, know that German thunder has accomplished its mission. At the sound thereof, eagles shall fall down lifeless from the sky; lions, even in the most remote deserts of Africa, shall hang down their tails and steal away to their dens. A scene will then take place in Germany, in comparison with which the French revolution shall be but as an innocent pastime. . . ."

Thus speaks the author, when unfettered by any restraint, and irritated by anger. If, in painting the philosophic labours of Germany in such singular colours, he had intended to portray the errors of those who prepared the way for atheists, we could easily have comprehended the cause of his exaggeration; but, on the contrary, assigning quite unexpected interpretations to the great efforts of metaphysics, he compares Kant to the sanguinary dictators of '93, and proclaims the gospel of pantheism. His theory of the intellectual history of the German people is therefore false in every way; it should be consulted only as furnishing information (but too true, alas!) on the mystic and sensual fever of a portion of the present century. When the author has passed this period, the style of his writing is entirely changed; kindly feeling and amiable grace appear in every part, and sympathy restores his independence. How touchingly does he describe the errors of Fichte's youth! With what emotion does he narrate the life of Lessing! How well does he explain the origin of romance, and exhibit in illustration of the subject the old popular legends, so full of deep feeling! We have found the poet again—we forget the philosopher. Sometimes, in a few rapid words, he produces a noble figure and exhibits it to us in a true and forcible light. Thus, in speaking of M. Jacob Grimm, he exclaims:—"His erudition is gigantic as a mountain, and his mind as pure and fresh as the stream that issues therefrom." Concerning Goethe, Herder, Oken, M. Varnhagen d'Ense—concerning the very men whom he has most censured, Arnim, Novalis and Brentano, he writes a few beautiful, though brief passages. Do not these generous portraits make us forget many of the caricatures? We forget the impious expressions, when we see the inconsistency of that which his heart dictates with what his pen has formerly written. The same author who, in speaking of the metaphysical works of Kant, exclaims, with triumphant irony—"Do not you hear the bell sounding? Kneel down, they are taking the sacrament to a dying God,"—remarks, in another place, but two pages afterwards—"It is sufficient for me to hear any one disputing the existence of God, to awaken iniquitude in my mind; I feel then an indefinable oppression, such as I once experienced in London, when, during a visit to New Bedlam, I found myself alone, abandoned by my guide, in the midst of a band of madmen. To doubt in God is to doubt in life itself; it is not less than death." We shall soon see the mask fall from the man who appeared anxious to disperse, like unfortunate phantoms, the most sacred dogmas of his fathers, and soon he will give utterance to those words which will completely disarm us:—"No, no; truly, it is vain that I attempt to deny it, old Germany is still at the bottom of my heart."

It was impossible that H. Heine could have attacked so many favourite tenets, given the death-blow to so many systems, and mercilessly introduced so many books and proper names into his sarcastic pages, without bitterly irritating the German people. They had not yet pardoned Louis Boerne for his ridicule; but they had excused him, on account of the nobleness and generosity of his soul. On the contrary, the ever-varying and mirthful irony of the author of the Reisebilder disconcerted the grave and serious Germans, and maintained their prejudices. For some years there was a fierce outcry against this renegade. Regarded by M. Menzel as an emissary of the modern Babylon, cursed by the rigid adherents of the Teutonic school as a representative of Parisian depravity, he was not less suspiciously eyed by the democrats, who accused him of treason. In addition to this, he had to endure official persecution.

A humorist ought certainly to be superior to emotions of anger; yet H. Heine had not hitherto attained that desirable elevation, and it is to his irritation, heightened by attacks of various kinds, that his book on Louis Boerne must be attributed. The author of the Lettres sur Paris was just dead; he was the civilian of the liberal party—the "firm Jacobin character" who was ever placed in contradistinction to H. Heine. H. Heine writes a description of him, caricaturing his great and noble qualities. The book is witty, bold, and vigorous; but is it as terrible as H. Heine intended it to be? No, in truth; and no one suffered from it except the author himself. Let us forget this unworthy act of retaliation, and return to poetry.

"My poem has no object, like life, like love! Seek not to find any aim in it. Atta-Troll is not a type of German nationality; he does not meddle with the questions of the day." Thus commences the charming story of Atta-Troll, in which the poet appears to be imbued with the best feelings of his youth. Gaiety and poetry, irony and imagination, these unite in diapason harmony; it is the work of a German artist. Let us not place implicit confidence in his word when he promises a poem entirely the production of his fancy—the dream of a summer's night—a romantic vision in the realms of Puck and Titania. Satire will be sure to find a place in it, but will not, however, be permitted to deface its beauty. It is a morning in May; the perfumes of the meadows and forests are wafted on vernal breezes; everything is in motion; everything has a voice; and whilst you are wandering in unfrequented paths, countless birds, concealed in the branches, are warbling satirical songs. But there are other sounds besides those of birds; from the caves of the rocks, from the ravines of the Pyrenees, resound the growlings of bears and the noise of their conspiracy against the human race. There are, as it were, secret clubs in the subterranean dens of the mountains. Listen to these menaces, these cries of vengeance, these incendiary schemes! It is the voice of Atta-Troll instructing his untamed family. Atta-Troll is a bear who formerly used to dance in the laughing valleys of the Pyrenees, under the balconies of Cauterets and Bagnères de Bigorre; he used to dance for the amusement of the idle and think of the time when, roaming free on the mountains, he deemed himself monarch of the world. One day he breaks his chain, and runs away. What happens to him in his retreat until the day he is killed by the son of the sorceress Uraka, we must inquire of H. Heine. The visions in the ravine of spirits, the cavalcade of spectres, and the apparition of the beautiful Herodias, form a scene full of grace and passion. This somnambulism, for which the author has so frequently censured the school of romance, he here treats seriously, and finds unexpected inspiration. The moon casts her spells around the valley of Roncvaux. Countless images of the chivalric ages arise, and appear galloping and singing on the enchanted mountains. "Hullo! huzza!" it is the last meeting of the shades—the last fiête of the poetry of Brentano and Fouqué. In the midst of these flights of his fancy, satire does not forget its task; literary, political satire, both are at work. On the one hand, we have the poet Freiligrath with his bears, his jackals, his negro kings, and all the menagerie of the desert; on the other, the democracy of Germany, with its deafening shouts. Is then this bear, who, after having broken his chain, busily inculcates his revolutionary theories at the bottom of his den, intended to represent a certain portion of Germany? Hush! the author says not so much as that; the rest is veiled, and we find a species of melancholy in the midst of the most brilliant allegros.

It is certain that H. Heine beholds with regret the disappearance, on the approach of the democrats, of that poetry which delighted his youth. He feels the charm of the poetry which he formerly satirized, now that the demagogues have declared war against the ideal, and are endeavouring to make imagination the handmaiden of politics.

One of H. Heine's characteristics is his predilection for Germany, even at the time when he appears to be renouncing it with anger. He lives in France; he desires the favour of the French, and, in order to obtain it, he sometimes does violence to his nature. Despite this, he is still a German, and it is towards Germany his eyes are turned. German politics, German literature, the parties, schools, newspapers and "thirty-six states of his beloved native land"—these are his theatre, and these furnish the inexhaustible fund of his irony and gaiety.

Atta-Troll appeared in 1840, at the time political poetry was beginning to create a sensation. A new band had appeared in the field, urging instant reform in the realms of fancy. The author of the Buch der Lieder had already effected a revolution in these territories; but, whatever was the mode of his attacks, whether violent or sarcastic, the ideal always appeared in them. Nothing of the kind was to be found among the reformers: the ideal was proscribed, reverie was abandoned to children; poetry must henceforth be the voice of revolution, the clarion of the approaching battles. Nothing was now to be seen but extracts in verse from the newspapers on political questions, pamphlets arranged in rhyme, appeals to the people, petitions to the King of Prussia, hymns to the future unity of the German nation. Nothing could have appeared more seasonably than the irony of Atta-Troll. It proved unavailing, however, in stemming the torrent; and from 1840 to 1845 the clamours of the democratic poets became each day more deafening. H. Hoffmann of Fallersleben, in the domain of light literature, and H. Herwegh, in that of the serious, appeared to have become the supreme governors of the German muse. It was at this period that the "new poems" of H. Heine appeared.

The book opens with a collection of stanzas of inimitable purity and beauty. Under the title of Neuer Frühling (New Spring), the author furnishes a continuation of those elegiac poems—Junge Leiden, Intermezzo, and Heimkehr—which grace the Buch der Lieder. Then follow many brilliant and imaginative pieces; some too much imbued with Parisian levity, others full of vigour and beauty. At length, after this singular overture, in which tones of every description are blended, commences the political and poetical symphony entitled Germany; a Winter's Tale. Germany is the counterpart of Atta-Troll. Atta-Troll is the production of an Ariosto of the north, who is ever seeking to disguise the boldness of his thought under the elegant veil of figure; Germany possesses neither figures nor veils, it is a work in which the daring spirit of the author shows itself undisguised. Atta-Troll sparkles with all the lustre of the south; Germany transports us to the mists of the north. The first is "the dream of a summer's night," the second is a "winter's tale;" the antithesis is perfect.

H. Heine is about to make a tour of some weeks' duration in his native land, and on the road from the frontiers of France to Hamburg, although the distance is short, he finds abundant food for his raillery. The Prussian custom-house, the cathedral of Cologne, the old Rhine, celebrated in the lofty tones of Becker, and so eagerly claimed by M. Alfred de Musset; the hotels of Minden, the principality of Buckeburg, the forest of Tentoburg and the statue of Arminius, Mount Kyffhauser, and the cave of Frederic Barbarossa, and, lastly, Hamburg itself—these are the varied objects that fall under the lash of his satire. The book closes with remonstrances to the King of Prussia, the lofty tones of which remind us of the invectives of Dante.

But Germany is not the work of a mere turbulent and satirical revolutionist: H. Heine includes everything, not excepting even himself, in his ridicule. The very democrats, with whom he appears to be in league, he covers with sarcasm. The liberals share the same fate as the bigoted; the national party is as ill-treated as King Frederic-William I. The author possesses the talent of comprising even past ages in his caricatures of the present day: in proof of this talent, how ably has he ridiculed the whole of Germany in the cave of Barbarossa—under the oaks of Arminius! He is ever the incorrigible humorist who delights in irritating his peaceable country in every possible manner; who pretends, by his satire, to raise himself above all beliefs; who amuses himself by baffling criticism; and who, in caricaturing the democrats, has still the power of replying with comic indignation to their attacks: "Thou liest, Brutus; thou liest, Cassius; thou liest, also, Ashmus!"

Was not his irony too long continued? Did it not resemble a part arranged beforehand, and intended henceforth to form portion of his character? That deep feeling which we have instanced as appearing even in the midst of impious expressions and writings, has it been preserved intact? Has not the author destroyed many of the lovely gifts with which nature had endowed him? These were the questions being asked by the public, when it was heard that H. Heine, who for more than three years had been stretched on his sick-bed, struck with paralysis and almost deprived of sight, had just completed a new volume of poems, and was about to take leave of the public.

How deep were the emotions this simple announcement created! Despite the prejudices entertained by so many against him, the author of the Buch der Lieder has always been a favourite poet in his native land. Whether from Berlin, Frankfort, Vienna or Munich, none of his fellow-poets ever went to Paris without knocking at the door of the dying poet, and inquiring affectionately concerning his welfare. All agreed in testifying to the victorious serenity with which he witnessed the approach of death; all admired his mental courage; and all were astonished at the firmness of soul of which they had hitherto doubted.

Endless were the conjectures started at this time concerning the dying man. What is become of the imagination of the satirist? was the inquiry. What lesson have years taught him? What has death told him, while seated even at his bedside? Is it true that he has denied the Hegelian tenets? that he has turned to God? that he believes in a future state? The Bible has converted him, we are assured by some; Moses is now his idol; he has again embraced the Jewish doctrines he so frequently satirized. Thus were opinions divided; some experiencing anxiety, others hope, and all expressing curiosity. The dying poet once more deceived the expectations of the public. As we found him in the ardour of youth, so does he now appear, while under the eye of his dead guest. The author of the Romanero is still the Heinrich Heine of old, the writer of the Reisebilder and Buch der Lieder; the irony is still that of former happy days, only it is more poignant; death is frequently introduced, and the grave is mournfully derided. If a few new tones are occasionally heard like a stifled lament, it will require an attentive ear to catch the meaning of them, in the midst of the peal of mirthful sounds.

The preface to the Romanero is one of those humorous medleys of which the author has been rather lavish. The poet takes leave of his readers and publicly makes his profession of faith in philosophy and religion. His regret in bidding farewell to the public is undoubtedly sincere; but, in addition to this, there is another circumstance which occasions his sorrow: the comedy is over, the curtain falls, and the theatre is about to close its doors; what will become of the puppets who performed their parts so cleverly under his direction? What will become of this and that one? It is well known that H. Heine is not scrupulous in introducing proper names. Poor puppets! he is anxious, at least, before parting from them, to repair the injury he has done. He therefore retracts numerous accusations he has formerly advanced, and makes peace with his enemies in the most serious manner possible. Having satisfactorily arranged these affairs, it is meet that he should be reconciled to God.

"Yes, I have made my peace with the creature, and I have also made it with the Creator—and that to the scandal of my friends the philosophers, who have bitterly reproached me for relapsing into the old superstitions: thus do they designate my return to God. All the friends of atheism have passed the anathema upon me, and there are many of the upholders of scepticism who would willingly inflict torture to wring from me the confession of my heresy. Fortunately for me, the only instruments of torture they can employ are their writings. Without torture, however, I shall confess everything. Yes, I have returned to God, like the prodigal son, after having long fed the swine with the Hegelians. Is it misery that has driven me to this? No, it is a less pitiful motive. I have traversed the forests and mountains of logic; on my road, I encountered the god of the pantheists, but I could not worship him. He is but a chimerical being, interwoven in the fabric of the universe; in matter only is he great—in that he is imprisoned, and there he remains, staring at us, destitute of power and reason. The existence of a will presupposes a person, and for the manifestation of this will ample space must be furnished. If, then, we seek a god capable of rendering us aid—and that is the principal thing—we must admit a personal god, a being superior to the universe, and endowed with the holy attributes of goodness, wisdom, and infinite justice. Then the immortality of the soul is granted us over and above, like the bone which the butcher, when satisfied with his customers, throws gratis into their baskets. These bones are called in French kitchens la réjouissance, and they make excellent soup which revives and strengthens the poor invalid. Every sensible man will believe that I never refuse a réjouissance of this description, but, on the contrary, that I always think of it with pleasure."

The most serious ideas may be expressed by comic figures, and this it is that constitutes humour. Nevertheless, we are tempted to ask whether H. Heine's theology is indeed serious, when, in a few pages, we come to so droll a description of the employments reserved for man in another world. All the vulgar objections to the dogma of a higher existence are here personified and caricatured. He who wrote such pages was not quite cured of pantheism; his heart aspires to a God in whom his mind has not power to believe, and this impotence, as usual, he avenges by irony. His poetry alone remains as fresh and brilliant as at first. He is thinking of the magician Merlin, the British poet, whose death was so delightful and peaceful. Merlin died under the great oaks of his native soil, while innumerable birds warbled above his head; Heine himself is far distant from the trees and the sun; he is dying amidst the confusion of Paris. Let poetry, at least, approach with its magic illusions! Let the whole world, from Asia to America—let all religions and all ages—let countless images, both mournful and joyous, come at his call, and surround the bed of the dying poet!

Such is, in truth, the character of the Romancero. The first part contains, under the title of Tales, a series of romances, ballads and poems, borrowed from all ages and glittering with the most varied colours; kings of Egypt, emperors of Siam, abbots, nuns, barons of the middle ages, sovereigns of modern times, revolutionists, savages from the New World, heterogeneous forms of every description are assembled in this brilliant gallery. After having thus followed his imagination through the various ages of history; after having passed in array these numerous figures—some comic, others tragic—intended by him to represent the confused movement of the human race, H. Heine will now speak in his own name. The second book of the Romancero is entitled Lamentations. These lamentations begin merrily enough with some clever literary satires; but immediately succeeding them is a delightful description of his life as an invalid, in a series of poems bearing the title of Lazare. These are a collection of dreams, reveries, curious reminiscences and epigrams, which he discharges in various directions, to pay off old reckonings; then we meet with unexpected bursts of emotion, or gloomy caricatures of the pale guest who is knocking at his door. He watches himself placed in the bier, and with poignant mirth describes the visit that a beloved friend will pay to his grave the following year. He speaks to her from the bottom of his sepulchre, brings his railery into action, and professes to doubt the sincerity of her grief. What! even after death will the incredulity of the humorist continue its task? But let us turn to the following page, and this melancholy impression will be dispelled. We find here some noble stanzas, in which the poet, with tears, supplicates the angels of heaven to take his place in the house of mourning, and to be the ever-watchful guardians of her whom he has just been addressing in irony.

In examining these productions, which contain so remarkable an union of joy and sorrow, our eager desire is to obtain some information respecting the religious emotions of the author. The last book of the Romancero is composed of "Hebrew Melodies;" and it appears to us that this final poem ought to contain H. Heine's real sentiments. Listen to these melodies: they are like dormant recollections awakening, like sentiments long since destroyed reviving in the mind. In the first poem of this series—The Princess Sabbath—he speaks of the old Jews he has so frequently ridiculed, with a species of embarrassment that betrays respectful affection. The finest and most poetical composition in the book, according to our ideas, is that dedicated to the great Jewish poet of the middle ages, Jehuda ben Halevy. Let us devote a few moments to the examination of it. The poet is thinking of Jehuda ben Halevy; the stanzas of the old rabbi are echoing in his ears; they are from the song of Prince Israel and Princess Sabbath. He sees before him the stern figures of some of the ancient Jews; he beholds the shadows with their long, white beards, and recognises Jehuda ben Halevy.

"Let my tongue cleave to my palate, and let my right hand be withered, if ever I forget thee, O Jerusalem!

"These words are echoing in my mind unceasingly to-day; I fancy I hear voices, the voices of men singing hymns.

"Occasionally, also, I have visions of beards—of the long beards of shades. . . . Spectres of my dreams, which of you is Jehuda ben Halevy?

"But they are departing rapidly—they have vanished; the rude appeal of the living has terrified the phantoms. Nevertheless, I recognised him.

"I recognised him by his pale forehead bearing the impress of noble thoughts, by the mild fixedness of his look (how attentively and anxiously did he gaze upon me!).

"But, in particular, I recognised him by the mysterious smile of his beautiful lips, so harmoniously united, like his own notes. None but poets have such lips."

He then narrates the childhood of the poet with tenderness and delight, mingled with a little innocent railery. How carefully and piously was Jehuda educated! How well did he sing the old text of the Bible to the sacred airs appointed for it! He lived in the Talmud as in a boundless world, and in the Talmud he grew up. No poet, since the world began, was endowed with richer gifts. God had taken pleasure in moulding his noble, yet pliant soul; and when he saw it, being satisfied with his work, he "kissed the beautiful soul, and the lovely sound of this embrace echoes in every one of the poet's stanzas." Jehuda ben Halevy was inspired with a most deeply-rooted love and veneration for Jerusalem; his heart bled when he read the narratives of those who had seen the temple in ruins, and the holy country of the prophets polluted; he loved the land in which so many great and miraculous events had taken place, he loved it ardently, passionately; he loved it as the troubadour Geoffrey Rudel loved the Countess Melisand of Tripoli. Geoffrey had seen Melisand only in his dreams, he embarked, and on reaching the shores of Tripoli, expired in the presence of his mistress. Jehuda ben Halevy also set out for Jerusalem, and, like Geoffrey Rudel, he expired in the arms of his beloved one. This is the story that H. Heine relates with a singular union of irony and deep sentiment. We may designate the poem of Jehuda ben Halevy as one of the best productions of the author of the Romancero. The enthusiasm of his hero introduces us to the mysteries of Jewish poetry, and the author furnishes us with a portrait of himself, in which the conflicting sentiments that dispute the empire of his soul and the lovely images that are ever present to his mind are admirably depicted. Jewish or Nazarene, and Greek literature are, he has often remarked, the two great divisions of history; Homer and the Bible comprise, in his estimation, all the philosophy of the world. He is not now speaking in jest; the Greek and Jewish world are disputing the first rank in his esteem. Formerly, the poetry of the Grecians accorded best with the ardour of youth, and led him a willing captive to the charms of her war-chariots and martial music; now that youth is past and the world itself is disappearing, it is time for grave thoughts, and Jehuda ben Halevy has succeeded Homer.

The following poem, that which closes the volume, is the most Voltarian scene that the sceptic demon of his mind ever produced. It is a solemn controversy between a monk and a rabbi, in the presence of a Spanish Court of the middle ages. How deeply is it to be regretted that, even to his last day, the poet continues to envelope the feelings of his soul in the impenetrable veil of irony.

Irony! it is right we should confess it—after studying the life of an author who placed all the treasures of his imagination at the disposal of this indiscreet muse—irony cannot form the last chapter in the life of a poet and thoughtful man. We can readily understand the mournful and satirical look with which he gazed on the world, when the generous hopes that filled his youthful heart were annihilated by the cold realities of life; it was the revenge of deluded enthusiasm. We can comprehend it when we think of the agitated, feverish age in which he wrote, especially if we remember also that his native land had nothing to offer to him but pictures of ruin and of conflicting systems, and a state of literary anarchy succeeding the majestic reign of the masters.

The satire of the humourist seems almost permissible in a land so waste and desolated. H. Heine is the first poet his country has beheld since the death of Goethe, and he may be called the personification of the state of literature during the last few years: let this be his excuse. Now, however, that his eyes are closed on this perishing world whose miseries and contradictions have so much excited his ridicule, another world is opening before the eye of his mind. In that world there will be an end of misery, of torturing incongruities, of harrassing deceptions; all problems will be solved, all discord will be banished. Irony may be the faithful mirror of the things of this life, but in those regions which are now being disclosed to his view, there is room only for admiration and reverence. He has been seeking peace and calmness in raillery, but we know that it has not furnished the happiness he sought. Real tranquillity is only to be obtained by a firm belief in those noble truths he has affected to despise. Yet it is in vain for him to attempt to deceive us, in vain to attempt to deceive himself. The ceaseless evolutions of the humorist will not alter our opinions; whether to the last he delights in baffling the critic, or whether he acknowledges his real sentiments, it signifies little to us; we are convinced that he is gradually yielding to the natural impulses of his generous and noble soul, and that in the end the better, the religious feelings of his nature, will be completely triumphant.

One thing alone is wanting in the writings of H. Heine, that is order, rule, harmony—the indispensable concomitant of beauty. There are countless gems of pathos, candour, and, we may even add, of Christian tenderness, scattered throughout his various productions; we have been endeavouring to collect them. The task of the critic will, however, be vain, if you, oh, poet! do not lend your aid. You alone have the power of affixing the seal to it, and of concluding your life in a manner worthy of yourself. It is said that you are writing your "memoirs;" you are summoning before your tribunal all the men with whom you have been associated, and all the literary and moral changes with which your history has been connected, during the first half of the nineteenth century. What a noble opportunity is thus afforded for the expression of the new sentiments which now fill your mind! What food for reflection—for information of every description! Follow the counsels of your inner monitor; shew us, with severe impartiality, the doubts, the failings, the lofty aspirations, and the complete development of your mind. By such a picture great truths will be taught, and the harmony to which your genius aspires, will be the merited crown of your work. Is there not, in every season of life, a vein from which poetry can extract gold? Death to those who witness its approach brings many a lesson. Will not you clothe these lessons in verse and sublime images for the benefit of your fellow-men? Link together the various religious sentiments which lie concealed beneath your sarcasm; present to us the scattered fragments we have collected, in a perfect form and free from alloy. You have been the representative of the disturbed and revolutionary state of Germany: how well would it be were you also the type of its return to real peace and joy!

It is narrated that Dante, towards the close of his life, when wearied by its agitation and conflicts, was wont to walk in the cemetery, and when asked what he sought in that mournful spot, replied: "Peace! peace!" We need not remind you, oh, poet! who is the author of peace; you have yourself celebrated him, when, through the mists of the North Sea, you had so dazzling a vision of Jesus Christ: "Clothed in a white flowing garment, of colossal stature, he was walking on the sea and land. He extended his hands in the attitude of blessing over the earth and ocean, whilst his head reached unto the heavens. Like a heart in his bosom he wore the sun, the red flaming sun, and this flaming sun poured forth the rays of his grace, his lovely, blessed light, which illumined and renewed the universe."

AN ORIENTAL FETE-CHAMPETRE.

WHO that has ever travelled through a rich and luxurious country, but has at one time or another alighted upon some locality which seems never to have been destined to be trodden by the foot of man, certainly never intended for his habitation? whose peculiar beauty seems to have marked it out as a temple in which nature is to be worshipped, or rather the God of nature, through his works; for the thing created, ought not, in man's estimation, to receive the honours belonging exclusively to the hand of Him who made it. And the very fact, that such spots as these owe nothing to the ingenuity of man, are neither arranged nor planted by him, but grow up spontaneously, as if to be enjoyed without labour and cost, should not be without its proper influence. How pathetically Milton laments the absence of that organ which deprived him of such gratification as the natural world reveals to us, and of the instruction it offers:—

"Seasons return, but not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of even or morn,
Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
But cloud instead, and ever-during dark
Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men
Cut off, and for the book of knowledge fair,
Presented with an universal blank
Of nature's works, to me expunged and ras'd,
And wisdom at one entrance quite shut out."

If the "light of the body is the eye," it is scarcely less the light of the mind, irradiating its darkness by the glorious shinings of the visible world, and imparting to it an intelligence which no one of our other faculties can give. But, unhappily, we are too often compelled to admit the want of a right appreciation of the beautiful as a teacher of wisdom; we close our hearts, if not our understandings, against its lessons. "The eyes of rich and poor, of educated and unlearned," said an eloquent Irish nobleman, Lord Dufferin, the other day, when addressing the patrons and pupils of the Belfast School of Design, "are too often shut up to the majesty and loveliness of nature; and we go forth upon our way, and pass along the beautiful earth, and hear the rushing winds careering in triumph over its bosom, and see the golden clouds heaped up in domes and towers, and girded at the far horizon with flaming walls, like the distant ramparts of lost Paradise; but our faces are bent upon the ground, and we perceive not the glory and the good of these things and we hurry to the marts of men and are very eager in our affairs; and we return to our homes weary and unsatisfied, little reeking of the beautiful pictures nature has been painting for us, to win our love from this world, to remind us of the better world to come, and to speak to us the goodness of the great Being who, for the enjoyment of men, has hung the silent dome of heaven with lighted worlds, and called forth the lily on the face of the earth, more lovely in her purity than Solomon in all his glory, and the array and pomp of kings."

It is a singular fact, one scarcely to be accounted for, but it cannot have escaped the observation of some, that we are not unfrequently more impressed by a picture than by the reality; the shadow has greater power over us than the substance. The only solution we can offer of this seeming inexplicable question is, that in a natural landscape, for instance, the eye wanders over a large space of scenery without being able to take in at one view all the beauties it contains; while in a picture, the artist concentrates these beauties into such a compass that the vision embraces them all; added to which, he brings all his imaginative faculties to render the beautiful still more lovely; he clothes it with his own bright verdure, and throws his sunshine and his shadow where each will best contribute to his purpose. Is the world of art, therefore, more fitted for man's admiration than the world of nature? By no means: but the art is to be admired which can so set before us the material creation as to fill the mind with pleasure, and raise it, even by a single step, to a nearer approach towards Him who framed it; and the genius of the painter is to be envied which enables its possessor thus to become the minister of good.

All pictures that are really worthy of the name must, in a degree, exercise such an influence; but there are some especially calculated so to do, such as this oriental scene which Mr. Warren has painted. This artist, who is a distinguished water-colour painter, has passed much time in the east, in Syria and Arabia; most of his pictures are taken from the scenery of those countries, or illustrate the manners and customs of their inhabitants. He has alighted here upon a charmingly picturesque spot, which instantly recalled to our minds a passage in Milton's description of the third day's creation:—

"Forth flourish'd thick the clustering vine, forth crept

The smelling gourd, up stood the corny reed
Embattled in her field, and the humble shrub,
And bush with frizzled hair implicit: last
Rose, as in dance, the stately trees, and spread
Their branches hung with copious fruit, or gemm'd Their blossoms; with high woods the hills were crown'd,

With tufts the valleys, and each fountain side;
With borders long the rivers; that earth now Seemed like to Heaven, a spot where Gods might dwell

Or wander with delight, and love to haunt
Her sacred shades."

Wherever this view was sketched, and it is doubtless from nature, it seems just the spot to attract the thoughtful by its glorious magnificence, and the pleasure-seeker by the templa-tion it offers to luxuriant indolence; the artist has filled it with groups of the latter class. At the base of the distant mountains is a stately edifice, from which, it may be presumed, the party has sailed down the stream in a richly ornamented vessel, moored by the bank just beyond the tall group of trees; to the left of these the slaves and menials are amusing themselves with the dance. In the foreground are the chiefs of the party variously engaged, and having for their companions peacocks and other birds of gorgeous plumage, whose brilliancy adds so materially to the splendour of an eastern landscape. The revellers in Watteau's fêtes-champêtres were surrounded with more of the treasures of art and of the beauty which man has created, but the theatre in which Mr. Warren has placed his, is of nature's own laying out and adornment.

THE CAPTIVE CHIEFS OF MOUNT LEBANON;*

WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF

MY MISSION TO EGYPT IN 1841.

(By the Author of "Reminiscences in Syria," &c. &c.)

THE RETURN OF THE LEBANON CHIEFS, AND MY RECEPTION IN THE MOUNTAIN.

"Now upon Syria's land of roses
Softly the light of eve reposes,
And, like a glory, the broad sun
Hangs over sainted Lebanon."

Moore's Lallah Rookh.

WE had safely reached the termination of our voyage; the corvette lay snugly at her moorings off Beyrout, in the magnificent Bay of St. George; the "Sanita," or Board of Health, had duly paid us their accustomed visit, and, considering all things, let us off very cheaply with a few days' quarantine, including the period of our voyage: an indulgence usually granted to all such vessels of war, us, during their passage, have not experienced any casualty on board.

So rapidly and unaccountably, after our arrival, was intelligence spread abroad of the Tuntu having brought back the exiled mountain chiefs, that scarcely had the boat containing the "Sanita" touched the strand, when crowds of people might be seen assembling on the mole, while boats shoved off in every direction from the shore, and hastily pulled towards the corvette, on approaching which, the numerous passengers they contained gave way to the wildest manifestations of unbridled joy: shouting, singing, and discharging their pistols and firelocks into the air; many of which, being loaded with ball, seriously imperilled the safety of those whom they so clamorously welcomed back to their native land.

In this manner boat loads of visitors rapidly succeeded each other; and, as the day advanced, the scene acquired additional interest, from the circumstance of many of the personal friends and relatives of the exiles having by this time arrived from the mountains, in order to greet, with all the hyperbole of Eastern enthusiasm, the return of those whom they had long, since given up as lost to themselves and to the world—as buried alive in the far-distant mines of Sennaar—or whose bones might ere then have been bleaching under the intolerable heat of a central African sun.

Fruit, wine, and flowers, fresh meat and vegetables, dresses of honour, and changes of apparel—in short, everything which the most tender solicitude could suggest—were eagerly handed up the vessel's side, and the "guardian," who had been left by the "Sanita," experienced no small difficulty in repelling the host of new comers, who threatened to board the vessel, take her by storm, and thus, on their return ashore—to use a quarantine expression—"compromise," or place in quarantine, the whole country for miles around.

So importunate and so numerous at last became these noisy visitors, that the poor guardian, in despair, suggested that the chiefs should be removed to the Lazaret; a proposal to which the Sheikhs and Emirs themselves most gladly gave their assent; for they appeared scarcely to consider themselves as really and safely returned from their distant and involuntary exile, until they should actually have set foot upon their native land.

As I could at the time perceive no objection to this arrangement, I suffered it to take place; but, being well aware of the discomforts of an Eastern Lazaret, I determined, for my own part, to remain on board during the whole period specified for our quarantine, a decision which I had, however, reason afterwards to regret; for French intrigue, constantly on the alert, appeared to have dogged our footsteps from Alexandria, and my absence was taken advantage of, for the propagation of a report that it was through the influence and agency of France, that the exiled mountain chiefs had been sent back to their native land; and I was afterwards informed, that some of the officials attached to the French Consulate at Beyrout had even received the Emirs when they disembarked, accompanied them to the Lazaret, and were not chary in arrogating to their own government a credit which it nowise deserved.

Among the many congratulatory visits paid to the corvette, I must not omit that of my faithful old brother campaigner and dragoman, Giorgio Habbib Giammal, whom I had left in charge of my horses and baggage, when at the conclusion of the war, I had so hastily quitted Jaffa for Alexandria, with important despatches from the Commodore.

Giorgio had safely brought back to Beyrout all the property, goods, and chattels, entrusted to his care; the worthy fellow was in one of the first shore boats which pulled up alongside of the corvette, and while congratulating me heartily on my return, he acquainted me that my old quarters had been made ready to receive me at his house, where the family anxiously hoped to welcome me as soon as I should get out of quarantine.

Giorgio's family circle consisted of his mother, a handsome widow of between thirty and forty years of age, and of two remarkably pretty sisters: the eldest called Nasarah, which may be translated Victoria; whilst the younger one—a merry, dark-eyed young damsel, still in her teens—rejoiced in the scriptural appellation of Sarah, a name common amongst the Christian, as well as Jewish maidens in the East. By a fortunate concurrence of circumstances I had, on first landing in Syria the year before, been admitted the welcome inmate of this hospitable abode, where I passed most agreeably what would have otherwise been, no doubt, a very tedious winter residence of many weeks at Beyrout. However, as Giorgio's relatives professed, like himself, the Christian faith, and belonged to the Greek Syrian Church, the ladies of the family did not deem it incumbent to maintain with respect to me, that seclusion and reserve which custom would have entailed upon them, had they received under their roof a guest of the Mahommedan belief.

I had been first presented to Giorgio by his own brother-in-law, Assaad-el-Kyat: a talented young Syrian, who had spent many years in England, and had, I believe, been educated at one of our universities, and with so favourable an introduction, I at once made my début on the familiar footing of an acknowledged friend—the ladies threw aside that distant reserve, usually shown by Christian females towards strangers, in the East; they soon appeared to consider me as one of their own domestic circle; I conformed to their customs, picked up a little of the language, and, in short, soon found myself perfectly at home.

Some previous knowledge of oriental languages greatly facilitated my colloquial intercourse with the family; and Giorgio being a good Italian scholar, became my dragoman or interpreter, and conjointly with the ladies, took every pains in instructing me in Arabic; but I must candidly confess I took far more pleasure, and found I made much greater progress in conversing with the latter, than I did whilst poring over some old Arabic manuscript with Giorgio, who, a gay, "larking" young fellow, was, sooth to say, far better pleased to strut about the Bazaar, or to be riding my Arab horses, than to play the part of an old moollah, in teaching me my "alif," "bé"—a task he therefore gladly handed over to his mother and sisters, when he found I was nowise opposed to such a plan.

" 'Tis pleasing to be school'd in a strange tongue
By female lips and eyes—that is, I mean,
When both the teacher and the taught are young,
As was the case at least where I have been."

The teachers on this occasion were young, pretty, amiable, and most persevering in their attempts at instruction; nor was their pupil then too old duly to appreciate such kindness, or such an agreeable method of acquiring a smattering of Arabic—that most difficult of all the known languages in the world. By degrees, the friends and neighbours of the family likewise became familiarised with the Frankish stranger, would often of an evening assemble, in friendly réunion, at Giorgio's house; when the song, the joke, or the recital of some wondrous Eastern tale, would merrily go their round; and under these circumstances, it will not be deemed matter of surprise, that time should, during the period when I was thus engaged, have passed most rapidly and pleasantly away; that, after a prolonged absence, I should on returning to Beyrout, feel anxious once more to behold my hospitable friends; or that the intervening time, which I was doomed to pass in quarantine, should have appeared intolerably long.

And yet, during this period of incarceration, there wanted not subjects to interest the most unobservant, in that beautiful bay of St. George, where the corvette lay slumbering at anchor, as on an unbroken sheet of transparent glass.

The last time I had before witnessed St. George's Bay, was in the depth of winter, during a terrific storm—the sea was then rolling in, mountains high, towards the shore—an English three-decker, the Princess Charlotte, was pitching and straining on her cables, in such a fearful way as to render it matter of doubt if she could possibly weather out the gale, which increased to a regular hurricane, as we were at last driven by its violence, from the position we had taken upon the beach, after being completely saturated by clouds of flying spray, carried by the wintry blast even along the mountain's side. All nature was convulsed, and appeared to labour under the most fearful throes: such was the scene on which, some few months before, I had turned my back—but how altered was the prospect which we now beheld!

Spring, a genial Eastern spring, now spread a glorious mantle of brightest green o'er the gardens and orchards of the surrounding plain, where the prickly cactus, and the graceful date tree—unmistakable types of a tropical vegetation—mingled with tall, waving, sugar-cane-like reeds, were united by the twining tendrils of the vine, to the fig-tree, the mulberry, the blossoming almond, the gaily flowering peach, or other productions of a more temperate—of quite an Italian clime—which, as they gradually receded up the sides of the mountains, commingling with pear, apple, and walnut-trees, till they, in their turn, were lost amidst masses of dark northern pines, standing out in bold relief against the hoary summits of El Sinnecn, that highest range of the mighty Lebanon, “ Whose head in wintry grandeur towers,

Shrouded in eternal sleet;
While summer, on a bed of flowers,
Lies gently smiling at her feet.”

Then the immediate vicinity of the bay itself, what memorials rife with interest did it not perpetually recall!

There—full in view—stood the far-famed chapel of Saint George, which gives its nomenclature to the encircling gulf; and where, if tradition deserveth any faith, our tutelary saint is said to have vanquished his terrific dragon foe. Following further on the devious windings of the shore, as it bites into the mountain's base, the eye can distinctly mark a narrow causeway, scooped out of the overhanging cliff: the path by which the great Sesostris once led to further conquests his victorious hosts; leaving as memorials, by the way, huge sculptured figures, carved out of the living rock, and discernible with a good telescope, even from the distance where our vessel lay.* History tells us, of Roman legions having frequently trodden this very path, more recently traversed by conquering British tars, where in 1840, a landing was effected by Sir C. Napier, previous to the capture of Beyrout; but the Commodore's position at Djouni is now hidden from our view by yonder bluff projecting mass of rock, behind whose dark shadow flows the mystic Lycus: “called sometimes,” quoth old Maundrell, “the river Canis, and by the Turks, at this day, Nahr-el-Khelb,” or River of the Dog.†

From such objects of interest, turn we now towards the south; and here again shall we behold fresh tokens of British valour, commingled with numerous monuments—although

* Maundrell mentions these sculptural figures, and Herodotus (Euterpe, CVI.) says that “Sesostris erected pillars in the places which he conquered,” some of which the “Father of History” says he himself beheld in Syria. The author of these pages took a sketch of one of these gigantic figures, which has the appearance of being of either Egyptian or Assyrian origin.

† Maundrell says: “It derives its name from an idol in the form of a dog, or wolf, which is said to have pronounced oracles at the place.” The religion of the Druses, of which so little is yet known, is supposed to have some relation with the worship of the dog, as well as with that of the calf, both probably of Egyptian derivation.

prostrate—of ancient classic art, together with with more recent mementos of a barbarous feudal age. Yonder solidly constructed edifices commemorate the rude though chivalrous times of the enthusiastic Crusaders, when our gallant countrymen, headed by a Richard or an Edward, fought under the banners of the Cross. Those massive, though now crumbling castles, shot-riddled and shaken to their very base, bear witness to the terrific power of British broadsides, which blew St. Jean d'Acre into the clouds. Yonder mole, projecting from the town of Beyrout, into the bay, on which may be seen ever sauntering such motley groups, is formed of pedestals and pilasters, of broken shafts and capitals, the former classic supports of palaces or temples adorning the favourite Berytus—the “Julia Felix,” of Augustus; or they may perchance be even the far, far more ancient relics of the idol, “Baal-Berith,” from whence Beyrout is said to have derived its actual name. Thus, do we tread on the memory of the past! Thus, do successive generations ever crowd upon and trample the ashes of those who have gone before!

Our tedious quarantine came at last to a close; the time for moralizing was also past, as, once more restored to freedom, I early on the day of my liberation landed near the Lazaret, shortly after the Sheikhs and Emirs had likewise been set free; hastening forward, I overtook my former charges, as they were being escorted in triumph by some Frenchmen, who had been awaiting their release.

This confirmed what I had heard of the French having taken to themselves the credit of their return—an impression I took every means in my power to dispel; nor do I believe that the chiefs themselves were for a single instant duped by these false reports; for, on joining the party increased to an immense number by their friends, relatives, and followers, who had fallen in with the procession—I was received with expressions of the warmest and most enthusiastic gratitude; one and all inviting me to visit them at their mountain homes, where, they assured me, I should be considered, not as a stranger, but as one of themselves.

“My son, my deliverer,” said Hamoud-el-Neked, the venerable old Druse, as he pressed me to his breast; “come thou speedily to Dhair-el-Kamar, that my family and my people may prove that gratitude is not unknown to the Druse, and that thou mayest relate the same, to our protector and saviour. the “Komodor el Kibir.”

As he uttered these words, the old warrior vaulted on his fiery steed; for a second, stood erect in his stirrups, then pressing their sharp edges against the glossy flanks of his noble charger, and uttering a loud cry of joy and exultation, he dashed off with his gallant retinue towards the “Palace of the Moon.”*

The rest of the chiefs, all equally anxious to rejoin their families, followed the example of old Hammoud-el-Neked; and after earnestly pressing me to visit them as soon as possible—amidst deafening cries of triumph, discharges of pistols and muskets, prancing of horses, flourishing of sabres, and brandishing of spears, they severally dispersed, and galloped towards their respective homes; leaving my friend Giorgio to conduct Tanta my little Ethiopian page, and myself, towards his hospitable abode, where I was received with all the warmth and cordiality of an old and valued friend—even Saade, the negro slave girl, displaying, in a broad grin of satisfaction, the pleasure she felt at my return.

By the time I had received the congratulations, and partaken of the ample repast provided for me by my kind and hospitable hosts, it was too late to think of proceeding that day to Hamanah, the residence of the Emir Beschir Cassim, the grand prince of Mount Lebanon, to whom I deemed it incumbent to offer my homage, and report as soon as possible in person, my return with his noble exiled subjects; more especially after what I had heard and seen of those intrigues and false reports which had recently been set on foot and of the unwarrantable means by which French influence was attempted to be re-established in the Lebanon, by their agents at Beyrout.

Hamanah being however situated on an elevated portion of the mountain, fully at a distance of six hours—and that over a most steep and rugged path—from the town of Beyrout, I deemed it best to despatch a messenger to the Emir Beschir (who, by the way, was an old acquaintance and fellow-campaigner, and to whom I had already written on arriving at Beyrout), announcing the release of the chiefs and myself from quarantine, and the intention of paying my respects to his Highness on the following day. Pursuant to this plan, I started next morning—accompanied by my dragoman—at early dawn. Giorgio had evidently, during my absence, done every justice to the horses which had been entrusted to his care. I found my favourite old flea-bitten Arab charger (a present from the commodore) in high condition, full of mettle and fire, and most eager for a gallop, in which I failed not to indulge him to his heart's content, as soon as—having issued from the deep, sandy, hollow ways, overhung with cactus and waving canes, which intersect in every direction the mulberry orchards and gardens surrounding the town—we had emerged on that level, pine-covered plain beyond, which is called the wood of Fakr-el-Din, from having, it is said, been planted by the celebrated Druse chieftain of that name, whose palace is still the principal ornament of Beyrout.

* The literal translation of Dhair-el-Kamar, the principal residence of the Druses, situated in the Lebanon, a few miles to the S. E. of Beyrout.

A broad sandy tract traverses this thinly-planted forest of gigantic trees; it was here that we gave our gallant steeds their head, and they carried us rapidly to the foot of that lower range of the Lebanon, whose sides are, in this part, under full cultivation of the mulberry and the vine.

As we continued to ascend, the ruggedness of the steep mountain paths obliged us soon to slacken our previous headlong course; our panting steeds now toiled more soberly up the rocky way, and, as we approached a little hamlet overlooking the well watered and fertile valley of Sharoer, I was surprised to behold an approaching cavalcade, headed by the Emir Mahmoud, one of the quondam captive chiefs, who having heard of my intended visit to the Grand Prince, had taken this opportunity to welcome me to the "Djebel,"* at the head of his numerous relatives, and of all such of his clan as he could hastily collect.

Setting at naught the steep and rugged nature of the path, the Emir—mounted on a noble desert steed, and magnificently arrayed in crimson cloth and gold—bounded forward with his brilliant cavalcade, at the very top of their horses' utmost speed, discharging, as they approached, their firelocks and pistols in the air; the mountaineers on foot, following meanwhile as they could, but likewise blazing away with all their might.

I had reined in my horse, to witness so unusual and so unexpected a sight; when, advancing at full gallop, the Emir and his friends suddenly pulled up within a yard of where I stood, and instantly sprung from their saddles to the ground.

* The "Mountain," as the Lebanon is always "par excellence" called by its inhabitants.

I likewise dismounted, was warmly embraced, by my former shipmate, and had in a similar manner to run the gauntlet of half a score of rough, well-bearded faces, appertaining to as many stalwart mountaineers, immediate relatives of the Emir Mahmoud, who appeared eager to outdo each other in expressions of delight, welcomed me with all the high-flown compliments of the East, and thanked me in the warmest terms for having brought back to them their relative and chief, who insisted on my then visiting his residence, situated only a few hundred yards off the road.

Once more in the saddle, volley in rapid succession followed volley, as we clattered up the mountain path. The terrace-roofs of the little hamlet we now approached, were crowded with the families of the mountaineers, whose daughters, wives, and sisters showered blessings and flowers down upon me as I passed. On returning their kind greetings, I beheld many a handsome though sun-burnt face, no longer shrouded by the envious veil, now freely floating from the "Tontura,"† on the fresh morning breeze. The ruddy and cheerful countenances of these peasant girls, beaming with all the glow of spirits and of health, were marked by the peculiar characteristic of female beauty of this region of alternate sun and cloud, where the full melting eye of deepest blue is oft shadowed by a fringe of long lashes, black as jet; and the warm stream of life of this southern clime flows beneath a skin not less fair—though from exposure far more bronzed—than that of Spain's mantilla'd daughters, whose tresses are not darker than the raven locks of these light-hearted and merry mountain maids!

On entering a sort of walled-in court, surrounding the residence of the Emir Mahmoud, he proceeded further to enact the part of the hospitable host, by again welcoming me to his abode, and—what I considered a far greater compliment—the inmates of his harem approached likewise to do the same.

Although amongst the Christian Maronites of Mount Lebanon the women are not secluded, as is customary with the Druses, or those professing the Mahomedan belief; and although the female peasantry of the mountains generally participate in the labours of the field, still, those of a higher order are seldom beheld by strangers, and I therefore took it as a compliment that exception should have been made in my own peculiar case.

"But," observed the Emir, "Komodor El-Sghier ('little commodore,' as I was often called in contradistinction to the 'Governor,' who was universally known as 'Komodor-el-Kibir' or the 'Great,') you are no stranger; we all consider you now as one of ourselves, one of our own family, and our wives and daughters also look upon you as such."

These assurances—and I believe them to have been sincere—were corroborated by such pretty speeches from such pretty and rosy lips, that, albeit not by nature very bashful, I felt somewhat at a loss how to reply, more particularly as my stock of Arabic "Tickle," or complimentary phrases, at no time very plentiful, appeared now to be completely worn out.

I, however, announced, with becoming modesty, that, in bringing back the mountain chiefs, I was only a humble instrument in executing those promises previously made by the Commodore: promises, the fulfilment of which, had received the full sanction of our most gracious Queen, who would, I felt convinced, ever regard the inhabitants of the Lebanon as her friends, and ever have their interest at heart.

I had, with the assistance of Giorgio, got thus far in my harangue, when, to my great satisfaction, a tray, laden with refreshments, was brought in, deposited on a small ebony stand richly inlaid with mother-of-pearl, around which we all seated ourselves in oriental fashion, on carpets spread upon the floor.

The brimming bowl now rapidly went round, well charged with luscious mountain wine, and there is no saying how long these revels might have been prolonged, had there only been leisure to indulge in all those friendly sentiments which appeared to predominate in every breast. We had, however, before us a long and tedious march; I urged the necessity of our departure; and a pipe of purest Latakia, inhaled through a green rose-wood tube, brought our "déjeuner" to a close.

Amidst a profusion of blessings and "Mah Salemehs" (peace be with thee), from the gentler portion of our hospitable hosts, I remounted my horse, and was accompanied for several miles of that rugged mountain path, by the kind-hearted Emir and his friends, who saw me fairly into the valley of Hamanah ere they took their final leave.

The return of the chieftains from Alexandria, had spread like wildfire amongst the hills, as had likewise apparently the report of my visit to the Grand Prince; for groups of peasants, with offerings of fruits and milk, beset me frequently on the way; and as we traversed some of the little hamlets in the upper regions, their families, as before, blessed me as I passed, and cast down flowers at my feet.

The town, or rather village of Hamanah, situated in the very heart of Mount Lebanon, at the head of a deep valley, or more properly speaking, of a frightful yawning ravine, called the "Wad-é-Nahar-é-Kibir," is approached by a narrow pathway, winding for several miles along the foot of the high and precipitous crags, forming here the base of the "Djebel Kneissi," which on the right-hand side rises perpendicularly as a wall, to the height of several hundred feet. On the left, at the foot of a nearly equally precipitous, though in some parts thickly wooded ledge, madly foams the roaring torrent of the Nahr-é-Beyrout, which, rising amidst the eternal snows of the Sinneen, precipitates itself through the valley of Hamanah in its rapid course to St. George's Bay.

As we continued gradually to ascend, all signs of habitation, and even of animal life, seemed to disappear: nothing met our eye save bare, barren, and frowning rocks, over which occasionally bounded some of those long-eared mountain goats peculiar to this part of the world. One solitary eagle we also saw, which—sweeping majestically over the cliffs above our heads—soared high across the valley which intervened, and was soon lost amidst the cloud-capped heights beyond.

A bend of the ravine brought us suddenly in sight of Hamanah, and of a numerous band of well-armed and well-mounted cavaliers, who, on being aware of our approach, advanced to our encounter, with the same display of "fantasias," and a similar expenditure of gunpowder, such as I have already had occasion to describe.

This body—the "élite" of the mountain horse—was commanded by the Emir Abdallah, a younger brother of the Grand Prince, whose acquaintance I had formed before. Cordially greeting me as an old friend, we hastened onwards together to the residence of the Grand Prince, who was expecting my arrival, and whose reception was likewise warm and friendly in the extreme.

The Emir Beschir Cassim—at that time the Grand Prince of Lebanon—was a nephew of the old Emir Beschir, who had, through a life of iniquity, extended to upwards of four-score years, so long tyrannized over the Mountain, had—from the period of the siege of Acre, by the French, and even previously—been the instigator and perpetrator of such numerous crimes and dark intrigues, and had been, since the expulsion of Ibrahim Pasha, sent, with his family, to live in exile, at Lavalette; whilst his nephew, Cassim, at that time upwards of seventy years of age, was placed—it is said, very injudiciously—to govern the Lebanon in his stead.

The Emir Beschir Cassim was a harmless, good old man, but not possessed of that decision of character and determination of purpose requisite to rule those turbulent mountain races during such stirring and troublous times. His reign was consequently short; he was, a few months after the occurrences here described, replaced by a Turkish Pasha,* and sent to end his days either at Broussa or Stamboul.

At the period to which I refer—viz., in 1841—the Emir Beschir Cassim was the recognised paramount Chief of all the Lebanon mountain tribes, whose unruly turbulence he was, however, never able to control; and the very appearance of the good old Prince betrayed that kindness and easy good-nature, unfitting him for a post which could only be maintained by the sterner qualifications of a far more active, determined, and energetic mind.

The Prince was a great ally of the Commodore: we had also during some portion of the Syrian war, been fellow-campaigners in the field; and he received me with all the kindness of a parent, and the warmth of a valued friend. The old Prince, after embracing me according to the fashion of the "Djebel," called me affectionately his child and his son, and expressed the high sense of what—he said—his people and himself must, and would ever feel, for all that the gallant Commodore had done in their behalf; acknowledgments in which I likewise came in for a share far greater than I deserved.

I explained to his Highness all the difficulties I had encountered, both at Cairo and Alexandria, in executing the mission with which I had been charged—difficulties which I unhesitatingly attributed to what I considered their true cause—viz., French diplomacy and intrigue; nor did I fail to expatiate on the circumstance, when at my recent landing at Beyrout, the same means had been employed, in order to arrogate solely to the interference of France, the merit of liberating the captive mountain chiefs.

The old Prince listened attentively to my tale; then, touching me on the shoulder, as he puffed forth a volley of smoke from his chibouque—"Mâ-be seil," "never mind," said he, "never mind; the Mountain and myself well know what we owe to England, and to that son of valour, and star of bravery: the gallant Komodor. You, also, my son, have played right well your part; and the recollection of all this will be everlastingly engraved upon our hearts. Let us now provide for your immediate wants, for hunger you undoubtedly must feel, after so long a ride. We will then go and see some of those old acquaintances whom you met before, at Kabalies, and lastly at Jaffa, when I took leave of you, on your departure for that mission which you have, through many difficulties, so successfully fulfilled."

So saying, the Prince—Haroun-el-Reschid-like—thrice clapped his hands; at which signal, numerous attendants, bearing trays covered with savoury kababs and rich pilafs—with leben and knafeh—with an endless variety of soups and of sweets—instantly appeared upon the scene. Of all these good things did I partake with an appetite sharpened by the keen mountain air; and at the conclusion of the feast, we adjourned to a spacious level piece of ground, where some hundreds of the Prince's cavalry—part of the force which had accompanied him during the late campaign—were drawn up in martial array.

A "field-day" next ensued, which though probably very different from a similar performance on Hounslow-leath, possessed nevertheless, peculiar merits of its own; and when concluded, was followed by the national exercise of the djereed, or casting of the spear.

Want of space precludes me, however, from here detailing the particulars of that martial game, in which these warlike mountaineers so much excel—from detailing the full extent of hospitality I experienced in every part of the Lebanon which I visited on that occasion—and for the same cogent reason, I must now abruptly conclude this account of the "return of the Mountain Chiefs," by informing my patient, and—I hope—indulgent reader, that, shortly after the events above described, I received an order to rejoin my regiment at Gibraltar; and with most unfeigned regret did I bid adieu to Mount Lebanon,—to the sunny land of Syria,—and to all the kind friends I had been so fortunate as to make whilst there.

* Another instance of that bad faith of the Porte towards the inhabitants of the Lebanon, which must, sooner or later, bring its rule over the "Mountain" to an inevitable close. As these lines are going to the press, the account of another insurrection of the Druses has just come from the Levant.

PHOEBE FORTESCUE'S ACCOUNT OF THE DUKE'S FUNERAL.

Communicated by the Author of "Mary Powell," &c.

MADAM,—My mistress told me that as I waited well, and was in nice new mourning, I might help to attend on the company who had bought tickets for the seats at the front windows of our first floor, to witness the mournful, majestic spectacle which took place yesterday. I will not waste my time, which is limited, in mentioning the trouble and confusion which previously took place, in clearing away stock and household furniture, for the reception of spectators, nor the noise and untidiness occasioned by the carpenters putting up the seats, on which people were to be ranged as close as flower-pots on the shelves of a nursery-man's green-house, nor the inconvenience and hindrance to trade, because these were incidental to the occasion. Some of us sat up all night on Wednesday, for the frontage was very much exposed, by reason of the first-floor sashes being taken out. I had, however, three hours' sound sleep in bed, for my mistress said I must be fresh, as I had a long day's work before me; and then I got up, and we all had a hearty breakfast at three o'clock in the morning, and then we began to cut sandwiches. For my master, having been handsomely paid for the tickets, was resolved to do the whole thing genteelly, and charge nothing for a liberal supply of white and red wine, and ham and beef sandwiches. And Thomas and I were continually to proffer them to the company, and make ourselves generally useful, till the procession came in sight, when we had liberty to peep at it any way we could.

Well, I looked out of window before I bandolined my hair, to see what the weather was; and finding it did not rain, I could not help returning thanks for the same, though briefly, in my prayers; considering how many persons' health might depend on it, not only in the way of pleasure and curiosity, but of absolute duty—many of them the best and greatest in the land—and many others, very obscure, but of great importance to their own humble circles and households.

I could not help noting how curious it was to see every house, at that early hour, full of lights, and of people in full activity. Sure, London was never before so universally awake and astir so early! and as for cabs, they seemed to have been plying all night. Strong barriers were erected on each side of Ludgate-hill, between the road and foot pavement, to prevent the crowd from encroaching on the procession; and men were busily spreading sand along the paving-stones of the road, all along the line.

Some of our company arrived as early as five o'clock, and were stowed away above and below, for what with persons who paid, and friends who did not, we received about two hundred. Some of the workmen, who had put up the seats, were mightily obliged to my master for allowing them the privilege of sitting astride on the top of the roof; and of four very genteel young men, friends of our shopmen, one availed himself of a little sloping penthouse, scarce the width of a man's body, just at the top of the shop front, in such a perilous position, that it turned me quite sick to look at him; another, whose head was not quite so steady, preferred lying all along, on his chest, with his face just peeping over the edge, like a stuffed crocodile at the British Museum; while two others sat one on each side our lath and plaster royal arms, one with his arm round the neck of the lion, the other round the unicorn, supporting the supporters as one may say; and, as the whole affair was but gimcrack (being never intended for such an use), there was great likelihood that supporters and supporters would share one common fate, and tumble down like Jack and Gill, that went up-hill, to fetch a pail of water.

As day began to dawn, people began to collect on the pavement, till at length they were as tight packed as figs in a drum; without seeming to consider or care for the many hours they must stand, pinioned in their places with nothing to look at except their neighbours. An old general, who was one of our first floor guests, began to speculate upon how many thousands would assemble, and he observed, that the only man who knew how to organize vast numbers of human beings was the man whose loss we were deploring, and that he had always had a dread of the assemblage of a vast, undisciplined mob in the streets of London. And perhaps, he added, this presence of evil would have its reasonableness verified this very day. However, this old gentleman evidently belonged to the Croaker family; and, as it would be neither kind nor polite to mention his real name, I will supply it by that of General Croaker; and, if there is any real gentleman of that name, I hope he won't take the liberty amiss, for I am not aware that there is such a person.

Carriages now began to set people down as fast as they could; for the time was at hand when they would not be admitted through the barriers. Our company had now all assembled; they were all of the genteel class, though some were a good deal higher than others; but they were all very accommodating and harmonious. One or two brought books, but there was not much reading; and a gentleman observed that people might sometimes be much more sensibly employed, in noticing, and reflecting on passing objects, than in perusing a book that might be read when there was nothing interesting to see. However, at this time, I must say, that except the crowd, and a few soldiers keeping the ground, there was little or nothing to see, except a poor little, terrified dog, running up and down the road, which was hooted after, and laughed at from Temple Bar to Ludgate-street. The general's daughter, a very pretty young lady, with large hazel eyes, called her papa's attention to what she called "the susurra of the multitude," which I suppose was the rumour or hum that was constantly to be heard, like the wind sighing through a forest or innumerable bees among lime-blossoms. This was prettier to hear, and more solemnizing, than peals of silly laughter at a poor little dog running along from one end of a street to the other. The penny-postman had much ado to deliver his letters, being obliged to pass them over the heads of the crowd.

At length, soldiers began to form in close file down each barrier, so as completely to line the road; but without molesting the bystanders. All this while, minute guns were firing, and the little bell of St. Paul's tolling, though scarce to be heard, by reason of the susurra the young lady mentioned. And now came a solemn pause; for the crowd became aware, though we did not, of a rumour from afar, and every tongue was hushed, all mirth, all fatigue forgotten. Our company became absorbed in expectation; and, as they needed no more attendance, I availed myself of a very good loophole of observation. After a little while, we heard the faint wail of distant solemn music; it came nearer and nearer, and at length paused right before our house, and after playing awhile, proceeded slowly to the cathedral, mournfully dying off. The general's daughter, who seemed a tender-spirited young lady, put her handkerchief to her eyes, and I heard her tell her papa that the music was Beethoven's Funeral March. Then came the horse soldiers, in companies of 600; oh, how gallant, how brave a show! The general knew them all; and I heard him tell them over—the Life Guards, some in scarlet, some in blue; the Rifles, in dark green; the splendid Scots' Greys, on their grey chargers; the Royal Marines; the Hussars, in green and gold, with faces that would look terrible to their enemies; the light, lithesome Lancers, so young, so comely! I thought of Asahel, the younger brother of King David's commander-in-chief, that was light of foot as a roe.

I may own to you, sir, that being timid and ignorant, I have had some secret troubles of late about the French; hearing that the great Duke himself, who knew them best, distrusted them; but I must say that these samples, as it were, of the troops our country can turn out, reassured me greatly; for every man of them looked equal to the overthrow of a dozen foreigners, of what nation soever; and I think this peaceful display of warlike power very well-timed, when so many young men are wanted for volunteers; and that, even in his coffin, the Duke is thus still doing us good.

But now came a hollow sound, it is utterly impossible for words—my words—to describe; and up came the heavy artillery, each gun-carriage drawn by six coal-black horses, in harness almost as fine as spun silk, in comparison of the heavy weight it drew after it. What guns! what death! Then, the light artillery; four horses. Two artillerymen seated on each gun-carriage.

Music wailing, again—"The Dead March in Saul." And then the infantry; tramp, tramp, very slowly; eyes cast down, sadness on their faces, muskets reversed, and trailing behind them in slings. Ah, how mournful!

Kettle-drums, all craped, rolling evermore a hollow, muffled sound. The old Waterloo heroes, poor old Chelsea pensioners, as much as was left of them; white-haired, shattered, weary old men, with the medal glittering on their breasts, just to remind us silently how much we owed them for every blessing we enjoy.

Then the English standard, carried by a lieutenant-colonel, supported by two captains on horseback. There was just air enough stirring to make it unfurl, and droop again—just enough sunshine to light it up, without making the scene too gay: for even Nature seemed to sympathize.

Sad, sighing music again. Then, a long array of mourning carriages, containing deputations from the many public bodies to whom the Duke belonged, all of whom had reason to lament their loss. The Guidon; another banner. Chaplains, and many officials whom I cannot particularize. The East India Company's representatives. The Wellesley banner. Great officers of state; lords and dignitaries. We saw Mr. Disraeli well, for there was a halt just as he passed our house. The Speaker, in his state-coach. The Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, in their state-coaches.

And, now, all the grenadiers lining the road presented their arms, and saluted Prince Albert, in twentics at a time. It had a striking effect, to see the salute running along the line. The Prince took no notice: he was attentively reading the burial service, and looked neither right nor left. His carriage was drawn by six noble black horses.

Then came the Great Banner, scarcely unfurling its heavy folds. Then, the Duke's butons, trophies of the distinctions he had received from grateful foreign countries, borne by the Duke of Osuna, the Duke of Teicirn, Prince Gortchakoff, Count de Nostitz, Baron d'Omphal, and General Falkett. The baton of England was borne by the brave old Marquis of Anglesca.

Then came the remains of him we mourn—drawn by twelve of the largest, heaviest, strongest, coal-black horses, before whom the others looked as grasshoppers. They were veiled in velvet, and erape, and feathers, so as scarcely to be distinguishable. Directly the funeral car came in sight, every grenadier grounded his musket, bent his fur-capped head on it, and covered his face with his hands, as if in tears. It was a touching thing, that. The car itself was most majestic!—of solid bronze, supporting an immense bier, covered with a sumptuous black velvet pall, embroidered with silver flowers; on which, at a height parallel with our first-floor windows, rested the uncovered coffin of scarlet and gold, which was surmounted by a gorgeous yet airy Indian canopy, of amber colour, raised on four huge halberts. There was nothing to compare in interest with this sublime spectacle, (though the chief mourner came after, with the blinds of his mourning-coach closely drawn down,) unless it was the pathetic sight of the poor horse, his head abased, his whole appearance crest-fallen and dejected. When the last band had played its last tune, just before St. Paul's, it ended with four plaintive chords, like long-drawn sighs—the very soul of sorrow!

Madam, the post is just going out, and I must end without adding a few appropriate remarks, which were made in a thoughtful spirit by some of our company after the solemnity; but I think that similar ones, of some sort or other, cannot have failed to suggest themselves to almost all reflective and feeling witnesses. For my own part, I shall never forget the nation's tribute to the nation's hero; and I rejoice that so many soldiers saw what honour a nation can pay to a man who prefers duty even to glory.

Your obedient servant,
PHIŒBE FORTESCUE.

BOOKS AND THEIR AUTHORS.

The issue of a regular three volume novel,* by one of the great lights of modern literature, has placed Uncle Tom's Cabin in the shade, and been a peculiar blessing during the late miserable weather, not only to mere novel readers, but to the thousands who admire the caustic humour, and estimate the deep "knowledge" of the so-called "world," as it is possessed and dispensed by the author of Vanity Fair. Mr. THACKERAY has been long known under the quaint sobriquet of "Michael Angelo Titmarsh," and more than suspected, in some of the most popular periodicals of the day, of the authorship of "Tales," "Sketches," and "Correspondence;" all remarkable for their brilliant and biting wit, and some for their ungenerous personalities, which the tone of his more recent and more thoughtful publications would lead us to believe he would "wish to blot." Mr. Thackeray's genius need never have descended to a heedless but piquant style to achieve popularity; he has strength and power to lead in any walk of literature. He is a scholar, a gentleman, an artist, a traveller, and, more than all, a close and uncompromising observer, not only of words but of deeds, not only of deeds, but of what is both difficult and dangerous to interpret—motives. He indulges in few sympathies, and has not many to indulge in; he places his standard of human excellence high, and surrounds it with pitfalls, the marvel being not why so many fall, but how any triumph; he sees the ridiculous in all things, and sees it not to laugh, but to sneer; he is frequently so disagreeably true, that he puts you out of temper with yourself, as well as with others: he pities faults and can forgive crimes, but he has no mercy on foibles; he lashes a fool in his folly to the death—that is to say a male fool—but he has a tenderness towards foolish woman, which is by no means singular in clever men; his amiable women are all weak, and his intellectual ones never more than "clever," and, generally speaking, even in a mild way, utterly good for nothing; he traces the bramble in the rose, and the moth in the sunbeam; he would be a great teacher, were he not so at war with small faults, which poor human nature would rather conceal, and gets irritable at having exposed; so that when he deals a home thrust at a downright vice, it loses its efficacy, from the fact of its being only a stronger thrust than was bestowed upon those little harmless foibles which should provoke a smile rather than a stab. Mr. Thackeray cannot be compared to any of his compatriots; he is more systematically caustic than any living author; for when he warns to a person or a virtue, he relapses into his ungenial mood, as does a miser after a feast, self-accused of too much enjoyment—and yet those flashes of sunshine, those gleams of happiness, are positively delicious; fresh, bright, and glowing; his philosophy is sound and healthy as a sea breeze, and he has a biting contempt for maudlin sentiment. It would be an ill compliment to Mr. Thackeray, to call him either the "Fielding," or the "Smollett" of these our days; for his sarcasm, his vivid views of the consistencies and inconsistencies of human nature, are free from every taint of sympathy with the vices or paltriness he records; and he never shocks his readers by the gross indecency of the one or the other of those strangely overrated men of the past century. Mr. Thackeray has a genuine and gentlemanly respect for the real proprieties of life, with a distinct and positive contempt for the assumption of them. We might almost call him the Hogarth of modern literature; he means to be, and believes he is, true to the actual life he describes, and his not being always so is the result of some undefined constitutional acidity, mingled with a passion for the ridiculous, which renders him the ungenial—while Dickens is the genial—chronicler of men and manners. The novel we have just read is partly historical; and the court of Queen Anne, including the poor Queen herself, is altogether the very sort of royalty which feeds Mr. Thackeray's contempt for the great, and makes him enjoy to repletion. He luxuriates in the heaviness, both mental and bodily, which cumbered the last of the reigning Stuarts, and has drawn such a picture of "the first Pretender" as will prevent his ever venturing with either comfort or security among certain Highland chiefs we wot of; indeed, this portrait stands out from the canvas with painful distinctness; it is as powerful and disagreeable as that of a gloating satyr, so frequently found in the pictures of the old masters; but, as if to prove that the sarcasm we hit against, and which hits against us, is only a part of Mr. Thackeray's character and literature, he has created in Colonel Esmond a hero so gentle-hearted, yet so truly brave—so passionate, yet so pure—so elevated, yet so humble—so manly, yet so unselfish—that we can hardly find his parallel in the whole range of fiction; yet he is so perfectly natural that we, old as we are, believe in him as faithfully as a nun believes in her patron saint. We would not do our readers the injustice to attempt to unravel the plot of a novel which they must read, and cannot read without the deepest interest. Some will enjoy the sarcasm, as people often do when it is their friends, and not themselves, who suffer; others will delight in the vivid sketches of character, the panoramic scenes, the philosophy of the story, and the young and faithful believers in the pure and true

(to whom may God preserve their trust!) will joy, to the end of their lives, in Colonel Esmond. The character is conceived in the spirit of the purest poetry; and though some, especially young-lady-readers, will ever and anon scout the idea of a man loving two ladies at the same time, and absolutely wedding the elder, the "Marrying Man" will at once agree in the wisdom of his choice, and declare that "Dentrix," with all her fascinations, was nothing more than a well-born and more ladylike "Becky," of notorious memory. Mr. Thackeray, in this, as in all his literature, is at times strikingly epigrammatic—conveying as much in a sentence as the generality of authors do in a chapter, and giving his readers abundant food for thought long after his book is closed. It is true there will be at least as much pain as pleasure mingled with the remembrance of what he writes; but it will be remembered, and recalled, and dwelt upon, and thought over.

SIR FRANCIS HEAD, who some years ago galloped "across the Pampus," has made a "boulé" through Ireland. He has spent "A FORTNIGHT" there, and gives us the result in a volume of exactly 400 pages! This is unjust to himself, and unfair to the country. Having never been in Ireland before, he spends fourteen days there, and if he has given us something that is good, and more that is sensible—of course, pretending to nothing that is new—our lament may be, that he did not, by a longer visit, obtain larger knowledge, so that he might really and truly aid the movement that is now progressing in regard to the most capable, and least productive, portion of the dominions of the Queen. Ireland has ever been the victim of haste. There has always been an inclination to deal with her by impulse. A few immatured thoughts seemed enough to give her; and for her practical and permanent good a little loose legislation has appeared sufficient. We speak with reference to her friends, of whom Sir Francis Head is one; and we may grieve and mourn that her destiny has been to receive only the complimentary nothings—the sweet simpers of sympathising admirers, and to be left by them pretty nearly as they found her. Sir Francis is, as has been said, one of her friends. Speaking of the Irish, he says—

"The Irish people, for whom, so long as I may be permitted to live, I shall entertain an unalterable affectionate regard."

Actuated by this feeling, he should have postponed the issue of his book until he could have done more to serve them. His limited knowledge is shown perpetually, from the day of his arrival, when he talks of crossing "Grattan Street"—meaning Grafton Street—to his passage out of the Claddagh at Galway. The brogue of Sir Francis is rather funny. Our Irish friends will smile when they read "jarb" for job, "arn'r" for honour, "orf" for off, "Dhublin" for Dublin, "prato" for parade, "starp" for stop, "wharl" for world, "ut" for it, "thum" for them, "marn" for man, "lum" for him, "whart" for what, "auld" for old, and so forth. Nevertheless, there is much that is valuable in these 400 pages. It might have been given us, indeed, without his having troubled himself to cross the channel. Such, for examples are his account of the Irish constabulary, the National Education, and the College of Maynooth. On these subjects his views are rational and liberal. Of course, they will please neither party, as Sir Francis will find; for no truth is more clear than that he who writes the truth concerning Ireland will have to endure the wrath of many, and receive the thanks of none. In his tour, also, he sees and describes much that is agreeable. He will not raise the Irish character; he sees the people in their utter misery, and he has—rightly—avoided to throw a veil over their wretchedness. But his kindly sympathies are with them, and his generous thoughts are theirs. His remarks upon the “evictions,” the “clearings,” the desolations, in Connemara do him honour. On this terrible theme he is touchingly eloquent. On the whole, if we regret that this book has been published, it is only because we are, in all probability, thus prevented from obtaining from the same hand a much better.

The Colloquies of Edward Osborne.—Are there any in the fair city of London, read in the chronicles of times long past, who do not remember the history of the ancestor of the Duke of Leeds?—how he was a brave, true-hearted City apprentice, how he served his master faithfully, saved the life of his young mistress, and—oh! but we are book-sworn not to tell—we had nearly permitted to escape the mystery of the prettiest and “quaintest” Christmas tale that ever wooed matrons and maids from the concoction of a Christmas pudding, a jar of minced meat, or a bowl of snap-dragon. We would not for the world have this tale—these Colloquies of Edward Osborne—enter our house when we were occupied in much home service, or preparing for a journey, or busied in some weighty literary occupation. It has engrossed us for the better part of a morning; and then we have been forced to read certain passages over again to ourselves, and then to read them aloud to others; and truly we have seen nothing from the pen of our contributor and friend that has given us half so much pleasure, with the exception, perhaps, of a certain MS., which, with others of peerless beauty, will, by God's blessing, commence the next volume of our beloved Magazine. How charming is the grace and freshness with which this City tale is told, how minute the particles that bring forth the whole with so much perfectness and harmony, how delicate the colouring, how perfect the development, how genuine and life-like the characters, how pure the purpose! We know no more fitting gift-book, no work more worthy to grace the table of youth and beauty. We congratulate the publishers on the production of such a “history.” It is right that it comes forth from a City house; and well it comes, in its quaint binding with red edges—which we never see without thinking of Malvolio's cross-quartering and red stockings—in right Christmas fashion. We congratulate everybody who has had anything to do with it, even to the very Diavolo who, in a red worsted comforter, waded through the floods with (careful imp!) the proofs in his rabbit-skin cap; and last, not least, do we congratulate our readers, who, on the first of next month, will commence a legend, as good, of we know who, by—but it is a secret as deep as Waverley—to be revealed HERRAFTER!

* The Colloquies of Edward Osborne, Citizen and Clothworker of London; as reported by the Author of “Mary Powell.” London: Arthur Hall, Virtue, and Co.

The Autobiography of William Jerdan has arrived at its third volume, and our interest in its contents was certainly increased by its dedication to the memory of L. E. L., “to whose genius,” to quote Mr. JERDAN's words, “the Literary Gazette was during many years, indebted for its greatest attractions.” We know this to be entirely true; and we also know, that those portions of the two chapters devoted to memories of this most richly endowed woman, only give her her due meed of praise. She was the most generous of critics, the most affectionate of friends, the most charming of conversationalists, the most unselfish of women. In a long and intimate acquaintance, extending from the year 1825 to the period of her leaving England, during three years of which we were in the habit of seeing her, or hearing from her daily, we saw repeated proofs of her most generous, and self-sacrificing nature—of a highly sensitive and poetic temperament. Schooled to the continual small kindnesses of life—boarding as she did in a school—she accommodated herself with the most loving gentleness to the discipline of school life, dining with the pupils, and sending forth the poetry which delighted the world from a small attic, where her bed, and desk, and little high-backed chair were in such close companionship, that we often wondered how she performed the duties of her careful and elegant toilette. We have known her throw aside a poem to trim her grandmama's cap, or dress a little girl's doll; and this close companionship, while it won both admiration and affection, showed us, frequently and clearly, the one fault to which she owed so much sorrow, and which caused her real character to be so frequently and so cruelly misunderstood and misrepresented. Her poetic temperament was too prone to undervalue fact and over-rate fiction. She never seemed to understand the difference between them, and would frequently give a fact as a fiction, and a fiction as a fact. Her imagination would run away with her judgment, and with her memory, but never with her generosity and kindness. She would say things in playfulness, or for effect, which others would, as we have said, either misunderstand or misrepresent. —Men, too, men! themselves fathers of girls as old as she—whom her innocence and gratitude distinguished—men, to whom she, fatherless, clung for advice and protection—have suffered jests to pass at her expense, which flattered their rancor, while it blotted her reputation, at the time when—we solemnly, and to this hour believe—she was as pure in conduct as unspotted snow. Her genius is beyond doubt or criticism; the memories of her noble qualities are well clustered round the heart of the few who loved her and knew her, as we did. But we shall look with more than anxiety to the future, which Mr. Jerdan promises to write, of this brilliant and unfortunate lady—to clear away the cloud which slander raised to her dishonour; we expect this—we require this—nay, we demand this from her first literary friend.

In point of interest this volume is greatly superior to its predecessors; the very names of those of whom it treats are a galaxy of talent—Coleridge, Disraeli, Gifford, Barry Cornwall, Mrs. Hemans, Theodore Hook, Dr. Kitchener, and hosts of others, who are now with the “past.” Our only regret being that with such opportunities Mr. Jerdan did not take for what he does remember makes us desire more.

He has evidently made up his mind, despite all we believe has been proved to the contrary, that authors are a peculiarly ill-used, miserable, and unhappy race of mortals, whose positions, "when their day is done," can never be traced back to any imprudence, mistake, or mismanagement of their own. Now we are convinced this is not the case—at all events, not to the extent Mr. Jerdan considers.

The feelings, tastes, pursuits, and callings of men of letters are so opposed to what are called, and are in reality "business habits," that they are as incompatible as the duties of the hand with the duties of the eye, though both tend to the establishment of a good order of things; every attempt for the one to do without the other (except, perhaps, in the case of the brothers Chambers,) has been a failure and a ruin. The true wisdom is to draw author and publisher more closely together. If the latter is educated and refined, it is to be hoped he may appreciate the labours of the former, which even Mr. Jerdan seems to admit was the case with the late John Murray; however, as is usual in argument, we have not convinced Mr. Jerdan, and Mr. Jerdan has not convinced us.

Mr. Jerdan writes with much truth and feeling about the late Doctor Maginn, whose wit and learning are now only remembered by a few of his old companions; periodical literature being, in his case, as it always is, the light of the present, the grave of the past. "Billy Maginn," the illuminator of 1820 and 1830, is forgotten; we had a difficult matter to find his grass-grown unrecorded grave in the churchyard of Walton-on-Thames, where we desire to see a little slab to his memory.

Mrs. LEE'S BOOKS.—There are no class of authors to whom we—for our children's sake—were more indebted than to those who crowd around our firesides the tender feelings and pleasant knowledge connected with natural history. It is quite enough to see the name of Mrs. R. LEE on a title-page to ensure our interest and entertainment, and we honestly confess that we have devoured two of this lady's volumes, published in anticipation of the coming Christmas by Messrs. GRANT and GRIFFITH, with more than our usual enjoyment. The first, because the largest, and capable of entertaining and instructing all ages is the Anecdotes of the Habits and Instincts of Birds, Reptiles, and Fishes; the second attracts the attention of childhood at once by its title of Sayings and Doings of Animals, a title, it may be, a little far-fetched; but the short sketches are primitive and pretty. Both books are well got up, and the illustrations are natural and unaffected; perhaps the chief interest in the larger volume is to be attributed to the "Anecdotes of Fishes," of which, of all created things, we know so little—the fishmonger being in general our great authority, or, perhaps, the patient and pertinacious angler, who insists that fishes cannot feel, and so pursues his sport, without an idea that he is practising cruelty either upon worm or fish. Mrs. Lee thinks so rightly, is so impressed with the value of one portion of what is created to the other, that her reasonings impart increased faith and increased happiness to her readers. "Our great Creator," she says, "has provided so many curious contrivances for their (i. e., the fishes) preservation; He has made so many of them valuable to man; He has endowed so large a portion with extreme beauty; He has caused others to be so singular, others, again, so terrible; and He has ordered some so to step from their general character, so to surpass our finite comprehension, so to cheat us of our ideas of fixed laws, that I flatter myself this last portion of my work will afford the same interest to the general reader as those which have had the precedence." The better natural history is understood the more interesting it becomes, and, in an educational point of view, it is of the greatest value, connecting, as it does, the different countries with their animated productions, all expanding into a mighty and perfect whole, each in truest harmony with the other. Mrs. Lee's views are as expansive as her subject, and her well-balanced and harmonious mind gives an additional charm to the knowledge she imparts.

MR. MARMION SAVAGE, of Dublin, who has been long considered the author of The Bachelor of the Albany, and other equally brilliant books, has now thrown off the incognito, and come forth with three volumes, with which his name is given. The Dublin literary school fosters much that is bright and sparkling; there is more badinage, more humour, more taste for practical jokes in Dublin society than in that of any other city, either abroad or at home, that we are even now acquainted with. It is frequently very difficult in a Dublin drawing-room for a quiet, matter-of-fact Englishman to distinguish what is real or unreal, true or untrue; there is so much cross-firing, both local and political, so much "quizz," that, whatever be the final result, the first two or three dinners are certain to bewilder and "bother" the stranger. But after a time it has one advantage; it encourages ease, both of mind and manner; it teaches repartee; it banishes the petrifying, conventional stiffness which often encrusts the rich casket of an English heart; it gives an earnest and hearty tone to society, which, however ephemeral, is decidedly pleasant and cheerful; the men are all gaily and yet bitterly political, the women musical, kindly, and unaffectedly intellectual; the very fierce clashing of opinions sharpens their wits; their arrows are not only ready, but barbed, and any one disposed to listen and observe, taking no particular position, and inclined to ride on both sides of the car, will find more to interest and amuse in a thorough round of Dublin society than in any other of the world. In this society Mr. Marmion Savage has lived; of this he has been long one of those admired and sought after, and, consequently, his tales—though the scenes are in England—savour, in their character, mode of thought, and expression, far more of Ireland than of England. Reuben Medlicott (the title of these pleasant volumes) is developed, from first to last, with great care and fidelity. His character is a study well worthy a high place in literary fiction, and, indeed, all the dramatis persone are sketched and filled out with much more thought and care than the generality of novelists deem it necessary to bestow on what are wrongly termed the minor portions of a book—"The Dean," more especially, is quite Hogarthian. If less brilliant than The Bachelor of the Albany, Reuben Medlicott develops a much higher range of thought and much greater power than anything Mr. Savage has hitherto produced. The motto tells the moral:—Il est propre à tout, disent ses amis, ce qui signifie toujours qu'il n'a pas plus de talent pour une chose que pour une autre: ou, en autres termes qu'il n'est propre à rien.

ALEXANDRE DUMAS.—It is well known that the political occurrences of 1851 in Paris expatriated many of the most brilliant and most remarkable of its literary men, whose politics and popularity rendered them peculiarly dangerous to the new dynasty. Scattered in all directions, they sought refuge in Germany, Switzerland, some few in England, but the greater number claimed the hospitality and protection of Belgium, now the only constitutional monarchy of the continent. To the latter country ALEXANDRE DUMAS shaped his course. And what country would not be proud to receive so distinguished a stranger, and offer him a generous asylum, where he could enjoy the liberty which a truly wise Government never fears to grant! Wherever the great dramatist resides he becomes an object of interest: commanding, as he does, a world-wide fame, all are anxious to offer him the sympathy of their homage. A friend was, a few days ago, so fortunate as to receive an invitation to pass an evening at the house in Brussels which he inhabits, and which, to quote his own phrase, is only “a petit coin,” being a small dwelling in the centre of the Boulevard de Waterloo, in the agreeable city of Brussels. He very kindly writes us the result: “The house has a pleasant view over a valley studded with small hamlets, farm buildings, and vegetable gardens, to the opposite heights of Vleurgat, crowned by the dense agglomeration of trees forming the boundary of the Forest of Soignes. In company with an accomplished young painter of the Belgian school (M. Slingeneer), we rang the bell at the door of the house, and were shortly afterwards admitted into a small square corridor, beyond which folding doors immediately admit visitors into a parlour something like a garden alcove, where the dinner-table still retained evidences of previous occupancy. In describing this apartment as the ‘alcove’ of a garden we, mean that it is so studded with plants and flowers as to bear resemblance to a small conservatory. The floor immediately over, comprising the drawing-room, and the romancist’s bed-chamber, are equally clustered with an extravagant profusion of the beauties of the floral kingdom, intermingled with bronzes, porcelain, mirrors, and all the adjuncts of recherché taste; nor must it be forgotten that in every possible place where draperies of rich stuffs could be suspended they hang in graceful folds, and lend their dazzling hues of gold and vivid colours to complete the singular scene. So much does M. Dumas liken his ‘petit coin’ to a conservatory of rare plants, that he makes it a calenbourg upon his isolation from France, in the following characteristic letter, in the possession of the writer:—

“ Mon Cher,—Il y a un siècle que je ne vous ai vu.
 “ Vous savez que l’homme à la Serre n’a pas même paru Boulevard de Waterloo.
 “ ALEX. DUMAS.”

M. Dumas having dined (our visit was about seven o’clock in the evening), had undressed and gone into bed, where we found him reading the history of the Duke de Guise by the light of a lamp placed on a corner shelf near the head of the bed—of course accompanied by flowers. He said this was his usual habit—to seek repose, generally reading while reclining thus, until ten or eleven at night, when he arose, took his pen, and commenced writing his popular works of fiction. The night before our visit he said he had continued writing through the night until six in the morning. In person, as far as judgment could be formed from seeing him in bed, M. Dumas appears about the middle height, and inclined to be robust. His head is large, and the features have a mild look of bon-homme; perhaps this was occasioned at this time mentally by the affectionate attentions of his daughter, who sat on the pillow beside him and kissed his forehead at intervals, or put her arms round his neck. There is but small trace of his creole origin in the features—the rather fleshy lips and slight tinge of skin are the only indications. The conversation during our visit was lively and agreeable, never in the least approaching to anything assuming or dogmatic. He spoke of being able to read perfectly the English language, but declined to make use of it in conversation. My friend and I sat, at his request, on the foot of the bed, and here we partook of tea, made by his charming daughter before spoken of, a young lady of twenty years of age, or so, who officiated while seated on the pillow near her beloved parent.

Mr. GROOMBRIDGE has again brought Grace Aguilar before the public in a little volume entitled Home Scenes and Heart Studies, which, her mother tells us in the preface, completes her works, adding, that “the wishes of the author of the Women of Israel will be fulfilled, should the unceasing labours of a life, too early closed, awaken sentiments of pure affection, and illustrate by example the delights of Home.” It seems like again parting from this most admirable and amiable woman to peruse her last book; there is something so drury in that word “last” that we cannot but lament she can no more give utterance to those feelings and sentiments so highly wrought, and yet so full of wisdom and purity; but “her handwriting is on the wall,” and both the Christian and the Jew owe her a debt of gratitude. Another edition of The Women of Israel is also just published, in two volumes, which we make no doubt will find, as it deserves, a rapid sale.

THERE are few things more delightful than the combination of art and literature. It is this which has added so many charms to modern books; but when we find a traveller who wields both pen and pencil the enjoyment is considerably increased. Our readers may, perhaps, remember Mr. EDWARD LEAR’S Journals of a Landscape Painter in Albania; he has now sent forth the result of his travels in Southern Calabria, in which his principal object has been to make his journal a landscape painter’s guide book, and he has succeeded to admiration. The illustrations are singularly fresh, and, we believe, faithful, and the accompanying letter-press simple, graphic, and unaffected. We hope Mr. Lear will soon again break new ground.
